RONALD KNOX

Not since St. Jerome has any Catholic attempted to translate the whole Bible by himself. Here is the fruit of Monsignor Knox's colossal labors; the first single volume to contain the whole Bible translated into modern English in a Catholic version. The volume serves as a kind of monument to a practically unique achievement.

Reviewers of all denominations have been unanimous in praise of the quality of Monsignor Knox's work. Its various virtues have been summed up by the English critics. "Indeed it is the style of Mgr. Knox's version that is without question its outstanding merit," says the Times Literary Supplement. "Mgr. Knox encourages us to look for a meaning," adds The Spectator. "No other translation is so invariably intelligent," says the London Tablet, while the Church of England Newspaper commends it for its scholarship, "the work of a scholar with deep human sympathies and a profound experience." The Anglican Bishop of London, writing in the London Sunday Times, summarized the conclusions of the other reviewers when he said, "I know no modern translation of the Bible that is as good as this."

PREFACE

EXACTLY ten years have passed since the Hierarchy of England and Wales authorized the public use of Monsignor Knox's translation of the New Testament. Subsequently, at my request, he published in two volumes his translation of the Old Testament. Since then, certain verbal revisions have been made and now the Hierarchy has authorized for public use Monsignor Knox's translation of the entire Bible. To that authorization the Bishops add, on behalf of the Catholics of this country, their warm commendation and deep gratitude for this splendid work of scholarship and devotion.

The Knox translation has passed rapidly into common usage and has already won world-wide acclaim. Indeed, one may apply to the translator the words of Dr Worthington who, in his preface to the Douay version of 1609, described Gregory Martin and his collaborators as 'well-known to the world, to have been excellent in the tongues, sincere men and great Divines'. High commendation has been given to Monsignor Knox's translation for its freshness of approach, for its lively language and for the ease with which it may be read. Its style has succeeded in giving meaning to passages which in earlier versions have been difficult to understand.

However, it is not for the study of literary style that we read the Bible. This monumental task of translation has been carried through in order to give us a greater knowledge and understanding of inspired Sacred Scripture. We read the Bible in order to increase our knowledge and love of God. St Jerome tells us that 'to be ignorant of Scripture is not to know Christ'. Although Bible reading is not necessary for salvation the Church treasures the Bible as the inspired word of God and with the help of grace we seek its full meaning and apply its message to ourselves.

Whilst there is great need for scientific study of the Scriptures—and we welcome the abundant evidence of such scholarship in this country in recent times—Bible reading is not to be regarded as the prerogative of specialists. For all, the Bible is a rich source of meditation, the ideal spiritual reading. Pope St Pius X tells us that the fruit of scriptural study is threefold: spiritual delight, love of Christ and zeal for His cause. Herein we recognize at once a means by which we may try to fulfil the very purpose of our existence—'to know, love and serve God'.

At the present time when we are confronted with materialist influences and there is such widespread indifferentism, our Catholic people have great need of a profound spirituality based upon knowledge and love of God. The lay apostle is helpless unless he be formed spiritually and doctrinally. Prayer and the sacraments are his strength, the Bible his armour. Indeed, a knowledge of Holy Scripture, bringing meaning to what may otherwise seem empty phrases, is a valuable element in his participation in the Church's liturgy.

It is of the utmost importance that the Bible be looked upon as a whole, not as a mere concatenation of texts. The New Testament, telling us the story of the life of Christ, has an immediate appeal. But the Old Testament must not be neglected and its study will prove rewarding even in regard to the conduct of our daily life. We would see a Bible in every home, a Bible which is read regularly and which has a real bearing upon the life of those who use it. Its very production should be as worthy as possible of the sublime material it contains; easy to read and a joy to handle. It is to meet this need that Monsignor Knox's translation is now presented in one volume and I trust that this version, which has already made so great a contribution to the life of our people, will succeed in giving increasing numbers a greater understanding of the inspired message it bears.

THE OLD TESTAMENT

THE BOOK OF GENESIS

2 GOD, at the beginning of time, created heaven and earth. Earth was still an empty waste, and darkness hung over the deep; but already, over its waters, stirred the 3 breath of God. Then God said, Let there 4 be light; and the light began. God saw the light, and found it good, and he divided the spheres of light and darkness;
5 the light he called Day, and the darkness Night. So evening came, and morning, 6 and one day passed. God said, too, Let a solid vault arise amid the waters, to keep 7 these waters apart from those; a vault by which God would separate the waters which were beneath it from the waters 8 above it; and so it was done. This vault God called the Sky. So evening came, and morning, and a second day passed.

9 And now God said, Let the waters below the vault collect in one place to make dry 10 land appear. And so it was done; the dry land God called Earth, and the water, where it had collected, he called the Sea.
11 All this God saw, and found it good. Let the earth, he said, yield grasses that grow and seed; fruit-trees too, each giving fruit of its own kind, and so propagating itself 12 on earth. And so it was done; the earth yielded grasses that grew and seeded, each according to its kind, and trees that bore fruit, each with the power to propagate its own kind. And God saw it, and found it 13 good. So evening came, and morning, and a third day passed.

14 Next, God said, Let there be luminaries in the vault of the sky, to divide the spheres of day and night; let them give portents, and be the measures of time, to mark out 15 the day and the year; let them shine in the sky's vault, and shed light on the earth. And so it was done.

16 God made the two great luminaries, the greater of them to command the day, and the lesser to command the night; then he 17 made the stars. All these he put in the vault of the sky, to shed their light on the earth, to control day and night, and divide 18 the spheres of light and darkness. And God saw it, and found it good. So evening came, 19 and morning, and a fourth day passed.

20 After this, God said, Let the waters produce moving things that have life in them, and winged things that fly above the earth under the sky's vault.¹ Thus God created 21 the huge sea-beasts, and all the different kinds of life and movement that spring from the waters, and all the different kinds of flying things; and God saw it, and found 22 it good. He pronounced his blessing on them, Increase and multiply, and fill the waters of the sea; and let there be abundance of flying things on earth. So evening 23 came, and morning, and a fifth day passed. God said, too, Let the land yield all different 24 kinds of living things, cattle and creeping things and wild beasts of every sort; and so it was done. God made every 25 sort of wild beast, and all the different kinds of cattle and of creeping things; and God saw it, and found it good.

26 And God said, Let us make man, wearing our own image and likeness; let us put him in command of the fishes in the sea, and all that flies through the air, and the cattle, and the whole earth, and all the creeping things that move on earth. So 27 God made man in his own image, made him in the image of God. Man and woman both, he created them. And God pronounced his blessing on them, Increase and multiply and fill the earth, and make 28 it yours; take command of the fishes in the sea, and all that flies through the air, and all the living things that move on the earth. Here are all the herbs, God told them, that 29 seed on earth, and all the trees, that carry in them the seeds of their own life, to be your food; food for all the beasts on the 30 earth, all that flies in the air, all that creeps along the ground; here all that lives shall find its nourishment. And so it was done.

¹ The Latin version, like the Septuagint Greek, represents the birds, like the fishes, as having been produced from the sea. The Hebrew text has 'and let winged things fly' instead of 'and winged things that fly'.

31 And God saw all that he had made, and found it very good. So evening came, and morning, and a sixth day passed.

2 Thus heaven and earth and all the furniture of them were completed.

2 By the seventh day,¹ God had come to an end of making, and rested, on the seventh day, with his whole task accomplished.
 3 That is why God gave the seventh day his blessing, and hallowed it, because it was the day on which his divine activity of creation finished.
 4 Such origin heaven and earth had in the day of their fashioning. When heaven and earth God made, no woodland shrub had yet grown, no plant had yet sprung up; the Lord God had not yet sent rain upon the ground, that still had no human toil to cultivate it; there was only spring-water which came up from the earth, and watered its whole surface. And now, from the clay of the ground, the Lord God formed man, breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and made of man a living person.² God had planted a garden of delight,³ in which he now placed the man he had formed. Here, at the bidding of the Lord God, the soil produced all such trees as charm the eye and satisfy the taste; and here, in the middle of the garden, grew the tree of life, and the tree which brings knowledge of good and evil. The garden was watered by a river; it came out from Eden,⁴ and went on to divide into four branches. One is called Phison; it is the river which surrounds all the country of Hevilath, a gold-producing country; no gold is better; bdellium is found there too, and the onyx-stone. The second river is called Gehon, and is the river which surrounds the whole country of Ethiopia. The third river, which flows past the Assyrians, is called Tigris, and the fourth is the river Euphrates. So the Lord God took the man and put him in his garden of delight, to cultivate and tend it.
 16 And this was the command which the Lord God gave the man, Thou mayest eat thy fill of all the trees in the garden except the tree which brings knowledge of good and evil; if ever thou eatest of this, thy doom is death.

But the Lord God said, It is not well that man should be without companionship; I will give him a mate of his own kind. And now, from the clay of the ground, all the beasts that roam the earth and all that flies through the air were ready fashioned, and the Lord God brought them to Adam, to see what he would call them; the name Adam gave to each living creature is its name still. Thus Adam gave names to all the cattle, and all that flies in the air, and all the wild beasts; and still Adam had no mate of his own kind. So the Lord God made Adam fall into a deep sleep, and, while he slept, took away one of his ribs, and filled its place with flesh. This rib, which he had taken out of Adam, the Lord God formed into a woman; and when he brought her to Adam, Adam said, Here, at last, is bone that comes from mine, flesh that comes from mine; it shall be called Woman, this thing that was taken out of Man. That is why a man is destined to leave father and mother, and cling to his wife instead, so that the two become one flesh.⁵ Both went naked, Adam and his wife, and thought it no shame.

3 Of all the beasts which the Lord God had made, there was none that could match the serpent in cunning. It was he who said to the woman, What is this command God has given you, not to eat the fruit of any tree in the garden? To which the woman answered, We can eat the fruit of any tree in the garden except the tree in the middle of it; it is this God has forbidden us to eat or even to touch, on pain of death. And the serpent said to her, What is this talk of death? God knows well that as soon as you eat this fruit your eyes will be opened, and you yourselves will be like gods, knowing good and evil. And with that the woman, who saw that the fruit was good to eat, saw, too, how it was pleasant to look at and charmed the eye,⁶ took some fruit from the tree and ate

¹ For 'by the seventh day' the Septuagint Greek has 'on the sixth day'. ² There is, here, a play upon words in the Hebrew; Adam, man, was made out of the ground, adamah. In the Latin text, the word Adam is translated 'the man' up to verse 18, and 'Adam' thenceforward. ³ The Hebrew text probably means that God planted a garden out in the East, in Eden. ⁴ The Latin here translates the word Eden, as in verse 8 above. ⁵ It is not certain whether these words are represented as having been spoken by Adam, or whether they are a commentary by the author. Cf. Mt. 19. 5. ⁶ 'And charmed the eye'; the Hebrew words are sometimes taken as meaning 'and gave desirable knowledge'.

it; and she gave some to her husband, and 7 he ate with her. Then the eyes of both were opened, and they became aware of their nakedness; so they sewed fig-leaves together, and made themselves girdles.

8 And now they heard the voice of the Lord God, as he walked in the garden in the cool of the evening; whereupon Adam and his wife hid themselves in the garden, 9 among the trees. And the Lord God called to Adam; Where art thou? he asked.
 10 I heard thy voice, Adam said, in the garden, and I was afraid, because of my 11 nakedness, so I hid myself. And the answer came, Why, who told thee of thy nakedness? Or hadst thou eaten of the 12 tree, whose fruit I forbade thee to eat? The woman, said Adam, whom thou gavest me to be my companion, she it was who offered me fruit from the tree, and so I 13 came to eat it. Then the Lord God said to the woman, What made thee do this? The serpent, she said, beguiled me, and so I came to eat.

14 And the Lord God said to the serpent, For this work of thine, thou, alone among all the cattle and all the wild beasts, shalt bear a curse; thou shalt crawl on thy belly 15 and eat dust all thy life long. And I will establish a feud between thee and the woman, between thy offspring and hers;
 she is to crush thy head, while thou dost 16 lie in ambush at her heels.¹ To the woman he said, Many are the pangs, many are the throes I will give thee to endure; with pangs thou shalt give birth to children, and thou shalt be subject to thy husband; he 17 shall be thy lord. And to Adam he said, Thou hast listened to thy wife's counsel, and hast eaten the fruit I forbade thee to eat; and now, through thy act, the ground is under a curse. All the days of thy life thou 18 shalt win food from it with toil; thorns and thistles it shall yield thee, this ground 19 from which thou dost win thy food. Still thou shalt earn thy bread with the sweat of thy brow, until thou goest back into the ground from which thou wast taken; dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return.

The name which Adam gave his wife ²⁰ was Eve, Life, because she was the mother of all living men.

And now the Lord provided garments ²¹ for Adam and his wife, made out of skins, to clothe them. He said, too, Here is ²² Adam become like one of ourselves, with knowledge of good and evil; now he has only to lift his hand and gather fruit to eat from the tree of life as well, and he will live endlessly. So the Lord God drove ²³ him out from that garden of delight, to cultivate the ground from which he came; banished Adam, and posted his Cherubim ²⁴ before the garden of delight, with a sword of fire that turned this way and that, so that he could reach the tree of life no longer.

4 And now Adam had knowledge of his wife, Eve, and she conceived.
 She called her child Cain, as if she would say, Canithi, I have been enriched by the Lord with a man-child. Then she bore ² a second time; this child, his brother, she called Abel. Abel became a shepherd, while Cain tilled the ground. Time passed, ³ and Cain brought the Lord an offering out of the crops the land had given him; Abel, ⁴ too, brought an offering, and his offering was out of the first-born of his flock, with their fat. On Abel, and on his offering, the Lord looked with favour, but not upon ⁵ Cain, or his offering; so that Cain was much enraged, and his looks were lowering.
 But the Lord asked Cain, What does this ⁶ anger mean, this frowning face of thine?
 If thy actions are good, canst thou doubt ⁷ they will be rewarded? If not, canst thou doubt that guilt, thenceforward, will lie at thy door? Meanwhile he is at thy mercy, and thou canst have thy way with him.²
 Then Cain said to his brother, Let us go ⁸ out together;³ and while they were out in

¹ For 'she' and 'her' the Septuagint Greek has 'he' and 'his'; the Hebrew text also, as it has come down to us, gives 'he', or perhaps 'it'. But most manuscripts of the Latin version have 'she', which plainly gives a better balance to the sentence. That the reference of this passage, in any case, is to the Incarnation, is the general opinion of the Fathers. The Latin here assumes that there is a play upon words in the original, since there are two Hebrew verbs closely alike, one of which means 'to crush', and the other 'to follow eagerly'. But the Hebrew text has 'to crush' in both clauses; the Septuagint Greek, in both clauses, has 'to lie in wait'.

² The last sentence in this verse probably refers to Abel, since the pronouns in it are masculine (whereas guilt is feminine in Hebrew), and the same words are used as were used of Adam in 3. 16 above. Some think, however, that guilt is represented as a wild beast lurking at Cain's door, and translate, 'its appetite is within thy control, thou canst have the better of it'. The Greek interpreters give a quite different meaning to the whole verse.

³ The words 'Let us go out together' are wanting in the Hebrew text.

the open, Cain turned upon his brother Abel and killed him.

- 9 Then the Lord said to Cain, Where is thy brother Abel? I cannot tell, said he; is it for me to keep watch over my brother?
 10 But the answer came, What is this thou hast done? The blood of thy brother has found a voice that cries out to me from the 11 ground. Henceforward thou shalt be an outlaw from this ground, that has opened to drink in thy brother's blood, shed by thy 12 hand. Till that ground, and it will yield thee its fruit no longer; thou shalt be a wanderer, a fugitive on earth. Then Cain 13 said to the Lord, Guilt like mine is too great to find forgiveness. And now thou 14 art robbing me of the ground, and I shall be cut off from thy protection, and wander 15 over the earth, a fugitive; anyone I meet will slay me. But the Lord told him, It shall not be so; whoever kills Cain shall 16 pay for it sevenfold. And the Lord gave Cain such token of his protection as should warn the chance-comer not to kill him.
 17 So Cain was banished from God's presence, and lived as a fugitive, east of Eden.
 18 And now Cain had knowledge of his wife, and she conceived. She called her child 19 Henoch; and Cain built a city which he called Henoch, after his son's name. This 20 Henoch was the ancestor, through Irad, Maviael, and Mathusael, of Lamech. Lamech 21 married two wives, the one called Ada and the other Sella. It was Ada that gave 22 birth to Jabel, the first founder of all those who live in tents and herd sheep; and he had 23 a brother called Jubal, the founder of all those who play music, on the harp or the pipe. Sella gave birth to Tubalcain, who became 24 a smith, skilled in every kind of brass and iron work; and Tubalcain had a sister called Noema. It was to his wives, Ada 25 and Sella, that Lamech uttered the saying, Listen to these words of mine, you wives of Lamech, note my saying well. The man that wounds me, the stripling who deals me a blow, I reward with death.¹ For Cain, sevenfold vengeance was to be taken; for Lamech, it shall be seventy times as much.²
 And once more Adam had knowledge of his wife, and she bore a son; Seth was the name she gave him, as if she would say, Seth, the Lord has secured a line of issue for me in place of Abel, now that Cain has murdered him. Seth, too, had a son whom he called Enos; and he began to call upon the name of the Lord.³

5 This is the record of Adam's posterity. When God created human kind, he made them in his own image. Man and woman both, he created them, and gave them his blessing; and Adam was the name by which he called them at the time when they were first created. Adam was a hundred and thirty years old when he begot in his image, his likeness, the son whom he called Seth. He lived eight hundred years more, and lived to be nine hundred and thirty. Seth was a hundred and five years old when he begot Enos, and lived to be nine hundred and twelve. Enos was ninety years old when he begot Cainan, and lived to be nine hundred and five. Cainan was seventy years old when he begot Malaleel, and lived to be nine hundred and ten. Malaleel was sixty-five years old when he begot Jared, and lived to be eight hundred and ninety-five. Jared was a hundred and sixty-two years old when he begot Henoch, and lived to be nine hundred and sixty-two. All these had other sons and daughters besides.

This Henoch was sixty-five years old when he begot Mathusala. For three hundred years after the birth of Mathusala, Henoch lived as God's close friend, and he had other sons and daughters besides; thus Henoch lived altogether three hundred and sixty-five years, the close friend of God; then God took him to himself, and he was seen no more. Mathusala was a hundred and eighty-seven years old when he begot Lamech; he lived for seven hundred and eighty-two years more, and had other sons and daughters besides; he died at the age of nine hundred and sixty-nine. And Lamech was a hundred and eighty-two years old when he begot a son, whom he called Noe, as if he would say, Nahem, ¹ Some think that Lamech was triumphing in the production of metal weapons, which may be implied in the preceding verse. ² The Hebrew text says 77 times, but the Septuagint Greek has '490 times'. The Latin may mean either, but cf. Mt. 18. 22. ³ The meaning of the Hebrew text here is doubtful; some would translate it, 'It was then that men began to call upon the name of the Lord'. But the suggestion is more probably that Enos (or perhaps Seth himself) began a God-fearing tradition, in contrast to the descendants of Cain.

He will console us, that have toiled and laboured with our hands so long on ground 30 which the Lord has cursed. He lived for five hundred and ninety-five years more, and had other sons and daughters besides; 31 he died at the age of seven hundred and 32 seventy-seven. And Noe was five hundred years old when he became the father of Sem, Cham, and Japheth.¹

6 Time passed, and the race of men began to spread over the face of earth, they and the daughters that were 2 born to them. And now the sons of God saw how beautiful were these daughters of men, and took them as wives, choosing
 3 where they would.² But God said, This spirit of mine shall not endure in man for ever, he is but mortal clay; his life-time shall be a hundred and twenty years.³
 4 Giants lived on the earth in those days, when first the sons of God mated with the daughters of men, and by them had children; these were the heroes whose fame has come down to us from long ago.

5 And now God found that earth was full of men's iniquities, and that the whole frame of their thought was set continually 6 on evil; and he repented of having made men on the earth at all.⁴ So, smitten with 7 grief to the depths of his heart, he said, I will blot out mankind, my creature, from the face of the earth, and with mankind all the beasts and the creeping things and all that flies through the air; I repent of 8 having made them. Only on Noe did God 9 look with favour. And these were the children of Noe, the man who was accepted as faultless in such a generation, the close 10 friend of God; Noe begot three sons, Sem, Cham, and Japheth.

11 There lay the world, corrupt in God's 12 sight, full of oppression; and God, seeing the world so corrupt (no creature on earth 13 but had lost its true direction), said to Noe, The time has come for me to make an end of all mankind; their coming has filled the earth with oppression; I mean to destroy them, and earth with them. Make thyself 14 an ark from planks of wood;⁵ in that ark make cabins, and give it a coat of pitch within and without. These are to be the 15 measurements; three hundred cubits of length, fifty cubits of breadth, and thirty cubits of height. The ark is to have a course 16 of windows, which thou wilt make a cubit in height;⁶ and thou wilt make a door in its side; and it is to have a hold, and a lower and upper deck. Thou must know that I

 17 mean to bring a flood of waters over the earth, and destroy every creature that lives and breathes under heaven; all that earth holds must perish. But with thee this 18 covenant of mine shall stand; thou shalt take refuge in the ark, thou and thy sons, and thy wife, and thy sons' wives with thee. And take with thee into the ark, to 19 preserve them, a pair of each kind of living creature, male and female, all the different 20 birds, all the different beasts, all the creeping things of earth; two of each shall go in with thee, so that all may survive. And it 21 is for thee to provide thyself with all that is eaten as food, and store it up, so that thou and they may have food to eat. All 22 this Noe did, at God's bidding.

7 And now the Lord said to him, Take refuge in the Ark, with all thy household; looking upon this generation of thine, I find thee only guiltless. Take seven 2 pairs of all the clean animals with thee, male and female, and two pairs of all the animals that are unclean, and of all the 3 birds that fly in the air, seven pairs; no breed must vanish from the earth. In 4 seven days from this, I mean to send down rain on the earth for forty days and forty 5 nights, and blot out this whole world of living things, my own creatures, from the face of the earth. All this Noe did, at God's 6 bidding; he was six hundred years old

¹ Throughout this chapter, the Hebrew forms of expression have been recast for the sake of brevity.

² 'Sons of God' appears to mean angels in Job i. 6; 2. 1; 38. 7; elsewhere its meaning is doubtful. Many Fathers understand this phrase of Seth's descendants, and the 'daughters of men' as descended from Cain.

⁵ 'Planks of wood': the rare word given in the Latin version as 'smoothed' is interpreted by some as the name of a tree. St Jerome, using a different reading, gives 'covered with pitch' as a translation.

⁶ 'A course of windows'; literally 'a window', but, since only one measurement is given, it must be presumed that there were to be openings all round the Ark. Some interpret the word as meaning 'a roof'.

when the waters of the flood covered the earth. Noe and his sons and his wife and his sons' wives with him took refuge in the Ark from the waters of the flood; of all the beasts, clean and unclean, of all the birds, and all the creeping things of earth, pairs took refuge with Noe in the Ark, male and female, as God had commanded him.

Seven days passed, and then the waters of the flood covered the earth. It was the seventeenth day of the second month of Noe's six hundredth year, when all the springs of the great depth beneath broke through, and the flood-gates of heaven were opened; and it rained for forty days and forty nights on the earth. That very day, Noe and his sons, Sem, Cham and Japheth, his wife, and the three wives of his sons, took refuge in the Ark; and with them all the different kinds of wild beasts, of cattle, of the creeping things of earth, and of things that fly, birds and winged creatures; there was refuge with Noe in the Ark for pairs of all mortal things that live and breathe. Into the Ark they went, males and females, as God had commanded; and the Lord shut him in. For forty days that flood came down on the earth, and the water grew deep, till it lifted the Ark up from the ground; full the tide flowed, covering the whole face of the earth, but still the Ark rode safe on the waters. Higher and higher the waters rose above the ground, till all the high mountains under heaven disappeared; the flood stood fifteen cubits higher than the mountains it covered. All mortal things that moved on earth were drowned, birds and cattle and wild beasts, and all the creeping things of earth, and all mankind; all that lived and moved on the earth perished together. God wiped out the whole world of earthly creatures, man and beast, creeping things and all that flies through the air, so that they vanished from the earth; only Noe and his companions in the Ark were left. And the waters held their own over the land for a hundred and fifty days.

8 Then God bethought him of Noe, and of all the wild beasts and the cattle that went with him in the Ark; so he set a wind stirring over the earth, and with that, the waters abated. The springs of the great depth closed up again; so, too, did the flood-gates of heaven, and rain fell from heaven no longer; more and more the waters receded from the land, beginning to abate, now that the hundred and fifty days were over. And now, on the twenty-seventh day of the seventh month, the Ark came to rest upon the mountains of Armenia. Inch by inch the waters abated, until the tenth month came; on the first day of the tenth month, the hill tops began to shew. Noe let forty days pass, and then undid the window he had made in the Ark, and sent out one of the ravens, which went this way and that, and had not come back to him when the waters dried up over the earth.¹ Then to make sure whether the waters had become shallow over all the surface of the ground, he sent out one of the doves. But the dove came back to the Ark and its master, finding never a resting-place to perch on; and he put out his hand to catch it, and took it back into the Ark. Seven days more he waited, and then sent the dove out from the Ark again; this time, it came back to him at night-fall, with a twig of olive in its mouth, the leaves still green on it; and then Noe could not doubt that the waters had become shallow all over the ground. But still he waited another seven days, and now, when he sent it out, it came back to him no more. It was the first day of the first month of his six hundred and first year when the waters ebbed away from the land, and Noe, withdrawing the covering of the Ark, looked round him and found that the whole surface of the ground was clear. And by the twenty-seventh day of the second month, the land itself was dry.

Then God's word came to Noe, telling him, Come out of the Ark, with thy wife and thy sons and their wives. Bring out with thee all the living creatures thou hast there, of all kinds, birds and beasts and creeping things that creep on the earth; occupy this earth, increase and multiply upon it. So Noe came out, and his sons and his wife and his sons' wives with him; and the living creatures came out of the Ark, beasts and all creeping things that roam on the earth, in all their various

20 kinds. Thereupon Noe built an altar to the Lord, and chose out beasts that were clean and birds that were clean, and made burnt-offerings there. And the Lord, smelling such a scent as pleased him, made the resolve, Never again will I plague the earth on man's account, that has all the thoughts and imaginations of his heart, even in youth, so bent towards evil; never again will I send affliction such as this upon all living creatures. While the earth stands, seed-time and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, day and night shall keep their course unaltered.

9 And God pronounced his blessing on Noe and his sons; Increase, he said, and multiply, and fill the earth. All the beasts of earth, and the winged things of the sky, and the creeping things of earth, are to go in fear and dread of you, and I give you dominion over all the fishes of the sea. This creation that lives and moves is to provide food for you; I make it all over to you, by the same title as the herbs that have growth. Only, you must not eat the flesh with the blood still in it. The shedder of your own life-blood shall be held to account for it, whether man or beast; whoever takes the life of his brother-man shall answer for it to me. Man was made in God's image, and whoever sheds a man's blood must shed his own blood in return.¹ And now, increase and multiply; occupy and fill the earth.

8 This, too, God said to Noe, and to Noe's sons: Here is a covenant I will observe with you and with your children after you, and with all living creatures, your companions, the birds and the beasts of burden and the cattle that came out of the Ark with you, and the wild beasts besides. Never more will the living creation be destroyed by the waters of a flood; never again a flood to devastate the world. This, God said, shall be the pledge of the promise I am making to you, and to all living creatures, your companions, eternally; I will set my bow in the clouds, to be a pledge of my covenant with creation. When I veil the sky with clouds, in those clouds my bow shall appear, to remind me of my promise to you, and to all the life that quickens mortal things; never shall the waters rise in flood again, and destroy all living creatures. There, in the clouds, my bow shall stand, and as I look upon it, I will remember this eternal covenant; God's covenant with all the life that beats in mortal creatures upon earth. Such was the pledge God gave to Noe of his promise to all living things.

These, then, were the names of Noe's three sons, who came out of the Ark with him, Sem, Cham and Japheth; and of these, Cham was the ancestor of Chanaan. All three were Noe's sons, and from them the race of mankind overspread the earth. And now Noe turned farmer, and on the ground he tilled, he grew a vine. So he came to drink wine, and, drunk with it, lay all naked in his tent. And Cham, Chanaan's ancestor, saw how his father's body lay naked, and went out to tell his two brothers of it; whereupon Sem and Japheth spread a cloak over their shoulders, and walked in backwards to cover their father's nakedness, their faces turned away, so that they never caught sight of his naked body. When Noe had slept off his wine, he found out how his younger son had treated him; Cursed be Chanaan, he said, he shall be the slave and drudge of his brethren. He said, too, Blessed be the Lord God of Sem; may Chanaan be a slave to him. May God give Japheth dwelling-space,² and let him share the tents of Sem, but let Chanaan be his slave. And Noe lived three hundred and fifty years after the flood, so that his lifetime, when he came to die, had filled the measure of nine hundred and fifty years.

10 These were the descendants of Noe's children, Sem, Cham and Japheth, through the sons that were born to them after the flood. These were the sons of Japheth; Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Thubal, Mosoch and Thiras. And these were Gomer's sons, Ascenez, Ripphath and Thogorma. And these were Javan's sons, Elisa, Tharsis, Cetthim and Dodanim; who divided up the islands of the Gentiles, region by region. Each of these became separate nations, distinct in speech and in blood.

¹ 'Must shed his own blood in return'; in the Hebrew text, 'shall have his blood shed by man'.
² There is here a play upon words between the name Japheth and the Hebrew verb, 'to enlarge'.

6 These were Cham's sons; Chus, Mes-7 raim, Phuth and Chanaan. And these were the sons of Chus; Saba, Hevila, Sabatha, Regma and Sabatacha. And these were Regma's sons, Saba and Dadan.
 8 Chus was also the father of Nemrod, who 9 was the first great warrior; bold, too, by God's grace,¹ at the hunt, whence the proverb arose, By God's grace, a huntsman 10 bold as Nemrod. His empire began with Babylon, Arach, Achad and Chalanne, in 11 the country of Sennaar. It was from that country Assur went out to build Nineve 12 and its suburbs,² and Chale; and between Nineve and Chale he built the great city 13 of Resen. Mesraim was the father of the Ludim, the Anamim, the Laabim, and the 14 Nephthum; the Phetrusim, too, and the Chasluim (from whom the Philistines 15 sprang) and the Capthorim. Chanaan was the father of Sidon; this was his first-born 16 son. From him, too, come Hethites, Jebusites, Amorrhites, Gergesites, Hevites, 17 Aracites, Sinites, Aradians, Samarites and Amathites; so, in later times, the Cha-naanite peoples spread this way and that.
 18 That Chanaanite territory, beginning at Sidon, reached as far as Gaza on the road to Gerara, and as far as Lesa on the road to Sodom, Gomorrhah, Adama and Seboim.
 19 These were the descendants of Cham; such were the tribes, the tongues, the branches, the countries, the peoples that came from him.
 20 Sem, too, Japheth's elder brother, had children; he is father of all who claim descent from Heber. His sons were called 21 Aelam, Assur, Arphaxad, Lud and Aram.
 These were Aram's sons, Us, Hul, Gether 22 and Mes. Arphaxad was the father of Sale, and Sale of Heber. Heber had two sons; 23 one was called Phaleg, Division, because in his time the territory was divided up, 24 and his brother's name was Jectan. This Jectan was the father of Elmodad, Saleph, 25 Asarmoth, Jare, Aduram, Uzal, Decla, 26 Ebal, Abimael, Saba, Ophir, Hevila and Jobab. All these were Jectan's sons, and 27 their territory reached from Messa to 28 mount Sephar in the east. These were the 29 sons of Sem; such were their tribes and 30 tongues and countries and peoples.

These were the descendants that sprang from Noe, divided according to their peoples and their races; this was how the nations were scattered over the earth after the flood.

11 Hitherto, the world had only one way of speech, only one language.
 And now, as men travelled westwards, they found a plain in the land of Sennaar, and made themselves a home there; Here we can make bricks, they said to one another, baked with fire; and they built, not in stone, but in brick, with pitch for their mortar. It would be well, they said, to build ourselves a city, and a tower in it with a top that reaches to heaven; we will make ourselves a great people, instead of scattering over the wide face of earth.
 But now the Lord came down to look at the city, with its tower, which Adam's children were building; and he said, Here is a people all one, with a tongue common to all; this is but the beginning of their undertakings, and what is to prevent them carrying out all they design? It would be well to go down and throw confusion into the speech they use there, so that they will not be able to understand each other. Thus the Lord broke up their common home, and scattered them over the earth, and the building of the city came to an end. That is why it was called Babel, Confusion, because it was there that the Lord confused the whole world's speech, and scattered them far away, over the wide face of earth.

These were the descendants of Sem; Sem was a hundred years old when he begot Arphaxad, two years after the flood. He lived five hundred years more. Arphaxad was thirty-five years old when he begot Sale, and lived three hundred and three years more. Sale was thirty years old when he begot Heber, and lived four hundred and three years more. Heber was thirty-four years old when he begot Phaleg, and lived four hundred and thirty years more. Phaleg was thirty years old when he begot Reu, and lived two hundred and nine years more. Reu was thirty-two years old when he begot Sarug, and lived two hundred and seven years more.

² 'Assur went out'; some would understand this as meaning 'he (Nemrod) went out to Assur'. 'Its suburbs'; literally 'the broad places of the city'; according to some it should be a proper name, Rehoboth-ir.

22 Sarug was thirty years old when he begot 23 Nachor, and lived two hundred years more.
 24 Nachor was twenty-nine years old when he 25 begot Thare, and lived a hundred and 26 nineteen years more. All these had other sons and daughters besides. And Thare, after reaching the age of seventy, became the father of Abram, of Nachor, and of Aran.

27 These are the descendants of Thare; Thare's sons were called Abram, Nachor and Aran, and Aran had a son called Lot.
 28 This Aran died before his father Thare, in Ur of the Chaldees, the country of his 29 birth. Abram and Nachor married; and Abram's wife was called Sarai, and Nachor's wife was called Melcha. Her father Aran had two children, Melcha herself and 30 Jescha. Sarai was barren, and had no 31 children. And now Thare, with his son Abram, and his grandson Lot, son of Aran, and his daughter-in-law Sarai, who had married his son Abram, left Ur of the Chaldees and set out for the land of Chanaan.
 They went as far as Haran, and there they settled. At Haran, at the age of two hundred and five, Thare died.

12 Meanwhile, the Lord said to Abram, Leave thy country behind thee, thy kinsfolk, and thy father's home, and come away into a land I will shew thee.
 2 Then I will make a great people of thee;
 I will bless thee, and make thy name re-3 nowned, a name of benediction; those who bless thee, I will bless, those who curse thee, I will curse, and in thee all the races 4 of the world shall find a blessing.¹ So Abram went out, as the Lord bade him, and with him went his nephew, Lot.
 Abram was seventy-five years old² at the 5 time when he left Haran, took his wife Sarai and his nephew Lot with him, all the possessions they had acquired in Haran, and all the retainers born in their service there, and set out for the land of Chanaan.
 6 When they reached it, Abram went across country as far as Sichem and the Valley of Clear Seeing.³ Those were the days when the Chanaanites still dwelt in the land.

 Here the Lord appeared to Abram, pro-7 mising to give the whole land to his posterity; and this appearance he commemorated by building the Lord an altar there. Then he moved on from there to the 8 mountain on the east of Bethel, where he pitched his tent with Bethel on the west and Hai on the east; here too he built an altar to the Lord, and invoked his name before it.

Thus Abram journeyed on, travelling 9 always further south. And now the coun-10 try was stricken with famine; and Abram made his way into Egypt, to take refuge there, so grievous was the famine all over the country. And when he had nearly 11 reached Egypt, he said to his wife Sarai, I have it in mind that thou art a woman fair to see; and it may be that when the Egypt-12 tians catch sight of thee, they will say to themselves, She is a wedded woman, this is her husband; and they will kill me, and keep thee for themselves. Tell them, I en-13 treat thee, that thou art my sister; so, for thy sake, I shall be well used, and I shall owe my life to thee. And sure enough, as 14 soon as Abram set foot in Egypt, the Egyptians remarked the great beauty of his wife, and Pharaoh was told of her by his 15 courtiers, who sang her praises to him. So Sarai was carried off to Pharaoh's court, and 16 Abram, for her sake, was well treated; he had no lack of sheep, oxen, and asses, of men and maid servants, of she-asses, too, and camels. But the Lord smote Pharaoh 17 and his court with great calamities, because of Abram's wife Sarai, till at last he 18 sent for Abram, and asked him, What is this trick thou hast played on me? Why didst thou not own to me that she was thy 19 wife? How is it that thou didst call her thy sister, and let me wed her? Enough; here is 20 thy wife, take her and begone. And Pharaoh gave Abram an escort to see him on his way, with his wife and all his possessions.

13 So Abram came back from Egypt into the south country, with his wife and all that belonged to him; Lot, too,

¹ 'Shall find a blessing'; some commentators would interpret this, 'shall bless themselves in thy name', that is, use it as a proverbial instance of prosperity. ² It seems that Thare was still alive at the time of Abram's migration (cf. 11. 26, 32). St Jerome, assuming that Thare was dead, would date Abram's age of seventy-five not from his birth, but from the time of his leaving Ur. ³ 'The Valley of Clear Seeing'; in the Hebrew text, 'The oak of Moré' (a proper name). The Latin version evidently follows a different tradition, which would connect the name of the place with the Hebrew word for 'appearance' (cf. the verse following).

2 went in his company. Abram was by now 3 the master of rich possessions, with abundance 4 of gold and silver. He took the same 5 road northwards by which he had come, 6 and reached Bethel, and the place between 7 Bethel and Hai where he had pitched his 8 tent before, with the altar still standing 9 there, as he had built it, commemorating 10 the Lord's name.¹ Lot, his companion, 11 had flocks and herds and a camp of his 12 own, so that there was no room for them 13 to live together on the same land; they 14 could not share a camping-ground, with 15 such great possessions, and already a 16 quarrel had broken out between Abram's 17 shepherds and Lot's. In those days, there 18 were Chanaanites and Pherezites living 19 around, and Abram said to Lot, Pray let us 20 have no strife between us two, between my 21 shepherds and thine; are we not brethren?
 22 See, here is the whole land before thee; 23 come, our ways must part. Turn leftwards, 24 and I will keep to the right, or choose the 25 right, and I will go leftwards. Whereupon 26 Lot looked about him, and the great hollow 27 of Jordan met his eye, well watered, in 28 those days before the Lord destroyed 29 Sodom and Gomorrhah, like the garden of 30 the Lord itself, or the land of Egypt ap-31 proached by way of Segor. So Lot chose 32 the hollow of Jordan, and went away to the 33 east, and the two kinsmen parted com-34 pany. Abram made his dwelling in the 35 land of Chanaan, while Lot found a home 36 among the cities round Jordan, camping at 37 Sodom. They were evil folk that lived at 38 Sodom, wicked in the Lord's sight beyond 39 all measure.

40 When Abram had parted from Lot, the 41 Lord said to him, Look about thee, turn 42 thy eyes from where thou art to north and 43 south, to east and west. All the land thou 44 seest I make over to thee, and to thy pos-45 terity for ever. And to that posterity I will 46 grant increase, till it lies like dust on the 47 ground, past all counting. Up, then, and 48 journey through the land at thy ease, the 49 length and breadth of it; to thee I will 50 give it. So Abram moved his tent, and 51 went to live by the valley of Mambre,² at Hebron, and there he built an altar to the Lord.

14 It chanced at this time that Amraphel, the king of Sennaar, and Arioch, King of Pontus,³ and Chodorlahomor, king of Elam, and Thadal, king of the barbarians, went out to war. And their enemies were Bara, king of Sodom, Bersa, king of Gomorrhah, Sennaab, king of Adama, Semeber, king of Seboim, and the king of Bala (or Segor). All these joined their forces in the Valley of the Forests, where the Salt Sea is now; they had been tributary to Chodorlahomor for twelve years, and in the following year they had revolted from him. So, in this fourteenth year, Chodorlahomor and the kings allied with him came out to battle. They had defeated the Raphaim, in Astaroth-Carnaim, and the Zuzim in their company;⁴ the Emim, too, in Save-Cariathaim, and the Horrites in the hills of Seir, right up to the plains of Pharan, out in the desert. And now, returning, they had reached the spring of Mispbat (or Cades), where they fell upon all the Amalecite country, and the Amorrhites that lived by Asason-Thamar.
 So the kings of Sodom, Gomorrhah, Adama, Seboim and Bala (or Segor) came out to meet them, and prepared to do battle with them in the Valley of the Forests. Chodorlahomor, king of Elam, and Thadal, king of the barbarians, and Amraphel, king of Sennaar, and Arioch, king of Pontus, these were the four kings those five kings had to meet. The Valley of the Forests contained many pools of asphalt, and among these the Kings of Sodom and Gomorrhah were overcome and routed; those who survived took refuge in the hill country. All the wealth of Sodom and Gomorrhah, and all their supply of food, was carried off by the victors as they went; so, too, was Abram's nephew Lot, who dwelt at Sodom, with all the wealth that was his.

And now word came, by one of those who had escaped, to the Hebrew chieftain Abram, where he lived in the valley of Mambre the Amorrhite, brother of Escol

¹ 'Commemorating the Lord's name'; or perhaps, 'and there (once more) he invoked the Lord's name'. ² The Hebrew text has 'oaks' instead of 'valley'; (cf. 12. 6 above). ³ 'Of Pontus'; so the Latin version, whereas the Hebrew text and the Septuagint Greek have 'of Ellasar'. It is not likely that Pontus on the southern shore of the Black Sea is meant; the other kings all lived east of Palestine. ⁴ 'In their company'; the Hebrew text makes this a proper name, 'in Cham', a place not elsewhere mentioned.

and Aner; all these were confederate with 14 Abram. Abram himself, as soon as he heard that his kinsman Lot was a prisoner, mustered the men he had in arms, all of his own household, to the number of three 15 hundred and eighteen, and went in pursuit all the way to Dan. Here he divided his confederates into companies, and fell upon the enemy by night, routing them and 16 driving them in their flight as far as Hoba, to the left of Damascus; and he brought back all that wealth with him, Lot, too, and the wealth that was his, and the women, and the common folk.

17 Thus he defeated Chodorlahomor, and the kings who were with him. And as he came back, the king of Sodom went out to meet him at the Valley of Savé, which is 18 the same as the Royal Valley; Melchise-dech, too, was there, the king of Salem.
 And he, priest as he was of the most high God, brought out bread and wine with 19 him, and gave him this benediction, On Abram be the blessing of the most high 20 God, maker of heaven and earth, and blessed be that most high God, whose protection has brought thy enemies into thy power. To him, Abram gave tithes of all 21 he had won.¹ As for the king of Sodom, he said to Abram, Give me these living souls; all the rest thou mayest take for 22 thyself. But Abram answered, By this hand, which I lift up to the Lord God, the 23 prince of heaven and earth, I will take nothing of thine, though it were but a thread from the woof or the strap of a shoe.
 Never shalt thou say, Abram got his wealth 24 from me. Take all, except the food my men have already eaten, and the share that falls to the three who came out with me, Aner, Escol, and Mambre; let them have their part.

15 It was after this that the Lord sent word to Abram in a vision, Have no fear, Abram, I am here to protect thee; 2 thy reward shall be great indeed. But Abram answered, Lord God, what can this gift of thine be? I must go the way of childless men; Damascus here, the son of 3 Eliezer, is but the son of my steward;² to me (Abram added) thou hast given no children, so that all the heir I have is a slave born in my house. Whereupon the Lord sent word to him, This man shall not 4 succeed thee; thou shalt have an heir sprung from thy own body. Then he took 5 him out of doors, and said to him, Look up at the sky, and count, if thou canst, the stars in it; thy race, like these, shall be numberless. So Abram put his faith in 6 God, and it was reckoned virtue in him.³

And now God said to him, I am the Lord, who brought thee out from Ur of the Chaldees, to give thee possession of this land instead. And when he asked, Lord God, what assurance may I have,
 that it is mine? the Lord answered, Bring 9 me a three-year-old heifer, a three-year-old she-goat, and a three-year-old ram, and a turtle-dove, and a pigeon. All these he brought to him, and cut them in half, 10 laying the two halves of each on opposite sides, except the dove and the pigeon; he did not divide these. The whole day long 11 Abram stood there, driving away the carrion-birds as they swooped down on the carcasses; but when the sun set, deep sleep 12 fell upon him, and in the darkness a great dread assailed him. So a voice came to 13 him, This thou must know, that thy race will live as strangers in a land not their own, reduced to slavery and ill-used for 14 four hundred years. But I am there to pass judgement on the nation which enslaves them; and when this is done, they shall 15 come back rich in possessions. For thyself, thou shalt be buried with thy fathers, grown old in comfort; but the fourth 16 generation will have come before these return hither; the wickedness of the Amorrites has not reached its full term.

So the sun went down, and when the 17 darkness of night came on, a smoking furnace was seen, a torch of fire that passed between the pieces of flesh. And the Lord, 18 that day, made a covenant with Abram;
 I will grant this land, he told him, to thy posterity, with its borders reaching up to the river of Egypt, and the great river 19 Euphrates; the land of the Cinites, and the Cenezites, and the Cedmonites, the 20

² The meaning of this verse is obscure both in the Hebrew text and in the versions; it seems likely that there has been a corruption in the manuscripts. As the text stands, Damascus must be the name of a person, not of a place, and the words 'Damascus (of) Eliezer' will probably imply that Eliezer was his father.

³ Cf. Rom. 4. 3; Gal. 3. 6.

Hethites and the Pherезites, the Raphaim, 21 too, and the Amorrhites, and the Chanaanites, and the Gergesites, and the Jebusites.

16 And still Abram's wife Sarai bore him no children. But she had an 2 Egyptian maid-servant, called Agar; and now she said to her husband, The Lord, as thou seest, denies me motherhood; be-3 take thyself to this maid of mine, in the hope that I may at least have children through her means. So Abram consented 4 to the wish of his wife, and she brought this Egyptian maid-servant of hers, Agar, and gave her to her husband as his mate, ten years after they had taken up their 5 abode in the land of Chanaan. Abram, then, had knowledge of her, and she, finding herself with child, began to look on 6 her mistress with scorn. And Sarai complained to Abram, I am being wronged, through thy fault; here is this maid-servant of mine, whom I bade thee take in thy arms, treating me scornfully, now that she has conceived. May the Lord do 7 justice between us. To this, Abram made answer, Is she not in thy power, thy own maid-servant? Do what thou wilt with her. Thus it was that Sarai used her cruelly, and she took refuge in flight.

8 She was sitting by a well out in the wilderness, on the desert road to Sur, when an angel of the Lord found her.
 9 Whence comes Agar, he asked, and whither does she go, that was Sarai's maid-servant? And she answered, It is from the threats of 10 my mistress, Sarai, that I have fled. Then the angel of the Lord said to her, Go back to thy mistress, and submit to her will.
 11 Still will I grant increase, he said, to the race that shall spring from thee, till its numbers cannot be counted. And he added, Now thou art with child; it is a son that will be born to thee, and thou shalt call him Ismael (that is, God hears), in token that God has listened to thee in thy 12 affliction. His shall be a nature none can tame; hating all and hated by all, he shall pitch his camp eastwards of his brethren.¹ 13 Thus the Lord spoke to her, and thus she named him, Thou art God, that hast looked on me; for indeed, she said, there was one who looked on me here, and I saw him as he left me.² So she called that well, 14 the Well of him who lives and looks on me; it is between Cades and Barad. Agar, then, bore a son to Abram, and called him 15 Ismael; Abram was eighty-six years old at the time of Ismael's birth.

17 It was when he reached the age of ninety-nine that the Lord was revealed to him with the words, I am God Almighty; live as in my sight, and be perfect. Then, on my part, I will make a 2 covenant with thee, to give thy posterity increase beyond measure. At this, Abram 3 fell prostrate before him. And God said to him; I AM,³ and here is the covenant I make with thee, thou shalt be the father 4 of a multitude of nations. No longer shall thy name be Abram, thou shalt be called 5 Abraham, the father of a throng, such is the multitude of nations I will give thee for thy children.⁴ I will make thee fruitful 6 beyond all measure, so that thou shalt count among the nations; from thy issue, 7 kings shall rise. I will honour this covenant of mine with thyself and with the race that shall follow thee, generation after generation; an eternal covenant that 8 pledges me to be thy God, and the God of the race which follows thee. To thee, and to that race, I will give the land in which thou dwellest now as a stranger, the whole 9 land of Chanaan; their inheritance for ever, and I their God.

10 Then God said to Abraham, Thou, too, shalt observe this covenant of mine, thou 11 and the race that shall follow thee, generation after generation. This is the covenant 12 you shall keep with me, thou and thine; every male child of yours shall be circumcised; you shall circumcise the flesh of your foreskins, in token of the covenant 13 between me and you. Generation after generation, every male child shall be circumcised when it is eight days old. And this law shall be binding on your slaves, 14 both those born in your households, and those you have bought, though these be of alien breed. So my covenant shall have its seal in your flesh, ratified to all time. If any male person has the flesh of his foreskin uncircumcised, there is no place for him among his people;¹ he has violated the covenant between us.

¹ 'Eastwards'; the Hebrew text is usually so rendered. The Latin gives a literal translation, 'over against'. ² The exact meaning of verses 13 and 14 is uncertain in the Hebrew.

This, too, God said to Abraham, Thou shalt call thy wife Sarai not Sarai but Sara, the princess. Her I will bless, giving thee a son by her; and him, too, I will bless, giving him whole nations for his posterity; kings with their peoples shall take their origin from him.

At this, Abraham fell prostrate before him; but in his heart he said, laughing at the thought, Shall I have a son when I am a hundred years old? Will Sara, with all her ninety years, become a mother? And this was what he asked of God, If only thou wilt grant life to Ismael! But God said to Abraham, Thou shalt have a son by thy wife Sara, and shalt give him the name of Isaac; it is to him and to the race which shall follow him that I will make good my promise, ratified for ever. As for Ismael, for him too I grant thy prayer; be sure that I will bless him, and make him fruitful, and grant him increase beyond all measure, so that he will be the father of twelve chieftains. From him, too, a great nation shall arise; but when I make good this promise of mine, it will be for Isaac, the son thou wilt have, at this time next year, by thy wife Sara.

So God finished speaking to Abraham, and went up out of his sight. And Abraham sent for his son Ismael, and for all the slaves born in his house and those, too, whom he had bought, every male child that belonged to any of his household, and on that very day he circumcised the flesh of their foreskins, in obedience to the Lord's bidding. Abraham was ninety-nine years old when he circumcised the flesh of his foreskin, and Ismael, at the time of his circumcision, had reached the age of thirteen. On this same day all were circumcised, Abraham, and his son Ismael, and

18 He had a vision of the Lord, too, in the valley of Mambre, as he sat by his tent door at noon. He looked up, and saw three men standing near him; and, at the sight, he ran from his tent door to meet them, bowing down to the earth.² Lord, he said, as thou lovest me, do not pass thy servant by; let me fetch a drop of water, so that you can wash your feet and rest in the shade. I will bring a mouthful of food, too, so that you can refresh yourselves before you go on further; you have not come this way for nothing. And when they had agreed to what he proposed, Abraham hastened into the tent to find Sara. Quick, he said, knead three measures of flour, and make girdle-cakes. Meanwhile, he ran to the byre, and brought in a calf, tender and well-fed, and gave it to a servant, who made haste to cook it. Then he brought out butter and milk with the calf he had cooked for them, and laid their meal ready, and stood there beside them in the shade of the trees.

When they finished eating, they asked, Where is thy wife Sara? She is here, he answered, in the tent. I will come back, said he who was speaking to him, next year without fail; and, live she till then, thy wife Sara shall have a son.³ Sara, behind the tent door, overheard it and laughed; both were old, and past their prime, so that Sara was no longer subject to the lot of womanhood. What, she said, laughing to herself at the thought, am I to have dalliance with this lord of mine, grown old as I too have grown old? Whereupon the Lord said to Abraham, Why does Sara laugh, and ask whether she is indeed to become a mother in her old age? Can any task be too difficult for the Lord? At this time of year, the time I have appointed, I will come back to thee; live she till then, Sara shall have a son. And when Sara, overcome with terror, denied the charge of laughing, Ah, he said, but thou didst laugh.

16 And now the men rose up, and turned towards Sodom, Abraham going with them 17 to put them on their way. And the Lord said, Should I hide my purpose from 18 Abraham, this man who is destined to give birth to a people so great and so powerful?
This man through whom all the nations of 19 the world are to find a blessing? Have I not chosen him as one who will teach his children¹ and all his race after him to follow the paths which the Lord shews them, and to do what is just and right, winning him the fulfilment of all the Lord has pro-20 mised him? So the Lord told him, The ill repute of Sodom and Gomorrhah goes from bad to worse, their sin is grievous out of 21 all measure; I must needs go down to see for myself whether they have deserved the ill report that has reached me or not; I 22 must know for certain. And Abraham stood there in the Lord's presence, as the men turned and went on towards Sodom.

23 Abraham drew close to him, and asked,
Wilt thou, then, sweep away the innocent 24 with the guilty? Suppose there are fifty innocent men in the city, must they too perish? Wilt thou not spare the place to save fifty such innocent men that dwell 25 there? Never that, thou wilt not destroy the innocent with the guilty, as if innocence and guilt were all one; that is not thy way, that is not how the Judge of the whole 26 earth executes justice! And the Lord told him, If I find fifty innocent citizens in Sodom, I will spare the whole place to save 27 them. And Abraham answered, Dust and ashes though I be, I have taken it upon me to speak to my Lord, and speak I will.
28 What if there should be five wanting to make up the tale of fifty innocent men?
Wilt thou bring the whole city to ruin because there are five less than fifty? No, he said, if I meet with forty-five such, I will 29 not bring it to ruin. But he plied him once more, What wilt thou do, then, if forty are found there? I will hold my hand, said he, 30 to save forty. Then he said, Lord, do not be angry with me for pleading thus; what if thirty are found there? If I find thirty, he said, I will not do it. I have taken it upon me, said he, to speak to my Lord, and speak I will; what if twenty are found there? I will grant it life, he said, to save twenty. And he said, Do not be angry with me, Lord, I entreat thee, for making one more plea still; what if ten are found there?

I will spare it from destruction, he said, to save ten. So God finished speaking to Abraham, and left him, and Abraham turned and went home.

19 It was evening when the two angels reached Sodom, and Lot was sitting at the town gate. He rose up when he saw them, and went to meet them, bowing down his face to the earth. Pray, sirs, he said, turn in to my house and spend the night there; wash your feet now, and go on your journey to-morrow. And when they said, No, we will stay here in the open square, he would take no denial, they must needs lodge with him. So they went to his house, and he baked unleavened bread for them, which they ate. And before ever they had gone to rest, the townspeople laid siege to the house, old and young, from every quarter of the city, calling for Lot, and crying out, Where are thy evening visitors? Bring them out here, to minister to our lust. So Lot went out, shutting the door behind him, and said, No, brethren, I entreat you, do not be guilty of such a wrong. I have two daughters here, that have as yet no knowledge of man; these I will bring out, and you shall have your will with them, but do these men no harm;² are they not guests under my roof?
What, said they, wouldst thou come here as a stranger, and then set thyself up as a judge? Stand back, or it will be worse for thee than for them. And they pushed Lot aside with great violence, trying to break the door in. So the two men reached out and pulled Lot back into the house, shutting the door after him; and they put a ban of blindness on the folk without, so that never a man of them could find the entry.

And now the two men asked Lot, Is there any here besides thyself, son-in-law, or son, or daughter of thine? If so, take them out of the city, all that are thine. Our intent is to destroy this place; the ill repute of it goes from bad to worse, and the Lord knows of it, and has sent us to destroy them. So Lot went out, and spoke to the suitors who were betrothed to his daughters;¹ Up, he said, leave this place; the Lord means to destroy the city. But they thought he was speaking in jest. Then morning came, and the angels were urgent with him; Up, they said, take thy wife with thee, and the two daughters who are still at home, or else thou too wilt perish with the offending city. And when they found that he hung back, they pulled him away, with his wife and his two daughters, so resolved was the Lord to spare him; led him out, and set him clear of the city. Here they said to him, Flee for thy life, never once looking behind thee, never lingering once in all the plain round about thee; take refuge in the hills, or thou, too, wilt perish.

But now Lot pleaded with them, My Lord, he said, I entreat thee, as thou lovest thy servant, as thou hast shewn me signal mercy in saving this life of mine, bethink thee that I have no strength to reach the safety of the hills; calamity will overtake me first, and I must die. But there is a city close by that I may reach in safety, a little city, but I can find refuge there. So small a city, and wilt thou not grant me life if I go there? Once again, said he, I yield to thy entreaty; I will not overthrow the city thou pleadest for. Only make haste, and take refuge there; I can do nothing till thou hast reached it. That is how it came to be called the little city, Segor. Into Segor Lot entered as the sun rose over the earth; and thereupon the Lord rained down brimstone and fire out of heaven, the Lord's dwelling-place, and overthrew these cities, with all the plain about them, and all those who dwelt there, and all that grew from their soil. And Lot's wife, because she looked behind her as she went, was turned into a pillar of salt. That morning, Abraham rose up early, and from the place where but now he had stood talking to the Lord, he looked out over Sodom and Gomorrah, and all the plain where they stood, and saw nothing but smoke going up from the land, like the smoke of a furnace. So it was that when he overthrew the cities in that plain God remembered Abraham, and rescued Lot from the ruins of his chosen dwelling-place.

But Lot left Segor, and went up to live in the hills, taking his two daughters with him; he was afraid to live at Segor, and took up his abode in a cave. There his two daughters dwelt with him, and the elder of these said to the younger, Our father grows old, and as for us, there is no one in the land to mate with us, after the wont of human kind.² Why then, let us give him wine and make him drunk, and so sleep with him, to preserve our father's posterity. So that night they gave their father wine to drink; and the elder went in and slept with her father, lying down beside him and rising up without his knowledge. And next day, the elder said to the younger, Last night it was I that slept with our father; let us give him wine again to-night, and thou shalt sleep with him, to preserve our father's posterity. So that night too they gave their father wine to drink, and the younger went in and slept with him, and still he knew nothing of it when she lay down, or when she rose up. Thus the two daughters of Lot were got with child by their father, and the elder bore a son whom she called Moab, the ancestor of the Moabite race that still survives; the younger, too, had a son, whom she called Ammon, as if she would say Ben-ammi, the son of my people; his descendants still survive as the Ammonites.

20 There was a time when Abraham made his way from there into the southern country, first settling down between Cades and Sur, then living as a wanderer in Gerara. And of his wife Sara he gave out, She is my sister; whereupon Abimelech, king of Gerara, sent and took her for himself. But God visited Abime-

² 'In the land', or perhaps, 'on earth'. The daughters of Lot may have assumed that the conflagration had been world-wide, and that Segor was shortly to be consumed like the rest of the world. On this understanding, some have excused the action of the two sisters; but the common opinion of theologians is that it was sinful.

lech in a dream by night, and told him, Thy life is forfeit, on account of this woman thou hast taken for thyself; she is wedded to a husband. Abimelech, as yet, had had no intercourse with her. What, Lord, he said, must a nation perish that has done no wrong, except through ignorance? Did he not tell me himself, She is my sister? And she, did not she herself claim him as her brother? My conscience has been clear, my actions honourable, in all I have done. And God said to him, I know that thou hast acted with a clear conscience; that is why I preserved thee from sinning against me, and would not let thee have intercourse with her. But now thou must give her back to her husband; he is a prophet, and will intercede for thy life; if thou dost not restore her, I give thee good warning, thou and thine must perish. So Abimelech rose up at once before dawn of day, and summoned the whole company of his servants to let them hear all this; whereupon they were all overcome with terror. Then Abimelech sent for Abraham too, and asked him, What is this trick thou hast played on us? What wrong have we done thee, that thou shouldst involve me and my kingdom in such guilt? Thou hast treated us amiss. And still he plied him with reproaches; What was in thy mind, that thou shouldst act thus? I thought to myself, answered Abraham, This may be a place where they have no fear of God, and then they will kill me on my wife's account. Besides, she is indeed my sister, on the father's side but not on the mother's, though she is none the less my wedded wife.¹ When God bade me leave my father's house and go on my travels, I said to her, Do me this kindness; give it out, wherever we go, that I am thy brother.²

So Abimelech made Abraham a present, of sheep and oxen, of men and maid servants, and gave his wife Sara back to him. Here is my land, he said, at your disposal, dwell where thou wilt. And to Sara he added, See, I am giving this brother of thine a thousand silver pieces; such amends will enable thee to look the world in the face, wherever thou goest;³ only, do not forget that thy pretence was discovered. And now, at Abraham's intercession, God restored health to Abimelech, to his wife and to his servant women; up to now, on account of Abraham's wife Sara, the Lord had made all Abimelech's household barren.

21 And now, true to his undertaking, the Lord visited Sara and fulfilled his promise; old as she was, she conceived and bore a son at the very time God had foretold. To this son whom Sara had borne him, Abraham gave the name of Isaac, and circumcised him, as God had commanded, when he was eight days old. He himself was then a hundred years old; so great an age had he reached before Isaac was born to him. And Sara cried out, God has made me laugh for joy; whoever hears of this will laugh (Isaac) with me. Who would have thought, she added, that Abraham would ever be told, Sara is nursing a son, born to thee in thy old age?

The boy grew, and was weaned; on the day of his weaning, Abraham made a great feast, and Sara found the son of the Egyptian woman, Agar, mocking her own son Isaac.⁴ Whereupon she said to Abraham, Rid thyself of this slave-woman and her son; it cannot be that the son of a slave should divide the inheritance with my own son, Isaac. At this Abraham was greatly distressed on his son's behalf; but God said to him, Do not take it to heart so, the boy's lot and the lot of thy slave; attend to all Sara's bidding, for indeed it is through Isaac that thy posterity shall be traced. As for the slave's child, I will make him, too, the founder of a great nation; he too is thy son. So, when he rose next morning, Abraham fetched some bread and a bottle of water, which he put on her shoulder, and bade her take the boy and begone. Thus she left him, and soon she was wandering to and fro in the desert of Bersabee.

¹ Some have thought that Sara was the daughter of Aran, uncle to Abraham, since the Hebrew language does not distinguish between a sister and a cousin. But the more obvious sense is that she was his half-sister. ² Cf. 12. 13 above. ³ 'Will enable thee to look the whole world in the face'; literally, 'will be a covering of the eyes for thee with all who are in thy company'. 'Do not forget that thy pretence was discovered'; so the Septuagint Greek interprets, 'and tell the truth in all things'. The Hebrew text is obscure and perhaps corrupt; the rendering generally given is, 'and in every way thou hast had right done thee'. ⁴ 'Mocking her own son'; the literal sense of the Latin version seems rather to be 'playing with her own son'. But cf. Gal. 4. 29. The words 'with her own son' are not in the Hebrew text.

15 At last all the water in the bottle was spent,
16 there, while she went and sat down opposite where he was, at a bow-shot's distance;
I cannot bear to see my child die, she said.
And there, sitting opposite him, she wept 17 aloud. But God had listened to the child's crying, and now his angel called to Agar out of heaven. Agar, he said, what ails thee? Do not be afraid, God has listened to the crying of thy child, where he lies 18 yonder. Up, and take thy child with thee, hold him fast by the hand; I will make him 19 the founder of a great nation yet. With that, God gave clear sight to her eyes, and she saw a well that had water in it; to this she went, and filled her bottle, and gave 20 the boy drink. Thenceforward, God was with him; he grew up, and made his dwelling there in the wilderness, and became a 21 great archer. It was in the desert of Pharan that he dwelt, and the wife his mother chose for him was an Egyptian.

22 It was at this same time that Abimelech, with Phicol the commander of his army, said to Abraham, God goes with thee in all 23 thou doest; swear to me, then, in the name of God, that thou wilt do no injury to me, to those who follow after me, or to my race; that thou wilt repay the kindness I have shewn thee by like kindness shewn to me, and to this land where thou hast dwelt 24 as a stranger. That oath, Abraham said, 25 I will take; but meanwhile, he had a complaint to bring against Abimelech over a well where he used to draw water, that Abimelech's servants had seized by vio-26 lence. I have no knowledge, said Abime-lech, who has done it; thou hast never told me of it, and I never heard of it till to-day.

27 So Abraham brought sheep and oxen, and gave them to Abimelech, and they made a 28 treaty there between them. There were seven ewe-lambs that Abraham set apart 29 from the rest of the flock; and when Abimelech asked what was the meaning of the seven lambs he had set apart, he an-30 swered, Thy acceptance of these seven lambs shall be my witness, that it was I who 31 dug this well. That is why the place was called Bersabee, the well of the oath, because the two men swore friendship there.

32 Thus they made their treaty over the Well of the Oath, and then Abimelech rose, and went back with Phicol, the commander of his army, to the country of the Philistines.

At Bersabee, Abraham made a planta- 33 tion, and invoked there the name of the Lord God eternal. And for a long time he 34 dwelt on alien soil, in the country of the Philistines.

22 After this, God would put Abraham to the test. So he called to him, Abraham, Abraham; and when he said,
I am here, at thy command, God told him, 2 Take thy only son, thy beloved son Isaac, with thee, to the land of Clear Vision,¹ and there offer him to me in burnt-sacrifice on a mountain which I will shew thee. Rising, 3 therefore, at dawn, Abraham saddled his ass, bidding two of the men-servants and his son Isaac follow him; he cut the wood needed for the burnt-sacrifice, and then set out for the place of which God had spoken to him. It was two days later when he looked up and saw it, still far off; and 4 now he said to his servants, Wait here with the ass, while I and my son make our way yonder; we will come back to you, when we have offered worship there. Then he 5 took the wood for the sacrifice, and gave it to his son Isaac to carry; he himself carried the brazier and the knife. As they walked along together Isaac said to him, Father. 7 What is it, my son? he asked. Why, said he, we have the fire here and the wood;
where is the lamb we need for a victim?
My son, said Abraham, God will see to it 8 that there is a lamb to be sacrificed. So 9 they went on together till they reached the place God had shewn him. And here he built an altar, and set the wood in order on it; then he bound his son Isaac and laid him down there on the altar, above the pile of wood. And he reached out, and took up 10 the knife, to slay his son.

But now, from heaven, an angel of the 11
Lord called to him, Abraham, Abraham.
And when he answered, Here am I, at thy command, the angel said, Do the lad no 12 hurt, let him alone. I know now that thou fearest God; for my sake thou wast ready to give up thy only son. And Abraham, 13 looking about him, saw behind him a ram caught by the horns in a thicket; this he took, and offered it as a burnt-sacrifice, instead of his son. So Abraham called that 14

spot, The Lord's Foresight; and the saying goes to this day, On the mountain top, the Lord will see to it.¹

15 Once more the angel of the Lord called 16 to Abraham out of heaven; and he said, This message the Lord has for thee: I have taken an oath by my own name to reward thee for this act of thine, when thou wast ready to give up thy only son for my sake.
17 More and more will I bless thee, more and more will I give increase to thy posterity, till they are countless as the stars in heaven, or the sand by the sea shore; thy children 18 shall storm the gates of their enemies; all the races of the world shall find a blessing through thy posterity, for this readiness of thine to do my bidding. Then Abraham went back to his servants, and took them with him to Bersabee; it was at Bersabee that Abraham made his dwelling.

20 It was after this Abraham had news that his brother Nachor, too, had had sons by his wife Melcha. Hus was the name of his first-born, and the next brother was called Buz; then Camuel from whom the Syrians are sprung, and Cased and Azau, Pheldas 22 too and Jedlaph, and then Bathuel, the father of Rebecca; all these eight sons were born to Nachor, Abraham's brother, 24 by his wife Melcha. He had, too, a concubine called Roma; she bore him Tabea, and Gaham, and Tahas, and Maacha.

2 23 Sara reached the age of a hundred and twenty-seven; then she died, at the town of Arbee (that is, Hebron) in the land of Chanaan. And there Abraham came, to make lamentation and to mourn 3 for her. When the last rites were paid, he rose up and said to the Hethite folk, Here am I, a newcomer and a stranger among 4 you; will you grant me rights of burial among you, to bury my dead? And this 6 was the answer the Hethites gave him, Sir, as a heaven-sent chieftain thou hast come to dwell among us; bury thy dead in the choicest of all our graves; no man among us but shall grant thee his own tomb, to 7 bury thy dead in. So Abraham rose up, and made obeisance to the people of the 8 land, the Hethites. If you have a mind, said he, to grant my dead burial, do me this favour; plead for me with Ephron, the son of Seor, to give the double² cave at the end of his lands. Let him make it over to me for a just price, here in your presence, as my burial-ground. Ephron had his 14 place there among the Hethites; so, in the hearing of all those who came in by the gate of his native town, he gave Abraham this 16 answer: My lord, that must not be. Do but listen to me; it is my gift to thee, both the field and the cave in it; in the presence of these, my fellow-countrymen, I give it to thee; bury thy dead there. Whereupon 18 Abraham made obeisance before the people of the land; and said to Ephron, in the presence of the whole assembly, Pray listen, rather, to me; I must make payment for the land, and thou must accept it, before I will bury my dead in it. And Ephron 20 answered, My lord, listen to me; the land for which thou art asking is worth four hundred pieces of silver, but what is such a price between thee and me? Bury thy 22 dead. Upon hearing this, Abraham paid Ephron the sum which he had named before the Hethites, four hundred silver 24 pieces of current money; so the field that had been Ephron's, with the double cave in it facing towards Mambre, not only the cave but the field itself, with all the surrounding trees that were in the confines 18 of it, changed hands; and Abraham took possession of it, with the Hethites to witness it, and all those who came in by the 19 gate of Ephron's native town. And so, in the double cave there that looks towards Mambre, Abraham buried his wife Sara; Mambre is the Chanaanite city now called 20 Hebron. Both cave and field were made over to Abraham by the Hethites for a burying-ground.

24 Abraham was old now, and his life was near its end; and still, in all his doings, the Lord had blessed him. So now he called the oldest servant in his house, one who had charge of all his possessions, and said to him, Put thy hand here under my thigh, and let me take an oath of thee. Swear to me by the Lord God of heaven and earth that when thou findest a wife for my son, it shall not be some daughter of these Chanaanites, among whom I dwell; that thou wilt make thy way to my own country and my own kindred, and find a wife for my son Isaac there. What then, said the servant, if the woman of my choice refuses to come back to this land with me? Must I then take thy son back instead to the place that was once thy home? Beware of that, Abraham said; never take this son of mine back there. It was the Lord God of heaven that called me away from my father's house and from the land of my birth; and he has spoken with me, swearing to make over this land to my posterity. His angel will go before thee, enabling thee to find a wife for my son there. If the woman will not accompany thee, then thou art quit of this oath of thine, but never must thou take my son back there instead.

¹ In the Hebrew text, 'on the mountain of the Lord it shall be seen to', or perhaps, 'he shall be seen'.

So, putting his hand under his master Abraham's thigh, the servant pledged himself to fulfil this errand. He brought out ten of the camels in his master's herd, and took part of all his master's treasure with him; thus he set out, and made his way to the city where Nachor dwelt, in Mesopotamia. He was resting his camels by a well close to the town, just at the time of evening when women go out to draw water, and he prayed thus: O Lord, who art the God of my master Abraham, speed my errand to-day, and shew kindness to my master Abraham. I have taken up my post by this well, and the daughters of the citizens will be coming out to draw water. It may be that one of them, when I ask her to let down her pitcher and give me drink, will say, Here is drink for thee, and I will water thy camels as well. Let this be the bride thou hast chosen for thy servant Isaac; if it proves so, I shall know that thou art shewing kindness to my master.

Before he had finished praying thus in his heart, Rebecca, the daughter of Bathuel, came out with a pitcher on her shoulder. (Bathuel was one of the sons of Melcha, who married Abraham's brother Nachor.) A maiden most beautiful, fair of face, and a virgin that had no knowledge of man; and now she had gone down to the well, and filled the pitcher, and was on her way back, when the servant went to meet her. Give me a drop of water to drink, he said, from that pitcher of thine. Drink, 18 sir, she answered, and quickly let down the pitcher on to her arm, to give him drink. Then she added, when he had finished 19 drinking, Now I will draw water for thy camels, too, till they have had their fill. And with that she emptied her pitcher into 20 the troughs, and ran back to the well to draw water again, and gave what she drew for all his camels to drink. He, meanwhile, 21 watched her in silence, wondering whether God had sped his errand or no. Then, 22 when the camels had drunk, he took out two golden ear-rings,¹ that weighed ten pennyweights, and two bracelets, weighing five ounces; and he said, Tell me, 23 who is thy father? And can thy father's house give us lodging for the night? Bathuel 24 is my father, she answered, the son of Nachor by Melcha; and she added, We have no 25 lack of straw or of hay, and it is a roomy house to lodge in.

At this the servant bowed low and 26 praised God; Blessed be the Lord, he said, 27 the God of my master Abraham, still so merciful, still keeping his word to this master of mine, and guiding me straight to his brother's house! So the girl ran back 28 home, and told her mother all that had been said to her. She had a brother called 29 Laban; and he hastened out to meet the servant at the well. Full of the sight of 30 those ear-rings, and the bracelets on his sister's arms, and of the words she had reported, he went to look for the man, and found him still standing by the camels, close to the well. Come in, he said; why 31 dost thou stand without, so high in the Lord's favour as thou art? I have made the house ready, and found stabling for the camels. So he brought the servant home, 32 and unharnessed the camels for him, and brought straw and hay for them; water, too, so that the servant and his companions could wash their feet.

Then they put food before him, but he 33 said, I cannot eat until I have delivered my message. So Laban gave him leave to speak, and he said, I am one of the servants 34 of Abraham. The Lord has blessed my 35 master abundantly and made him great, giving him sheep and cattle, silver and gold, men-servants and maid-servants, camels and asses. And now Sara, my master's wife, has borne him a son in her old age, the heir of all his property. So my master took an oath of me to do his bidding; When thou findest a wife for my son, he said, it shall not be some daughter of these Chanaanites, among whom I dwell; thou must make thy way to my father's house, and find a wife for my son among my own kindred. What then, I answered, if the woman of my choice refuses to come back with me? And he said, The Lord, in whose sight I live and move, will send his angel with thee, to guide thee on thy journey and enable thee to find a wife for my son among my own kindred, my own father's household. And if, when thou reachest them, these kinsmen of mine will not give her up to thee, no curse of mine shall light upon thee.

So I found myself, to-day, at the well, and my prayer was, O Lord, who art the God of my master Abraham, wilt thou speed this present errand of mine? I have taken up my post by this well; it may be that some maiden, when I ask her to let me drink a drop of water from her pitcher, will say, Here is drink for thee, and I will draw water for thy camels as well. Let this be the bride the Lord has chosen for my master's son. I was still praying thus in the silence of my own heart, when I saw Rebecca coming down to the well with a pitcher on her shoulder, and drawing water there; and I asked her for a drop of water to drink. And she, without waiting, let down the pitcher from her shoulder; Do thou drink, she said, and I will water thy camels as well. So I drank, and she gave the camels their drink. Then, when I questioned her, asking who her father was, she said, Bathuel is my father, the son of Nachor by Melcha. And with that I hung these ear-rings upon her, to deck her face, and put these bracelets on her arms; and I fell down to worship the Lord, blessing him, the God of my master Abraham, for guiding me where my master's niece waited for my master's son. And now, if you are ready to shew love and loyalty to my master, tell me your mind; if you have other thoughts, tell me your mind none the less, so that I may know where my course lies, to right or to left.

Laban and Bathuel had but one answer; This comes from the Lord; when his will is made known, it is not for us to say Yes or No. Rebecca stands before thee, take her and go on thy way; she must wed thy master's son at the Lord's bidding. Upon hearing this, Abraham's servant bowed down to earth and gave the Lord worship; then he took out cups of silver and gold, and garments, too, as a present for Rebecca, and gave precious gifts to her brethren and her mother besides. So the feasting began, and they ate and drank and passed the night there; but when morning came, the servant rose up and said, Now give me leave to go back to my master. And when her mother and her brethren would have kept her with them for ten days, at least, before her departure, he begged them, Do not detain me, now that the Lord has sped my errand so well, let me go back to my master at once. Then they said, Let us send for the maiden herself, and find out what her will is. So they fetched her, and when she came in, they asked, Art thou ready to go with this man? And she told them, I am ready. So they let her go, and her nurse with her, and Abraham's servant, and his companions, wishing their sister good fortune as she went: Sister of ours, may thousands of thousands spring from thee, and may thy posterity storm the gates of their enemies.

So Rebecca and her maids mounted their camels and followed the servant, who went back to his master with all speed. At this time, Isaac, who now lived in the South country, used to walk along a certain road, leading to the well called, God lives and looks on me.¹ And one evening he had gone out of doors, to meditate there, when suddenly, looking up, he saw camels coming towards him from a distance. As for Rebecca, when she saw Isaac, she alighted from her camel, and asked the servant, Who is this coming towards us across the fields? When he said, It is my master, she quickly took up her veil, and veiled herself.² And now the servant told Isaac of all that he had done, and Isaac led her to the tent which had been his mother

Sara's, and made her his wife, and found comfort over the loss of his mother in his love for her.

25 Abraham, too, married again; his second wife's name was Cetura, and his children by her were Zamran, Jecsan, Madan, Madian, Jesboc and Suë. Jecsan was the father of Saba and Dadan, and Dadan's children were the Assurim, the Latusim and the Loömim. From Madian came Epha, Opher, Henoch, Abida and Eldaa. All these were descended from Cetura. Abraham left Isaac the heir to all he possessed and made gifts to the children he had by his concubines. These children of his he bade journey eastwards, while he was still alive, to keep them apart from his son Isaac. Abraham lived a hundred and seventy-five years; then his strength failed him, and he died, content in late old age, his tale of years complete, and he became a part of his people. His sons, Isaac and Ismael, buried him; buried him in the double cave, on the land opposite Mambre that had once belonged to Ephron, son of Seor, the Hethite. Abraham himself had bought this land from the Hethites, and there he was buried, like his wife Sara before him. And now that he was dead, God's blessing passed to his son Isaac, who had made his home close to the well that is called, God lives and looks on me.

This was the lineage that came down from Ismael, Abraham's son by Agar, the Egyptian, Sara's waiting-woman; these are the names of his sons, arranged by the order of their birth. Ismael's eldest son was Nabaioth, then came Cedar, Adbeel, Mabsam, Masma, Duma, Massa, Hadar, Thema, Jethur, Naphis and Cedma. These were Ismael's sons, and these the names they left to their villages and towns; each of the twelve was chieftain of a tribe. As for Ismael, he lived a hundred and thirty-seven years; then his strength failed and he died, and became a part of his people. The country where he lived reaches from Hevila to Sur, at the gate of Egypt, where the way to Assur lies; and he died with all his kindred about him.¹

And this was how the race of Abraham's son Isaac continued; Abraham was the father of Isaac, and Isaac was forty years old when he married Laban's sister Rebecca, daughter of Bathuel the Syrian, who lived in Mesopotamia. At first she was barren, but he prayed to the Lord for her, and his prayer was answered; Rebecca conceived. But the children fell to struggling in her womb; How am I the better for conceiving, she asked, if this is to befall me? And she went to ask counsel from the Lord. The answer he gave was this: There are two nations in thy womb; in thy body the separation of two peoples has begun; here is a victory of people over people, and it is the elder that shall be subject to the younger. And now the time came for her giving birth, and it was found that there had been twins in her womb. The first to come was of a red complexion, and hairy all over as if he had worn a coat of skin; this one was called Esau. Then the second came, with his hand clutching his brother's heel; and she called him, for that reason, Jacob, the Supplanter. It was when Isaac was sixty years old that these sons were born to him.

When the twins grew up, Esau turned into a skilful huntsman, that loved the open plains; Jacob was a tent-dweller and a man of peace. All Isaac's love was for Esau, who brought him game to eat; Rebecca's favourite was Jacob. One day, when Esau was coming back tired from the chase, he found Jacob making broth, and said to him, Let me have a mouthful, pray, of that red broth of thine; I am full weary. (That is why he came to be called Edom, the Red.) First then, Jacob answered, make over to me thy birthright. Why, surely, said he; I shall have little profit of my birthright, if I am to die of hunger as I stand here. Give me thy oath, saith Jacob; and Esau gave his oath, and made over his birthright. Then Jacob gave him bread, and some of the lentil broth, and he ate and drank and came away, as if the loss of his birthright were a thing of little moment.

26 When a famine came upon the land again, like the famine which had visited it in Abraham's time, Isaac was

for leaving it; and he had reached the court of Abimelech, king of the Philistines, in 2 Gerara, when the Lord appeared to him and said, No, do not take refuge in Egypt;
thou art to remain in the land of my choice.
3 Dwell in that land, though it be alien soil, and I will be with thee and bless thee;
I mean to give all this land to thee and to thy race after thee, in fulfilment of the oath 4 I took to thy father Abraham. I will make that race plentiful as the stars in heaven, and grant the whole of this land to thy descendants; in thy posterity all the nations of the world shall find a blessing.
5 Such reward shall Abraham have for obey-ing me, for keeping every command and charge I gave him, following observance 6 and decree of mine. So Isaac remained 7 where he was, at Gerara. And now, when certain of the inhabitants asked him about his wife, he told them, She is my sister; he was afraid to own that she was his wedded wife, thinking they might be tempted by 8 her beauty to kill him. And one day, when he had already spent a long time in the country, the Philistine king, Abimelech, looked out of a window and saw Isaac and 9 his wife in dalliance together. Whereupon he summoned him, and said, It is plain enough, now, that she is thy wife, why didst thou pretend she was thy sister?
I was afraid, he answered, that she 10 might be the cause of my death. What is this trick thou hast played on us?
said Abimelech. One of my people might easily have dishonoured thy wife, and so thou wouldst have led us into 11 grievous guilt. Then he issued his command to all his people, If anyone touches this man's wife, his life must pay for it.
12 In this country, Isaac began growing crops; and in that first year they yielded a hundredfold; such was the Lord's blessing 13 on him. Thus he became rich, and went on prospering more and more, until he 14 rose to great influence; flocks of sheep were his, and herds of cattle, and a great 15 retinue. And now the Philistines, out of envy, stopped up all the wells which the servants of his father Abraham had dug 16 there, filling them in with earth. At last Abimelech himself said to Isaac, Separate from us; thou hast become altogether too powerful for us. So he went to live in the valley of Gerara. Here he opened afresh 17 other wells, dug by his father Abraham's 18 servants, and stopped up long since by the Philistines, when Abraham died; calling them by the old names his father had given them. While they were thus digging in the 19 valley, they came upon running water; but 20 here, too, the herdsmen of Gerara disputed the rights of Isaac's herdsmen, and claimed the water as their own. So he called the well, in memory of what had happened, the False Claim. Then they dug another, 21 and this, too, was a cause of contention, so he called this well the Feud. And at last, 22 when he had gone further on and dug another well, over which they did not dispute with him, he called it Freedom; Now at last, he said, the Lord has given us freedom to spread over the land. From there 23 he went to Bersabee; and here, the same 24 night, he had a vision of the Lord, who said to him, I am the God of thy father Abraham; fear nothing, I am with thee.

I mean to bless thee, and give increase to thy posterity, in reward of Abraham's true service. So he built an altar, and in-25 voked the Lord's name, and pitched his tent there, and bade his servants dig a well.

When Abimelech came from Gerara to 26 visit him there, with Ochozath, his counsellor, and Phicol, the commander of his army, Isaac asked them, What means your 27 visit? Here is a man you have treated as an enemy, and driven him away from you.
But they answered, We have seen how all 28 this while the Lord is with thee; and our thought was, It is time there was an oath between us. Let us make a covenant that thou wilt do us no wrong; we never laid 29 hands on thee, never did thee anything but good; we parted from thee peaceably, and the Lord's blessing was thine. So he made 30 them a feast, and they ate and drank with him; then, when they rose up in the morn-31 ing, they bound themselves by oath each to the other, and so Isaac took leave of them, and they went home in peace. It 32 was on that very day that Isaac's servants came to him and brought word of the latest well they had been digging; We 33 have found water, they told him. So he called it Abundance;¹ that is how the city

¹ 'Abundance'; the Hebrew text has, 'the Oath', which is more consonant with the derivation given in 21. 31 above.

came to be called Bersabee, as it is to this day.

- 34 Esau, who was by this time forty years old, married two wives, Judith the daughter of Beëri, the Hethite, and Basemath, the daughter of another Hethite, Elon.
35 Both of these distressed the hearts of Isaac and Rebecca.

27 And now Isaac was old, and his eyes had grown so dim that he saw nothing. One day he called to his elder son Esau, My son! and when he answered, I am here, at thy command, See, his father said, how old a man I have grown; there is no telling how soon I may be overtaken by death. Come, fetch that armoury of thine, thy quiver and thy bow, and go out hunting; when thou hast slain thy quarry, make me a roast dish, such as I love well, and bring it me to eat. And so thou shalt have my blessing, against the time of my death.

- 5 To all this, Rebecca listened; and when Esau had gone out hunting, to do as his father had bidden him, she said to her son Jacob, I heard thy father talking to thy brother Esau, and thus he spoke to him;
6 Bring my venison from the chase, and make me a dish of meat; so thou shalt have my blessing, with the Lord to witness it, 8 against the time of my death. Nothing remains for thee, my son, but to fall in with this plan of mine. Make thy way to the herd, and bring me two choice kids; of these I will make such a dish as thy father 10 loves to eat, and thou shalt take it in to him; so, when he has eaten it, his dying benediction shall be thine instead. Be-11 think thee, answered Jacob, how hairy my brother Esau's skin is, and mine how 12 smooth! What if my father should feel it? He will think that I have been trying to 13 make game of him, and it is a curse, not a blessing, I shall win. A curse, my son? said his mother. Let it fall on me; do but 14 attend to my bidding, and fetch me what I ask for. So he went and brought them 15 to his mother, and she made a dish of meat, such as she knew his father loved. She had 16 fine clothes of Esau's by her in the house, and she dressed Jacob in these; enclosed 17 his hands, too in skin he had taken from the kids, and covered his bare neck with it; 7 then she gave him the dish, and some loaves which she had cooked, to carry with him.

So he brought them in, and said, Father. 18 Yes, my son, he said; who is it? I am Esau, 19 said Jacob, Esau, thy first-born; I have done thy bidding. Rise up, I pray thee, sit at table, and eat this venison of mine, and give me a father's blessing. Why, answered 20 Isaac, how didst thou come to find thy quarry in so short a time, my son? It was God's pleasure, said he, to send it in my way. Then Isaac said, Come near, and let 21 me feel thee, to make sure whether thou art my son Esau or not. So he went close 22 to his father; and he, upon feeling the touch of him, said, The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau. There was no recognizing Jacob, since his 23 hands were hairy like Esau's hands, and he must needs give his blessing. Thou art my son, he said, my son Esau? Yes, he answered, I am. Why then, said he, bring it 25 here; let me eat my son's venison, and give him a father's blessing. So he ate what was brought him, and Jacob offered him wine too, and he drank.

Then he said to Jacob, Come here, my 26 son, and kiss me. And when he came near, 27 and kissed him, all at once Isaac caught the smell of his garments, and this was the blessing he gave him: How it breathes about this son of mine, the fragrance of earth when the Lord's blessing is on it! God give thee dew from heaven and fruit- 28 ful soil, corn and wine in plenty. Let 29 nations serve thee, and peoples bow before thee; mayst thou be lord over thy brethren, receive obeisance from thy own mother's sons; a curse on those who curse, a blessing on those who bless thee! Scarcely had 30 Isaac finished speaking, and Jacob gone out, when Esau returned. And now he 31 brought his father a dish of venison; Rise up, father, he said, eat thy son's venison, and give me a father's blessing. Why, who 32 art thou? Isaac asked. I am thy son, he answered, thy first-born son Esau. At this, 33 quite overcome with dread, astonished past belief, Isaac cried out, Why then, who is it that has already brought me venison from the chase? Before ever thou camest back to me, I have eaten my fill and to him given my blessing; on him the blessing will come.

Esau, on hearing his father's words, 34

broke out into a loud cry of anguish; Thy blessing, father, for me also thy blessing!
 35 Thy brother, it seems, Isaac answered, came in disguised; he has snatched thy 36 blessing from thee. Why, said Esau, he is well named Jacob, the Supplanter; first he took away my birthright, and now he has stolen my blessing. And then, turning to his father, he asked, Hast thou no blessing 37 left, then, a blessing for me too? Nay, answered Isaac, I have designated him thy master; I have condemned all his brethren to do him service; I have assured him of corn and wine; what claim have I left myself to make for thee, my son? But Esau 38 pleaded still, Hast thou only one blessing to give, father? I pray thee, bless me too. And he could not control his voice, but 39 wept aloud. Then Isaac said, greatly moved, All thy blessing shall come from earth's fruitfulness, and from the dew of 40 heaven.¹ Thy sword shall be the breath of life to thee, but thou shalt be subject to thy brother, until the day comes when thou wilt rebel, and wilt shake off his yoke from thy neck.

41 But ever Esau bore Jacob a grudge over the blessing he had won from their father. Soon, he thought, the days will come when we shall be mourning for my father's death; that is the time to kill my brother.
 42 News of this reached Rebecca; so she sent for her son Jacob, and told him, Thy 43 brother Esau is threatening thy life. Thou must needs do what I bid thee, my son; bestir thyself, and take refuge in Haran 44 with thy uncle, Laban. There thou must dwell for a short while, till thy brother's 45 anger dies down. Soon his rage will cool, and he will forget the wrong thou hast done him; then I will send there, and bring thee back home; only begone; shall I let one day's work rob me of both my sons?²
 46 And to Isaac Rebecca said, I am weary of life, with these Hethite women about me; if Jacob weds a bride of this native stock, may I not live to see it!

28 So Isaac summoned Jacob to him, and gave him his blessing, and laid this charge upon him: It is not for thee to marry a woman of Chanaanite stock; rather bestir thyself, and make thy way to Mesopotamia of the Syrians; there dwelt thy mother's father, Bathuel, there thou mayest wed one of the daughters of thy uncle Laban. God Almighty bless thee, and make thy posterity thrive and increase, so that a multitude of nations may spring from thee. May he gra:it to thee, and to thy race after thee, the blessing which he promised to thy grandfather Abraham; possession of the land in which thou dwellest now as a stranger. Jacob took leave of him, and set out on his journey to Mesopotamia of the Syrians, to the home of his uncle Laban, son of Bathuel, the Syrian. An ill day for Esau; here was Jacob sent with his father's blessing to find himself a wife in Syria; forbidden, as he would win that blessing, to marry a Chanaanite; here was Jacob gone all the way to Mesopotamia in obedience to his parents' whim! These women of Chanaan, Esau thought, are little to my father's liking; so he betook himself to Ismael,³ and married a third wife, Maheleth, daughter to Abraham's son Ismael, and sister to Nabaioth.

Meanwhile Jacob had left Bersabee, and was on his way to Haran. There was a place he reached as nightfall overtook him, so that he must lie down and rest; so he took one of the stones that lay around him, to make a pillow of it, and went to sleep. He dreamed that he saw a ladder standing on the earth, with its top reaching up into heaven; a stairway for the angels of God to go up and come down. Over this ladder the Lord himself leaned down, and spoke to Jacob, I am the Lord, he said, the God of thy father Abraham, the God of Isaac; this ground on which thou liest sleeping is my gift to thee and to thy posterity. Thy race shall be countless as the dust of the earth; to west and east, to north and south thou shalt overflow thy frontiers, till all the families on earth find a blessing in thee, and in this race of thine. I myself will watch over thee wherever thou goest, and bring thee back to this land again; before I have done with thee, all my promises to thee shall be fulfilled.

¹ 'Thy blessing'; in the Hebrew text, 'thy dwelling-place'. Some think the meaning is, 'Thy dwelling-place shall be far from earth's fruitfulness, and the dew of heaven', since these advantages had already been pledged to Jacob (verse 28 above). ² Rebecca probably means that if Esau killed Jacob he would become a fugitive, like Cain, and thus be lost to her. ³ 'To Ismael'; that is, probably, to Ismael's family, their father being now dead.

16 When he awoke from his dream, Jacob said to himself, Why, this is the Lord's dwelling-place, and I slept here unaware 17 of it! And he shuddered; What a fearsome place is this! said he. This can be nothing other than the house of God; this is the 18 gate of Heaven. So it was that, when he rose in the morning, Jacob took the stone which had been his pillow, and set it up there as a monument, and poured oil upon 19 it; and he called the place Bethel, the House of God, that was called Luz^a till then. And there he took a vow; If God will be with me, he said, and watch over me on this journey of mine, and give me bread to eat 20 and clothes to cover my back, till at last I return safe to my father's house, then the 21 Lord shall be my God. This stone, too, which I have set up as a monument, shall be called the House of God. And of all the gifts thou sendest me, a tenth part shall be the offering I make thee.

29 Then Jacob went on his way, and reached the eastern country.
2 Here, in the open plain, he found a well, with three flocks of sheep lying down beside it. It was here that the flocks were watered; but the mouth of the well was 3 closed by a great stone, and it was not the custom to roll this stone away till all the flocks were assembled. When these had had their fill, the stone was put back on the 4 well mouth. Whence come you, brethren? he asked the shepherds. From Haran, they 5 answered. And his next question was, whether they knew Laban, son of Nachor.
6 Yes, they said, we know him. Is all well with him? asked Jacob. Yes, said they, all is well with him. That is his daughter, 7 Rachel, yonder, coming towards us with her flock. Then Jacob said, The sun is still high, and it is a long time before the flocks need to be folded; why do you not water the sheep at once, and take them back to 8 their pasture again? That cannot be done, they answered, until all the herds have assembled here; we wait till then, before we move the stone from the well mouth and water our flocks. The words were scarcely spoken, when Rachel came up with her father's sheep; Rachel herself was 9 their shepherdess. Jacob watched her as she came; this was his cousin, these were his uncle Laban's sheep; so he moved away the stone by which the well was shut in. Then, when she had watered her flock, he went up and kissed her, weeping aloud; 11 and he told her that he was her father's 12 kinsman, Rebecca's son; whereupon she went quickly home to tell her father the news.

No sooner did Laban hear of his nephew 13 Jacob's arrival, than he ran out to meet him, embraced him, covered him with kisses, and brought him back home. He listened to the reasons that had brought him there, and said, Thou art my own flesh 14 and blood. And he waited till a month had passed; then he said, Because thou art my 15 kinsman, that is no reason why thou shouldst work for me free of charge; tell me what reward thou wouldst have. Laban 16 had two daughters; Rachel was called Lia. But Lia was dull-eyed, whereas Rachel had 17 beauty both of form and face, and on her Jacob's love had fallen. So he answered, I will work seven years for thee to win thy 18 younger daughter Rachel. Better thou, 19 said Laban, than any other husband I could find for her; stay, then, at my side. So Jacob worked seven years to win 20 Rachel, and they seemed to him only a few days, because of the greatness of his love.

Then he said to Laban, Give me my 21 bride; the time has come now for me to wed her. So Laban invited a great com-22 pany of his friends to the wedding feast; but that night he matched Jacob with his 23 daughter Lia instead, giving her a maid called Zelpha to wait on her. So, with all due ceremony, Jacob took her to his bed, 24 and it was not till morning he found out that it was Lia. Whereupon he said to 25 Laban, What meanest thou? Did not I work for thee to win Rachel? What is this trick thou hast played on me? And Laban 26 answered, It is not the custom of our country to wed our younger daughters 27 first. Celebrate this wedding of thine for a full week, and I will give thee Rachel too, 28 and thou shalt work for me another seven years to earn her. To this Jacob agreed, 29 and when the week was over he made Rachel his wife; the waiting-maid her 30 father gave to Rachel was called Bala. So, at last, he won the bride he had longed for, and loved her better than he had loved her sister; meanwhile, he spent another seven years in Laban's service.

31 And now, seeing Lia thus despised, the Lord gave her issue, while Rachel must 32 remain barren. So she conceived and bore a son, whom she called Ruben, as if she would say, the Lord has looked on my lowliness, Raa-beoni. Now, she thought, 33 my husband will love me. Then she conceived again, and again bore a son; Fresh gift, said she, is fresh proof the Lord has come to hear of the despite done me; so 34 she called him Simeon, Hearing. Then she conceived a third time, and bore another son; This time, she thought, my husband will be closely knit to me, now that I have borne him three sons, and she called him 35 Levi, Knit together. And when she conceived a fourth time, and bore a son, she said, Now I may praise the Lord, and she called him Juda, Praise. Then, for a while, she had no more children.

30 Rachel, meanwhile, when she found she remained barren, looked with envy on her sister; Thou must needs give me children, said she to her husband, or it will be my death. What, answered Jacob, angry at her mood, Must I stand in the place of God to thee? It is he that has denied thee motherhood. Here is Bala, she said, my maid-servant; get her with child instead, and it shall be born on my knees; thus, through her means, I shall have a family of my own.¹ So she gave him Bala as his mate; and Bala, got with child by Rachel's husband, bore a son. Whereupon Rachel said, God has pronounced judgement for me, and listened to my plea, by giving me a son; and she called the boy Dan, as if she would say, He has pronounced judgement. Afterwards Bala conceived again and bore a second son; of him Rachel said, God has matched me like a wrestler against my sister, and I have won the bout, so she called him Nephthali, Wrestling. Lia, too, finding that she was not having any more children, gave her maid-servant Zelpha to her husband for his mate; and when Zelpha conceived and bore a son, Lia said, Good fortune has come to me, and called the boy Gad, Fortune. Zelpha, too, bore Jacob a second son, and Lia said, Here is a blessing for me; women must needs call me blessed now; so she gave him the name of Aser, Blessedness.

Once, at the time of the wheat harvest, Ruben went out and found some mandrakes, which he brought back to his mother Lia;² and Rachel said to Lia, Give me some of the fruit thy son has found. What, answered she, art thou not content with stealing my husband from me? Must thou have my son's mandrake fruit as well? And Rachel said, Jacob shall sleep with thee to-night, if I may have some of thy son's mandrake-fruit. So, when Jacob came back from work at evening, Lia went out to meet him; Thou art to share my bed to-night, she told him; I have paid thy hire with the mandrake fruit which my son found. So he slept with her that night; and now God listened to her prayers, so that she conceived again and bore a fifth son. Whereupon she said, God has paid me too my hire, for the maid-servant I lent to my husband, and she called the boy Issachar, Reward. And again Lia conceived, and bore a sixth son; This is a fair dowry, she said, God has endowed me with; once more my husband will dwell with me, now that I have borne him six sons; and she called the boy Zabulon, Dwelling. She had one more child after this, a daughter called Dina. Meanwhile, the Lord had not forgotten Rachel; her prayer was answered, and she, too, had issue. When she conceived and bore a son, her thought was, God has taken away my disgrace. And she called him Joseph, Increase; If only, she thought, God would increase my household with another son.

After Joseph's birth, Jacob said to his father-in-law, Give me leave to go back home, to my own country. And when I go, let me take with me the wives and the children I have earned in thy service; how hard I have worked for thee, none knows better than thou. Let me ask a favour of thee, said Laban. Proof needs none that it is for thy sake God has made me prosper

¹ Legitimacy, in ancient times, depended on recognition by the foster-parents, and if Rachel consented to take the child on her knees, the ceremony would make it, for legal purposes, her child. ² The fruit of the mandragora or mandrake was anciently thought to be a specific for promoting conception in women.

28 so. Work for me still, and name thy own 29 hire. None knows better than thou, answered Jacob, how hard I have worked for thee, and how these herds of thine have 30 increased under my care. It was little enough thou hadst before I came to thy house, and now thou hast become rich; the Lord has blessed thee from the day when I came hither. Now it is time that I should 31 think of my own household too. What shall I give thee? Laban asked. Give me nothing, said he; but I will consent to feed and tend thy herds still on this condition.
 32 Go round all thy flocks, now, and remove from them every sheep that is speckled, or has a blotched fleece. And the hire thou art to pay me shall be all the lambs that are born, even so, grey or spotted or speckled; 33 and so with the kids. So, later, when our agreement is fulfilled, my honesty shall be on its trial; if I keep for myself any beast except those which are speckled or spotted or grey, whether it be lamb or kid, call me 34 a thief. Thy request, said Laban, is granted; and, that same day, he set aside 35 she-goats and ewes, he-goats and rams, that were speckled and spotted; all those, too, that were of one colour, white (among the goats) or black (among the sheep);¹ and these he gave in charge of his own sons.
 16 And he put a distance of three days' journey between himself and his son-in-law.
 17 Jacob, then, left in charge of the rest of the flocks, did this. He took green branches of poplar, and almond, and plane, and partly peeled them; so that (now the bark had gone) the white shewed through where they had been stripped, whereas the parts he had left untouched remained green; 18 everywhere the colour was varied. These branches he fitted into the troughs where his flocks were watered, so that when they came to drink, they should have these speckled branches before their eyes, and the dams would conceive in full view of 19 them. Looking at the branches at the very heat of their coupling, the dams bore spotted and speckled and piebald young.
 20 There, then, were the two flocks divided, and there were Jacob's branches set up before the very eyes of the rams. All the white (sheep) and all the black (goats) were to be Laban's, the rest Jacob's, when the flocks were sorted afresh. And this was 41 his plan; at the earlier breeding-season he fitted the branches into the troughs, before the eyes of ram and ewe, so that the dams might be looking at them when they conceived; but when the later breeding 42 happened, and the time for conceiving was at an end, he put the branches there no longer. So all the late-bred (weaklings) belonged to Laban, and all the (strong) early-bred belonged to Jacob.² Thus he 43 became rich beyond measure; many were the herds, the men-servants and maidservants, the camels and asses that were his.³

31 Meanwhile, Laban's sons were complaining, Our father has been robbed of all his goods by Jacob, who has become rich at his expense. Jacob was 2 aware of this; he found, too, that Laban looked on him more coldly than hitherto.
 But what moved him most was that 3 the Lord had bidden him, Return to the land of thy fathers, to thy own kindred. So he 4 sent word to Rachel and Lia to meet him on the pasture-ground where he was feeding his flocks, and said to them, I find that 5 your father looks on me more coldly than hitherto; and all because the God of my father has prospered me. You know well 6 that I have worked for your father with all my might, whereas he has defrauded me, 7 altering, time and again, his bargain with me; it was only God's mercy that pre-8 vented him doing me an injury. As it was, whenever he said, The speckled beasts shall be thy wages, it was to speckled lambs that all my ewes gave birth; when he changed about, and said, Thou shalt have all the white lambs for thy pay, all my flocks bore white. That is how God has 9 taken away your father's wealth and given it to me. I had a dream at the time when 10 my ewes were mating; as I looked round,

² The words 'weaklings' and 'strong' are not expressed in the Latin, but the Hebrew text shews that this was the author's meaning. Apparently it was thought that winter lambs were more robust than spring lambs.

³ In the Hebrew text, this whole story is confused, and difficult to unravel. The Latin version differs from it very considerably; and this, too, is obscure in places; the rendering here given is based on the exposition given by St Jerome himself in his notes on Genesis.

I could see none but speckled and spotted and blotched rams coupling with the ewes.

11 And in my dream, an angel of God called me by name, and when I answered, I am

12 here, at thy command, he said, Look about thee, and mark well that all the sires coupling with the dams are speckled, spotted, or blotched; that is because I have taken good note of all Laban's dealings with thee. I am the God who dwells at Bethel, where thou didst anoint the stone, and didst take a vow to me. It is time for thee, now, to bestir thyself, to leave this country, and go back to the country of thy birth. Why, 14 answered Rachel and Lia, we have no reversion left to us in all our father's wealth and possessions. He has treated us as if we were no kindred of his, putting us up for sale, and keeping the price for himself.

16 And now, it seems, God has taken away our father's wealth from him, and given it to us and to our children. Why then, do as the Lord has bidden thee.

17 Upon this, Jacob waited no longer; he mounted his children and wives on the camels, and set out on his journey; taking with him all his possessions, his cattle and all the wealth he had gained in Mesopotamia; he would return to his father

19 Isaac, and the land of Chanaan. Meanwhile, in the absence of her father Laban, who had gone to shear his sheep, Rachel stole his household gods from him. Jacob had given his father-in-law no warning of his flight, and it was not till he and all that belonged to him had gone away, and crossed the Euphrates, and were making

22 for the hills of Galaad, that a message came to Laban, three days too late, Jacob has fled. So now he took his kinsmen with him and gave chase; and he had been on the road seven days before he overtook him

24 on the hills of Galaad. Here, in his sleep, he had a vision of God warning him, Have a care thou dost not speak to Jacob harshly.

25 Jacob had already pitched his tent on the hills, and now Laban, coming up with his kinsmen in pursuit, encamped in these same hills of Galaad. What meanest thou, he asked Jacob, by thus tricking me, and carrying off my daughters as if they were prisoners of war? Why wouldst thou run away when my back was turned, instead of warning me of it, so that I could have sped thee on thy way with good cheer, with singing, and music of timbrel and harp? But no, thou wouldst not even let me part from my own grandsons and daughters with a kiss. This was a rash act of thine, and see where it has brought thee. Thou art in my power, and I could repay the injury if I would; but the God who protects thy father's race warned me yesterday, Have a care thou dost not speak harshly to Jacob. Thou wert hastening to return to thy own kindred? Thou wert longing for thy home? Tell me then, why hast thou carried away my household gods with thee? To this Jacob answered, If I left thee unawares, it was because I was afraid thou wouldst rob me of thy daughters by violence. But as for thy charge of theft, whoever is found with these gods of thine in his possession shall pay for it with his life. Make search in the presence of thy kinsmen and mine, and take away with thee all thou findest here that belongs to thee. Of Rachel's carrying off the images, Jacob knew nothing.

So Laban went into Jacob's tent, and Lia's, and the tents of both the serving-women, but found nothing. At last he came to Rachel's tent; and Rachel, who had quickly hidden the images among the harness of her camel, now sat down upon the harness. As her father looked in vain all through the tent, she said, Forgive me, sir, if I do not rise to greet thee; the common lot of women has come upon me; and so the anxious search came to nothing. And now Jacob broke out into angry reproaches against Laban. For what fault, what guilt of mine, hast thou so hotly pursued me, and made this search of all my goods? What treasure hast thou found here, of all the treasures in thy house? Bring it out here, before my brethren and thine, and let them judge between us. Was it for this that I spent twenty years in thy service? All that time, thy ewes and she-goats were never barren, no wether lamb of thine did I take for my own eating. If wild beasts preyed on them, I made good the damage, instead of bringing it to shew thee; I must needs give account to thee of all that was lost by theft. Burning heat by day, and biting frost at nights, till my eye-lids lost the power of sleep; thus it was that I spent twenty years as a servant in thy household, fourteen years for thy daughters, and six

for thy flocks; time and again thou didst 42 alter thy bargain with me. Why, if the God of my father Abraham, the God before whom Isaac trembles, had not prospered me, thou wouldst have sent me away pen-niless; as it is, God has taken account of my wretchedness, and the toil these hands have borne; that is why he gave thee, yes-43 terday, his warning. And Laban answered, These are my daughters, these boys are mine, as thy flocks, and all thou seest before thee, are mine; something I must do to protect my own daughters, my own 44 grandchildren. Come, let us make a covenant, which shall stand on record between us.

45 So Jacob took a stone, and set it up there 46 as a monument; he said, too, to his kinsmen, Bring stones here. And they gathered stones, and made them into a heap; and over that heap they took food together.
 47 Laban called it the Cairn of Record, and Jacob called it the Witness-heap, each according to the usage of his own tongue.
 48 Laban had said Let this heap bear record of our covenant to-day; that is how it came 49 to be called Galaad, the Witness-heap. Let the Lord keep watch, he said, and see justice done between us, when our ways 50 have parted.¹ If thou dost treat these daughters of mine amiss, and bringest home other wives instead of them, there will be no one else to bear witness of what we have said, but God will bear witness; he 51 is here to see us. He said further to Jacob, Look at this heap, this stone which I have 52 set up between us;² these shall be witnesses, heap and stone shall be there to accuse us, if I pass by them on my way to thee, or thou on thy way to me, with harm-53 ful intent. May the God who is Abraham's God and Nachor's, the God of their common father³ see justice done between us.
 Then Jacob swore by the God his father 54 Isaac held in reverence, and summoned his kinsmen, when sacrifice had been done on the hill, to take food there. So they took 55 their meal, and remained there, while Laban rose up at daybreak, kissed his grandsons and his two daughters, and blessed them, and went back to his home.

32 Jacob, too, set out to continue his journey, and as he went, God's angels met him. This is God's encamp-2 ment, he said when he saw them, and called the place Mahanaim, which means a Camp.

And now he sent messengers of his own 3 on before him, to greet his brother Esau in the country of Seir, which is Edom's ter-4 ritory. These were his directions, You are to tell my lord Esau this, from his brother Jacob: I have been living abroad, on a visit to Laban, and am but just returned. I have 5 brought back oxen and asses and sheep, men-servants and women-servants with me. And now, my lord, I have sent these envoys to thee, to secure thy good will.
 And this was the news the messengers 6 brought back with them, We found thy brother Esau; even now he comes hastening to meet thee, with four hundred men.
 At this, Jacob was overcome with terror, 7 and in his extremity he divided up his followers, the flocks of sheep, too, and the cattle, and the camels, into two companies;
 If Esau, he thought, should meet with one 8 company, and fall upon it, at least the other will come through safely. And now Jacob 9 said, O God of my fathers Abraham and Isaac, thou, Lord, who hast bidden me return to my own country, the land of my birth, and hast offered to bless me, I, thy 10 servant, am not worthy of all the mercies thou hast shewn me, the faithful observance of thy promises. I had nothing but this staff with me, when I crossed the Jordan, and now I have come back with two companies behind me. Save me now from 11 the power of my brother Esau; I fear grievously that when he comes he will spare neither women nor children. Hast 12 thou not promised me thy continued favour, and a posterity spread wide as the sand by the sea, that is beyond all counting?

When he had slept the night there, he 13 chose out of all his possessions a present for his brother Esau, two hundred she-14 goats and twenty buck-goats, two hundred ewes and twenty rams, thirty camels in 15 milk with their colts, forty cows and twenty

¹ 'Let the Lord keep watch'; in the Hebrew text, these words are explained as the origin of another place-name, Maspha. ² There may have been some confusion in the text of this passage; perhaps Jacob in verse 45 is a mistake for Laban, whose 'kinsmen' have been mentioned in verse 23. ³ This is the sense of the Latin; the Hebrew text is confused, and leaves it doubtful whether one God or a plurality of Gods is meant.

bulls, and twenty she-asses with ten colts.

16 All these he sent on, with their drivers; Go on in front of me, he told his men, and leave a space between one herd and the 17 next. And to the first of these, his directions were, If thou shouldst encounter my brother Esau, and he should ask, Whose man art thou? or Whither goest thou? or 18 Whose are these beasts thou tendest? thy answer is to be, They belong to thy servant Jacob, who is sending them as a present to my lord Esau; and he himself follows behind us. Then he bade the second do the like, and the third, and all the drovers in turn; these same words you are to use, he 19 said, when you fall in with Esau, and be sure to add, Thy servant Jacob follows on behind us. I will not see him, he thought, until I have disarmed his anger with the gifts I have sent before me; then perhaps he will be well disposed towards me!¹

21 So the gifts went on in advance of him, and he waited in the camp all night. But before dawn he rose, and took his two wives, their serving-women, and his eleven 23 sons, across the ford of Jaboc. And now he had set down all that was his on the further side, and he was left there alone. And there one appeared to him who 25 wrestled with him until the day broke. At last, finding that he could not get the better of Jacob, he touched the sinew of his thigh, which all at once withered; then he said, 26 Let me go, the dawn is up. But Jacob answered, I will not let thee go until thou givest me thy blessing. What is thy name?
27 asked the other, and when he heard that it was Jacob, Jacob, he said, is no name for thee, thou shalt be called Israel, one that prevails with God.² If thou hast held thy 29 own name? Why wouldst thou know my name? he answered, and gave him there 30 and then, his blessing. So Jacob called the place Phanuel, the Face of God; I have seen God face to face, he said, and my life 31 was not forfeit. As soon as he passed beyond Phanuel, the sun rose, and he went 32 limping on one foot; that is why the race of Israel, to this day, will not eat the sinew of the thigh, in which Jacob's strength failed him, the sinew of his thigh that withered when it was touched.

33 And now Jacob looked in front of him, and there was Esau coming towards him, with four hundred men at his back. So he divided up his children into families, Lia's sons and Rachel's and those of the two serving-women. He put these first, with their children, and Lia second with hers; Rachel and Joseph came last of all. He himself, as he came up, prostrated himself seven times before his brother reached him. Seeing this, Esau ran to meet his brother, embraced him, clung to his neck and kissed him, in tears. Then, as he looked round him and saw the women with their sons, he asked, What are these? Are they part of thy company? And he was told, They are the children God has granted to thy servant. So the serving-women and their children came up first, and made their obeisance, then Lia with her children; and when they had done the like, Joseph and Rachel made theirs last of all.

And when Esau asked, What of those companies I met on my way? Jacob answered, A gift, my lord, to secure me thy good will. I have abundance, said he; keep what is thine. But Jacob said, No, I entreat thee; do me the favour to accept this present of mine; to gain audience with thee is like gaining audience with God himself. Assure me of thy favour by receiving the offering I have brought thee, God's gift to me, who has given me all I have. So at last Esau consented, overcome by his brother's persuasions; then he said, Let us travel on together, so that I can be the companion of thy journey. But Jacob answered, My lord, bethink thee that I have young children with me; that I have ewes here in lamb, and cows in calf, so that I may lose a whole herd if I overdrive them. Pass on, my lord, in advance of thy servant; I will follow slowly, at whatever pace suits these children of mine, and meet thee again, my lord, in Seir. Pray then, said Esau, take some of my followers to escort thee on thy journey. No need for that, answered Jacob; enough for me, my lord, that I should have thy good will.

¹ It is not clear, either in the Hebrew or in the Latin, whether the sentence beginning 'I will not see him' is part of the message which Jacob's servant was to deliver or not. ² The name Israel may be derived from either of two verbs, one meaning 'to persevere', and the other 'to rule as a prince'.

16 So that day, Esau went back to Seir the 17 way he had come; Jacob went as far as Socoth, and there built himself a house, with sheds for his cattle; that is why he 18 called the place Socoth, which means Sheds. He passed on from there to Salem, a city belonging to Sichem,¹ thus returning 19 to Chanaan after his journey to Mesopotamia 20 of the Syrians. Here he dwelt near the town; he bought the piece of ground where he encamped from the men of Hemor's clan, that was father to Sichem, at 21 the price of a hundred lambs. And here he built an altar, and dedicated it to the almighty God, the God of Israel.

34 A time came when Dina, Lia's daughter, went out to visit some of the women who dwelt in that country.
2 And one of the chieftains, Sichem, son of Hemor the Hevite, cast longing eyes at her; then seized her and mated with her, 3 violating her virginity. And indeed his heart was set on her, so he comforted her 4 sorrow, and went to his father Hemor, asking him to demand the girl's hand in 5 marriage. When Jacob was told of it, his sons were away, engaged in feeding their cattle; so he kept silence, awaiting their 6 return. But even as Hemor, Sichem's father, was on his way to confer with Jacob, 7 Jacob's sons came back from the plains and heard what had befallen. They fell into a great rage; Sichem had dishonoured the whole race of Israel, and done great wrong, 8 by violating their father's daughter.

8 And now Hemor began to plead with them, My son Sichem has set his heart on this maid of yours; grant him her hand in 9 marriage. It is well that we should inter-marry, that you should give us your 10 daughters, and wed ours, and settle down amongst us. Our country is yours; you may till and trade and have your dwelling 11 here. Sichem, too, said to her father and her brethren, Grant my request, and I will 12 pay whatever price you name. Increase the sum of the dowry, ask for presents in addition, you shall have what you will so 13 you will let me make the girl my wife. But the sons of Jacob, enraged at their sister's disgrace, made a treacherous answer to Sichem and his father: We cannot grant 14 your request, if it means bestowing our sister's hand on a husband who is not circumcised; that is a forbidden thing, abominable to us. But we can enter into a treaty 15 with you, if you will consent to be like ourselves, and have every male among you circumcised; then we will give our daugh-16 ters to you in marriage, and accept yours, we will share your country, and form one people with you. If you refuse to be cir-17 cumcised, we must take the girl with us and be gone. This offer of theirs com-18 mended itself to Hemor and his son Si-chem; nor did the young man lose any 19 time in having their request fulfilled, such was his love for the girl, and such was the influence he had with all his father's kin-20 dred. They both went to the city gate, and there made it known to the people: These 21 are peaceable folk, ready to share our country with us; let us allow them to trade here and to till the land, wide and open as it is, and in need of farming; let us marry 22 their daughters, and give them ours in exchange. There is but one thing that stands in the way of this happy agreement. We must adopt the custom of their race, and 23 have all the males among us circumcised.

Then their wealth and these cattle of theirs and all they have will be ours too; we have only to humour them in this, to make them 24 form one people with us. To this everyone agreed, and all their men folk were circumcised.

The third day came, which is the day on 25 which the pain of the wound is most felt.
Then, two of Jacob's sons, who were brothers to Dina, Simeon and Levi, took up their swords, and made their way boldly 26 into the city, where they killed all the men folk; making an end of Hemor and Sichem with the rest, and carrying off their sister 27 Dina from Sichem's house. When they had left the city, the rest of Jacob's sons broke in, to find the men already slain; so they plundered the city to avenge the 28 wrong done; making spoil of their sheep and oxen and asses and all they found in 29 houses or in fields, and seizing their children and their wives as captives. Reck-30 lessly the deed was done; in vain did Jacob protest to Simeon and Levi, You have much injured me, to Chanaanite and Pherezite all around making my name 31 abominable; see how few we are! If they make common cause against me, I and mine will perish. What, they answered, should we allow him to treat our sister like a harlot?

35 In the meanwhile, too, God had said to Jacob, Bestir thyself, go up to Bethel, and make thy dwelling there; there build an altar to the God who revealed himself to thee when thou wast in 2 flight from thy brother Esau. Whereupon Jacob summoned all his household; Cast away, he told them, whatever images of alien gods you have among you, purify 3 yourselves, and put on fresh garments. We must leave this, and go up to Bethel; there we must build an altar to the God who listened to me in time of trouble, and 4 escorted me on my journey. So they gave him all the images of alien gods that were in their possession, the rings, too, which they wore on their ears, and he buried them under the mastic-tree, close to the 5 town of Sichern. Thus they set out on their journey, and God inspired terror into the hearts of all who dwelt around them, so that they durst not pursue them as they went.

6 Jacob, then, with all his clan, made their way to Luza, which is now called Bethel, 7 and built an altar there. It was he who called the place Bethel, the house of God, because it was there God appeared to him 8 when he was in flight from his brother. It was at this time that Debora, Rebecca's nurse, died; she was buried under an oak, by the spur of the hills where Bethel is, and the place came to be called, The Oak of 9 Mourning. Once again God revealed himself to Jacob, after his return from Mesopotamia of the Syrians, blessing him, and assuring him, Thou shalt not be called 10 Jacob any longer; Israel is to be thy name.
 11 So, calling to him by this name of Israel, he said to him, I am God all-powerful, and I bid thee increase and multiply; peoples shall descend from thee, whose families of nations, and kings shall be born of thy 12 stock; and that land, which I gave to Abraham and Isaac, I will give to thee and 13 to thy posterity after thee. Then God went

Death of Rachel at Bethlehem-Ephrata away out of his sight; and he built a monu-14 ment of stone at the place where God had spoken to him, offering libations there and pouring oil upon it. Bethel was the name 15 he gave to the place, and when he left it, in the spring, he journeyed into the country that lies towards Ephrata.¹ Here Rachel 17 was in travail, and the difficult labour she had was endangering her life; but the midwife said to her, Do not be afraid; this time, too, thou wilt give birth to a son. But 18 her life was ebbing away in her pangs; she saw that she was close to death, and called her son Benoni, the child of my distress.

 His father's name for him was Benjamin, the child of his right hand. So Rachel died, 19 and was buried on the way that leads to Ephrata (the same as Bethlehem). Over her tomb, Jacob raised a monument; it is called, to this day, the Pillar of Rachel's Tomb. And he went on from there, and 21 pitched his tent on the further side of the Sheep-tower.

It was while he was living there that 22 Ruben betook himself to his own father's concubine, the one who was called Bala, and slept with her; nor did he contrive to keep Jacob in ignorance of it. Jacob had twelve sons altogether: by Lia, this first-23 born son, Ruben, as well as Simeon, Levi, 24 Juda, Issachar, and Zabulon; by Rachel, Joseph and Benjamin; by Bala, Rachel's 25 serving-woman, Dan and Nephthali; by Zelpha, Lia's serving-woman, Gad and 26 Aser. These were Jacob's sons, and Mesopotamia of the Syrians was their birthplace.

He went, too, to visit his father Isaac at 27 Mambre, the city of Arbee, also called Hebron; here, as strangers, Abraham and Isaac had dwelt. And now Isaac finished 28 his life, of a hundred and eighty years; he died at last, worn out with age, his tale of 29 years complete. He too became a part of his people; and his two sons, Esau and Jacob, gave him burial.

36 Here is a list of the descendants of Esau (or Edom). Esau's Cha-2 naanite wives were Ada, daughter of Elon the Hethite, Oölibama, who was daughter of Ana and grand-daughter of Sebeon the 3 Hevite, and Basemath, who was daughter

¹ 'In the spring he journeyed'; the Hebrew text here has a different meaning, 'It was still some way for him to travel'.

4 of Ismael and sister of Nabaioth. Ada became the mother of Eliphaz, Basemath of 5 Rahuel, and Oölibama of Jehus, Ihelon and Core; all of these were born while their father still lived in the land of Chanaan.
 6 Afterwards Esau removed to another region, with wives and sons and daughters and all his household, with his wealth and his cattle and all that Chanaan had given him. He must needs part from his brother Jacob, now that they had become too rich 7 to live side by side; the country in which they lived as strangers hitherto could no 8 longer give feed for all their cattle. So Esau (or Edom) dwelt thenceforward in the hill country of Seir.

9 Thus Esau is the father of those Edomites who live in the hill country of 10 Seir, and this was the line that came from him through those two sons of his, Eliphaz who was his son by his wife Ada, and Rahuel, his son by his wife Basemath. The sons of Eliphaz were called Theman, Omar, Sepho, Gatham, and Cenez. He also had a concubine called Thamna, by whom he became the father, and Esau the grandfather, of Amalec. All these were descended from Esau's wife Ada. And Rahuel's sons were called Nahath, Zara, Samma, and Meza; these were descended 14 from Esau's wife Basemath. Esau's other three sons, Jehus, Ihelon and Core, were borne to him by his wife Oölibama, daughter of Ana and grand-daughter of Sebeon.

15 These, then, were the Edomite chieftains: of the family of Eliphaz, Esau's first-born, Theman, Omar, Sepho, Cenez, 16 Core, Gatham, Amalec, all Edomite chieftains descended from Eliphaz, and so 17 through Ada. Of the family of Esau's son Rahuel, the chieftains called Nahath, Zara, Samma and Meza, all Edomite chieftains descended from Rahuel, and so through 18 Esau's wife Basemath. And three chieftains, Jehus, Ihelon and Core, were sons of Esau's wife Oölibama, who was daughter 19 of Ana. So the descendants of Esau (or Edom) are named, after the chieftains who ruled them.

20 There were other chieftains native to the land, descended from Seir, the Horrite. Their names were Lotan, Sobal, Sebeon, 21 Ana, Dison, Eser, and Disan; all Edomite chieftains, but Horrite by race and descended from Seir. Lotan had a sister 22 called Thamna, and the names of his two sons were Hori and Heman. The names of 23 Sobal's sons were Alvan, Manahat, Ebal, Sepho, and Onam. Sebeon had two sons, 24 Aia and Ana. It was this Ana who was feeding his father's asses, when he came upon hot springs, out in the desert. He 25 had a son called Dison, and a daughter, Oölibama. Dison's sons were called Hamdan, Eseban, Jethram, and Charan; Eser's 26 were called Balaan, Zavan, and Acan; Disan's were called Hus and Aram. Thus 28 the Horrites had for their chieftains Lotan, Sobal, Sebeon, and Ana, Dison, Eser, and Disan. These were the Horrite chieftains 30 who bore rule in the land of Seir.

There were kings ruling in the Edomite 31 country before the Israelites had kings of their own; these are their names; Bela the 32 son of Beor reigned in Denaba, and after his death Jobab son of Zara, from Bosra, 33 who was succeeded by Husam from the Themanite country; his successor was 34 Adad, son of Badad, who defeated Median in the territory of Moab; he ruled at Avith. Adad was succeeded by Semla from Masreca, and Semla by Saul from the river 36 Rohoboth, and Saul by Balanan, son of Achobor, and Balanan by Adar, who ruled 37 at Phau; his wife's name was Meëtabel, daughter of Matred, who was daughter 39 of Mezaab.

And these chieftains of Esau's race have 40 clans and territories called after the names; Thamna, Alva, Jetheth, Oölibama, Ela, 41 Phinon, Cenez, Theman, Aabsar, Magdiel, and Hiram. Such were the chieftains of Edom, each bearing rule over the territory about him; and the father of the Edomite race was Esau.

37 Jacob, meanwhile, had settled in the land of Chanaan, where his father lived a wanderer's life before him; and this is the record of Jacob's line. By 2 now, Joseph was sixteen years old,¹ and helped his brethren to feed the flocks, young though he was. He worked with the sons of his father's wives, Bala and Zelpha; and against these brothers of his he told his father ill tales. Among his children, 3 Jacob loved Joseph best, as old men love the sons old age has brought them; and he dressed him in a coat that was all embroidered. Whereupon his brethren, who saw that he was his father's favourite, bore him a grudge, and never had a good word for him. They hated him the more, when he recounted to them a dream of his; Listen, he said, to this dream I have had. I dreamt that we were all binding sheaves in a field, and my sheaf seemed to lift itself up and stand erect, while all your sheaves stood about it and did reverence to mine. What, said his brethren, art thou to be our king? Are we to be thy subjects? So this talk about his dream fed the fires of their envious anger. Then he had another dream which he disclosed to his brethren; In this dream of mine, he said, it seemed to me that the sun and the moon and eleven stars did reverence to me. When he reported this to his father and his brethren, his father said, in reproof, What means this dream of thine? Must I and thy mother and thy brethren bow down to earth before thee? So his brethren eyed him with jealousy, while his father pondered over the story in silence.

One day, when his brethren were away at Sichem, feeding their father's flocks, Israel said to him, Thy brethren are pasturing the sheep at Sichem; I have an errand for thee there. And when Joseph answered, I am here, at thy command, he said to him, Go and see whether all is well with thy brethren, and with the flock, then come back and tell me their news. So he set out from Hebron valley and reached Sichem, where a stranger found him wandering on the open plain, and asked what was his errand. I am looking for my brethren, he said; Canst thou tell me where they are feeding their flocks? They have left this part, the man answered; I heard them say, Let us go to Dothain. So Joseph went on in search of his brethren, and it was at Dothain he found them. Before he came up to them, they caught sight of him in the distance, and began plotting against his life. They said to one another, Here comes the dreamer; how if we kill him, and throw his body into a dry well? We can pretend he has fallen a prey to some wild beast. Now we shall see what good these dreams of his can do him! Upon this, Ruben began scheming to save Joseph from their violence; No, he said, do not take his life, there must be no bloodshed. Throw him down into this well here, far from all help, and so keep clear of any murderous act. His meaning was to rescue Joseph out of their hands, and restore him safe to his father. As soon, then, as Joseph reached his brethren, they stripped him of his long, embroidered coat, and threw him into a disused well, which had no water left in it.

And now, as they sat down to take their meal, they saw a company of Ismaelites mounted on camels, who were on their way from Galaad to Egypt, with a load of spices, balm, and myrrh. Whereupon Juda said to his brethren, What shall we gain by killing our brother, and concealing his murder? Far better sell him to these Ismaelites, and keep our hands clean of crime; remember that he is our brother, our own flesh and blood. His brethren fell in with the plan; so, when the merchants from Madian passed by,¹ they dragged Joseph up out of the well, and sold him for twenty pieces of silver to these Ismaelites, who carried him off with them to Egypt. In vain did Ruben go back to the well, there was no sign of Joseph there. For grief he tore his garments, then he went back to his brethren, crying, The boy is not to be seen; what is left for me? Where can I betake myself now?

Meanwhile, they killed a goat, and dipped Joseph's coat in its blood; then they sent a message to their father, We have found this coat; satisfy thyself, whether it is thy son's or not. And their father recognized it, It is my son's coat, he said; past doubt, some wild thing has devoured him, my son Joseph, the prey of a wild beast! And he tore his garments, and put on sackcloth; and long he mourned for his son. Vainly did all his children conspire to solace their father's grief; he would admit no consolation. I will go down mourning, he said, to keep my son company in the grave; and would not dry his tears. Meanwhile, the Madianites had

38 A time came when Juda left his brethren up in the hill country, and went to lodge with a man called Hiras, at Odollam. Here he cast his eyes on the daughter of one Suë, a Chanaanite, and wedded and bedded her. She conceived, and bore a son, whom she named Her; then conceived again, and called her second son Onan; then bore a third, whom she called Sela, and after that had no more children. Juda found for his eldest son, Her, a wife whose name was Thamar; but this first-born son of his was a sinner, and God saw it and cut him off in his prime. Whereupon Juda bade his son Onan mate with the widow, and do a husband's duty by her, so as to beget children in his brother's name; but Onan, who knew that they would not be reckoned as his, frustrated the act of marriage when he mated with her, sooner than breed sons in his brother's name. Him, too, for this abominable deed of his, the Lord punished with death. And now Juda said to Thamar, his daughter-in-law, Go back to thy father's house, and there support thy widowed state until my son Sela has grown up. The truth was, he was afraid the same doom might overtake Sela. Thamar, then, went back to live at her father's house.

12 Time passed, and Suë's daughter, the wife of Juda, died. And when his grief for her was assuaged, he went with his friend Hiras of Odollam, who was a shepherd, to see the men who were shearing his flock at Thamnás.¹ When she heard that her father-in-law was going up to Thamnás for the sheep-shearing, Thamar laid aside her widow's weeds, put a veil on, and disguised herself; then she went and sat at the cross roads on the way to Thamnás. She knew well that Sela had grown up, and still no husband was given her. Juda saw her without recognizing her as his daughter-in-law (for she kept her face veiled), and took her for a harlot; so he accosted her, and asked for her favours. What wilt thou give me, she asked, as the price of enjoying them? I will send thee a goat, he answered, from my herd. And when she told him he might have his will, on condition that he gave her a pledge, to hold until he kept his promise, What wilt thou have, asked Juda, for a pledge? Thy ring, she answered, and thy bracelet, and the staff thou carriest. At this single mating she conceived; and now she rose up and was gone, took off her disguise, and was back in her widow's weeds again.

Then Juda bade his shepherd at Odollam take the woman a goat, so as to recover the pledge he had given her. But the shepherd could not find her; and when he asked the townsfolk, What has become of the harlot that used to sit at the cross-roads? they said, There was never a harlot there. So he went back to Juda, and told him, I could not find her; and what is more, the townsfolk would have it there was never harlot sitting there at all. Let her keep what she has, said Juda; she cannot call us dishonest, now that I have sent the kid as I promised, and she was not to be found. So three months passed; and then word came to Juda, Thamar, thy daughter-in-law, has proved a light woman; she is big with child for all to see. Whereupon Juda said, Bring her here, then; she must be burned alive. But she, on the way to her place of punishment, sent a message to her father-in-law to say, These belong to the man who got me with child; satisfy thyself, whose are this ring, this bracelet, and this staff. And Juda, recognizing his own gifts, said, She is in the right, not I; why did I not give her my son Sela in marriage? Yet would he never mate with her again.

When she was near her time, it proved she had twins in her womb. And at the very moment of her delivery, one of the children put his hand out; so the midwife tied a red cord round it, thinking to herself, This one is the first-born. But he drew his hand in again, and the other was born first. Whereupon the woman said, Wouldst thou break thy way out? And so he was called Phares, which means, A breach in the wall. And when his brother was brought to birth after him, with the red cord round his hand, he was called Zara, the Dawn.

39 Meanwhile, Joseph had been taken away into Egypt, where his Ismaelite owners sold him to an Egyptian called Putiphar, one of Pharaoh's courtiers, and captain of his guard. The Lord was with him, so that he prospered in all he undertook; and he was given a lodging in the house of his master, who saw clearly enough how God was with him, giving him success in all he turned his hand to. Thus Joseph became his master's favourite servant, and had the management of all his affairs, and of all the property that was entrusted to him. For Joseph's sake, the Lord blessed the household of this Egyptian, and gave him large revenues of stock and store; he ate what was put before him, and could not tell how he came by it.

Joseph had beauty of form and face, and after a while his mistress cast longing eyes at him, and bade him share her bed. But he would have nothing to do with such wickedness; My master, he said, entrusts everything to my care, and keeps no count of his belongings; there is nothing of his but I, by his appointment, have the keeping of it, save thee only, his wedded wife. How canst thou ask me to wrong him so grievously, and offend my God? Such was the talk between them day after day, she ever more importunate, and he still resisting her shameful desire. A day came at last when Joseph must needs be within doors, busy with some task when no one else was by; and she caught him by the hem of his garment, inviting him to her bed. Whereupon he went out, leaving his cloak still in her hand.

And now, finding herself alone with his garment in her hands, and all her advances spurned, she summoned the men of the household; Look, she said, what comes of bringing in a Hebrew to insult us! Joseph came in, and would have dishonoured me, but I cried out, and at the sound of my voice he ran out, leaving his cloak in my grasp. She kept the cloak in support of her story, and shewed it to her husband when he came back home; This Hebrew slave, she told him, whom thou hast brought into the house to insult me, offered me violence; and it was only upon hearing me cry for help that he ran out, leaving me with this cloak in my hand. Upon this Joseph's master, too easily convinced by what his wife told him, broke into a rage, and committed him to the prison in which the king's prisoners were kept. There lay Joseph, then, a captive, but the Lord was still with him, and by the Lord's mercy he became a favourite with the chief gaoler, who put all the prisoners detained there in his charge, and would have nothing done save at his discretion. Thus the chief gaoler, in his turn, knew nothing of what went forward, but left all to Joseph, well knowing that the Lord was with him, and prospered all he did.

40 Soon after this, it chanced that two of the king of Egypt's courtiers, his cup-bearer and his pastry-cook, fell into disgrace with their master. The one was chief of all his cup-bearers, the other of all his pastrycooks, and Pharaoh, angry with both of them, handed them over to the captain of the guard, to share Joseph's prison. So the gaoler put them in Joseph's charge, and he saw to their needs. They had not been long in captivity when, on a single night, either of them had a dream, portending what it portended to each. Joseph, when he visited them next morning, found both of them downcast, and enquired why they looked sadder than their wont. We have been dreaming, they said, and we can find no interpreter. Why, said Joseph, it is God who interprets our dreams for us; tell me what it was you saw.

The chief cup-bearer related his dream first; I saw in front of me, he said, a vine, which had three shoots. First they budded, and then, when they had flowered, grapes grew upon them. I had Pharaoh's cup in my hand; so I took the grapes and pressed them out into the cup I held, and gave Pharaoh the draught. This, answered Joseph, is what thy dream meant; the three shoots stand for three days which have yet to pass, after which Pharaoh will bethink himself that he has need of thee, and will restore thee to thy old office; then thou wilt hand the cup to him by right of thy office as thou ever didst. Pray do not forget me, in that day of thy prosperity; as thou lovest me, win from Pharaoh my release from this prison of ours. It was treachery brought me here, when I left the land of the Hebrews, and now I am in this dungeon for no fault of mine.

16 Hereupon the chief cook, finding that Joseph could interpret the first dream so well, reminded them that he had dreamt too; I was carrying three baskets of loaves 17 on my head, said he, and the top basket contained pastry of every kind; but the birds came and ate it. Thy dream, answered Joseph, means this; the three baskets stand for three days which have yet to pass, after which Pharao will take away thy life,¹ and so hang thee on a gibbet, for the birds to come and prey on thy flesh.
 20 The third day after was Pharao's birthday, and he made a great feast for his servants. And as he sat feasting, he remembered the chief cup-bearer and the chief pastrycook. The one he restored to his office of putting the cup in his hand; the other he hung on a gallows, to prove the truth of the prophecy that had been made. But the chief cup-bearer, in his new good fortune, thought no more of the man who had interpreted his dream.

41 Then, two years afterwards, Pharao himself had a dream. He thought that he was standing by the Nile, and out of its channel there came up seven heifers, sleek and well fattened, which began feeding on the river bank, among the reeds. Then seven others came up, also out of the river, ill-favoured and ill-nourished; and these too stood grazing where it was green, close to the river. And it seemed as if they ate up those other seven, that were so fine and well fed. With that Pharao awoke, and when he slept again, it was to dream a second dream. This time, there were seven ears of corn growing from a single stalk, all plump and fair, and another seven ears, all shrunken and blighted, came up in their turn, to eat up the fair promise of the other seven. Pharao, then, awoke from his dream, and as soon as it was daylight, he sent in great confusion of mind for all the diviners and all the wise men of Egypt. When they answered his summons, he told them of his dream, without finding anyone who could interpret it.

9 And now, at last, the chief cup-bearer remembered; I am much to blame, he said.
 10 When thou, my lord, wast vexed with thy servants, thou didst commit me and thy chief cook to prison, with the captain of thy guard in charge of us; and there, on a single night, either of us had a dream which foretold what was to become of us. One of our fellow-prisoners, a Hebrew slave, belonging to this same captain, heard what our dreams were, and gave us an account of them which the event proved right, when I was restored to my office, and that other was hung on a gibbet. With that, the king sent to have Joseph released from prison and brought before him, with his beard shaved and new clothes to wear. I have had certain dreams, he said, and no one can tell me the meaning of them; I have heard of thee as one who can interpret such things with sovereign skill. No skill of mine is needed, said Joseph; the Lord will give Pharao his answer, and a favourable one.

So Pharao described what he had seen; I thought I was standing on the river bank, and seven heifers came up out of the stream, sleek and well fed, that grazed on the rushes, there in the marsh-land. Then, on a sudden, seven other heifers followed them, so pinched and starved that in all this land of Egypt I never saw the like. These ate up the first seven, wholly consuming them, and yet they shewed no sign of having had their fill; they languished there, as gaunt and wretched as ever. Then I woke up, but was soon plunged in sleep again; and this time I dreamed that seven ears of corn, plump and fair, were growing from a single stalk, until seven others, all shrunken and blighted, sprang up out of the stubble near by and devoured all the fair promise of the first seven. This is the dream I have told to these diviners of mine, and none of them can tell me what it means.

My lord, answered Joseph, the two dreams are all one, God is warning my lord Pharao of what he intends to do. The seven sleek cattle, the seven plump ears, have the same sense in the two dreams; they stand for seven years of plenty. Whereas the seven gaunt, starved cattle which came up after them, and the seven shrunken, blighted ears of corn, prophesy seven years of famine. And they will come about in this order; first, there will be seven

30 harvests of great abundance all over this land of Egypt, and they will be followed by seven years of such drought as will efface the memory of the good times that went before them. Famine will ravage the whole country, till the evil effect of the drought does away with all the good effect of those abundant harvests. That thou shouldst have dreamed twice to the same purpose, is proof that God's decree stands firm; what he foretells will come about, and there will be no delay in its fulfilment. It is for thee, my lord king, to find some man that has the wisdom and the skill for it, and put the whole of Egypt under his charge. 34 He must appoint a commissioner for each region, to collect a fifth of the harvest during the seven years of plenty which are now upon us, and store it up in barns. All this reserve of corn must be held at the royal disposition, and kept in the various cities, to make provision for the seven years' famine by which Egypt will be overtaken; if not, the whole land will perish for want of it.

37 The plan commended itself to Pharaoh and to all his courtiers. And now he asked them, Where are we to find another man such as this, so full of God's inspiration? 39 Then he turned to Joseph, and said, Every word thou hast spoken comes to thee revealed by God, and shall I look for some other whose wisdom can match thine? 40 Thou shalt have charge of my household and all my people shall obey thy word of command; thou shalt share all I have, except this royal throne. Hereby, Pharaoh said to Joseph, I put the whole land of 42 Egypt under thy care. And with that, he took off the signet-ring from his own hand, and put it on Joseph's hand instead; gave him robes, too, of lawn, and hung a gold chain about his neck; then bade him mount on a chariot that was next in honour to his own, and would have a herald proclaim that all must do him reverence, and acknowledge him as ruler of the whole land of 44 Egypt. And he gave Joseph this assurance, On the word of Pharaoh, no one in all Egypt shall be free to move hand or foot without thy permission. He gave him a new name, calling him in Egyptian Saviour of the World; and bestowed on him the hand of Aseneth, daughter of Putiphare, that was priest at Heliopolis.

So Joseph set out on his mission to the 46 land of Egypt, having thus won the favour of king Pharaoh when he was only thirty years old; and there was no part of Egypt he did not visit. Seven years of abundance 47 came, and the corn was bound in sheaves and taken away to all the storehouses that could be found in Egypt; all that could be 48 spared of the crops was thus stored away in the various cities. And indeed the yield of wheat was so rich that it might have been sand by the sea-shore; there was no 49 measuring the amount of it. In these years before the famine came, Joseph's wife Aseneth, daughter of Putiphare that was priest at Heliopolis, bore him two sons. He called his first-born Manasses, Ob- 51 livion; God has bidden me forget all my troubles, said he, forget my home. The 52 second he called Ephraim, as if he would say of God, Hiphrani, he has made me fruitful, in this land where I was once so poor.

So the first seven years passed, years of 53 plenty for Egypt; and now, as Joseph had prophesied, seven years of scarcity began; 54 famine reigned all over the world, but everywhere in Egypt there was bread to be had. When food grew scarce, there was 55 ever a cry made to Pharaoh for bread, and still he would answer, Betake yourselves to Joseph, do what he bids you. And 56 Joseph, as the famine grew daily worse everywhere, opened the storehouses and made the Egyptians, too, buy their corn, 57 for they were as hungry as the rest. Soon the whole world was coming to Egypt and buying food to relieve its want.

42 The news that there was corn to be bought in Egypt reached Jacob among the rest; and he said to his sons, What means this lethargy? They tell me 2 there is corn for sale in Egypt; why do you not go down there, and buy enough for us to live on, instead of waiting till we starve? So ten of Joseph's brethren went down 3 into Egypt to buy corn there; only Benjamin his father kept at home, saying to the others, Some harm might befall him on 4 the way. So they made their way into Egypt with others who were going there to buy; the whole of Chanaan was by now 5 famine-stricken.

it was at his discretion that corn was sold to foreign nations. And when his brethren came and did him reverence, he recognized them; but he treated them as strangers, and talked roughly to them. Whence come you? he asked. From the land of Chanaan, they said, to buy food. Well as he knew them, his brethren did not know him again, and his mind went back to the dreams he had had, long ago. You are spies, he told them; you have come to find out where our country's defences are weak. No, my lord, they said, we are thy servants, come here to buy food, sons of one father, all of us, sent on an errand of peace; thy servants know nothing of any evil intent. I know better, he answered; you have come to spy out where our country is ill defended. We are all brethren, they said; our father, in the land of Chanaan, is the father of twelve sons; the youngest is still with him, and one of us no longer lives. I was sure of it, said he; you are spies, all of you. I will put you to the test; your youngest brother must come here, or, by the life of Pharaoh, none of you shall leave this land. One of you must go and fetch him, the rest shall be my prisoners, until you give me proof whether your story is true or not. If you refuse this, as sure as Pharaoh lives, you are spies.

So he committed them to prison, and kept them there for three days. When the third day came, they were released, and now he said to them, Do what I bade you, and I will spare your lives; I am a man that fears God. To prove whether your errand is peaceful, one of you must be kept here in prison; the rest shall go home, taking with them the corn they have bought. Then you must bring your youngest brother here into my presence; when you have done that, I shall know that your story is true, and your lives shall be spared. And they bowed to his will, saying to one another, It is no more than we deserve, we, who so wronged our brother, and looked on without pity when he pleaded, in anguish, for his life. That is what has brought all this trouble upon us. And Ruben said to the rest, I pleaded with you not to do the boy such wrong, and you would not listen to me; we are being punished, now, for his murder. All this Joseph understood, although they did not suspect it (he always spoke to them through an interpreter); so that he withdrew from them for a little, and gave himself up to tears. Then he went back and spoke to them, taking Simeon, and fastening chains upon him, there in their presence. Meanwhile, he had bidden his servants fill their sacks with corn, enclosing in each sack the money its owner had paid, and providing them with victuals for their journey as well. All this was done, and now they loaded their asses with the corn, and were on their homeward journey, when one of them opened his sack, to feed his beast at a halting-place. And there, in the mouth of the sack, he found his money. Look, he said to his brethren, my money has been restored to me; here it is, in the sack. And their minds misgave them; they said to one another in bewilderment, What is this God has done to us?

When they came back to their father Jacob, in Chanaan, they told him of all that had happened; how the regent of the country had spoken to them roughly, taking them for spies, and how they had answered, Ours is an errand of peace, we have no mischievous intent; there were twelve of us, all born of one father; one is no longer alive, and the youngest is with our father in Chanaan. And then, the test of their honesty he had proposed; that they should go home with what they needed, leaving one of them behind; that he should remain a prisoner, until they cleared themselves of suspicion by coming back with their youngest brother; then they should be restored, and they should be free to buy as they would. When they had finished their story, they began unloading the corn, and were filled with dismay at finding the money each had paid enclosed there in his sack. As for their father Jacob, he told them, You have made a childless man of me; Joseph is dead, Simeon a prisoner, and you would rob me of Benjamin too; it is I who have to bear all this trouble. Whereupon Ruben answered, Kill my own two sons in requital of it, if I do not restore Benjamin to thee in safety; give me charge of him, and I will bring him back. No, said he, I will not let this son of mine go with you; his brother is dead, and he is all I have left; if any harm should befall him in the country of your travels, you would send an old man sorrowing to the grave.

2 43 But still the land was famine-stricken and all the food they had brought with them from Egypt was used up. Go back, said Jacob to his sons, and 3 bring us all a mouthful of food. Why, answered Juda, this man we told thee of warned us with a solemn oath he would not give us audience, unless our youngest 4 brother came back with us. If thou wilt send him in our company, we will all go 5 together, and buy what thou needest; not otherwise. How often must we tell thee that the man gave us solemn warning, You shall have no audience without this young-6 est brother of yours? This was great unkindness you did me, Israel said, to tell 7 him you had a brother at all. Why, they answered, the man asked news of all our family in turn, whether our father was still alive, and whether we had any brother besides; we told him no more than he asked, and how were we to know he would demand to have our brother brought into 8 his presence? Let the boy go with me, Juda said to his father; let us go and find something to support life with, or we shall 9 all die, and our children with us. I take the boy under my charge, and make myself answerable for his safety; never forgive me if I do not bring him back and restore 10 him to thee. If there had not been this delay, we might have gone to Egypt and been back again by now.
 11 And their father Israel said to them, Since it must be so, have your way. Only, take gifts with you in your packs, the most precious this land yields, a little balm, and honey, and storax, and myrrh, and mastic, 12 and almonds. Take a double amount of money with you, and restore what you found in your sacks; it may have been an 13 oversight. And so go back to the man, 14 taking your brother with you. May the almighty God I serve secure you his favour, so that he will send back that brother of yours who is now his hostage, and Benjamin as well. Meanwhile, I shall be like a man bereft of children.
 15 With such gifts, and a double amount of money, they took Benjamin down into Egypt, and presented themselves before Joseph.
 16 As soon as he saw them, and Benjamin in their company, he said to his steward, Take these men home, and kill victims, and make a feast; they will eat with me at noon. The steward did as he was bidden, 17 taking them all to Joseph's house, where 18 they stood dismayed; We have been brought in here because of the money, they said to one another, the money we took home in our sacks. He means to trump a charge against us, and to hold us here in pawn, and our beasts along with us. So, in the very doorway of the house, 19 they approached the steward, Pray, sir, 20 listen, they said. We came here some while since, to buy food, and buy it we did; but 21 when we reached our halting-place we found the money lying in the mouths of our sacks. And now we have brought back the same amount, over and above the sum 22 that is to defray our fresh needs; we cannot guess who it was put the money back in our purses. Set your mind at rest, he said; 23 you have nothing to fear. Your own God, the God your father serves, must have enriched those sacks of yours; I have the money you paid me accounted for. Then he fetched Simeon out to meet them, and 24 took them into the house, where he brought water for them to wash their feet;

 he also gave their beasts fodder.

There then they waited, with the gifts 25 ready, till Joseph should come home at noon; they had been told that they would be his guests. And as soon as Joseph en- 26 tered his house, they offered him the gifts they carried, and bowed down to earth.
 And he, returning their greeting with 27 courtesy, asked how their father was, the old man of whom they had spoken to him.
 Was he still living? Yes, my lord, they 28 said, our father still lives. And they bent to do him reverence. Then Joseph looked 29 round, and saw Benjamin there, his own mother's son; Is this, he asked, the younger brother you told me of? And he 30 added, God be merciful to thee, my son.
 After this he could wait no more; his heart went out to this, his own brother, and the tears began to come. He withdrew into his private room, and there wept; then washed 31 his face and came out again, master of himself; Serve the meal, he said. So food was 32 brought, with separate portions for Joseph, for his brethren, and for the Egyptians who kept them company; the Egyptians are not allowed to eat with men of Hebrew blood, and would think it foul disgrace to share a 33 meal with them. There they sat in his presence, ranged in order from the eldest, with his birthright, to the youngest in age. And 34 they were not a little surprised when they received the portions he sent them, for the greatest share of all came to Benjamin, six times as large as the others. So they drank and made merry with him.

44 And Joseph gave orders to his steward; Fill their sacks with corn, as full as they can hold, and enclose in each man's sack the money he has paid.
2 And when it comes to the youngest, enclose in his sack not only the money he paid for his corn, but my silver cup as well.
3 His command was obeyed; and now morning came, and they were given leave to 4 depart, with their asses. They had left the city and passed on a little further, when Joseph summoned his steward; Bestir thyself, he said, and go in pursuit of these 5 men. When thou overtakest them, say, This is a poor return to make for the kindness you have received; you have stolen my master's cup, the one from which he 6 drinks, and takes omens; you have done him a great wrong. The steward obeyed, and as soon as he overtook them, delivered 7 his message by rote. What a charge is this, my lord, they answered, to bring against thy servants! That we should have been 8 guilty of such a shameful deed! When we found our money enclosed in the mouths of our sacks, we brought it back to thee all the way from Chanaan; is it likely we 9 would rob thy master's house of gold or silver? If the cup that is missing should be found in possession of any of us, let him 10 pay for it with his life; and we, too, will be slaves in our lord's service. I accept this test of yours, said he; the man in whose 11 possession it is found, shall be my slave, and the rest of you go clear. So, with all haste, they lowered their sacks to the 12 ground, and began opening them one by one. And he began with the eldest, and examined each in turn, till at last he found the cup in Benjamin's sack.

13 And now they tore their garments about them, loaded their asses again, and went 14 back to the city. Joseph was awaiting them there, and Juda led his brethren into Joseph's presence, where they all bowed face 15 to the earth before him. What moved you, said he, to do this? Surely you must know that I have powers of divining such as no other man has? My lord, said Juda, what 16 answer can we make? What plea can we offer in our defence? We are guilty men, and God would not let it pass unnoticed; and now all of us, not only he in whose possession the cup was found, will be thy slaves. God forbid I should ask that, answered Joseph; no, the thief who stole the cup shall be my slave; the rest of you may 17 go back to your father as free men.

At this, Juda made bold to draw nearer 18 him; My lord, he said, let thy servant speak a word for thy own hearing, without earning thy displeasure, Pharaoh's viceroi though thou art, and my sovereign lord. When thou didst ask us whether we had 19 a father or a brother living, our answer was, My lord, we have a father well advanced 20 in years, and one of his sons is still with him, the youngest, who was born to him in his old age. There was another son by the same mother, but he is dead, and now only this one recalls his mother's memory, so that his father loves him dearly. Upon 21 this, thou didst bid us bring the boy to thee and let thee have sight of him. My lord, 22 we urged, our father cannot do without the boy; the parting would kill him. But thou 23 didst warn thy servants, You shall never have audience of me again, unless you bring your youngest brother with you.

Then we went back to our father, and 24 told him of the warning which thou, his master and ours, hadst given us. And 25 when our father bade us come here again and buy a little bread, we told him we 26 could not, unless our youngest brother was allowed to come down with us. In his company, we said, we will go willingly enough, but we dare not face the man we told thee 27 of without him. You know, he answered, that my own wife only bore me two sons; I let one of them go out of my sight, and 28 your news was, that some beast had made a prey of him; he was never seen again. If 29 you take this one too, and any harm befalls him on the way, you will send an old man 30 sorrowing to the grave. My lord, shall I present myself before my father, and the boy not with me? His life is bound up with his son's, and if he finds we have not 31 brought him with us, it will be the death of him; must we bring an old man to the 32 grave in sorrow? Enslave me instead; with full justice, I made myself answerable for him. If I do not bring him back, I said, I will never claim my own father's forgiveness. I, therefore, my lord, would be left here as thy servant, to wait upon thee in his stead; let the boy go home with his brethren. Should I go back to my father without him, and witness the blow that strikes my father down?

45 Joseph could contain himself no longer, and there were many standing by. So he gave orders that all these should leave his presence; there must be no strangers to see it, when he made himself known. But when he spoke, he burst into such a fit of weeping that these Egyptians, and all Pharaoh's household, could not but hear it. I am Joseph, said he to his brethren; is my father yet alive? But his brethren were so overcome with fear that they could not answer him, and he must needs use gentleness; Come closer, he said, and then, when they had drawn close to him, I am Joseph, that brother of yours whom you sent away to be sold as a slave in Egypt. And now, do not take it to heart; waste no regrets over the bargain that brought me here; if I came to Egypt first, it was on God's errand, to be your protector. It is two years now since famine came to these parts, and there will be no ploughing, no reaping harvests, for five years more; so God would have me here in readiness to preserve your race, by giving you food to live on. It was not your design, then, it was God's will that sent me here; he it is that has put Pharaoh himself under my tutelage, made me regent of all his domains, with the whole of Egypt under my care.

9 Make haste, go back to my father and give him this message from his son Joseph: God has made me ruler of all Egypt; make thy way here with all speed. Thou shalt have the land of Gessen for thy dwelling-place, so that thou canst live close to me, with thy children and thy grandchildren, thy sheep and cattle and all that is thine. 11 And there, since there are still five years of famine to come, I will maintain thee and keep thee from starving, with that household of thine and all thou hast. You and my brother Benjamin here can assure him from the witness of your own eyes, that it was Joseph who spoke to you. Tell my father of all these honours I enjoy, and of all you saw in Egypt, and bring him back to me here with all speed.

With that, he threw his arms round Benjamin's neck, in tears; Benjamin, too, wept as he clung to him. Then Joseph kissed all his brethren in turn, and wept over them, till at last they found courage to speak to him. And now the news was in everybody's mouth, and all Pharaoh's court heard that Joseph's brethren were there. Pharaoh rejoiced heartily over it, and all his courtiers with him; and these were the orders he would have Joseph give to his brethren, Pack your beasts, and go back to Chanaan, bring your father here, and all your family, to share the blessings of Egypt with me, and live on the best the land can give. And they might borrow waggons from Egypt, to carry their wives and children back. Take your father with you (he was to tell them) and make haste over your return; and leave none of your farm stock behind you; all the wealth of Egypt awaits you here.

The sons of Israel did as they were bidden; Joseph providing them with waggons at Pharaoh's command, and with food for the journey. He also had two new garments brought out for each, and gave Benjamin three hundred silver pieces and five new garments of the choicest sort; sending his father a like gift in both kinds, as well as ten asses laden with the best merchandise of Egypt, and ten she-asses with corn and bread to last him over his travels. Thus he sent his brethren home, and his last word, as they set out, was Be sure there is no quarrelling on the way. So they left Egypt, and when they reached their father Jacob in Chanaan, they gave him their news, Thy son Joseph is still alive, and it is he that rules the whole land of Egypt. Jacob heard it, with the look of one just awoken from a heavy sleep, but at first he would not believe them, and they must tell him the whole story from first to last. Then, when he had seen for himself the waggons and all the gifts, he could breathe

28 again. If my son Joseph, he said, is still alive, that is all I ask; I will go with you, and have sight of him again before I die.

46 So Jacob set out with all his possessions, and when he reached the Well of the Oath, he offered sacrifice there to the God of his father Isaac. That night, in a vision, he heard God calling to him, Jacob, Jacob! and when he answered, I am here, at thy command, God said to him, I am the almighty God thy father worshipped. Betake thyself to Egypt without fear; I mean to make thy descendants into a great nation there. I will go down there with thee; and when the time comes to return, it shall be under my guidance still; and Joseph shall stand by thee to close thy eyes in death. So Jacob left the Well of the Oath behind him, and his sons took him on further in the waggons which Pharaoh had provided, to ease an old man's travel. With him were their own wives and children, and all the possessions he had in Chanaan, and so he reached Egypt with the whole of his family, sons and grandsons and daughters with them, the whole of his race.

These are the names of Israel's descendants who made their way into Egypt. He had his sons with him, of whom Ruben was the first-born, and Ruben's own sons were called Henoah, Phallu, Hesron, and Charmel. Simeon's were called Jmueel, Jamin, Ahod, Jachin, and Sohar; he had another, called Saul, by a Chanaanite. Levi's were called Gerson, Caath, and Merari. Juda's were called Her, Onan, Sela, Phares and Zara, but of these, Her and Onan had already died in Chanaan; Phares had two sons, Hesron and Hamul. Issachar's were called Thola, Phua, Job and Semron; Zabulon's were called Sared, Elon and Jafelel. So much for the sons Lia bore in Mesopotamia of the Syrians, with one daughter, Dina; the whole count of these, sons and daughters, was thirty-three. Gad's sons were called Sephion, Haggi, Suni, Esebon, Heri, Arodi and Areli. Aser's were called Jamne, Jesua, Jessui and Beria, and they had a sister called Sara; Beria had two sons, Heber and Melchiel. All these were descended from Zelpha, the woman-servant Laban gave to his daughter Lia; thus Jacob counted sixteen descendants through her. Jacob's wife Rachel had two children, Joseph and Benjamin; Joseph's two sons, Manasses and Ephraim, were borne to him in Egypt by Aseneth, daughter of Putiphare that was priest at Heliopolis; Benjamin's were called Bela, Bechor, Asbel, Gera, Naaman, Echi, Ros, Mophim, Ophim and Ared. These were descended from Jacob's wife Rachel, fourteen in all. Dan was the father of Husim, Nephthali of Jasiel, Guni, Jeser and Sallem; these were descended from Bala, whom Laban gave as a serving-woman to his daughter Rachel; through her, Jacob had seven descendants in all. Thus Jacob went into Egypt with sixty-six companions all sprung from his stock, not reckoning his son's wives. Meanwhile, Joseph had had two sons born to him in Egypt; so that Jacob's whole clan, when they found a home in Egypt, reached the number of seventy.

He had sent Juda on before him to tell Joseph of his coming, so that they could meet in Gessen; and upon his arrival, Joseph had horses put in his chariot and drove there to meet his father. At the first sight of him, he threw his arms about his neck, and embraced him, in tears. Now, his father said to him, I can die happy; I have seen thee face to face, and know that my son survives me. Then Joseph said to his brethren and to his family, I must go and tell Pharaoh that my brethren and my family have come here from Chanaan. They are shepherds, I shall say, and all their skill is in tending flocks; those flocks, and their herds, and all they possess, they have brought with them. So when he summons you and asks you what is your trade, your answer must be, Thy servants are shepherds; to that trade we have been brought up from youth, as our fathers were before us. This profession will win you a home in the land of Gessen; the Egyptians hold all shepherd-folk in abhorrence.

47 So Joseph approached Pharaoh with the news that his father and his brethren had brought their sheep and cattle and all they possessed away from Chanaan, and were there in the land of Gessen. He also presented his five youngest brethren to the king, and these, when the king asked what their employment was, answered, Thy servants are shepherds, as their fathers were before them. We have come to seek hospitality in this land of thine, my lord, because the drought lies heavy on Chanaan, and there is no pasture for our flocks; our plea is, that thou wouldst grant thy servants a home in the country of Gessen. So the king told Joseph, Now that thy father and thy brethren have come here to bear thee company, the whole land of Egypt is at thy disposal; bid them dwell where they are best able to dwell, occupying the country of Gessen. And if thou knowest any of their number to be skilful at their craft, give them charge of my own herds. Afterwards, Joseph brought his father in, and presented him to the king, to whom he gave his blessing. And when the king asked him, what was his age? I have lived a wanderer's life, said he, these hundred and thirty years; no long life, and no happy one, compared with the years my fathers spent, roaming the world before me. So he gave the king his blessing, and left him.

Joseph obeyed Pharaoh's bidding, and gave his father and his brethren lands in the most favoured part of Egypt, at Ramesses; and there he maintained them, with all his father's kindred, giving an allowance of food to each. All the world over, bread was still scarce, and the drought bore hardest on Egypt and on Chanaan, till at last Joseph had amassed all the money either land possessed in the royal treasury, through his sales of wheat. So, when they had nothing left to buy with, the Egyptians all came to Joseph asking to have bread given them for nothing; Wilt thou watch us starve, they asked, now that we have no more money left? If you cannot pay, he answered, bring your cattle here, and you shall have food in return for these. So they brought them and he bartered corn for horses and sheep and cattle and asses, feeding them the whole of that year and taking their beasts as the price. By the next year, they came to him and said, My lord, we must needs be open with thee; we have come to the end of our cattle, as well as our money; thou canst see for thyself that nothing is left us except our lives and our lands. Do not watch us starve; thou shalt have the disposal of our lands and of ourselves, making both of these the king's property, and giving us seed-corn in return; if not, the land will become a wilderness for want of tillage. So Joseph bought the whole land of Egypt, one and all selling their possessions to him because the famine was so grievous; and he made it Pharaoh's property, with all the inhabitants of it from one end of Egypt to the other; except the land which the king had assigned to the priests. These had a fixed allowance of food made to them from the royal storehouses, and there was no occasion for them to sell their lands.

Joseph said to the people, You can see for yourselves now that Pharaoh is lord of your lives and lands; you shall have seed-corn to sow your fields with, and when harvest-time comes you shall give up a fifth of your crops to the king; the other four-fifths I will grant you for the next sowing, and to feed your households and your children. Our lives are in thy hand, they said; as long as we enjoy my lord's favour, we will gladly be the king's servants. All over Egypt, from that day to this, the payment of the fifth is a custom which has the force of law, except in the priests' lands, which are bound by no such conditions.

Thus Israel began to find a home in Egypt, that is, in the land of Gessen, took possession of it, and flourished, and grew great. Jacob himself lived on seventeen years there, so that he reached altogether the age of a hundred and forty-seven. And when he saw the day of his death approaching, he sent for his son Joseph; Do me this favour, he said, put thy hand under my thigh, and swear, in love and loyalty, that thou wilt not bury me here in Egypt. I would sleep where my fathers sleep; take me far away from this land and bury me in the burial-place of my kindred. I will do thy bidding, answered Joseph; but Jacob would have him bind himself by an oath. So he gave his oath; and then Israel turned his eyes towards the top of his bed,¹ and gave praise to God.

48 Soon after this, Joseph was told that his father had fallen sick, and took his two sons, Ephraim and Manasses, to visit him. When the old man heard that Joseph had come to see him, he found strength to sit up in bed, and greeted him thus, The almighty God revealed himself to me at Luza in Chanaan, and gave me his blessing there. I will make thy posterity increase and multiply, he said, so that a host of nations shall spring from thee; and I will give this land to thee and to thy race after thee, to be their possession eternally. Thy two sons were born to thee in Egypt, before my coming, but they shall be counted as sons of mine; Ephraim and Manasses shall take rank with Ruben and Simeon. Whatever children thou shalt beget after this shall be thine, not mine, and they shall hold whatever possession they hold under the title of these brothers of theirs. It was when I was on my way back from Mesopotamia that I lost Rachel, there in Chanaan, while we were on our journey, in spring time,¹ and when I reached Ephrata I buried her there, by the road which leads to Ephrata; Bethlehem is another name they call it by. Then he saw Joseph's two sons there, and asked, Who are these? The sons God has given me, said he, while I have been living here. Bring them close to me, he answered, and let me give them my blessing; by now, Israel's eyes were failing through his great age, and he could not see clearly. So they were brought close to him, and he kissed them; then he said to his son, Once I never thought to see thee again; that fear was groundless, and now God has given me sight of thy children too. And Joseph took them from his father's embrace, and bowed low, putting Ephraim on his right, by Israel's left hand, and Manasses on his left, at Israel's right hand, and holding them both close to him. But Jacob stretched out his right hand, and put it on the head of Ephraim, the younger, and put his left on the head of Manasses, the elder, changing his hands round. And this is the blessing which Jacob gave to Joseph's sons; May that God, in whose presence my fathers, Abraham and Isaac, once lived and moved, that God who has guided me like a shepherd from my youth till now, that angel of God, who has rescued me from all my troubles, bless these sons of thine. Let them inherit my name, and the names of my fathers, Abraham and Isaac; may their posterity spread wide over the earth. Joseph took it amiss when he saw his father put his right hand on the head of Ephraim, and would have raised it up from Ephraim's to put it on Manasses' instead; No, father, said he, thou art wide of the mark; here is the eldest, upon whom thy right hand should rest. But Jacob would not be persuaded; I know it, my son, said he, I know it; Manasses too shall give birth to a people, and spread far; but this younger brother shall outdo him, and beget a multitude of nations. So then and there he blessed them; When men give a blessing in Israel, he said, the words they use shall be, God make thee like Ephraim and Manasses. So he put Ephraim before Manasses. He said, too, to Joseph, I must die, but God be with you, and bring you back to the land of your fathers. And there I bequeath thee one portion² to which thy brethren shall have no claim, the land I won from the Amorrhite with my sword and my bow.

49 Then Jacob summoned all his sons to him; Gather about me, he said, to hear what awaits you in the days still to come; gather about me, sons of Jacob, and listen; it is Israel, your father, who speaks. Thou, Ruben, art my first-born, my pride, my manhood's first-fruits; thine was the privilege, thine the right to rule, but all went to waste like water. Never mayst thou thrive, thou who wouldst lie between thy father's sheets, and defile his bed. Simeon and Levi are brothers indeed, warriors both, and ready tools of violence. Never may this soul of mine take part in their conspiracy, this heart be of their company; raging, they slew their enemy, recklessly they broke down a city wall.³ A curse on this unrelenting rage of theirs, this bitter spite! I will distribute them here and there in Jacob, I will scatter them throughout

8 Israel. But thou, Juda, shalt win the praise of thy brethren; with thy hand on the necks of thy enemies, thou shalt be reverenced by thy own father's sons. Juda is like a lion's whelp; on the hills, my son, thou roamest after thy prey; like a lion couch'd in his lair, a lioness that none dares provoke. Juda shall not want a branch from his stem,¹ a prince drawn from his stock, until the day when he comes who is to be sent to us, he, the hope of the nations. To what tree will he tie his mount; the ass he rides on? The vine for him, the vineyard for him; when he washes his garments, it shall be in wine, all his vesture shall be dyed with the blood of grapes. Fairer than wine his eyes shall be, his teeth whiter than milk.²

13 Zabulon shall dwell by the sea shore, where the ships find harbour, at Sidon's gates. Issachar lies secure within its own confines, like some beast of burden that has great strength; so pleasant he finds his resting-place, so fair his land, that he is willing to bow under the yoke, and pay tribute to others. But Dan shall administer his own laws, like any other tribe of Israel; Dan is like a snake by the road side, an adder on the path, to bite the horse's heels, and make him throw the rider backwards.
I will wait patiently, Lord, for the deliverance thou canst bring me.³ Gad shall be at the mercy of armed men, till he goes armed in his turn. Rich in wheat shall Aser's lands be; he shall send out delicacies for the tables of kings. Nephthali is like a roe-deer that goes free, bringing a message of gladness.⁴

22 Joseph grows upward, upward still, fair to view; see how the maidens pass to and fro on the city walls!⁵ Sorely his enemies harass him with the darts they throw, unrelenting in their hatred, but his bow rests in the strength that does not fail him; the power of the God who rules in Jacob gives free play to hand and arm. From Joseph one shall arise, who will be the shepherd and the corner-stone of Israel. The God of thy father shall bring thee aid; the Almighty shall bless thee with all the blessings that lie stored in heaven above, or in the depth beneath us, all the blessings that enrich breast and womb. This blessing which thy father gives thee draws strength from all the blessings which his own fathers bequeathed; they shall not cease till he comes, whom the everlasting hills await.

May they all rest on Joseph's head, rest on his brow, who is separated, like a Nazirite, from his brethren. As for Benjamin, he is like a ravening wolf, that must devour his own prey in the morning, and have plunder still to divide at nightfall.

All these names are perpetuated in the twelve tribes of Israel; and these are the words in which their father blessed them one by one, giving each the blessing that was due to him. Then he laid a charge upon them; I must die, he said, and become a part of my people; bury me with my fathers in the double cave on the land that belonged once to Ephron the Hethite, the cave that looks towards Mambre, in the land of Chanaan. It was this cave that Abraham bought, with the ground it stands in, from Ephron the Hethite, to make his tomb there. There they buried him, and his wife Sara with him; there, too, Isaac lies buried with his wife Rebecca; there Lia, too, was laid. So he made an end of giving the directions he would have his sons observe; then lay his full length on the bed, and died, and became a part of his people.

50 Joseph, when he saw this, threw himself down at his father's side, weeping and covering his face with kisses.
And now he would have the doctors who were in his service embalm his father with

¹ 'A branch'; literally 'a rod'. The sense intended may be that of a royal sceptre. The meaning of the word rendered 'who is to be sent to us' is very uncertain in the Hebrew text. For 'he, the hope of the nations', the Hebrew text gives 'he shall have the obedience of the nations'.
² The words used about Ruben, Simeon and Levi seem to be a reference, for the most part, to past events; cf. 35. 22, and chapter 34 above. The blessing of Juda is more naturally understood of the position which the tribe of Juda was to occupy.

³ No plausible explanation has been given of the sudden interruption introduced by this verse.
⁵ Some think that Joseph is compared to a fruitful tree, whose branches (though the word 'daughters' never has this meaning elsewhere) spread along a garden wall. The blessing of Joseph is very uncertain in its interpretation throughout. It has been supposed that the reference is to the later prominence of Ephraim among the ten tribes that were separated from Juda (cf. e.g. Ps. 77. 67).

3 spices. Forty days went by, and they were still at their task; that is the custom of the embalmers in Egypt; and for seventy days the whole of Egypt mourned him. Then, when the time of mourning was over, Joseph said to Pharaoh's courtiers, Do me a favour, and prefer this request of mine to Pharaoh. My father has left me bound by an oath; I am dying, said he, and I charge thee to bury me in the tomb I dug for myself in Chanaan. I would go back there to bury my father, and so return. And Pharaoh told him, Go back, and bury thy father in fulfilment of thy oath. So he went, and with him went all Pharaoh's senators and all the elders of Egypt; Joseph's brethren too and all his household, except the children and the flocks and herds; these were left behind in the land of Gessen. He had chariots and horsemen with him, so it was a great retinue that accompanied him. When they reached Atad's Threshing-floor, on the further side of Jordan, they spent seven days over the funeral rites, mourning long and bitterly; till the Chanaanites, watching it, said This is great lamentation the men of Egypt are making, and the place came to be called, The Lament of the Egyptians. Thus Jacob's sons carried out his command, by taking his body to Chanaan, and burying it in the double cave opposite Mambre, that Abraham bought, with the ground it stands in, from Ephron the Hethite, to be his burial-place.

14 And Joseph, when the funeral rites were done, went back to Egypt with his brethren and all his retinue. His brethren, now that their father was dead, grew afraid of Joseph; what if he should remember his wrongs, they asked one another, and punish us for our ill deeds? So they sent a message to him, Our father, before he died, laid a charge on us. We were to say to thee in his name, Forget, I pray thee, the crime which thy brethren committed, the cruel wrong they did thee. And it is our prayer too that thou wouldst grant forgiveness to us, the servants of the God thy father served. Joseph wept upon hearing it; and when his brethren came and bowed to the ground before him, owning themselves his servants, his answer was, Do not be afraid; who am I, that I should oppose my will to God's will? You thought to do me harm, but God turned it all to good account; I was to be raised up to greatness, as you see, for the saving of a multitude of people. Do not be afraid; both you and your children shall still have maintenance from me. With such kindly words he comforted them.

So, with all his father's household, he continued to dwell in Egypt, and reached the age of a hundred and ten. He lived to see Ephraim a grandfather, and Machir, son of Manasses, had children whom he took on his knees.¹ After this he said to his kindred, When I am dead, God will have mercy on you, and enable you to return from this country to the home which he promised Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. And he bound them by an oath, When God shews you this mercy, you must take my bones out of this land with you. So he died, a hundred and ten years old, and they embalmed him with spices, and laid him to rest in a coffin, there in Egypt.

THE BOOK OF EXODUS

HERE are the names of Israel's sons; these were the men who betook themselves to Egypt, each with his family, when Jacob went there; 3 Ruben, Simeon, Levi, Juda, Issachar, Zabulon and Benjamin, Dan and Nephthali, Gad and Aser. There were seventy 4 souls altogether that came from Jacob's stock, but of these, Joseph was in Egypt 6 already. When he and his brethren and 7 all their next descendants were dead, the race of Israel grew into a teeming multitude, in such strength that the whole 8 land was peopled with them. Meanwhile, a new king of Egypt had arisen, who 9 knew nothing of Joseph. See, he said to his people, how the race of the Israelites has grown, till they are stronger than we 10 are. We must go prudently about it and keep them down, or their numbers will 11 grow; what if war threatens, and they make common cause with our enemies? They will get the better of us, and leave 12 our country altogether. So he made them answerable to officers of the public works, who laid crushing burdens on them, using 13 them to build the store-cities of Phithom and Ramesses; but the more they were ill-treated, the more they bred and multiplied. 14 The Egyptians, in their abhorrence for the Israelites, oppressed and insulted them, making their lives a burden with drudgery 15 in the clay-pit and the brick-kiln, drudgery, too, of all kinds in the cultivation of the land. 16 Then the king of Egypt gave orders to Sephora and Phua, two midwives who 17 attended the Hebrews; When you are called in, he said, to attend the Hebrew women, and their time comes, kill the child 18 if it is a boy; if it is a girl keep it alive. But these midwives feared the Lord, and would not carry out the commands of the king of 19 Egypt; they kept the boys safe; and when the king summoned them and asked, What do you mean by sparing the boys too? they answered, The Hebrew women are not like those of Egypt; they are skilled in midwifery, and contrive to give birth before we reach them.¹ For this, God rewarded the midwives; while his people grew and attained great strength, he gave the midwives, too, families of their own, as women who feared God. And at last Pharaoh made a proclamation to the whole of his people: Whenever a male child is born, cast it into the river, keep only the girls alive.

2 And now one of the descendants of Levi wooed and married a woman of his own clan, who conceived and bore him a son. So winning were the child's looks, that for three months she kept him hidden away; then, unable to conceal him any longer, she took a little basket of reeds, which she smeared with clay and pitch, and in this put her baby son down among the bulrushes on the river bank. The boy's sister waited at a distance, to see what would happen. Just then, Pharaoh's daughter came down to bathe in the river, while her maid-servants walked along the bank. She caught sight of the basket among the rushes, and sent one of her attendants to fetch it; and when she opened it, and saw the baby crying, her heart was touched. Why, she said, this must be one of the Hebrew children. And at that, the boy's sister asked, Wouldst thou have me go and fetch one of the Hebrew women, to nurse the child for thee? Go by all means, she said; and the girl went and fetched her mother. Take this boy, Pharaoh's daughter said, and nurse him for me; I will reward thee for it. So the woman took the boy and nursed him till he was grown; then she handed him over to Pharaoh's daughter, who adopted him as her own son, and gave him the name of Moses, the Rescuer; I had to rescue him, she said, from the river.

A time came when Moses, now a grown-up man, went out among his brethren the Hebrews, and saw how ill they were treated, saw one of these brethren of his being beaten by an Egyptian; whereupon,

¹ 'Are skilled in midwifery'; according to the Hebrew text, 'Are quick to bear'.

12 after looking this way and that to see that 13 no one was near, he killed the Egyptian and buried him there in the sand. When he went out next day, he found two Hebrews that had come to blows, and asked the aggressor what he meant by offering 14 violence to a friend. Why, said he, who made thee a ruler and a judge over us?
 Hast thou a mind to kill me, as thou didst kill that Egyptian yesterday? And Moses was terrified to find that his action had so 15 strangely come to light. When Pharaoh heard of it, he was for putting Moses to death; and Moses, to avoid his scrutiny, took refuge in the country of Madian.
 Here he sat down to rest by the side of a 16 well. And it chanced that seven maids, daughters to the priest of Madian, came out and began drawing water, to fill the 17 troughs and water their father's sheep. But now came shepherds, and would have turned the maidens away, until Moses stood up for them, and himself watered 18 their sheep. When they reached home their father, Raguel, asked them why they were 19 earlier than their wont;¹ and they told him, There was an Egyptian there, who took our part against the shepherds, and then drew water for us himself, for our 20 sheep to drink. Upon which he asked, What has become of this man? Why did you part from his company? Bid him come in and eat.

21 So it came about that Moses bound himself by an oath to live there with Raguel, 22 and wedded his daughter Sephora. The first son she bore him he called Gersam, as if he would say, I have been a stranger, Ger, in an alien land. And when she bore another son, Moses called him Eliezer, Help from God; the God of my father (said he) has helped me to escape from the power of Pharaoh.²

23 Then, after a long while, the king of Egypt died, and the cry of the Israelites, still groaning aloud in their drudgery, went up to God, who took pity on this drudgery 24 of theirs, and listened to their complaint; he had not forgotten the covenant which he 25 made with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. So it was that the Lord looked down in mercy on the Israelites, and took heed of them.

3 Moses, in the meanwhile, had married the daughter of Jethro, priest of Madian, and was doing shepherd's work for him. Deep into the desert he led his flock, till he reached God's own mountain of Horeb. And here the Lord revealed 2 himself through a flame that rose up from the midst of a bush; it seemed that the bush was alight, yet did not burn. Here is 3 a great sight, said Moses, I must go up and see more of it, a bush that does not waste by burning. But now, as he saw him 4 coming up to look closer, the Lord called to him from the midst of the bush, Moses Moses; and when he answered, I am here, at thy command, he was told, Do not come 5 nearer; rather take the shoes from thy feet, thou art standing on holy ground.

Then he said, I am the God thy father 6 worshipped, the God of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob. And Moses hid his face;
 he dared not look on the open sight of God.
 I have not been blind, the Lord told him, 7 to the oppression which my people endures in Egypt, I have listened to their complaints about the cruelty of the men who are in charge of their work. I know 8 what their sufferings are, and I have come down to rescue them from the power of the Egyptians; to take them away into a fruitful land and large, a land that is all milk and honey, where the Chanaanites dwell, and the Hethites, and the Amor-9 rhites, and the Pherezites, and the Hevites, and the Jebusites. Yes, the cry of Israel's race has reached my ears, I have watched how their Egyptian oppressors ill-treat 10 them. Up, I have an errand for thee at Pharaoh's court; thou art to lead my people, the sons of Israel, away out of Egypt.

At this, Moses said to God, Ah, who 11 am I, that thou shouldst send me to Pharaoh? Who am I that I should lead the sons of Israel out of Egypt? I will be with 12 thee, God said to him. And here is a sign for thee, that thy mission comes from me; when thou hast brought my people out of Egypt, thou wilt find thyself offering sacri-13 fice to God on this mountain. But Moses still pleaded with God: How if I appear before the Israelites with the message that the God of their fathers has sent me to

 found in the Septuagint Greek, but not in the Hebrew text. It is possibly an addition derived from 18. 4 below.

² The second part of this verse is them, and they ask me, What is his name?

 14 What answer shall I make? And God said to Moses, I am the God who IS; thou shalt tell the Israelites, THE GOD WHO IS 15 has sent me to you.¹ And he charged Moses again, That is what thou shalt tell the sons of Israel, that he who bears this name, the God of their fathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob has sent thee to them, and this is the name he will be known by for ever; it shall stand recorded, age after age.
 16 Go then, and summon the elders of Israel to meet thee. Tell them that the Lord, the God of their fathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob has appeared to thee, with this message: Day after day I have watched, and seen all that has befallen you 17 in Egypt. And now I mean to take you away from Egypt, where it goes so hard with you, into the land of the Chanaanites, the Hethites, the Amorrhites, the Phe-rezites, the Hevites, and the Jebusites; a 18 land that is all milk and honey. The elders of Israel will give thee a good hearing; and with them thou shalt make thy way into the king of Egypt's presence. The Lord God of the Hebrews, thou shalt tell him, has summoned us to go out three days' march into the desert, and there we must 19 offer sacrifice to the Lord our God. I know well enough that the king of Egypt will not let you go, except under strong compul-20 sion; I must needs exert my power, and smite the Egyptians with all the portents I mean to do among them, before he will 21 give you leave. And I will let you have your way with the Egyptians; when you go you shall not go empty-handed. Each 22 woman shall claim from her neighbour, or from some woman that lodges with her, gold and silver trinkets, and clothes to dress your sons and daughters in; such toll you shall take of the Egyptians.

4 But Moses still had his answer; What if they will not believe me, he said, or give a hearing? What if they tell me to my face that I never had any vision of the Lord? What is that in thy hand? the Lord 2 asked him. A staff, he said. So the Lord 3 bade him cast it on the ground, and when he did so, it turned into a serpent, and 4 Moses shrank away. Now put out thy hand, the Lord said, and catch it by the tail. He did so, and it turned to a staff in his hand. And the word came to him, Will 5 they still doubt that the Lord God of their fathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob has appeared to thee? And now the Lord had 6 a fresh command for him, Put thy hand into thy bosom; and, doing so, he found that it came out a leper's hand, white as 7 snow. Now, said he, put it back in thy bosom again; so he put it back, and this time, when he brought it out, the skin on it was no different from the rest of his skin.

 And the Lord said, If credence and hearing 8 thou canst not gain, with the first sign for thy warrant, the evidence of this second sign will make them believe thee. And if 9 even two signs are not enough to convince them and make them listen to thee, thou hast but to take water from the river and pour it out on the ground; the water thou hast drawn out of the river will turn into blood.

Then Moses said, Lord, have patience 10 with me; but all my life I have been a man of little eloquence, and now that thou, my Master, hast spoken to me, I am more faltering, more tongue-tied than ever.
 Why, the Lord said to him, who was it that 11 fashioned man's mouth? Who is it that makes a man dumb or deaf, clear-sighted or blind, if not I? Go as thou art bidden; 12 I will speak with thy mouth, telling thee what words to utter. But still he said, 13 Lord have patience with me; wilt thou not choose some fitting emissary?² And now 14 the Lord was angry with Moses; What of thy brother Aaron (the Levite)? he asked.³
 I know him to be a man of ready speech.
 He is even now on his way to meet thee, and will give thee a joyful welcome when

¹ The verb used in the Hebrew text can be translated 'I will be', and it is possible to understand the formula as meaning, 'I will be what I will be'. In the second half of the verse, according to the Hebrew text, the name used is 'I am' (or, 'I will be'), rather than 'He who is'. But the personal name under which Almighty God was known to the Jews was Yahweh, He who is. The Greek translators, out of reverence, substituted 'the Lord' wherever this name occurred in the Old Testament, and the Latin follows them. Thus, in verse 15 immediately following, 'Yahweh the God of their fathers' appears in the Latin as 'the Lord, the God of their fathers'.
² The phrase here used, 'Send the man whom as a matter of fact thou art going to send' must be interpreted, in view of what follows, as a remonstrance, not as an act of submission.
³ 'The Levite'; this description seems out of place here; it is perhaps due to some corruption of the text.

15 he finds thee. To him thou shalt repeat my message, entrusting it to his lips; through his lips I will speak, and through thine, telling you what I would have you do. He shall be thy spokesman, giving out thy message to the people, and thou shalt be his representative with God.¹ And take this staff of thine with thee; thou hast portents to bring about by means of it.

18 Then Moses made his way back to his father-in-law, Jethro; Give me leave, he said, to return to Egypt, and see whether my brethren there are still living. And 19 Jethro said, Go in peace. From Madian, then, the Lord bade Moses return to Egypt; all those who had threatened his life were dead. So Moses took his wife and children, with his ass to carry them, and returned to Egypt, with the staff, divinely appointed, in his hand. And as he went back to Egypt, the Lord said to him, Thy part is to do all the wonders I put it in thy power to do, in Pharaoh's presence. But I mean to harden his heart, so that he refuses

22 to let my people go; and then thou shalt give him this message: Israel, says the 23 Lord, is my first-born son, and when I bade thee give this son of mine leave to go and worship me, that leave was refused; I come to claim the life of thy first-born in return.

24 On this journey, at one of his halting-places, the Lord came in his path and threatened him with death, until Sephora took a sharp stone, and circumcised her son with it; then, touching her husband's feet with the flesh, she said, Now we are betrothed in blood. And as she said the words, Betrothed in blood, after the circumcision, the Lord consented to spare him.²

27 Meanwhile the Lord had told Aaron to go out and meet Moses in the desert; so he set out and met him at God's mountain, and greeted him with a kiss. And Moses told Aaron all the message the Lord had entrusted to him, and the wonders he had commissioned him to perform. So together they went and summoned all the elders of the Israelite race to meet them;

and when Aaron told them all the Lord had said to Moses, and shewed the people the appointed signs, the people were convinced. At last the Lord had come to enquire after the sons of Israel, and had witnessed their affliction; they would bow down and worship.

5 After this, Moses and Aaron obtained audience with Pharaoh, and said to him, We have a message to thee from the Lord God of Israel, Give my people leave to go and offer me sacrifice in the desert. Why, he answered, who is this Lord, that I must obey his command, and let Israel go free? I know no such Lord as that; I will not let Israel go. It is the God of the Hebrews, they told him, who has summoned us to go out into the desert, a matter of three days' journey, and offer sacrifice to him; he, the Lord, is our God, what if he should bring sickness or war upon us? Nay, said the king of Egypt, it is two men, Moses and Aaron, enticing the people away from their work; go back to your duties.

These folk, Pharaoh complained, have outgrown their territory already: see how their numbers have increased! And it will be worse still if you ease them of their burdens. So he gave orders, that very day, to overseer and foreman alike: Do not give them any more straw to make bricks with, as your custom has been; let them go and find straw for themselves. Meanwhile, you must give them the same tale of bricks to make as before; there must be no lessening of it. They are idle; that is what has led to this outcry about going and offering sacrifice to their God. Give them heavier work to do; then they will pay no more attention to these lying tales.

So overseer and foreman gave it out to the people as a message from Pharaoh, You shall have no more straw from me; go and gather it for yourselves where you can find it; meanwhile, there is to be no lessening of the work done. And the people found themselves scattered all over Egypt gathering straw; and still the overseers were urgent with them: Finish those daily tasks of yours, as you did when the straw was found. The foremen, who were Israelites, must undergo a beating, now, from Pharaoh's overseers, who asked them why the full tale of bricks had not been made up these two days past, as it was formerly. So the Israelite foremen went and complained to Pharaoh; Master, they cried, why dost thou treat us so? The straw is not being found for us any longer, and never a brick less demanded of us. Here are we, thy servants, beaten for it; there is no justice for this people of thine.¹ You are idlers, said he, idlers all, or you would not be asking leave to go and sacrifice to this Lord of yours. Off with you to your work; no straw shall you have; and as for the bricks, you must make up the same tale as before.

When they heard that the same tale of bricks was to be demanded each day, the Israelite foremen saw that it would go hard with them; and meeting Moses and Aaron face to face, as they came away from Pharaoh's audience, they said to them, The Lord take note of it, and be your judge; you have made our name stink in the nostrils of Pharaoh and his court, put a weapon in his hand that will be our doom. So that Moses had recourse to the Lord again, and asked him, Lord, why dost thou treat thy people so cruelly? Why didst thou ever send me on such an errand? I gained audience with Pharaoh, and spoke to him in thy name; and since then he does nothing but ill-use thy people; is this the deliverance thou hast sent them?

6 But the Lord said to Moses, Thou hast yet to see what I have in store for Pharaoh, such constraint as will make him let them go; he shall have no choice but to drive them away out of his country. And now the Lord sent his word to Moses: I am the same Lord who revealed myself to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob; but although I revealed myself as God the Almighty, my name Adonai I did not make known to them.² And the covenant I made with them was that I would give them the land of Chanaan, their dwelling-place then, but not their home. And now the complaints of the Israelites under their Egyptian oppressors have reached my ears, and I am reminded of this covenant. Tell the sons of Israel, I am the Lord, and I mean to release you from your prison-house in Egypt, to set you free from your slavery, to buy you back for myself, with my arm uplifted in signal acts of redress. Then I will make you my own people, and will be your God; you will learn to acclaim the Lord as your God, that Lord who has brought you out of your Egyptian prison-house, that Lord who made good his promise to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, led you back to your dwelling-place, and made it your home. All this Moses repeated to the Israelites, but they, in their bitterness of heart and the misery of their bondage, would not listen to him. And when the Lord sent Moses to bid Pharaoh, king of Egypt, let the sons of Israel go, Moses told the Lord to his face, The Israelites will not listen to me; what hope is there that Pharaoh will listen to me? A man, moreover, so tongue-tied.³

When the Lord spoke to Moses and Aaron, giving them a message to the Israelites and to the Egyptian king, Pharaoh, and bidding them lead the sons of Israel away out of Egypt, these were the heads of families that had left their names to clans. From Ruben, Israel's first-born, came Henoch, Phallu, Hesron and Charmi. From Simeon came Jamuel, Jamin, Ahod, Jachin, Soar, and Saul (the son of a Chanaanite woman). From Levi came the three clans of Gerson, Caath, and Merari. (Levi lived to the age of a hundred and thirty-seven.) From Gerson, the two families of Lobni and Semei. From Caath, Amram, Isaar, Hebron and Oziel. (Caath lived to the age of a hundred and thirty-three.) From Merari, Moholi and Musi. Such were the families descended from Levi.

Amram married a kinswoman of his called Jochabed, who bore him two sons, Aaron and Moses. (Amram lived to the age of a hundred and thirty-seven.) From

² 'Adonai'; rather, as the Hebrew text shews, 'Yahweh'. The Latin here, confusingly has substituted another divine title, which has the literal meaning of 'the Lord'; see note on 3. 14 above.

³ 'A man so tongue-tied'; literally, 'a man of uncircumcised lips', and so in verse 29 below.

Isaar came Core, Nepheg, and Zechri, 22 from Oziel, Misael, Elisaphan and Sethri.
 23 Aaron's wife was Elisabeth, daughter to Aminadab and sister to Nahasson, and the sons she bore him were called Nadab, 24 Abiu, Eleazar and Ithamar. And Core's sons were called Aser, Elcana and Abia-saph; those were the divisions of the Corite 25 clan. Meanwhile Aaron's son Eleazar married one of the daughters of Phutiel, and become the father of Phineés. Such were the heads of the Levite families that gave their names to clans.

26 It was these two, Aaron and Moses, who had orders from the Lord to lead the Israelites away, in their full muster, out of 27 Egypt; and it was these two, Moses and Aaron, who bade Pharao, king of Egypt, let them leave his country, at the time we 28 are speaking of. It was to Moses the Lord 29 said, there in Egypt, I am the Lord, repeat to Pharao king of Egypt all this message 30 of mine, but Moses hung back and asked the Lord to his face, How should Pharao listen to me, tongue-tied as I am?

7 And the Lord said to Moses, It is my will that thou shouldst be a divine oracle to Pharao,¹ with thy brother for 2 spokesman; Aaron will receive my commands from thee, and repeat them to him, bidding him let the Israelites depart from 3 his country; but I, meanwhile, will harden Pharao's heart. Many signs, many portents will I give in this land of Egypt, and 4 still he will not listen. Then Egypt shall feel the weight of my hand, and I will deliver the Israelites, my army, my people, out of Egypt, with signal acts of redress.
 5 All Egypt shall know that it was I, the Lord, who raised my hand against it, and brought out the sons of Israel from its 6 midst. This command of the Lord was faithfully carried out by Moses and Aaron; 7 they did all he bade them do. Moses was eighty years old, and Aaron eighty-three, when they gave Pharao their message.

8 And now the Lord said to Moses and 9 Aaron, When Pharao asks you to shew him signs of your mission, thou, Moses, shalt bid thy brother take up his staff and cast it down in Pharao's presence; it will 10 turn into a serpent. So Moses and Aaron gained Pharao's audience and did as the Lord had bidden them; Aaron brought out his staff in the presence of Pharao and his court, and it turned into a serpent. At this, 11 Pharao summoned his diviners and magicians, who, in their turn, uttered secret spells in the Egyptian language and did the like; each man's staff, when he cast it 12 down, turned into a serpent; but the staff of Aaron devoured them. Meanwhile, 13 Pharao's heart was hardened, so that he would not obey the Lord's will and heed their warning.²

Then the Lord said to Moses, Pharao's 14 heart is still obdurate, he does not mean to let my people go. Betake thyself to him 15 to-morrow morning; thou wilt find that he is walking by the water side, and there on the bank of the river, thou shalt meet him. Thou wilt be carrying the staff which turned into a serpent, and this shall be thy 16 message to him: The Lord God of the Hebrews sent me to bid thee let his people go and offer him sacrifices in the desert, and hitherto thou hast refused to listen.
 And now the Lord has a new message for 17 thee, to convince thee that he is indeed the Lord. When I strike the water of the river with this staff I carry, it will turn into blood; the fishes in the river will die, till 18 its waters are full of corruption; it will go hard with the Egyptians if they are for drinking river water. Then the Lord gave 19 Moses a message for Aaron, Take up thy staff, and stretch thy hand out over the waters of Egypt; all their rivers and channels and marshes and pools of water. All must turn into blood; blood in every bucket and picher, all over Egypt. So 20 Moses and Aaron did as the Lord had bidden them; Aaron lifted up his staff and struck the waters of the river in the presence of Pharao and his court, and the river turned to blood. All the fishes in 21 the river died, and its waters stank, so that the Egyptians could not drink river water any longer, and there was blood all over the land of Egypt. But the Egyptian magicians 22 did as much with spells of their own; and Pharao's heart was still hardened, still he would not obey the Lord's will and heed their warning. He turned away and went 23 home, paying no more attention to them

¹ 'A divine oracle'; literally, 'a God'.

² The Hebrew text probably means, 'He refused, just as the Lord had foretold, to heed their warning'. So also in verse 22 below, and elsewhere.

24 than before. Meanwhile, all the Egyptians had to dig wells round about the banks, since they could not drink any water from 25 the river itself. So passed the first week after the Lord smote the river.

8 Then the Lord bade Moses present himself before Pharaoh with this message from him. Give my people leave to go and offer me sacrifice; if thou dost refuse, I mean to plague thy whole country with 3 frogs. The river shall swarm with frogs, which will come up out of it and find their way into thy palace, into thy bed-chamber, into thy bed itself; and so with all thy servants and all thy people, with thy ovens 4 and thy larders; neither thou nor thy servants nor thy people will be able to keep the frogs out. Then the Lord would have 5 Moses tell Aaron to stretch out his hand over river and channel and marsh, and 6 bring up frogs all over Egypt; so Aaron stretched out his hand over all the waters of Egypt, and the frogs came up till the 7 whole land of Egypt was full of them. But the magicians, too, did as much with their spells; to fill Egypt with frogs was not beyond their powers.

8 So Pharaoh summoned Moses and Aaron, and bade them entreat the Lord to rid him and his people of the frogs, promising that he would let the Israelites go and offer God 9 sacrifice. Appoint a time, then, Moses said to him at which I shall pray for thee and thy servants and thy people, asking that the frogs may be driven away from thee and them, and no longer be found any-10 where but in the river. To-morrow, said he, and Moses answered, I will do what thou hast said, to let thee know that there is no other God like this Lord of ours;
 11 thou and thy palace and thy servants and thy people shall be rid of the frogs, and they will remain in the river, nowhere else.
 12 So Moses and Aaron went out from Pharaoh's presence, and Moses asked the Lord to grant what he had promised 13 Pharaoh about the frogs. His prayer was answered; in house and farm and countryside all the frogs died, and must be collected in great heaps; the whole land stank with them.

15 As soon as Pharaoh found that a respite

The Plagues of Frogs, Gnats, and Flies was granted him, he steeled his heart against the Lord's will, and would not heed their warning. So the Lord would have 16 Moses tell Aaron to hold out his staff and strike the dust on the ground with it, to bring gnats upon the whole land of Egypt. The command was obeyed; and when 17 Aaron stretched out his hand, with the staff in it, and smote the dust on the ground, gnats settled on man and beast; all over Egypt the dust on the ground 18 turned to gnats. When the magicians tried to do as much with their spells, they found they could not, but still the gnats came and settled on man and beast, till the magicians 19 told Pharaoh, This is God's handiwork; but Pharaoh's heart was hardened, and still he would not listen to them, or obey the Lord's will.

So the Lord said to Moses, Rise up early, and present thyself before Pharaoh; thou wilt find he has gone out to the water side. Give him this message from the Lord, Let my people go and offer me sacrifice; if thou dost not send them on their way, I will send on thee, thy servants, thy 21 people, and the houses in thy land, flies of all sorts;¹ flies of every kind shall swarm in the houses of the Egyptians, and all over the land in which they dwell. But I will shew signal favour to the land of Gessen, where my own people dwell, sparing it from the flies; am I not Lord in every part 22 of the earth? My people shall not fare as thine; to-morrow shall see this portent happen. And the Lord carried out his threat; into the houses of Pharaoh and his servants and upon all the land of Egypt came a grievous swarm of flies, such a swarm as tainted the whole land by its presence.

Then Pharaoh summoned Moses and Aaron to him; Go and sacrifice to your God, he said, but here, in this land. That may not be, said Moses; do we not sacrifice to the Lord what the Egyptians worship? If we are seen slaughtering the very beasts which the Egyptians hold sacred, they will stone us. We will do what the Lord bade us do, go out three days' march into the desert and offer him sacrifice there. Then Pharaoh said, You shall go and sacrifice to the Lord your God in the desert, provided

it is no long distance away; now go and use 19 your prayers on my behalf. When I leave thy presence, said Moses, I will pray to the Lord, and to-morrow Pharaoh and his servants and his people shall be rid of the flies; only do not play us false again by 30 holding the people back from their sacrifice. So Moses left Pharaoh's presence, and prayed to the Lord, and what he had prom-31 ised, the Lord granted, ridding Pharaoh and his servants and his people of the flies, 32 until not one was left. But the heart of Pharaoh was still obdurate, and once more he would not let the people go.

9 Then the Lord bade Moses present himself before Pharaoh with this message from the Lord, the God of the Hebrews; Give my people leave to go and 2 offer me sacrifice. If thou dost still refuse, 3 wouldst still keep them in thy power, then my hand shall be felt all through this countryside; a most grievous plague shall 4 fall upon horse and ass and camel, on oxen and sheep. And I will make a signal difference between the lands of Israel and the lands of the Egyptians; the Israelites will 5 not lose any of their possessions at all. And the Lord has appointed his own time for it; To-morrow, he says, the Lord will 6 carry out this threat against thy land. So, next day, the Lord did as he had threatened; everywhere the beasts belonging to the Egyptians died, and the Israelites did 7 not lose one. Pharaoh himself sent to make enquiry, and found that no beast belonging to the Israelites had died. But still Pharaoh's heart was obdurate, and he would not let the people go.

8 So the Lord said to Moses and Aaron, Take handfuls of ashes from the oven, and let Moses sprinkle them in the air in 9 Pharaoh's presence. They will turn to a dust that falls everywhere in the land of Egypt, and everywhere ulcers and boils 10 shall break out on man and beast. So they took ashes from the oven into Pharaoh's presence, and Moses sprinkled them in the air; and ulcers and boils broke out on man 11 and beast, so that even the magicians could not present themselves before Pharaoh, such pain they had, like all Egypt, from the ulcers. But the Lord hardened 12 Pharaoh's heart so that he would not listen to them; all fell out as the Lord had prophesied to Moses.

And now the Lord bade Moses rise up 13 early in the morning, and present himself before Pharaoh with this message from the Lord, the God of the Hebrews: Let my people go and offer me sacrifice. I am 14 taking occasion now to send all my plagues upon thy person,¹ and thy servants, and thy people, to shew thee that none on earth has power like mine. Were I to stretch out 15 my hand and smite thee and thy people with pestilence,² earth would see no more of thee. But no, this is the very reason why 16 I have made thee what thou art, so as to give proof, in thee, of my power, and to let my name be known all over the earth. So 17 thou wouldst still play the tyrant with my people, and refuse them leave to go away?
To-morrow, then, at this hour, I will pour 18 down such a fierce storm of hail as Egypt has never known, from the first day of her existence to this. Lose no time in sending 19 word to have thy cattle brought in, and all that thou hast out of doors; men and cattle and all else that is left in the open, not brought under shelter, will die when the hail falls upon it. Some of Pharaoh's serv- 20 ants were struck with awe at the Lord's threat, and made their servants and their cattle take refuge within doors; others paid 21 no heed to the message the Lord had sent, and left their servants and their cattle in the open.

Then the Lord said to Moses, Stretch 22 out thy hand towards heaven, so that hail may fall all over the land of Egypt, on man and beast and every growing thing the soil of Egypt produces. So Moses lifted up his 23 staff towards heaven, and the Lord sent thunder and hail and fire that ran along the ground; all over the land of Egypt the Lord showered down hail. The hail drove on, 24 and fire mingled with the hail; never was such hail seen anywhere in Egypt since its people became a people. And throughout 25 the land this hail smote all that was left in the open, man or beast; smote upon all the

¹ 'I am taking occasion now to send all my plagues'; literally, 'this time I am sending all my plagues', but it is difficult to see the force of the words unless they mean (as we should say nowadays) 'while I am about it, I mean to send all my plagues'.

² Some would interpret, 'I will stretch out my hand' etc., but no pestilence is mentioned among the judgements which follow, and it is clear that Pharaoh himself was still alive when the Exodus took place.

soil yielded, and broke down every wild 26 tree. Only in the land of Gessen, where the Israelites dwelt, no hail fell.

27 So Pharaoh had Moses and Aaron summoned to his presence; Thus far, he said, I have done wrong; the Lord has justice on his side, the guilt lies with me and my 28 people. Pray to the Lord that these heavenly thunders, this hail, may cease; then I will let you go, and not keep you waiting 29 here any longer. And Moses answered, When I leave the city I will spread out my hands in prayer to the Lord; the thunders will cease, and there will be no more hail, to prove to thee that the Lord rules the 30 earth. But thou and thy people, I know it well, have not learned to fear the Lord God even now. (The flax and the barley had 31 been spoiled; the barley was ripening, and the flax already in the pod. But no harm was done to the late crops, the wheat and 32 the spelt.) When Moses left Pharaoh and the city, he stretched out his hands to the Lord; whereupon the thunder and the hail 33 ceased, and no more rain fell on the land. And Pharaoh, seeing that rain and hail and 34 thunder were past, added sin to sin; his heart and those of his servants were dull and hardened beyond belief, and he would 35 not let the Israelites go; the Lord's warning through Moses went unheeded.

10 So the Lord said to Moses, Gain admission, now, to Pharaoh's presence; I have hardened both his own heart and the hearts of his servants, so that he 2 shall be a signal proof of my power. It is a story thou shalt repeat in the hearing of thy children and thy children's children, how I crushed the Egyptians, what portents I did amongst them, and you shall 3 know, all of you, what manner of God you serve. So Moses and Aaron gained Pharaoh's audience, and brought him this 4 message from the Lord, the God of the Hebrews, Wilt thou never learn to bow to my will? Give my people leave to go and 5 offer me sacrifice. If thou dost refuse to let them go, then to-morrow I am sending the locust to invade thy territory, covering 6 the face of the ground till it is lost to sight, devouring all that the hail has left, eating away all the trees that grow in the country-side. Locusts shall lie thick in all the houses that belong to thee, and thy servants, and all the Egyptians; such a swarm as father or grandfather of thine has never seen in all their time. With that, Moses turned away, and left Pharaoh's presence.

And now Pharaoh's servants said to him, 7 Shall we never be rid of this thorn to our sides? Let the men go, and sacrifice to the Lord their God if they will. Canst thou not see for thyself that Egypt is a ruined country? So they brought Moses and 8 Aaron back into the presence of Pharaoh, who said to them, Go and sacrifice to the Lord your God if you will. How many 9 will you take with you? We must take our children with us, answered Moses, and the old as well; our sons and daughters, our flocks and our herds; it is a solemn festival of the Lord our God. As you hope for the 10 Lord's mercy, cried Pharaoh, you shall not go thus, taking your children with you. Who can doubt there is mischief brewing here? That will not serve; you that are grown 11 men shall go and sacrifice to the Lord; that is all you asked for. And with that they were driven away from Pharaoh's presence.

Then the Lord bade Moses stretch out 12 his hand over Egypt, to make the locusts swarm over it and devour all the growing things that had outlived the hail. So 13 Moses stretched out his staff over Egypt; and the Lord made a sirocco blow all that day and that night.¹ When morning came, the sirocco carried locusts with it; and 14 these invaded all the land of Egypt, settling upon its whole extent in such numbers as had never been seen before, nor shall be hereafter. They covered the whole face of 15 the ground, laying everything waste; devoured all the growing things which the soil produced, and all the fruit which the hail had left on the trees; no green was to be found on tree or plant all over Egypt. Upon this, Pharaoh sent for Moses and 16 Aaron with all haste; I have wronged you, he said, you and this Lord of yours; but 17 forgive me this once, and pray the Lord your God to rid me of this deadly plague. So Moses went out from Pharaoh's 18 presence, and prayed to the Lord; who thereupon sent a violent west wind, that caught 19 up the locusts and swept them away into the Red Sea; not one was left in the whole land of Egypt.

20 But still the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart, and he would not let the Israelites 21 go. So the Lord said to Moses, Stretch out thy hand towards heaven, to bring 22 darkness over the land of Egypt, darkness so thick that it can be felt. And when 23 Moses stretched out his hand towards heaven, all over the land of Egypt utter 24 darkness fell; for three days no one caught sight of his neighbour's face, or moved 25 from where he was. But wherever sons of Israel dwelt, the light shone. Then Pharaoh 26 had Moses and Aaron summoned; Go and sacrifice to the Lord, he said, and take your children with you, only leave your flocks and herds behind. But Moses said, Nay, 27 thou must let us take victims with us, if we are to offer the Lord our God burnt-sacrifice.
 28 All our flocks must go with us, not a hoof but shall take the road; we shall 29 need them for the worship of the Lord our God. We cannot tell what kind of offering we must make, until we reach the place itself.

27 But the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart, and he would not let them go. Depart 28 from me, Pharaoh said to Moses, and take good care thou dost not come into my 29 presence any more; if I see thee again, that day shall be thy last. It shall be as thou sayest, Moses answered; I will not come into thy presence any more.

11 The Lord had told Moses, I mean to send one more plague on Pharaoh, and Egypt with him; after that he will let you go, nay, he will drive you out with all 2 eagerness. Give the word, then, to all the people, men and women alike, that they 3 are to claim gold and silver trinkets from their neighbours; the Lord will let you have your way with the Egyptians.¹

Soe adread of Moses the Egyptians were, both Pharaoh's servants and all the 4 people. And now he said, The Lord sends you this message: At midnight I will make 5 my way through the midst of Egypt, and with that every first-born thing in the land of Egypt will die, whether it be the first-born of Pharaoh, where he sits on his throne, or the first-born of the slave-woman working at the mill; all the first-born, too, of your cattle. All over the land of Egypt 6 there shall be loud lament, such as never was yet, never shall be again. But where 7 the Israelites dwell, all shall be still, man and beast, not a dog shall howl; you will know at last how signal a difference the Lord makes between Egypt and Israel. 8 Then all these servants of thine shall come bowing down to me in entreaty, praying to be rid of me, and of all the people under my command; and when that happens, we will depart. So he left Pharaoh's presence, full of anger. It was a true word the Lord had said to Moses, Pharaoh will refuse you a hearing, to give occasion for those many signs I mean to do in Egypt. Moses and 10 Aaron had done all the miracles here recorded, all in Pharaoh's presence, and still the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart, and he would not let the Israelites leave his country.

12 It was while they were still in the land of Egypt that the Lord said to Moses and Aaron, For you, this month is to lead in all the months, to be the first month of the year. Make this proclamation to the whole assembly of Israel: On the tenth day of this month, each family, each household, is to choose out a yearling for its own use. Or, if there are not enough of them to eat a whole lamb, the head of the family must call in some neighbour who lives close by, so that a lamb shall not be too much for their needs. It must be a male yearling lamb, or a male yearling kid, that you choose, with no blemish on it. These victims must be kept ready till the fourteenth day of the month, and on the evening of that day the whole people of Israel must immolate.² They must take some of the blood, and sprinkle it on the doorway, jams and lintel alike, of the house in which the lamb is being eaten. Their meat that night must be roasted over the fire, their bread unleavened; wild herbs must be all their seasoning. No part must be eaten raw, or boiled, it must be roasted over the fire; head, feet, and entrails, all must be consumed, so that nothing remains till next day; whatever is left over, you must put in the fire and burn

² The Hebrew text has 'between the evenings'.

11 it. And this is to be the manner of your eating it; your loins must be girt, your feet ready shod, and every man's staff in his hand; all must be done in haste. It is the night of the Pasch, the Lord's passing by;¹ the night on which I will pass through the land of Egypt, and smite every first-born thing in the land of Egypt, man and beast alike; so I will give sentence on all the powers of Egypt,² I, the Lord. The blood on the houses that shelter you will be your badge; at sight of the blood, I will pass you by, and there shall be no scourge of calamity for you when I smite the land of Egypt.

14 You are to observe this day as a memorial of the past, a day when you keep holiday in the Lord's honour, generation after generation; a rite never to be abrogated. For a whole week you will eat unleavened bread; from the first day of it, yeast is to disappear from your houses, and the man who eats any leavened thing between the first day and the seventh, is lost to Israel.³ That first day shall be solemnly set apart, and the seventh observed with no less honour; on neither of them shall you do any work, except to prepare your food. Mark well this day of unleavened bread; for this is the day on which I will lead your whole muster away out of Egypt, and you are to observe it, generation after generation, a rite never to be abrogated. From evening on the fourteenth day of the first month to evening on the twenty-first day of it, the bread you eat must be unleavened; no yeast to be found in any house for a whole week. If anyone, stranger or native, eats leavened bread during that time, there is one soul lost to Israel. There must be no food cooked with yeast; there must be no house in which leavened bread is eaten.

21 Thereupon Moses called the elders of Israel together, and gave them the command: Set about choosing victims for each family to immolate at the paschal feast. 22 Take bunches of hyssop, too, and dip them in the blood which stands at your doors, and sprinkle it over the doorway, lintel and jambs alike. None of you must cross the threshold of his house till morning comes.

The Lord will pass on his way smiting²³ down the Egyptians, and when he sees the blood on the lintel and the jambs of a doorway he will pass by that house, and will not let the destroying angel enter your homes to do them injury. And this command is to be kept as an observance by you and your sons for ever. When you reach the²⁵ land which the Lord will give you in accordance with his promise, you are to keep these ceremonies alive; and if your²⁶ children ask, What is the meaning of this rite? then you shall tell them, This is the victim that marked the Lord's passing-by, when he passed by the houses of the Israelites in Egypt, smiting only the Egyptians, and leaving our homes exempt. Upon hearing this, the whole people bowed down in worship, and the Israelites went²⁸ away to carry out the divine commands which Moses and Aaron had received.

Then, at midnight, the Lord's stroke²⁹ fell; fell on every first-born thing in the land of Egypt, whether it were the first-born of Pharaoh, where he sat on his throne, or the first-born of some captive woman where she lay in her dungeon; all the first-born³⁰ too, of their cattle. So Pharaoh and all his servants and all Egypt rose up at dead of night, and all over Egypt there was loud lament; in every house a man lay dead. And it was still night when Pharaoh sent for³¹ Moses and Aaron, and said to them, Up, out of my kingdom, you and all the people of Israel with you; go and offer this Lord of yours the sacrifice you spoke of. You shall have your way, and take your flocks and herds with you; leave me only your blessing, and begone.

The Egyptians, too, urged the people to hasten their departure; We are dead men else, they said. So the Israelites carried³⁴ away the dough in their kneading-troughs before they had time to leaven it, tying it up in cloths and carrying it on their shoulders. Nor did they forget to do what³⁵ Moses had bidden them; they asked the Egyptians for gold and silver trinkets, and a great store of garments. And the Lord³⁶ let his people have their way with the Egyptians, claiming as they would; so ¹ 'The Pasch'; the Vulgate here, and in the Old Testament generally, transliterates the Hebrew name of this feast as 'Phase'. The alternative form 'pasch' is given here as being more familiar to the modern reader, and universal in the Vulgate rendering of the New Testament. ² 'The powers'; literally, 'the gods', but it seems possible that human powers are meant, cf. note on Ex. 21. 6 below. ³ 'Lost to Israel'; cf. note on Gen. 17. 14.

37 they took toll of Egypt. The Israelites, then, set out from Ramesses to Socoth, about six hundred thousand men on the 38 march, not reckoning in the children; and with them a mingled array of other folk, past counting; they had flocks and herds, too, and beasts of all kinds, in great numbers. For cooking they used the dough
 39 which they had brought with them all the way from Egypt, making girdle-cakes without any yeast in them; they had had no time to leaven it, no chance of making 40 provision for their journey, with the Egyptians eagerly bidding them begone, and allowing them no respite. It was four 41 hundred and thirty years since the Israelites had first dwelt in Egypt; at the end of that time, the whole muster of the Lord's people left Egypt in a single day.

42 It is a night for keeping vigil in the Lord's honour, this night when he led them away out of the land of Egypt; the sons of Israel, age after age, must needs 43 observe it. And these are the rules for keeping the Pasch, as the Lord gave them to Moses and Aaron. No alien is to partake 44 of it; a slave acquired by purchase may do so, if he will be circumcised, but not a 45 foreign resident, not a hired servant. All of it must be eaten under the same roof; you must not take any of the victim's flesh 46 elsewhere, or break it up into joints.¹ Every Israelite is bound to keep the observance. If any stranger that lives among 48 you wishes to be of your company, and to eat the pasch, all the males of his household must be circumcised before he can lawfully celebrate the rite. That done, he 49 takes rank as an inhabitant of the country; whereas the uncircumcised are not allowed to partake of it. Native-born, or foreign 50 resident, the same rules are binding on everyone.

51 So all the sons of Israel carried out the divine commands Moses and Aaron had received; and that same day the Lord led them away out of the land of Egypt, company by company.

2 13 And this was another command the Lord gave to Moses: Dedicate to me every first-born thing that Israel yields, whether it be man or beast, the first-fruits of every womb; all these are forfeit to me.

And now Moses said to the people, 3
 To-day you have left Egypt, your prison-house, and it is the Lord's constraining power that has won you your freedom; mark out this day by eating no bread that has leaven in it, this day of early spring which sees your departure. When the Lord has given thee a home in the land of Chanaanite and Hethite, the Amorrhite, Hevite and Jebusite, that land, all milk and honey, which he promised thy fathers he would give thee, thou shalt keep alive, this month, the old custom. For a whole week thou shalt eat unleavened bread, and the seventh day of it shall be kept as a feast in the Lord's honour. During those seven days you shall eat, all of you, bread without yeast in it; nothing leavened shall be seen anywhere within the frontiers of thy domain. And thou shalt tell thy children in those after times all the Lord did for thee when thou madest thy escape from Egypt. This custom is to endure like a mark branded on the hand, to be kept in view like a badge worn on the forehead; the law of the Lord shall be continually on thy lips; was it not the Lord's constraining power that rescued thee from Egypt? Thou shalt keep it alive, year after year, 10 when the appointed time comes round.

And when the Lord has made good his 11 promise to thee and to thy fathers, by bringing thee into the Chanaanite land and giving it to thee for thy own, thou shalt dedicate to the Lord the first-born of every womb, the first-fruits of all thy cattle; every such thing, if it be of the male sex, is forfeit to him. When an ass has its first 13 foal, thou shalt offer a sheep in payment of its ransom; if not, it must be killed.² And every first-born man child of thy own race shall have a price paid for his ransom. When, in after times, thy sons ask thee 14 what is the meaning of this, thou shalt tell them how the Lord's constraining power rescued you from your prison-house in Egypt; how Pharaoh's heart was hardened, 15 and he would not let you go free, until the Lord slew every first-born male thing, man or beast, in the land of Egypt. That (thou shalt say) is why I immolate to the Lord every first-born thing, the first-fruits of every womb, except among my own children; and for these I must pay ransom; 16 this custom is to endure like a mark branded on the hand, to be kept in view like a badge worn on the forehead, to remind you, too, how the Lord's constraining power rescued us from Egypt.

17 Thus the people had Pharaoh's leave to go on their way; but God did not lead them by the nearest road, the road through Philistia. Here they would have found themselves met by armed resistance, and perhaps, in despair of their enterprise, returned to Egypt. He took them round, 18 instead, through the desert which borders on the Red Sea; and yet the Israelites left 19 Egypt in war-like array. Nor did Moses forget to take with him the body of Joseph, who had bound the sons of Israel by an oath to carry his bones away with them 20 when God shewed mercy to them. Their first encampment after leaving Socoth was at Etham, on the very frontier of the desert. 21 And the Lord went on before, to guide them on their journey; by day, in a pillar of cloud, by night, in a pillar of fire; he 22 was their guide at all times; every day a pillar of cloud, every night a pillar of fire moved on before the people.

2 14 Then the word of the Lord came to Moses, bidding him give the Israelites fresh orders. They were to turn back and encamp round Phihahiroth, between Magdal and the sea, opposite Beelsephon, pitching their tents close to the western shore of the sea.¹ Pharaoh (the Lord told them) will think that the Israelites have no room to move, caught there in the desert; and I will harden his heart, so that he will give pursuit. Then I will win victory over Pharaoh and all his armies, and Egypt will learn to know me, the Lord, for what I am.

The people did as they were bidden. 5 And now, when the news of their escape reached the Egyptian court, Pharaoh and his servants changed their minds about the Israelites; What madness was this, they said, to let our slaves go free! So Pharaoh 6 harnessed his chariot, and took all his troops with him; not only his best chariots, 7 six hundred in number, but all that were to be found in Egypt, and all the captains of his army. Thus the Lord hardened the heart of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, and he 8 pursued the Israelites in the hour of their triumphant escape. All Pharaoh's horses 9 and chariots, and the whole of his army, followed close on the track of the fugitives, and came upon them where they lay encamped by the sea, at Phihahiroth, opposite Beelsephon. What fear fell upon the 10 Israelites, how they cried out to the Lord, when they looked round at Pharaoh's approach, and saw the Egyptians close behind them! Were there no graves for us 11 in Egypt, they asked Moses, that thou hast brought us here, to die in the desert? Was it not ill done, to bring us away from Egypt at all? And did we not tell thee as much 12 while we were still there? Leave us, we said, to our Egyptian bondage; better slavery here, than death in the desert. But 13 Moses said to the people, Have no fear; wait patiently; the Lord means to do a miracle to-day under your eyes. The Egyptians you see now, you are seeing for the last time; they will disappear from your sight for ever. It is the Lord that will 14 do battle for you; your part is silence.

And the Lord's word came to Moses, 15 No need to cry to me for aid; bid the Israelites march on. And do thou, meanwhile, lift up thy staff, and stretch out thy hand over the sea, parting it this way and that, so that the Israelites can walk through the midst of the sea dry-shod. Then I will 17 harden Pharaoh's heart, so that he will give pursuit, and I will win victory over Pharaoh and all his army, over his chariots and horsemen. Vain the chariot, vain the horseman; I will teach the Egyptians to know me, the Lord, for what I am. And with 19 that, God's angel, that went on before the host of Israel, moved to their rear; the pillar of cloud, too, left its place in the van and came behind them. It stood there 20 between the Egyptian camp and the camp of Israel, a cloud that shed light in the darkness, yet was itself deep mist, so that ¹ 'Close to the western shore of the sea'; literally, 'close to the sea facing it', that is, Beelsephon. It is clear from the context that this place must have been to the east of the Red Sea, and Israel encamped on the shore just opposite, cut off from their line of flight.

neither army could approach the other all 21 that night. Meanwhile, Moses stretched out his hand over the sea, and the Lord cleared it away from their path. All night a fierce sirocco blew, and the Lord turned 22 the sea into dry land, the waters parting this way and that.¹ So the Israelites went through the midst of the sea dry-shod, with its waters towering up like a wall to right and left.

23 And the Egyptians, still in pursuit, pressed on after them, all Pharaoh's mounted troops, his chariots and horsemen, driving on through the midst of the 24 sea. It was already the first watch of the morning, when suddenly, through the pillar of fire and mist, the Lord looked down upon the Egyptians, and brought 25 their army to its doom. He turned the wheels of their chariots aside, so that they drove through deep places, and the Egyptians began to say, Back, back! There is no facing Israel; the Lord is fighting on 26 their side against us. Then the Lord said to Moses, Stretch out thy hand over the sea, so that its waters shall recoil on the Egyptians, on all their chariots and their 27 horsemen. And when Moses stretched out his hand towards the sea, at early dawn, it went back to its bed, so that its waters met the Egyptians in their flight, and the Lord drowned them amid the 28 waves. Back came the water, overwhelming all the chariots and horsemen of Pharaoh's army that had entered the sea in 29 their pursuit; not a man escaped. But the sons of Israel made their way through the midst of the sea where it had parted, its waters towering like a wall to right and left.

30 So the Lord rescued Israel that day 31 from the assault of the Egyptians; and when they saw the dead Egyptians washed up on the shore, and the great defeat the Lord had inflicted upon them, the people learned to fear the Lord, putting their trust in him and in his servant Moses.

15 Then Moses and the Israelites sang praise to the Lord, and this was their song: A psalm for the Lord, so

¹ See note on 10. 13.

² 'Whose very name tells of omnipotence'; in the Hebrew text, 'his name is Yahweh'. This was the divine name communicated to Moses in Ex. 3. 14; commonly in the Latin version this is translated 'the Lord', but here 'the omnipotent' as if to stress that it is a significant word, and not a mere title.

³ The Hebrew text has, 'The nations heard and were afraid'; the Latin version, 'The nations went up and were angry'; it is not clear in what sense.

great he is and so glorious; horse and rider 2 hurled into the sea! Who but the Lord is my protector, the pride of my song; who but the Lord has brought me deliverance?
 Shall I not praise him, my own God; shall I not extol him, the God of my father before me? The Lord, the warrior God, 3 whose very name tells of omnipotence!²
 That power could hurl Pharaoh's chariots, 4 Pharaoh's army, into the sea; drowned in the Red Sea, the flower of all his chivalry;
 the depths closed over them, and they 5 sank to the bottom like a stone. How mag-6 nificent, Lord, is the strength of thy right hand; that right hand which has shattered the enemy! Against such majesty rose they but to fall; the hot breath of thy anger burnt them up like stubble. The waters 8 were piled high through the blast of thy fury; the waves were still, at the sea's heart the depths congealed.

After them, seize them! the enemy 9 cried; there will be spoils for all, to our heart's content; now to unshathe my sword, and deal the fatal blow! A breath 10 from thee, and the sea closed over them; they sank in the raging waters like lead.
 What power is there, Lord, that can match 11 thee? Who, as thou art, is august in holiness, who so worthy of fear and of praise, who so wonderful in his doings? Thou 12 hadst but to stretch out thy hand, and the earth swallowed them up.

Thy mercy had delivered Israel; thy 13 mercy should be their guide; thy strong arms should carry them to the holy place where thou dwellest. The heathen raged 14 in their hill-fastnesses;³ anguish came upon Philistia's citizens, the chieftains of 15 Edom were dismayed, the warriors of Moab overcome with fear; a numbness seized upon all that dwelt in Chanaan.
 Terror and dread must needs fall upon 16 them; still as a stone, under the threat of thy powerful arm, they must watch thy people go by, thy ransomed people, Lord, go by unharmed. Entry thy people should 17 have, and a home on the mountain thou claimest for thy own, the inviolable dwelling-place, Lord, thou hast made for thyself, the sanctuary thy own hands have 18 fashioned!¹ The reign of the Lord will 19 endure for ever and ever. To horse! cried Pharaoh, and swept chariots and horsemen on into the sea; and the Lord brought the waters of the sea back over them, while the sons of Israel went through the midst of it dry-shod.²

20 Hereupon Mary the prophetess, Aaron's sister,³ went out with a tambour in her hand, and all the women-folk followed her, with tambour and with dances, and took up from her the refrain, A psalm for the Lord, so great he is and so glorious;
 horse and rider hurled into the sea!

22 And now Moses led Israel away from the Red Sea, and they went out into the desert of Sur, where they found no water in three days' marching over waste ground.

23 So they came to Mara, and even here they could not drink the water, so brackish it was to the taste; it was with good reason he called it Mara, for Mara means Bitterness. Here the people were loud in their complaints against Moses; What shall we 24 do for water? they said. Whereupon he cried out to the Lord, and the Lord shewed him a tree whose wood turned the waters sweet when it was thrown into them. Here, too, he gave them laws and decrees to live by,⁴ and issued this challenge to them: If thou wilt listen to the voice of the Lord thy God, his will doing, his word obeying, and all he bids thee observe, observing faithfully, never shall they fall on thee, the many woes brought on Egypt; I am the Lord, and it is health I bring thee.

27 After this the Israelites came to Elim, where they found twelve springs of water and seventy palm-trees, and pitched their tents beside the water.

16 Then, leaving Elim, the Israelite people marched to the desert of Sin, between Elim and Sinai. It was now the fifteenth day of the second month since 2 they had left Egypt, and the Israelites, one and all, there in the desert, were loud in their complaints against Moses and Aaron.

 It would have been better, they told them, if the Lord had struck us dead in the land of Egypt, where we sat down to bowls of meat, and had more bread than we needed to content us. Was it well done to bring us out into this desert, and starve our whole company to death? But the Lord said to Moses, I mean to rain down bread upon you from heaven. It will be for the people to go out and gather enough for their needs day by day; and so I shall have a test, whether they are ready to follow my orders or not. Only when the sixth day comes must they lay in a store twice as large as they gathered on any of the others.

So Moses and Aaron told all the people of Israel, This night shall bring proof it was the Lord that rescued you from Egypt, and to-morrow you shall witness his glory.
 He has heard your complaints against himself—not against us, we are nothing. The Lord (said Moses) means to give you meat for your food this evening, and bread tomorrow to your heart's content. Not unheard, the complaints you have brought against him; we count for nothing, it is the Lord's dealings you complain of, not ours.
 And Moses would have Aaron summon the whole people into the Lord's presence, that had heard them talk so rebelliously.⁵ Even as Aaron was speaking to the assembled Israelites, they looked round towards the desert, and saw the glory of the Lord revealed there in a cloud. And the Lord said to Moses, This be thy answer to the rebel talk I hear: This evening you shall have meat, and bread to-morrow to your hearts' content; will you doubt, then, that I am the Lord your God?

Evening came, and brought with it a flight of quails, that settled in every part of the camp. And at morning, all about the camp, dew was lying; dew that covered the earth's surface, there in the desert, powdered fine as if it had been brayed by a pestle, lying on the ground like hoar-

¹ Some of the verbs in this passage may refer either to the future or to the past and it has been suggested that it was added to the song at a later period, after the conquest of Chanaan. But it seems more natural to understand it as an anticipation, on the part of the Israelites, of an unlabourious victory over Chanaan, which was in fact denied them.

² Some regard this verse not as part of the song, but as an historical résumé leading up to verse 20. According to the Hebrew text, it was 'the horses of Pharaoh' that went into the sea; the Latin implies that Pharaoh himself went into the sea on horseback, but this is probably due to a textual error.

³ And sister, also, of Moses, but the mention of the elder brother's name is a genealogical formality, cf. Gen. 36. 22.

⁴ 'He gave them'; literally, 'he gave it', i.e. the people, or (less probably) 'he gave him', i.e. Moses.

15 frost.¹ The Israelites could not tell what it was when they went to look at it; Manhu, they said to one another, What is it? And Moses told them, This is the bread which the Lord has sent for your eating.

16 And this is the command the Lord gives you; everyone is to gather enough for his needs; a gomor a head is the measure he is to take up, just so much for each person living in his tent. So the children of Israel did as they were bidden, gathering up one more, another less, and each of them measuring it by the measure of a gomor.

18 The man who gathered more did not gather too much for his household, or the man who gathered less too little; each gathered according to the number of mouths that must be filled. None of you, Moses told them, must keep any of it for the morrow. Little heed they gave him, but when some of them left part of it over till morning, it bred worms and corrupted, and Moses rebuked them for their disobedience. So, every morning, each man gathered what would suffice for his needs; whatever was left till the sun grew hot, melted away.

22 When the sixth day came, they gathered a double allowance of two gomors a head. And when this was reported to Moses by those who were in command of the people, he told them, Why, that is the direction the Lord has given us. To-morrow is the sabbath, a day of rest consecrated to the Lord; prepare all you need to prepare, cook all you need to cook, for to-day, and leave what is over for to-morrow. And when they did as Moses had bidden them, they found that what they had left overnight did not corrupt or breed worms at all. That is your food for to-day, Moses told them, because it is the Lord's sabbath; go out to-day, and you will find nothing.

26 You have only six days to gather it in; you will find none on the seventh, the Lord's day of rest forbids it. And sure enough, when some of the people went out to gather it on the seventh day, they could find none.

28 Hereupon the Lord said to Moses, Will you never learn to do as my law commands you? Can you not see that the sabbath is the Lord's gift to you, and if he gives you a double allowance on the sixth day, it is because you must all stay within doors, not leaving your homes, on the seventh? So on the seventh day the people kept the sabbath rest.

This food, which the Israelites called Mán, was white in colour and looked like coriander seed; its taste was like that of flour mixed with honey. And now Moses told them a fresh command he had had from the Lord; he was to fill a gomor with it, and this was to be kept, so that later generations might know what kind of nourishment it was I gave them in the desert, when they had been rescued from the land of Egypt. Take a jar, Moses said to Aaron, put into it as much of the manna as a gomor measure will contain, and leave it to lie in the presence of the Lord, as a treasure for after ages to keep. Such was the Lord's command to Moses; so Aaron left the jar to lie in the tabernacle, where it was to be kept.² The Israelites fed on this manna for forty years, while they were far from the haunts of men; this was their nourishment until they reached the frontiers of Chanaan. (Note that the gomor measures a tenth of a bushel.)

17 Then the whole people of Israel left the desert of Sin, moving on from stage to stage as the Lord directed them, and encamped at Raphidim. But here they had no water to drink, so they turned upon Moses crying out, We have nothing to drink; find water for us. Why do you turn upon me? asked Moses. Will you challenge the Lord? But the people, thirsting for lack of water, grew loud in their complaints against Moses; Didst thou bring us away from Egypt, they said, only to let us die here, with our children and our cattle, of thirst? Moses had recourse to the Lord; What can be done with them? he asked. A little more of this, and they will begin stoning me. So the Lord bade Moses march out at the head of the people, taking some of the elders of Israel with him; and as he went, he was to carry in his hand the staff which he had

6 used to smite the river. I will meet thee, he said, at the rock of Horeb; thou hast but to smite that rock, and water will flow out of it, to give the people drink. All this Moses did, with the elders of Israel to witness it; and the name he gave to that place was Challenge,¹ because it was there the Israelites turned on him and challenged the Lord, by asking whether the Lord still went with them or not.

8 And while they were at Raphidim, the Amalecites came and offered the Israelites battle. So Moses said to Josue, Muster me an army, and go out to fight against Amalec; I will take my stand to-morrow on the hill top, with the miraculous staff in my hand. And Josue did as Moses bade him, going out to do battle with Amalec, while Moses, Aaron and Hur went up to the hill top. Whenever Moses lifted up his hands, Israel had the better of it; only when he rested for a little did the victory go to Amalec. But now Moses' arms grew weary; so they found him a stone to sit on and bade him be seated on it; then, one on each side, Aaron and Hur kept his hands lifted up. In this way, the strength of his arms held out until set of sun, while Josue routed Amalec, and all the forces Amalec could rally, at the sword's point. Put this on record in writing, the Lord said to Moses, and recite it in Josue's hearing: I mean to efface the very name of Amalec from this earth. Moses, too, built an altar there, and called it The Lord raises me up;² and he cried out, Lift up your hands to the Lord's throne! The Lord declares war against Amalec, for all ages to come.³

18 And now news reached Jethro, priest of Midian, Moses' father-in-law, of all that God had done for Moses and for his people Israel, and how the Lord had rescued Israel from Egypt. So he brought Moses his wife Sephora (for Moses had sent her back home), and his two sons. The elder of these was called Gersam, because his father said, I have been a stranger, Ger, in an alien land, and the younger Eliezer, Help from God, because, said Moses, the God of my father has helped me to escape from the power of Pharaoh. So, here in the desert, where he lay encamped close to God's mountain, Moses was visited by his father-in-law Jethro, and his sons, and his wife. Jethro had sent word on to tell Moses who it was that came, and that he had Sephora and her two sons with him; so Moses went out to meet his father-in-law, bowing low and greeting him with a kiss, and words of peaceful welcome passed between them. Then, within the shelter of his tent, Moses told his father-in-law how the Lord had avenged Israel on Pharaoh and the Egyptians; what hardships they had met on the journey, and how the Lord had sent them relief. The story of the Lord's mercies to an oppressed people in delivering them from the power of Egypt rejoiced Jethro's heart; Blessed be the Lord, he said, who has brought you deliverance when you lay in the power of Pharaoh and of the Egyptians! Blessed be the Lord, who has put an end to your slavery in Egypt! Now I know for certain that the Lord is greater than all other gods! An ill day for the Egyptians when they wronged you!⁴ So Moses' father-in-law Jethro brought offerings and sacrificed to God; and Aaron, with all the elders of Israel, came to sit at meat with him, there in God's presence.

Next day, Moses was in his place deciding disputes among the people, who must stand there from morning till evening waiting for an audience with him; and when Jethro saw how he busied himself over the people's needs, he asked, What makest thou here among the people? Why dost thou sit there alone, with all the people waiting upon thee from morning till evening? They come to me, answered Moses, to find out what God's decision is. Some dispute arises among them, and they come to me so that I may make a just award between them, telling them of the decrees which God issues, and of his law. It is ill conceived, said Jethro, this practice

18 of thine. Thou wilt wear out thy own strength, and the patience of this people that goes with thee, and to no purpose; it is beyond thy powers to sustain this office all alone. Here is a word of advice for thee; do but listen, and God will speed thee.

19 Thy part is to be the representative of this people with God, referring all their affairs to him, prescribing to them rite and observance, custom to be kept and duty to be done. Meanwhile, choose out here and there among the people able men, God-fearing, lovers of truth and haters of gain ill won; put each of these in charge of a tribe, or of a hundred families, or fifty families, or ten.¹ These will administer justice to the people from day to day, referring graver matters to thee, but deciding for themselves all that is of less moment. Share thy burden with others, and find relief; so thou wilt be able to carry out God's commands, and endure the weight of all his claims upon thee, and yet all these folk will go home satisfied.

24 Moses listened to all that he proposed, and carried it into effect. He chose out here and there among the Israelites active men, and made them rulers of the people, with the charge of a tribe, or a hundred families, or fifty families, or ten; and these administered justice to the people day after day, referring graver matters to him, and deciding for themselves all that was of less moment. And so he took leave of his father-in-law, who now went back to his own country.

19 The third new moon was rising since they left the land of Egypt, on the day when the Israelites reached the wilderness of Sinai.² They set out from Raphidim, and marched all the way to the Sinai desert before they encamped, pitching their tents there in full view of the mountain. Here Moses went up to meet God, and the voice of God came to him from the mountain, A message to the race of Jacob; to Israel's sons proclaim it: You have seen for yourselves what I did to the Egyptians, how I carried you as if on eagle's wings, and took you up into my care. Listen, then, to my voice, and keep your covenant with me; and I, to whom all the earth belongs, will single you out among its peoples to be my own. You shall serve me as a royal priesthood, as a consecrated nation;³ tell the Israelites this. So, when Moses came back, he summoned the elders of the people, and told them what message it was the Lord had entrusted to him; whereupon the whole people answered with one voice, We will do all the Lord has said.

Moses went back to the Lord with this promise from the people, and the Lord said to him, The time has come now when I mean to visit thee, wrapped in a dark cloud, so that all the people may hear me talking with thee, and obey thee without question henceforward. And when Moses had told him of the people's promise, he said, Go back to the people, and spend to-day and to-morrow ridding them of defilement. Let them wash their clothes, and hold themselves in readiness for the third day; two days from now, the Lord will come down on to mount Sinai in the presence of all the people. Keep them within bounds along the whole circle of it, and bid them beware of going up on to the mountain, or touching even the fringes of it; if anyone touches the mountain, his life must pay for it. No hand must be laid on him, he must be stoned, or shot down with javelins; beast or man that touches the mountain is to die. All this, until they hear a blast on the ram's horn; then let them go up on to the mountain. So Moses went down again to the people, and rid them of defilement. First they must wash their clothes; then he bade them hold themselves in readiness for the third day, and have no commerce with their wives.

And now the third day had come. Morning broke, and all at once thunder was heard, lightning shone out, and the mountain was covered with thick mist; loud rang the trumpet-blast, and the people in the camp were dismayed.⁴ But Moses brought them out from the camp itself to meet the Lord, and they stood

¹ The word 'families' is not expressed in the original, but this seems the most probable account of what is meant. ² The Latin here interprets the Hebrew as meaning simply 'in the third month', but this does not explain the words 'on that day' which follow. ³ I Pet. 2. 9. ⁴ The noise of a trumpet here mentioned was probably supernatural in origin; the word used in the Hebrew text is not the same as in verse 13 above.

there close by the spurs of the mountain.

- 18 The whole of mount Sinai was by now wreathed in smoke, where the Lord had come down with fire about him, so that smoke went up as if from a furnace; it was 19 a mountain full of terrors. Louder yet grew the noise of the trumpet, longer its blast; and then Moses spoke to the Lord, and the Lord's voice was heard in answer.
 20 It was on the very top of mount Sinai that the Lord had come down, and now he called Moses up to the summit. When he had climbed up there he was bidden go down again, and warn the people not to pass beyond their bounds in their eagerness to see the Lord; or it might be that a great multitude of them would incur death.
 22 Even the priests who came into the Lord's presence were to come sanctified, for fear he should smite them.¹ But, Lord, said Moses, the common folk will be in no danger of climbing up on to Sinai; thou thyself hast warned them, and bidden us set bounds, to keep the mountain inviolable. Go down, the Lord said to him, and come back with Aaron alone; neither priests nor people are to go beyond their bounds, and come into the Lord's presence, or he will slay them. So Moses went back to the people, and told them all he was bidden.

20 And now God spoke all these words which follow. I, the Lord, am thy God (he said); I, who rescued thee from the land of Egypt, where thou didst dwell in slavery.

- 3 Thou shalt not defy me by making other 4 gods thy own. Thou shalt not carve images, or fashion the likeness of anything in heaven above, or on earth beneath, or 5 in the waters under the earth, to bow down and worship it. I, thy God, the Lord Almighty, am jealous in my love; be my enemy, and thy children, to the third and fourth generation, for thy guilt shall make 6 amends; love me, keep my commandments, and mercy shall be thine a thousandfold.
 7 Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God lightly on thy lips; if a man uses that name lightly, the Lord will not acquit him of sin.

¹ Some would render 'chieftains' instead of 'priests'. The leading men in Israel perhaps had certain religious functions before the Aaronic priesthood was instituted. Cf. II Kg. 8. 18.

 holy. Six days for drudgery, for doing all the work thou hast to do; when the seventh day comes, it is a day of rest, consecrated to the Lord thy God. That day, all work shall be at an end, for thee and every son and daughter of thine, thy servants and serving-women, thy beasts, too, and the aliens that live within thy gates. It was six days the Lord spent in making heaven and earth and sea and all that is in them; on the seventh day he rested, and that is why the Lord has blessed the sabbath day, and hallowed it.

Honour thy father and thy mother; so thou shalt live long to enjoy the land which the Lord thy God means to give thee.

Thou shalt do no murder.

Thou shalt not commit adultery.

Thou shalt not steal.

Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour.

Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house, or set thy heart upon thy neighbour's wife, or servant or hand-maid or ox or ass or anything else that is his.

All the people stood watching while thunder rolled and lightning flashed, while the trumpet sounded and the mountain was wreathed in smoke, terrified and awe-stricken so that they kept their distance, and cried out to Moses, Do thou tell us the message; we are ready to obey thee. Do not let us hear the Lord speaking; it will cost us our lives. But Moses said to the people, Do not be afraid; God has come here to make trial of your obedience; he would have you possessed with the fear of him, to preserve you from sin. So the people stood their ground far off, while Moses went up into the darkness where God was.

And the Lord gave Moses this further message for the Israelites: You stood watching while I spoke to you out of heaven; it is not for you to make yourselves gods of silver or of gold. It is enough to build me an altar of turf, on which to present burnt sacrifices and welcome-offerings, of sheep or oxen, wherever my name is honoured; so I will come to thee, and give thee my blessing. Even if thou shouldst make me an altar of stone, thou shalt not build it of hewn stones; to use any tool in the making of it is to profane 26 it. And when thou goest up to my altar, thou shalt not mount by steps, for fear of exposing thy body's nakedness.

21 And these laws, he said, thou shalt promulgate to them.¹ If thou dost buy a slave that is a Hebrew by race, he shall do thee six years' service, and in the seventh year, without any ransom paid, he shall go free. He shall leave thy service in the same guise in which he entered it;² if he came to thee married, his wife shall go free with him. But if his master has assigned a wife to him, and she has borne sons and daughters, this woman and her children shall belong to the master; the slave shall go free in the same guise as before. It may be that the slave, for love of his master, and of his own wife and children, will refuse to take his leave; if so, his master shall bring him before the judgement-seat, and then fasten his ear with an auger to door or door-post, in token that the man is his slave in perpetuity.³ If anyone sells his daughter into a man's service, she is not to go free on the same conditions as a slave.⁴ The master to whom she has been made over may send her away, if he has no liking for her, but he may not sell her to foreign masters; he has done her despite enough already. He may betroth her, if he will, to his son; but if he does that, he must treat her as his daughter; and if he finds his son another wife instead, he must marry the girl off, and give her clothes, and make all amends for the loss of her virginity.⁵ If he is not prepared to do these three things, then she must go free, with no ransom paid for her.

12 Whoever kills a man with intent to kill, must pay for it with his life. But where there was no malice aforethought, and God provides the occasion,⁶ he shall be allowed to find refuge in such place as I shall appoint for thee. One who lies in wait on purpose to kill his neighbour shall be torn away even from my altar to die. Death is the penalty for one who kills his father or his mother; death is the penalty when a man is shewn to have carried off his fellow-man and sold him; death is the penalty for one who curses father or mother.

Two fall out, and one is struck with a stone, or with the fist, not fatally, but so that he must take to his bed; must the man who struck the blow be held guilty? Only till the other is well enough to get up and walk abroad with a stick; but he must compensate him for his loss of work, and for the doctor's charges. When a man beats his servant or his handmaid to death, if death follows at once, he must pay the full penalty; but if they survive for a day or more, he shall go unpunished; the loss is his. If men fall out, and one of them strikes a woman who is pregnant, so that the child is still-born, but she herself lives, he must pay whatever sum the woman's husband demands, and the judges agree to; if her death follows, then life must pay for life.⁷ So it is to be; an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth,⁸ a hand for a hand, a foot for a foot; burning for burning, wound for wound, bruise for bruise. If anyone gives servant or handmaid a blow on the eye, so that the sight of it is lost, he must set them free in return for the sight he robbed them of; or if he knocks out a tooth, he must let servant or handmaid go free by the same title.

If an ox gores a man or woman to death, it shall be stoned, and the flesh of it is not to be eaten. But the owner of the ox shall be held innocent, unless the ox has been using its horns for some time past, and he has refused to shut it away when appeal was made to him. Then, if the ox gores

¹ The code of laws which occupies this and the two following chapters was known as the Book of the Covenant.

² 'In the same guise'; the Latin here translates as if it were a question of the slave's clothing. But the meaning of the Hebrew text is, that if the slave entered service all by himself, he is to leave it all by himself; and so also in verse 4.

³ 'Before the judgement-seat'; literally, 'before the gods', perhaps meaning 'before the judges'; cf. Ps. 81. 6.

⁷ 'She herself lives', 'if her death follows'; in the Hebrew text, 'no harm is done', 'if harm follows'.

⁸ Cf. Mt. 5. 38.

25 If thou dost lend money to some poorer neighbour among my people, thou shalt not drive him hard as extortioners do, or burden him with usury. If thou takest thy neighbour's garment for a pledge, thou shalt give it back to him by set of sun; it is all he has to cover himself with, his body's protection, all he has to sleep under. He has but to cry for redress, and I, the ever merciful, will listen to him.

28 Thou shalt not revile the powers above thee, or speak ill of him who rules thy people.¹

29 There must be no delay in paying tithes and first-fruits. Thou shalt make me an offering of the first son that is born to thee, and with thy oxen and sheep thou shalt do the like; for seven days the dam may keep her first-born, after that it must be offered to me.

31 You are to be men marked out for my service. Meat that has once been tasted by wild beasts shall not be used for food; it must be thrown to the dogs.

23 Never must thou take up a false cry, or join hands with the guilty by giving false witness in their favour.

2 Never must thou follow with the crowd in doing wrong, or be swayed by many voices so as to give false judgement; even pity for the poor must not sway thee when judgement is to be given.²

4 If thou hast an enemy, and findest his ox or his ass going astray, take it back to him. Here is one that hates thee, and his ass has fallen under its burden; do not pass by, help him to lift it up.

6 Do not give false judgement when the cause of the poor is tried. Keep clear of untruth. Do not bring death on an innocent man that has justice on his side; I give no countenance to the wrong-doer. Beware of accepting bribes; they blind even the prudent, and disturb the judgement even of just men. Do not oppress the alien; you know what it is to be an alien, since you yourselves were exiles in the land of Egypt.

For six years together thou mayst sow thy land, and gather the crop from it; in the seventh year leave it alone, to lie fallow, and give thy poorer neighbours food; all that is left, the wild beasts may eat. And thou shalt do the like with thy vineyard and thy oliveyard. For six days together thou shalt do the tasks thou hast to do, and on the seventh leave off working; so shall ox and ass of thine have rest, home-born slave and alien that works for thee revive their spirits.

Observe all these commandments of mine, and never take an oath by the names of alien gods, or let such names be heard on your lips.

Thrice a year keep holiday in my honour. There is the feast of unleavened bread to be observed; for seven days, in the first month of spring, the month of thy rescue from Egypt, thou shalt eat unleavened bread in obedience to my command. Then thou shalt present thyself before me with gifts.³ And there is the feast of harvest, when the fields thou hast sown reward thy labour with first-fruits; and another feast at the end of the year, when the last of thy crops has been gathered in. Thrice, then, in the year all thy men folk must present themselves before the Lord thy God.

When thou offerest living things in sacrifice to me, the bread that goes with them shall not be leavened, nor shalt thou leave the fat of my victims unconsumed till the morrow.

The first-fruits of thy land must be brought to the house of the Lord thy God.

Seething a kid in its dam's milk is a rite forbidden thee.⁴

And now I am sending my angel to go before thee and guard thee on thy way, and lead thee to the place I have made ready for thee. Give him good heed, and listen to his bidding; think not to treat him with neglect. He will not overlook thy faults, and in him dwells the power of my name. If thou wilt listen to his warnings, and do all I bid thee, then thy enemies

² Literally, this verse reads 'And thou shalt not pity (in the Hebrew text, adorn) the poor man in his judgement'. Some think that there is an error of transcription, which has changed the word 'great' into the word 'poor', a difference of only one letter in the Hebrew. Cf. Lev. 19. 15.

man or woman, it shall be stoned, and he too shall be put to death, unless a fine is imposed on him instead; if so, he shall pay whatever ransom is demanded for his life. The parents shall have the same claim upon him, whether it be a son or daughter of theirs the ox has gored; if it has attacked man-servant or woman-servant, the owner must pay thirty silver pieces, and the ox must be stoned. If a man who has opened an old well, or is digging a new one, does not cover it up, and ox or ass falls into it, the owner of the well shall pay the full value of the beasts; the carcase he may keep for himself. If one man's ox is wounded by another's, and dies of it, they shall sell the live ox and share the price of it, dividing the carcase of the dead ox between them; unless it has been known for some time past that the live ox was using its horns, and the owner has not kept it under control. If so, he shall restore ox for ox, and keep the whole carcase for himself.

22 The man who steals ox or sheep and slaughters or sells it, must make restitution at the rate of five oxen for one, and four sheep for one.

² When a thief is caught breaking into a house, or digging under the walls of it, the man who deals him a fatal wound is not guilty of murder, unless the deed was done after sun-rise. If the sun be risen, there is murder done, and life must pay for life.¹

The thief who has no money to make restitution with, must himself be sold as a slave.

⁴ If something stolen, ox or ass or sheep, is found alive in the possession of the thief, he shall make restitution twofold.

⁷ Where money or goods entrusted to a friend's keeping have been stolen, the thief, if he is found, must make twofold restitution. If he cannot be found, the owner of the house where they lay in keeping shall be brought before the judgement-seat.² He must swear that he laid no hands on his neighbour's property with malicious intent. Be there a loss of ox or ass or sheep or clothing or any other kind of property, the two parties shall come before the judgement-seat, and the defendant, if he is found guilty, shall make twofold restitution. If a man entrusts his neighbour with ass or ox or sheep or any other beast for safe keeping, and it is killed or wounded or carried off by enemies, with no witness to the fact, the matter shall be settled by an oath, which the owner shall accept, that the other did not lay hands on his property; there is no restitution to be made. But where the loss is due to theft, the owner shall be compensated. If it has been killed by a wild beast, the carcase must be brought before the owner, and no amends made. Where a man has borrowed any such beast of his neighbour, and it is maimed or killed in the owner's absence, compensation must be made to him; but not if the owner himself was present, and especially if hire was being paid for the work the beast did.

One who seduces a virgin not yet betrothed, and beds with her, must give her a dowry and marry her, unless the father will not give her in marriage; then amends must be made, equivalent to the dowry which a virgin customarily receives.

Sorcerers³ must not be allowed to live. The man who is guilty of bestiality must pay for it with his life. Sacrifice is for the Lord alone; he who offers it to other gods must be put to death.

There must be no harrying or oppression of the aliens that dwell among you; time was when you too dwelt as aliens in the land of Egypt. You must not wrong the widow and the orphan; wronged, they will cry out to me for redress, and their cry will be heard. My anger will blaze out against you, and I will smite you with the sword, making widows of your own wives, orphans of your own children.

shall find an enemy in me, and those who shew thee no mercy shall find me merciless. So this angel of mine will go on before thee, leading thee on into the land of Amorrhite and Hethite, Perezite and Chanaanite, Hevite and Jebusite; and all these I will destroy. Do not bow down to their gods and worship them, or follow their customs; sweep them away, and break down their monuments. All your loyalty must be for the Lord your God. So I will enrich thee with the bread and the water thou needest, and keep sickness far away from thy company; there shall be no unfruitfulness in thy land, no barrenness; and I will grant thee a full span of days.

I mean to make the fear of me go in front of thee, bringing destruction upon the whole people thou goest to meet; all thy enemies shall turn their backs before thee. I will send in hornets first, to make cowards of Hevite and Chanaanite and Hethite before ever thou goest in. Only I will not drive them out before thee all in one year; that would make a wilderness of the land, and the wild beasts in it would multiply, to thy harm. I will make them yield little by little before thy onset, so that thou wilt have time to increase, and populate the land. The frontiers I give thee are the Red Sea and the sea of the Philistines, the desert and the river Euphrates.¹ All the inhabitants of the land shall be at your mercy, and I will drive them out before you. Thou shalt make no treaty with them, nor with their gods. They must not share thy territory, or they would persuade thee to commit sin against me, by worshipping their gods; no doubt of it, they will ensnare thee.

24 Then Moses was told, Do thou and Aaron and Nadab and Abiu, with seventy elders of Israel, come up to meet the Lord, and worship from afar.
 2 Only Moses must enter the Lord's presence, the rest are not to draw near, and none of the people are to come up with him. So Moses went and told the people all the Lord had said, all the commands he had given; and the whole people answered with one voice, We will do all that the Lord has bidden us. Then Moses committed everything the Lord had said to writing; and when he rose next morning, he built an altar close to the spurs of the mountain, and twelve memorial stones answering to the twelve tribes of Israel. And he directed some of the younger Israelites to make burnt-sacrifice there and bring welcome-offerings to the Lord, with bullocks for their victims. After this Moses took half of the blood, and set it aside in bowls; the other half he poured out on the altar. Then he took up the book in which the covenant was inscribed, and read it aloud to the people. We will do all the Lord has bidden us, said they; we promise obedience; and Moses took the blood and sprinkled it over the people, crying out, Here is the blood of the covenant which the Lord makes with you, in accordance with all these words of his.²

Then Moses and Aaron, Nadab and Abiu, and seventy of the elders of Israel went up the mountain, and had a vision of his God of Israel, with a pavement about his feet that might have been made of sapphire, bright as the fashioning of the heavens. There they stood, far removed from the rest of Israel, and the hand of the Lord never smote them down; they had sight of him, and lived to eat and drink like mortal men.³ And the Lord said to Moses, Come up to the mountain and abide with me there; I have still to give thee tablets of stone on which I have written down the law and the commandments thou art to teach them. At that, Moses rose up, and his servant Josue with him; and Moses, as he began climbing God's mountain, said to the elders, Wait here till we come back to you. You have Aaron and Hur with you; to them refer all matters of dispute. When Moses had gone, the mountain was veiled in cloud; for six days the glory of the Lord abode there on Sinai, wrapping it in cloud,

¹ The frontiers indicated seem to represent the southern, western, eastern and northern frontiers of the Jewish territory, in that order (the upper reaches of the Euphrates being north of Syria). ² Mt. 26. 28; Heb. 9. 19. ³ Literally, 'Nor did he lay his hand upon those of the children of Israel who had withdrawn far away; and they saw God, and ate and drank'. It is possible to understand this phrase as referring to the main body of the Israelites, who had remained at the foot of the mountain, cf. Ex. 32. 6. But this is not the sense of the Hebrew text, which alludes (most probably) to the 'leading men among the children of Israel'.

and on the seventh day, from the heart of 17 that darkness, the Lord called to him. To the Israelites, as they looked upon it, this glory of the Lord wore the semblance of a fire, burning there on the summit of the 18 mountain. So Moses climbed higher up the mountain, into the heart of the cloud;
 for forty days and forty nights the mountain was his home.

25 And now the Lord gave Moses 2 this message, Bid the Israelites bring me gifts in kind, each man offering what his heart prompts him to offer, for 3 your acceptance. And these are the gifts you will declare to be acceptable, gold, 4 silver and bronze; threads of blue and purple and scarlet twice-dyed, and lawn, 5 and goats' hair, and rams' fleeces dyed red, 6 and skins dyed violet;¹ acacia wood, and oil to feed lamps, spices for the anointing-7 oil, and sweet-smelling incense; onyx-stones, too, and jewels, to be set in the 8 priestly mantle and burse. I mean them to build me a sanctuary, so that I can dwell 9 among them; this tabernacle-dwelling itself and the appurtenances to be used in it must be of the pattern which I will now show thee. Listen, then, to the fashion of it.

10 Make me an ark of acacia wood, two and a half cubits long, with a breadth and height 11 of one and a half cubits. Give it a covering and a lining of pure gold, and put a coping 12 of gold all round the top of it; a ring of gold, too, at each of the four corners, two 13 on either of the flanks. Then make poles 14 of acacia wood, gilded over, and pass them through the rings on the sides of the ark, 15 so as to carry it; these poles are to remain 16 in the rings, never taken out. In this ark thou wilt enshrine the written law I mean to give thee.

17 Make a throne,² too, of pure gold, two and a half cubits long, one and a half cubits 18 broad, and two cherubs of pure beaten 19 gold for the two ends of this throne, one 20 to stand on either side of it; with their wings outspread to cover the throne, guardians of the shrine. They are to face one another across the throne. And this 21 throne is to be the covering of the ark, and the ark's contents, the written law I mean to give thee. Thence will I issue my com-22 mands; from that throne of mercy, between the two cherubs that stand over the ark and its records,³ my voice shall come to thee, whenever I send word through thee to the sons of Israel.

Make a table, too, of acacia wood, two 23 cubits long, a cubit broad, and a cubit and a half in height; gild it with pure gold, and 24 make a rim of gold about its edge, with an embossed coping four inches high, and a 25 second coping of gold over that. Make four rings of gold, and fix them to the four 26 corners of the table, one by each leg of it.
 The rings must be below the coping, to 27 let poles pass through, that will carry the table; these poles too thou shalt make of 28 acacia wood, and gild them over; so the table shall be carried. So with the cups, 29 too, and the bowls, and the dishes,⁴ and the goblets for pouring out libations; all of them must be of pure gold. The table 30 is to hold the loaves of bread which are to be set out continually in my presence.

Make a lamp-stand, too, of pure beaten 31 gold, stem and branches, cups and bosses, and fleurs-de-lis that spring from them.⁵ Six branches are to come out of the stem, 32 three on each side; and on each branch 33 there are to be three cups shaped like almond-flowers, then a boss, then a fleur-de-lis, balanced by three cups and a boss and a fleur-de-lis on the opposite branch;
 such is to be the fashion of all the six branches that come out of the stem. But 34 the stem itself is to have four cups, shaped like almond-flowers, each with its boss and its fleur-de-lis; there will be six 35 branches altogether coming out of a single stem, and under each pair of them there will be an additional boss. The bosses and 36 the branches must be of a piece with the main stem, and all alike must be of pure beaten gold. Make seven lamps, too, and 37 mount them on the lamp-stand, so as to

¹ The word used in the Hebrew text is of uncertain significance, and may perhaps indicate the name of the animal whose skin is referred to. ² Literally, 'a place of atonement'; in the Latin it is also called 'the oracle' or shrine. This was evidently a kind of shelf or roof above the ark, regarded in some way as the focal point of the Divine Presence in the tabernacle.

³ Literally, 'the ark of the testimony'. Presumably the ark was so called as containing the tablets of the Law; the tabernacle itself is called the tabernacle of testimony, or record, in 27, 21 below. ⁴ Literally, in the Latin version, 'censers'.

⁵ 'Fleurs-de-lis'; in the Hebrew text simply 'flowers'. They were perhaps sockets spread out like open flowers to receive the seven lamps.

38 Even the snuffers, and the trays for the burnt wick, must be made of pure gold.

39 The whole weight of the lamp-stand, together with its appurtenances, must be a talent of pure gold.

40 Look well, and make everything in due accord with the pattern which has been shewn to thee on the mountain.

26 And this is how the tabernacle is to be fashioned. Make ten curtains of twisted linen thread, worked in threads of blue and purple and scarlet twice-dyed, with all the embroiderer's art.² All the curtains are to be of the same size, twenty-eight cubits in length and four in width. Five of these must be joined to each other, and then the remaining five in the same way; the sides, the extreme edges of the curtains must be fitted with loops of blue cord, to fasten one to the next, fifty loops at the edge of either set of curtains, so let in that loop meets loop and can be fastened to it. Then make fifty gold clasps, and join the two widths of curtain together, to make a single tent of them.³

7 Next, make eleven coverings of goats' hair, to protect the tapestry over the tabernacle. The measurements of all these coverings are to be the same; each will be thirty cubits long and four cubits wide. 8 Join together first five of the coverings, then the other six; the sixth of these is to hang double over the front of the tapestry. 9 Make fifty loops at the edge of the first set of coverings, then fifty at the edge of the other, to join them together, and fifty brazen clasps, to hold these loops together, so that the whole may form a single protecting roof. Since there is one more of these coverings than is needed for the protection of the tapestry, fold it double and use it to protect the back of the tabernacle. The coverings are a cubit longer on the north and south than the tapestry, and this additional cubit will hang down, to protect the tabernacle itself on either side. Then make another canopy over the roof, of rams' fleeces dyed red, and yet another, of skins dyed violet.⁴

Then make upright frames of acacia wood to support the tabernacle. Each must be ten cubits high, and a cubit and a half wide; and at the sides of it, two tenon-pieces must jut out, so that each frame can be mortised to the next; all the frames are to be made in this manner.⁵ Twenty of these will be on the south, facing the midday sun, with forty silver sockets, two at the foot of each frame, close to the corners; and twenty more on the opposite side, that looks northwards; these again will have forty silver sockets, two at the foot of each frame. And for the western end of the tabernacle there will be six frames, and two in addition, which must be set up in the corners at the extreme end of the tabernacle.⁶ All these will be joined together, from bottom to top, with a single kind of fastening to hold them all; the two frames which are to be set up in the corners will be joined in the same way as the others.⁷ Thus there will be eight frames

² According to the Hebrew text, here and in verse 31 but not in verse 36, the embroidery was a pattern of cherubim.

⁵ The Latin version evidently thinks of the frames as mortised to one another; some interpret the Hebrew text as meaning that each frame consisted of two uprights joined together by cross-pieces. ⁶ The six frames give a width of nine cubits, where ten cubits are required. It seems natural to suppose that the gap was filled by the two frames mentioned in verse 23. These may have had a width of nine inches instead of eighteen; or they may have jutted out to north and south of the building; or they may have been put in a slanting position (so as to face north-west and south-west respectively) by way of joining the west end to the north and south sides—a need for which no provision is made in the text. Some think they acted as lean-to buttresses at the west end, but (i) the mention of sockets suggests that they stood perpendicular, and (ii) it is difficult in that case to see what filled the gap in the western wall; we can hardly suppose that the frames on the north and south sides were nine inches thick.

⁷ The Latin text here differs considerably from the Hebrew, which is too obscure to admit of any certain interpretation.

in all, with sixteen silver sockets, two to each frame.

26 Then make five poles of acacia wood, to hold the frames together on one side of 27 the tabernacle, and five more to hold it together on the other side, and the same 28 number for the western end; these will be passed right along the frames from end to 29 end.¹ Gild the frames themselves, and furnish them with gold rings, by which the poles can hold the frames together; these 30 poles, too, must be plated with gold. So must thou set up the tabernacle, in conformity with the pattern that has been shewn to thee on the mountain.

31 Make a veil, too, out of twisted linen thread, worked in threads of blue and purple and scarlet twice-dyed, with all the embroiderer's art, and let it hang down from four posts of acacia wood, gilded and with gilt capitals,² but set in silver sockets.
32 This veil will be held up by rings. The ark is to be set down behind it, and thus it will be a division between the sanctuary and the inner sanctuary. The throne, too, which rests above the ark and its records, 33 will be in the inner sanctuary; on the outer side of the veil, the table will stand on the north, and the lamp-stand on the south side of the tabernacle, opposite the table.

34 Make a screen, too, out of twisted linen thread, embroidered with threads of blue and purple and scarlet twice-dyed, for the 35 entrance of the tabernacle; it must hang from five gilded posts of acacia wood, with gilt capitals and sockets of bronze.

27 Make an altar, too, of acacia wood, with a surface five cubits square, and a height of three cubits. It must have horns at the corners, all of a piece with it, and it must be plated with 2 bronze. Provide it with ash-pans, tongs, forks, and braziers, making all its appurtenances of bronze; and make a bronze 3 grating, of network, with bronze rings at its four corners, sunk in the hearth³ of the altar; this grating must reach to half 4 the altar's height. Then make two poles of acacia wood, plated with bronze, which 5 can be put through the rings on either side of the altar, so as to carry it. The altar is 6 not to be made solid, but to have a hollow space within, after the manner shewn thee on the mountain.

7 Make a court, too, round the tabernacle.
8 At the south side of this, towards the mid-day sun, there will be hangings made of twisted linen thread, a hundred cubits long on this side, and twenty posts, each 9 with its socket made of bronze, its engraved capital of silver.⁴ So, too, on the 10 north side, hangings a hundred feet long, twenty posts with bronze sockets and engraved silver capitals. On the short side, 11 westwards, the line of hangings will be only fifty cubits long, and there will be only ten posts in ten sockets. The side 12 which looks eastward will also be fifty cubits in length; of these, fifteen at one 13 end will be protected by a line of hangings fifteen cubits long, with three posts and as many sockets, and there will be fifteen 14 cubits' length of hangings, with three posts and as many sockets, at the other end too; in between, at the gateway of the 15 court, there will be hangings of twisted linen thread, embroidered with threads of blue and purple and scarlet twice-dyed, 16 twenty cubits in length; these will have four posts, and as many sockets. All the 17 posts of the court must be plated with silver, and have capitals of silver, and sockets of bronze. Thus the court will 18 occupy a space a hundred cubits long and fifty wide, and the enclosure, of twisted 19 linen thread with bronze sockets underneath, will be five cubits in height.

All the appurtenances the tabernacle 20 needs for its various purposes and ceremonies, and all the pegs for making the enclosure and the tabernacle itself fast, must be made of bronze.

Bid the Israelites supply thee with olive 21 oil, pure as when the pestle brayed it, so that there may be a lamp burning perpetually in the tabernacle that bears record 22 of me,⁵ before the veil that hides the place

of record. Aaron and his sons are to set it out there, so that it may burn in the Lord's presence till daybreak. This is a custom the Israelites are to observe in every generation.

28 And now, that I may have priests to serve me among the sons of Israel, summon thy brother Aaron, with his sons, Nadab, Abiu, Eleazar and Ithamar, to thy presence. Thou shalt have sacred vestments made for thy brother Aaron, to his honour and adornment, bidding all those cunning workmen, whose art is the gift of my spirit, so clothe him as to set him apart for my service. And these are the vestments they shall make; a burse, a mantle, a tunic, a pleated robe, a mitre, and a girdle. Such sacred vestments must be made for thy brother Aaron and his sons, before they can minister as my priests.

The workmen must provide themselves with gold, with threads of blue and purple and scarlet twice-dyed, and with linen thread. Of gold, of blue and purple and scarlet twice-dyed, and of twisted linen thread, the mantle is to be made, all embroidered work. At the top, on either side, it shall have the two shoulder-pieces joined together so as to make one garment. The whole of its embroidered texture shall be of gold, blue, purple, scarlet twice-dyed, and twisted linen thread.¹ Then thou shalt take two onyx-stones, and inscribe them with the names of Israel's twelve sons, six on one stone and six on the other, in the order of their birth; and these stones, graven with all the skill of the gem-carver, and set in clasps of gold, thou shalt let into the mantle, one on either side, to perpetuate the memory of Israel's sons. Aaron shall carry those names on his two shoulders, when he goes into the Lord's presence, and so remind him of them.

Then make two golden hooks, and two chains of pure gold, with closely fitted links, which thou wilt fasten to the hooks. And make a burse,² from which thou wilt take counsel; it is to be of the same texture as the mantle itself, embroidered work of gold, and threads of blue and purple and scarlet twice-dyed, and twisted linen threads. It is to be made double, and either part of it square, a palm's length by a palm's breadth. And thou shalt set in it four rows of stones; in the first row will be a sardius, a topaz, and an emerald; in the second, a carbuncle, a sapphire, and a jasper-stone; in the third, a jacinth, an agate, and an amethyst; in the fourth, a chrysolite, an onyx-stone, and a beryl; each row is to be set in gold. And they will contain the names of the sons of Israel, each stone being engraved with the name of one of the twelve tribes, in their order.

The burse, then, must have two chains of pure gold, their links closely fitted, and two rings of gold, attached to its two edges; with these two rings at the edges thou wilt couple the two chains, making fast the other ends of the chains to the two hooks, which will be fixed on either side of the mantle, where it faces towards the burse. Then make two gold rings, which must be attached to the edges of the burse, to that part of its lining which looks towards the mantle, that is, inwards; and two other gold rings, which must be attached to either side of the mantle underneath, facing the lower point where burse meets mantle, so that the two can be tied together. Thou shalt use blue cords to make the rings of the burse fast to the rings of the mantle; thus the two will be joined in a workmanlike fashion, and will never come apart. And whenever Aaron goes into the sanctuary, he will carry on his breast, on the burse that gives counsel, the names of Israel's sons, putting the Lord in mind of them eternally.³

And within the burse that gives counsel thou wilt put the touchstones of wisdom

¹ According to the Hebrew text, this refers, not to the mantle itself but to the band which was a part of it.

² The significance of the Hebrew word used here is quite uncertain, but the context suggests a kind of pouch or wallet. 'From which thou wilt take counsel'; it is clear from various references that in some way the burse was used for the taking of omens, by a system providentially prearranged, when difficult decisions were to be made; hence it is called 'the burse of judgement'. Cf. note on verse 30. The precious stones named in the verses which follow cannot be identified with certainty.

and of truth.¹ These shall be on Aaron's breast, when he enters the Lord's presence; as long as he is there, he will be carrying on his breast the arbitrament of the sons of Israel.

29 And there is more for thee to do, before they can be my consecrated priests. Choose a bullock out of the herd, and two rams without blemish. Then make unleavened bread, and unleavened pastry baked with oil, and unleavened cakes soaked in oil, all of pure wheat flour, and put them in a basket ready to be offered up. The bullock and the two rams thou shalt drive to the door of the tabernacle which bears record of me. Thither, too, thou shalt bring Aaron and his sons; and when thou hast washed them, father and sons in water, clothe Aaron in his vestments, the robe, the tunic, the mantle, and the burse made fast to his mantle's band, and put the mitre on his head, and the holy plate over the mitre. And then anoint his head with oil; so shall he be consecrated. Then it is the turn of his sons to approach, and be clothed in their linen robes, and have their girdles tied and their mitres put on, like Aaron himself; so they shall be my priests, hallowed eternally.

When thou hast consecrated their hands, bring out the bullock in front of the tabernacle that bears record of me; there, when Aaron and his sons have laid their hands upon its head, thou shalt slay it in the Lord's presence, at the tabernacle door. Some of its blood thou shalt smear, with thy hand, upon the horns of the altar; the rest thou shalt pour out at the altar's foot. Then take all the fat about its entrails, the membrane of its liver, and the two kidneys with the fat on them and offer them as a burnt-sacrifice on the altar; the flesh, skin and dung of the bullock thou shalt burn beyond the confines of the camp, as an offering for sin.

Take one of the rams, too, and bid Aaron and his sons lay their hands upon its head; then kill it, and pour out some of its blood round the altar. Cut up the ram itself into pieces; put these and the head underneath, the entrails (when thou hast washed them) and the feet above, and so make a burnt-sacrifice of the whole ram upon the altar; the scent of the victim so offered to the Lord will find acceptance

¹ Literally 'the Doctrine and the Truth'. In the Hebrew text, the words used are of doubtful significance; the former probably means 'lights'. Some think the precious stones enumerated above afforded omens, e.g., by their brightness or dullness; others, that the pouch contained sacred objects, not further specified, which were used for the same purpose. Cf. Num. 27. 21; I Kg. 14. 41 and note.

19 with him. Then take the other ram, Aaron and his sons laying their hands on its head 20 meanwhile; and when thou hast killed this ram, put some of the blood on the tip of Aaron's right ear, the thumb of his right hand, and the great toe of his right foot, and do the same by his sons. Pour blood, 21 too, all round the surface of the altar, and then sprinkle with this, and with the oil used for anointing, Aaron and his sons, and the vestments they wear.

22 So hallowing all alike, take the fat, the tail, the covering of the entrails, the membrane of the liver, the two kidneys with the fat on them, and the right shoulder from this ram, the victim of their consecration; take a loaf of bread, too, a piece of pastry cooked in oil, and one of the cakes, out of the basket that lies there 24 before the Lord; and put all this in the hands of Aaron and his sons. Then raise it aloft in the Lord's presence, and by that act they shall be consecrated, Aaron and 25 his sons both. Then take all the offerings out of their hands again, and make a burnt-sacrifice of them upon the altar; the scent of them will be acceptable to the Lord, in 26 whose honour they are offered up. The breast of the ram that is used in Aaron's hallowing thou shalt remove, and sanctify it by holding it up in the Lord's presence; this shall be thy own share.¹

27 Thou shalt set apart this consecrated breast and shoulder, taken from the ram 28 by which Aaron and Aaron's line are hallowed, to be their lot, a fixed privilege the people of Israel will grant to them; these are the earnest and the first-fruits of those welcome-offerings which they make to the 29 Lord. The sacred vestments which Aaron wore shall be worn by his sons after him when they are anointed and consecrated;
30 whatever son of his shall succeed him, entering the tabernacle that bears record of me and ministering before me in the sanctuary, shall wear them for seven days 31 continuously. As for the ram with which they were hallowed, it must be taken away 32 and cooked in a holy place; and so Aaron and his sons will eat it. They, too, will eat the bread from the basket, in the porch of 33 the tabernacle that bears record of me, so that the sacrifice of it may atone for them, and their hands be hallowed by the offering of it; these things are too holy to be eaten by anyone not of their family. Whatever 34 remains till morning of the consecrated meat or bread must be burnt in the fire; it is too holy to be eaten. All this that I 35 have told thee must be done to Aaron and his sons; thou art to spend seven days in consecrating their hands, and on each of those days a bullock must be sacrificed as a sin-offering to atone for them. So offering a victim to make atonement, thou wilt 36 cleanse the altar, and sanctify it by anointing. Seven whole days thou must spend 37 in winning favour for the altar and consecrating it; so it shall be all holiness, and whoever touches it shall become holy thereby.

On this altar thou shalt sacrifice two 38 lambs day by day, with no intermission; one is to be offered in the morning, the 39 other in the evening. One lamb each morning, with a tenth of a bushel of flour, 40 kneaded in three pints of pure oil, and as much wine for a libation; and another 41 offered in the evening with the same rite and all the additional offerings aforesaid, a fragrance acceptable to the Lord. This 42 is his sacrifice, to be performed day after day, by one generation of you after another, in the Lord's presence, there at the door of the tabernacle that bears record, the appointed place where I will give thee 43 audience. There I will issue my commands to the sons of Israel; that altar shall be hallowed by my glorious presence.
44 Hallowed it shall be, and hallowed the tabernacle that bears record of me; hallowed shall Aaron be and his sons, for their 45 priestly office. And I will dwell in the midst of the Israelites, and be their God; and they shall know me for the Lord God 46 that rescued them from the land of Egypt, so as to abide among them, their Lord and their God.

30 For burning incense, thou shalt 2 make an altar of acacia wood, a cubit square in surface, and two cubits high; it must have horns going out of it.
3 The whole must be covered with pure gold, the grate and the walls around it and the horns too. It is to have a rim of gold

¹ The special privilege here granted to Moses was to belong in future (verse 28) to the high-priestly family. In the Hebrew text there is some doubt about the meaning of verse 28.

4 about it, and close under the rim two gold rings on either side, with poles in them, 5 so that the altar can be carried; these poles, too, must be of acacia wood, gilded over.
6 Its position is to be facing the veil that hides the ark and its records, facing, too, 7 the throne that overshadows them, my trysting-place with thee. Aaron, when he 8 trims the lamps each morning, shall burn fragrant incense on it, and again when he lights them at evening he shall burn incense in the Lord's presence; a custom 9 you are to preserve age after age. You are to offer no incense there but what is of my own prescription; there is to be no sacrifice, no victim, no pouring of libations.
10 Once a year Aaron shall make intercession at the horns of it, with the blood that is offered in atonement for sin, winning pardon for you there, age after age; it shall be all holiness in the Lord's honour.

1 This, too, was the Lord's word to 2 Moses: When thou dost pass the Israelites in review and count their number, each shall pay the Lord a forfeit for his life, to avert all plague at the time of their num-3 bering.¹ As each man is added to the count, he must pay half a sicle by sanctuary reckoning (note that the sicle, half of 4 which must be paid to the Lord, is worth thirty pence). The forfeit must be paid by all those, above the age of twenty, who are 5 registered, the rich giving no more than half a silver piece, and the poor no less.
6 The money taken up in this contribution from the Israelites is to be devoted to the needs of the tabernacle which bears record of me, to put the Lord in mind of them, and win ransom for their lives.

7 This, too, was the Lord's word to 8 Moses: Make a washing-basin of bronze, with a stand, and set it between the tabernacle that bears record of me and the 9 brazen altar. Water shall be poured into it for Aaron and his sons to wash their hands 10 and feet before they enter the tabernacle that bears record of me, or approach the 11 altar to kindle their sacrifice before the Lord. This they must do on pain of death;

it is an observance that must be kept alive by him and by all his sons that succeed him.

This, too, was the Lord's word to 22 Moses: Provide thyself with spices, a stone 23 of the best and choicest² myrrh, and half a stone of cinnamon, and half a stone of scented cane, a stone, too, of cassia, all 24 reckoned by sanctuary weights; and with these, three quarts of olive oil. And so 25 make the holy oil to be used for anointing, an ointment mixed with all the perfumer's art. This thou must use to anoint the tabernacle that bears record of me, and the ark where that record lies; the table with its 27 appurtenances, the lamp-stand with its appurtenances, the altar used for incense, and that used for burnt-sacrifice, and all 28 the instruments belonging to them.³ All 29 these thou shalt sanctify, and they shall be all holiness; whoever touches them shall become holy thereby. Aaron himself and 30 his sons thou shalt anoint and hallow, before they can minister as my priests.

This, too, tell the Israelites: The oil 31 used for anointing is a thing you must keep set apart for me, age after age. It is not 32 to be used for anointing the flesh of man; nor are you to compound oil for yourselves as this is compounded; it is a thing set apart, and you must keep it holy. Whoever 33 compounds such, though it be to give it to a stranger for his use, is lost to his people.⁴

This, too, was the Lord's word to 34 Moses: Provide thyself with spices, storax, and burnt shell, and sweet-smelling galbanum, and pure frankincense, all in equal weight, and make incense compounded 35 with all the perfumer's art, well tempered together, unadulterate, fit for hallowing.
All this thou shalt beat into fine powder, 36 and keep a store of it before the tabernacle that bears record of me, my trysting-place with thee. For you, this incense shall be 37 all holiness; you must not compound it so for your own use, it is set apart for the Lord. Whoever compounds the like, to 38 make perfume for his own enjoyment, is lost to his people.

¹ Cf. II Kg. 24. ² The word used in the Hebrew text seems to mean 'liquid', although the reckoning is made by weight. The figures here only correspond roughly with those in the original, which are besides uncertain; some think that the weight was twice that here indicated. ³ The Hebrew text adds at the end, 'and the basin and its stand'. ⁴ This appears to be the sense of the Latin; the Hebrew text is more naturally interpreted as meaning 'The man who either makes oil like this, or gives away this oil to a stranger'. The stranger, in that case, would be anyone not of the priestly family, as in 29. 33 above.

31 And now the Lord said to Moses, 2 Here is the name of the man I have singled out to help thee, Beseleel, son of Uri, son of Hur, of the tribe of Juda.
 3 I have filled him with my divine spirit, making him wise, adroit, and skilful in 4 every kind of craftsmanship; so that he can design whatever is to be designed in 5 gold, silver, and bronze, carve both stone 6 and jewel, and woods of all sorts. I have found a partner for him in Oóliab, son of Achisamech, of the tribe of Dan; and I have inspired the hearts of all the craftsmen with skill to carry out the commands 7 which I have given thee. The tabernacle which attests my covenant,¹ the ark that bears record of me, the throne above it, 8 and all the appurtenances of the tabernacle, the table with its appurtenances, the lamp-stand of pure gold and all that goes 9 with it, the altar for incense and the altar for burnt-sacrifice, and all that goes with 10 these, the basin and its stand, the sacred vestments to be worn by the high priest Aaron and his sons when they perform 11 their holy office, the oil for anointing, and the incense that is to perfume the sanctuary, all that I have bidden thee make,
 shall be made through their workmanship.
 12 This, too, was the Lord's word to 13 Moses: Give the sons of Israel a warning from me, Be sure that you observe the sabbath day.² It is a token between us, that is to last all through the ages which lie before you, reminding you that I am the Lord, and you are set apart for me.
 14 Keep my sabbath; it has a binding claim on you, on pain of death for all who violate it. The man who does any work on that 15 day is lost to his people. You have six days to work in; the seventh is the sabbath, a day of rest set apart for the Lord, and if anybody works on that day, his life must 16 pay for it. It is for the sons of Israel to observe my sabbath and honour it among themselves, age after age. It is an undying 17 covenant, a perpetual token between me and the Israelites; the Lord spent six days making heaven and earth, and on the seventh he rested from his labours.
 18 Then, at the end of all this converse with Moses on mount Sinai, the Lord gave him two stone tablets, with laws inscribed on them by the very finger of God.

32 Meanwhile, finding that Moses' return from the mountain was so long delayed, the people remonstrated with Aaron. Bestir thyself, they said; fashion us gods, to be our leaders. We had a man to lead us, this Moses, when we came away from Egypt; but there is no saying what has become of him. Take out the gold ear-rings, said Aaron, that your wives and sons and daughters wear, and bring them to me. The people, then, brought him their ear-rings as he had bidden them, and he melted down what they had given him and cast them into the figure of a calf. And all cried out, Here are thy gods, Israel, the gods that rescued thee from the land of Egypt. Aaron, finding them so minded, built an altar in front of it, and bade the crier give out that there would be a solemn feast next day in the Lord's honour. So when they awoke on the morrow, they offered burnt-sacrifice and welcome-offerings; and with that, the people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to take their pleasure.

And now the Lord said to Moses, Away, down with thee; they have fallen into sin, this people thou didst bring out of Egypt with thee. They have been swift to leave the way thou didst mark out for them, by making a molten calf and falling down to worship it; brought victims to it, and cried out, Here are thy gods, Israel, the gods that rescued thee from the land of Egypt. And the Lord said to Moses, I know them now for a stiff-necked race; spare me thy importunacy, let me vent my anger and destroy them; I will make thy posterity into a great nation instead. But Moses would still plead with the Lord his God; What, Lord, said he, wilt thou vent thy anger on thy people, the people thou didst rescue from Egypt so imperiously, with so strong a hand? Wilt thou let the Egyptians say it was but a treacherous deliverance; that thou hadst marked them out for death, here in the mountains, and no trace left of them on earth? Oh let the storm of thy anger pass; pardon thy people's guilt! Remember thy servants Abraham, Isaac and Israel, and the oath thou didst swear by thy own name: I will make your posterity countless as the stars in heaven, and give them all this land of which I spoke to you, to be their everlasting home. So the Lord relented, and spared his people the punishment he had threatened.

With that, Moses came down from the mountain, carrying in his hand the two tablets of the law, with writing on either side, God's workmanship; a divine hand had traced the characters they bore. And now, as the noise of shouting reached him, Josue said to Moses, I hear the cry of battle in the camp. No, said he, this is no sound of triumph or of rout; it is the sound of singing that I hear. Then they drew nearer the camp, and he saw the calf standing there, and the dancing. And so angry was he that he threw down the tablets he held, and broke them against the spurs of the mountain; then he took the calf they had made and threw it on the fire, and beat it into dust; this dust he sprinkled over water, which he made the Israelites drink. And he asked Aaron, What harm has this people done thee, that thou hast involved them in such guilt? Do not be angry with me, my lord, said he; thou knowest how the whole bent of this people is towards wrong-doing, and it was they who said to me, Fashion us gods to be our leaders. We had a man to lead us, this Moses, when we came away from Egypt, but there is no saying now what has become of him. So I asked them, Which of you has any gold in his possession? And they brought what they had, and gave it to me; I cast it into the fire, and this calf was the issue of it.

Moses saw, too, that the people went all unarmed; Aaron had let them strip, in their shameless debauchery, so that they were defenceless against attack.¹ So he stood there at the gate of the camp, and said, Rally to my side, all that will take the Lord's part. Then the whole tribe of Levi gathered round them, and he said, A message to you from the Lord God of Israel. Gird on your swords, and pass to and fro through the middle of the camp, from gate to gate, killing your own brothers, your own friends, your own neighbours. So the sons of Levi did as Moses bade them, and that day some twenty-three thousand men fell slain. To-day, said Moses, at war with your own flesh and blood, you have dedicated your hands to the Lord's service, and earned his blessing.²

When the morrow came, Moses told the people, You have sinned heinously; I will go up into the Lord's presence, and see if I can make amends for your guilt. And so, having recourse to the Lord again, he prayed thus: Thy people have sinned heinously, in making themselves gods of gold. I entreat thee, pardon this offence of theirs; or else blot out my name too from the record thou hast written.³ Whoever sins against me, the Lord answered, shall be blotted out from my record. But do thou march on, and lead this people into the land I told thee of, and my angel shall still go before thee. But when the time comes for vengeance, this sin of theirs shall not be forgotten.

The Lord, then, made the people suffer for their wickedness in the matter of the calf Aaron made for them.⁴

33 And now a new message came to Moses from the Lord, March on, then, with the people thou hast led out of Egypt; make thy way hence to the land I promised Abraham, Isaac and Jacob should be the home of their race. I am

² Wherever the Old Testament records bloodthirsty actions done from zeal for the worship of God, we should remember (i) the barbarity of the times and (ii) the fact that God, under the imperfect revelation of the Old Covenant, did sometimes sanction conduct which, for more enlightened consciences, would be wrong. Hence we must not regard exploits like that of the Levites in this passage as worthy of imitation. According to the Hebrew text, the number of those killed was three thousand.

³ It does not seem probable that Moses refers here to the book of eternal life; if we understand him in that sense, he is perhaps giving rhetorical expression to the love he bears for his people. (Cf. note on Rom. 9. 3.) But the allusion is more probably to the register of God's people, mystically conceived as written down under his eye; cf. Mal. 3. 16.

⁴ It is not clear whether this refers to the events described in verses 27-29, or some other punishment not here specified.

ready to send an angel who will go before thee, so as to cast out Chanaanite, Amor-3 rite, Hethite, Pherezite, Hevite and Jebusite, and bring thee into the land that is all milk and honey. But I will not go with 4 thee myself, stiff-necked people as thou art, or I might be moved to destroy thee on the way.

4 The people, on hearing this bitter reproach, went mourning, and none wore 5 his ornaments, as custom bade; the Lord's word came through Moses to the Israelites,
 You are a stiff-necked people, and if once I set out on the march among you, I would be moved to destroy you. Take off, here and now, your ornaments, and wait till I 6 have resolved what to do with you. So there, at mount Horeb, the sons of Israel 7 laid their ornaments aside. Moses, too, removed his tent,¹ and pitched it far off, away from the camp, calling it, The tent which bears witness to the covenant; to this, all who had disputes to settle must betake themselves, away from the camp.
 8 And when Moses repaired to this tent of his, all the people rose up and stood at the doors of their own tents, following Moses 9 with their eyes till he went in. And, once he was within the tent that bore witness of the covenant, the pillar of cloud would come down and stand at the entrance of it, and there the Lord spoke with Moses, 10 while all watched the pillar of cloud standing there, and rose up and worshipped, 11 each at his own tent door. Thus the Lord spoke with Moses face to face, as a man speaks to his friend. And when he returned to the camp, Josue, son of Nun, the young man who served him, never left the tent unguarded.

12 Then Moses complained to the Lord, Thou biddest me lead this people on the march, but thou wilt not tell me who it is thou art sending me for my guide. And this is the man whom thou callest thy familiar friend,² assuring him of thy 13 favour! Nay, if indeed thou dost look upon me with favour, make thy own presence known to me; let me know thee, and know that thy favour is with me. Have more regard for this folk, thy own people.

 My presence, the Lord said, shall go before 14 thee, and bring thee to thy resting-place.
 It must be thyself, said Moses, going 15 before us; otherwise do not bid us leave the place where we are.³ How am I and 16 thy people to know that thou dost look upon us with favour, if thou wilt not journey with us; such a privilege as no other people in the world can boast? And 17 the Lord told Moses, I will grant this request of thine; such favour thou hast with me, thou, my familiar friend.

Give me, then, said Moses, the sight of 18 thy glory. And he answered, All my splen-19 dour shall pass before thy eyes, and I will pronounce, in thy presence, my own divine name, the name of the Lord who shews favour where he will, grants pardon where he will. But, my face, he said, thou canst 20 not see; mortal man cannot see me, and live to tell of it. Then he said, There is a 21 place here, close by me, where thou mayst stand on a rock; there I will station thee 22 in a cleft of the rock, while my glory passes by, and cover thee with my right hand until I have gone past. So, when I take my hand 23 away, thou shalt follow me with thy eyes, but my face thou canst not see.

34 After this the Lord said to him, Carve two tablets of stone, like those others, and I will write on them the same words as I wrote on the tablets thou didst break. Be ready to come up on to 2 mount Sinai in the morning, and there thou shalt stand before me on the moun-3 tain top. No one else is to climb up with thee, no one else is to be in sight on any part of the mountain; even the cattle and the sheep must not be allowed to graze within view. So Moses carved two tablets 4 of stone, like the others; and he rose at dawn and went up mount Sinai at the Lord's bidding, with the tablets in his hand. The Lord came down to meet him, 5 hidden in cloud, and Moses stood with him there, calling on the Lord's name.

² Literally, 'knowest by name'. So in verse 17, below. ³ In the Hebrew text of verse 13, Moses asks the Lord to make known not his presence, but 'his way'; it is difficult to see in what exact sense. Both in verse 14 and in verse 15, according to the Hebrew text, it is a question of God's 'face', or 'presence', going before Moses on his journey. The Latin, however, seems to distinguish between God's 'presence' (as if it were something which could be indirectly manifested), and his own personal nearness.

6 Thus the Lord passed by, and he cried out, It is the Lord God, the ruler of all things, the merciful, the gracious; slow to take vengeance, rich in kindness, faithful 7 to his promises. He is true to his promise of mercy a thousand times over; shame or sin or guilt is none but he forgives it; yet, before him, none can claim innocence in his own right, and when he punishes, the son must make amends for the father's guilt, to the third and the fourth generation.¹ Then, without more ado, Moses fell 8 prostrate with his face to the ground in 9 worship. Lord, he said, if thou dost look on me with favour, I entreat thee to go with us on our journey, stiff-necked as this people is; guilt of our sins do thou pardon, and keep us for thy own.

10 And the Lord answered, Here is my covenant, to which I am pledged. In the presence of you all I will do such marvels as were never yet seen on earth by any nation; the people among whom thou dwellest shall see for themselves what the Lord can do, and be terrified at the sight.
11 Thy part is to keep all the commandments I am now giving thee.

When I dispossess Amorrite, Chanaanite, Hethite, Pherezite, Hevite and 12 Jebusite at thy coming, make no treaty of friendship with any inhabitant of the land, 13 or it will be thy ruin; destroy their altars, break their images, cut down their forest
14 shrines.² Never pay worship to any alien god; the very name of the Lord bespeaks 15 jealous love, he will endure no rival. Do not ally yourselves, then, with those who dwell there; those faithless hearts will be set on their own gods, and when they do 16 sacrifice to their idols, someone will bid thee come and feast upon the meat so 17 offered. Nor must thou find wives for thy sons among their daughters; faithless themselves, they will make thy sons, too, faithless, and worshippers of their own gods. Cast no metal to make thyself idols.

¹ In the Latin version, it is Moses who cries aloud the Lord's name, and describes him in the terms of verses 6 and 7. But according to the Hebrew text, it is the Almighty who cries out his own name as he comes near, and verses 6 and 7 give the terms in which he does so. This is more in keeping with the promise made above (33. 19).

Observe the feast of unleavened bread.¹ For seven days, in the first month of spring, thou shalt eat thy bread without leaven, as I bade thee; it was in that spring month thou didst escape from Egypt.

The first male thing that comes from 19 every womb is forfeit to me; every such living thing, be it ox or ass, is mine by right. When an ass has her first foal, thou shalt offer a sheep in payment of its ransom; or, if thou hast no mind to ransom it, let it be killed. The first-born of thy own sons thou must ransom, presenting thyself 20 before me with an offering.

Thou hast six days to work in; on the 21 seventh, both ploughing and reaping must cease.

Thou shalt keep the feast of the seven 22 weeks, with the first-fruits of thy wheat harvest, and another feast at the end of the year, when all is gathered in. Thrice in 23 the year all thy men folk shall present themselves before the Lord, the almighty God of Israel. And so, when I have dispos-24 sessed the nations at thy coming, and given thee wide lands to dwell in, three times a year present thyself before the Lord thy God, and thy lands none shall invade by 25 treachery.

When thou offerest living things in 25 sacrifice to me, the bread that goes with them shall not be leavened, nor shalt thou leave any of the paschal victim till the 26 morrow.

Bring the first-fruits of thy land as an 26 offering to the house of the Lord thy God. Seething a kid in its dam's milk is a rite forbidden thee.

Then the Lord said to Moses, Put these 27 words in writing, as terms of the covenant I am making with thee and with Israel. So, for forty days and nights, without food 28 or drink, he remained there with the Lord; and he wrote down on the tablets the ten 29 precepts of the covenant.³ Moses came down, after this, from Mount Sinai, bearing with him the two tablets on which the law was written; and his face, although he did not know it, was all radiant¹ after the meeting at which he had held speech with 30 God. The sight of that radiance made Aaron and the sons of Israel shrink from all near approach to him; he must call out to Aaron and the leaders of the people before they would gather round him. To these he spoke first; then all the Israelites came to greet him, and he passed on to them all the commands he had received on 33 mount Sinai. When he had finished speaking, he put a veil over his face, which he only laid aside when he went into the Lord's presence and had speech with him. Afterwards he would come out, and tell the Israelites what commands had been 35 given him; so they saw his face, as he came out, still radiant, but always, when he spoke to them, he veiled his face as before.

35 And now he called the whole assembly of the Israelites into his presence, and told them, Here are the 2 Lord's commands. You have six days before you now to work in; when the seventh comes, you must keep it holy, since it is the sabbath, the Lord's day of rest; no one must do any work that day, 3 on pain of death, you must not even light a fire in any of your dwelling-places on the sabbath day. Then Moses went on to tell all the Israelites what prescriptions the 5 Lord had given him,² how they were to set apart contributions, to be offered to the Lord freely and with a ready heart; contributions of gold and silver and bronze, 6 threads of blue and purple and scarlet 7 twice-dyed, and lawn, and goats' hair, and rams' fleeces dyed red, and skins dyed 8 violet; acacia wood, and oil to feed lamps, spices for the anointing-oil, and sweet-smelling incense; onyx-stones, too, and 9 jewels, to be set in the priestly mantle and its burse.

10 If any of you is a skilled craftsman, he said, let him come forward to carry out the 11 Lord's bidding. There is a tabernacle to be made, with its covering and its canopy, rings and boards and poles and pegs and sockets; an ark with poles to carry it, a throne over it, and a veil to hang in front of it; a table with its poles and its appurtenances, bread, too, to be set forth there; a lamp-stand on which the lights are to rest, with its lamps and its other appurtenances, and oil to keep the light burning; an altar for offering incense, with its poles; oil for anointing, and incense made from spices; a screen for the tabernacle entrance; an altar for burnt-sacrifice, with its grating of bronze, its poles and other appurtenances; a basin with its stand; curtains for the court, with the posts they hang from and their sockets, a hanging for the door of the court, pegs and ropes to make fast both the tabernacle and its enclosure; the vestments that are worn in the service of the sanctuary, and those sacred vestments in which Aaron and his sons will perform their priestly office before the Lord.

No sooner had the sons of Israel left 20 Moses' presence, than all alike began making their contributions to the Lord, with readiness and devotion of heart, to help build the tabernacle that should bear record of him. Whatever was needed for the performance of worship, or for sacred vestments, men and women made haste to give; armlets and ear-pendants, rings and bracelets; all the gold ware they had was set apart to be given to the Lord. And whoever had thread of blue or purple or scarlet twice-dyed, lawn or goats' hair, rams' fleeces dyed red, or skins dyed violet, or silver, or bronze, offered them to the Lord; and acacia wood for all its manifold uses. There were women, too, skilled in spinning, who had their own contribution to make of blue, or purple, or scarlet, or lawn, or goats' hair, and made them of their own accord. It was the rulers who gave onyx-stones and jewels for the mantle and its burse, and the spices and oil for feeding the lamps, and preparing the ointment, and making the sweet-smelling incense. All alike, men and women, devoutly brought their gifts, so as to speed on the work which the Lord, through Moses, had enjoined on them; there was not one Israelite that did not freely consecrate his offerings to the Lord's service.

And now Moses said to the sons of Israel, Here is the name of the man the Lord

¹ Literally (in the Latin), 'his face was horned'. text in chapters 35-39 as in chapters 25-30.

² The Latin sometimes varies from the Hebrew has singled out to help me, Beseleel, son of Uri, son of Hur, of the tribe of Juda. The Lord has filled this man with his divine spirit, making him wise, adroit, and skilful in every kind of craftsmanship, so that he can design and execute whatever is needed, in gold, silver, bronze, and sculptured gems, and carpenter's work. All the craftsman's wit can discover the Lord has put into his heart. Here is Oöliab, too, son of Achisamech, of the tribe of Dan; both of these he has endowed with skill, to carry out woodwork, and tapestry, and embroidery, with threads of blue and purple and scarlet twice-dyed and lawn; the weaving shall be theirs, and they shall find out new devices.

36 And so the work was begun, by Beseleel, and Oöliab, and all the craftsmen to whom the Lord had given skill in their craft, so that they should know how to make workmanlike provision for the sanctuary's needs, according to the prescriptions the Lord had given. Moses summoned them, all these trained workmen who had been endowed by the Lord with skill, and had offered their services freely; and he handed over to them the contributions which the sons of Israel made. Eagerly they set about their work, and every morning the people brought their gifts, till at last the workmen must needs come to Moses, and tell him, The people are offering more than is needed. So Moses bade the crier give out that no man or woman should offer any more for the needs of the sanctuary; thus he put an end to the bringing of gifts, because the contribution had already given them enough and to spare.

So, to carry out the fashioning of the tabernacle, all these skilful workmen made ten curtains, of twisted linen thread, embroidered with threads of blue and purple and scarlet twice-dyed, all of the same size, twenty-eight cubits in length and four in width. Then Beseleel joined five of these to each other, and the remaining five in the same way. And on the sides of one set of curtains, at its extreme edge, he made loops of blue cord, and so with the other, so that loop could meet loop and be fastened to it. Afterwards he made fifty gold clasps, to catch the loops on the curtains, so as to make a single tent of them. Next, he made eleven coverings of goats' hair, to protect the tapestry over the tabernacle. The measurements of all these coverings were the same; each was thirty cubits long and four cubits wide. He joined together first five of these coverings, then the other six in their turn. And he made fifty loops at the edge of the first set of coverings, then fifty at the edge of the other, to join them together, and fifty brazen clasps, so that the coverings would be tied together, and the whole would form a single protecting roof. He made a canopy, too, over the tabernacle, of rams' fleeces dyed red, and another canopy over that of skins dyed violet.

He made upright frames, too, of acacia wood to support the tabernacle. Each board was ten cubits high, and had a width of a cubit and a half; and at the sides of it, two tenon-pieces jutted out, so that each might be mortised to the next; all the framework of the tabernacle he made in this way. Twenty frames were on the south, facing the midday sun, with forty silver sockets, two to each frame, fitting on each side at the corners, where the mortising finished. There were twenty frames, too, on the side of the tabernacle which looked north, with forty silver sockets, two to each frame. For the western side of the tabernacle, looking towards the sea, he made six frames, and two in addition, for the corners at the extreme end of the tabernacle. These were joined together, from bottom to top, with a single kind of fastening; it was the same with the corners at each side, so that altogether there were eight frames, with sixteen silver sockets, two at the foot of each.

Then he made five poles of acacia wood, to hold the frames together on one side of the tabernacle, and five more to connect the frames on the opposite side, and on the western side of the tabernacle, looking seawards, five more still. And one pole he made that should reach right along the frames from end to end. The sockets he made of cast silver; the frames themselves he gilded over, and made rings of gold through which the poles, those too plated with gold, could pass.

He made a veil, too, out of twisted linen thread, worked in threads of blue and 36 purple and scarlet twice-dyed, with all the embroiderer's art, and four posts of acacia wood, gilded and with gilt capitals, but set 37 in silver sockets. And he made a screen out of twisted linen thread, embroidered with threads of blue and purple and scarlet twice-dyed, for the entrance of the taber-38 nacle, and five posts of acacia wood which he gilded over, capitals and all, fitting into sockets of moulded bronze.

37 Beseleel also made an ark of acacia wood, two and a half cubits long, with a breadth and height of one and a half cubits, and gave it a covering and a 2 lining of pure gold, putting a coping of 3 gold all round the top of it, and four rings, cast in gold, at its four corners, two on 4 each of the flanks. Then he made poles of 5 acacia wood, gilded over, and passed them through the rings on the sides of the ark,
so as to carry it.
6 He made a throne, too, or shrine, of pure gold, two and a half cubits long, and 7 and a half cubits broad, and two cherubs of pure beaten gold, which he set up on either side of the throne, each of them at 8 its extreme edge. And these two cherubs that stood at the extreme edges of the 9 throne overshadowed it with their out-spread wings, facing towards it and towards each other.

10 And he made a table of acacia wood, two cubits long, a cubit broad, and a cubit and 11 a half in height; this he gilded with pure gold, and made a rim of gold about its 12 edge, with an embossed coping four inches high, and a second coping of gold over 13 that. Then he cast four rings and fixed them to the four corners of the table, one 14 by each leg close to the coping; and he put poles through them, that would carry the 15 table; these poles, too, he made of acacia 16 wood, and gilded them over. So with the appurtenances of the table, cups, and bowls, and dishes, and goblets for pouring out libations; all were of pure gold.

17 And he made a lamp-stand of pure 18 beaten gold, with branches coming out from its stem, all with their cups and bosses and fleurs-de-lis. Six branches stood 19 about the stem, three on either side; and on each branch there were three cups shaped like almond-flowers, then a boss, then a fleur-de-lis, balanced by three cups

Construction of the Ark and the Altars and a boss and a fleur-de-lis on the opposite branch; such was the fashion of all the six branches that came out of the stem.

But the stem itself had four cups, shaped like almond-flowers, each with its boss and its fleur-de-lis; there were six branches altogether coming out of a single stem, and under each pair of them there was an additional boss. The bosses and the branches were all of a piece with the main stem, and all alike were of pure beaten gold. He made seven lamps, too, with snuffers and trays for the burnt wick, all of pure gold.
The whole weight of the lamp-stand, together with its appurtenances, was a talent of gold.

And he made an altar of acacia wood for burning incense, a cubit square, with a height of two cubits; it had horns at the corners. And he covered the whole with pure gold, the grate and the walls around it and the horns too. It had a rim of gold
about it, and close under the rim two gold rings on either side, for putting poles in, so that the altar could be carried. These poles, too, were of acacia wood, gilded over.

And he made oil for the hallowing ointment, and incense of pure spices, with all the art of a perfumer.

38 He made another altar, too, of acacia wood, for burnt-sacrifice, with a surface five cubits square, and a height of three cubits; it had horns at the corners, and it was plated with bronze. And he provided it with appurtenances all of bronze, ash-pans, tongs, forks, hooks and braziers; and made it a bronze grating of network, and a hearth under this, in the middle of the altar. He also cast four rings, to go at the four extreme ends of the grating; through these, poles were to be passed, to carry the altar. The poles themselves he made of acacia wood, covered with a plating of bronze, and set them in the rings that stood out from the sides of the altar. This altar was not solid, but hollow, made of frames with an empty space between them.

Then he made a washing-basin and a stand for it, out of bronze from the mirrors of the women who used to keep watch at the door of the tabernacle.

He made a court, too, at the south side of which there were hangings of twisted 10 linen thread, a hundred cubits long, and twenty posts, with brazen sockets,¹ with their capitals and all their chased work of 11 silver. On the north side, too, there were hangings, and posts with their sockets and capitals, all of the same measurement, 12 workmanship, and material. But on the side which looked westwards the hangings were only fifty cubits long, and the posts, with their brazen sockets, their silver capitals, and chased work, were only ten 13 in number. For the eastern side, it was 14 fifty cubits long; fifteen cubits occupied the space at one end, in which there were 15 three sockets and three posts, and at the other end (leaving room in between for the entrance which led to the tabernacle) there were again hangings fifteen cubits long, 16 three posts, and three sockets. All these hangings for the court he had made out of 17 twisted linen thread. The sockets for the posts were of bronze; the capitals were of silver, in chased work; the posts of the 18 court he plated with silver. At the entrance, he made a hanging of twisted linen threads, embroidered with threads of blue and purple and scarlet twice-dyed, twenty cubits long, and, like all the hangings of 19 the court, five cubits high. There were four posts at the entrance, with sockets of 20 bronze and capitals of chased silver. The pegs which kept the tabernacle and the court in place, all round, were made of bronze.

11 Here is an account, drawn up at Moses' command by the priest Ithamar, son of Aaron, with the help of the Levites. It shews what was spent on the tabernacle 12 that bears record of the Lord, when all the work was completed, at the Lord's command given through Moses, by Beseleel, son of Uri, son of Hur, of the tribe of 13 Juda. (He had Oôliab, too, son of Achisamech, of the tribe of Dan, to help him; he too was a famous craftsman in wood, he too could make tapestry and embroidery 14 from threads of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and lawn.) The sum of gold spent in building the sanctuary, provided by the contribution, was twenty-nine talents and seven hundred and thirty sicles, by sanc-25 tuary reckoning. Offerings, too, were made by those who were registered, six hundred and three thousand five hundred and fifty men under arms, from the age of 26 twenty upwards; thus there were also a hundred talents of silver, from which they made the sockets of the holy place, and those of the entrance, where the veil hangs;

 a hundred sockets were made out of a hun-27 dred talents, one talent for each socket.
 They used besides a thousand seven hun-28 dred and seventy-five sicles over the capitals of the posts, and the posts themselves where these were plated with silver.
 Seventy-two thousand talents and four 29 hundred sicles of bronze were offered,² and 30 of these they made the sockets of the approach to the tabernacle that bears record of the Lord, and the brazen altar with its grating, and all the appurtenances used at it; and the sockets round the court and at 31 the entrance to the court, and the pegs which held up the tabernacle and the enclosure round about.

39 Beseleel made vestments, too, of blue and purple, scarlet and lawn, for Aaron to wear when he ministered in the holy place, as the Lord had prescribed them to Moses. He made a mantle of 2 gold and blue and purple and scarlet twice-dyed, and of twisted linen thread, all em-3 broidered work; to do this, he must needs cut up gold leaf and spin it into threads, so that it could be worked into the rest of the coloured woof. At the top, on either 4 side, he made two shoulder-pieces joined together, and a band³ of the same colours, 5 as the Lord had prescribed to Moses. He also provided two onyx-stones, closely set 6 in gold, and inscribed by a gem-carver with the names of Israel's sons; these, ac-7 cording to the prescription which the Lord had given Moses, he let into the sides of the mantle, to keep the sons of Israel in memory.

¹ The Latin version here seems to imply that the posts themselves were made of bronze. But there is no such indication in 27. 10, and verse 17 below tells us that the posts were plated with silver, and therefore probably made of wood. It seems possible therefore that the Latin text is only an awkward rendering of the Hebrew, which clearly says that the sockets were of bronze. ² The Hebrew text has 'seventy talents and two thousand four hundred sicles', a much more likely figure. It is probable that the talent represents about half a hundredweight, and the sicle about half an ounce; but the figures, according to others, should be considerably lower. ³ The Latin renders this Hebrew word differently in 28. 8.

8 He made a burse, too, of embroidered work, of the same pattern as the mantle itself, of gold and blue and purple and scarlet twice-dyed, and twisted linen thread, a folded square of a palm's breadth either way. And he set in it four rows of stones; in the first row a sardius, a topaz, and an emerald; in the second, a carbuncle, a sapphire, and a jasper-stone; in the third, a jacinth, an agate, and an amethyst; in the fourth, a chrysolite, an onyx-stone, and a beryl; all the rows were closely set in gold. And these stones were inscribed with the names of the twelve tribes of Israel, one on each. On the burse, they put chains of pure gold, fastened together, and two hooks, and two rings, all of gold. The rings they set on either side of the burse, so that the two gold chains could hang from them, and these fitted the hooks which stood out from the corners of the mantle. They met before and behind in such a way that mantle and burse were linked together, tied to the strongly fastened rings of the band by a blue cord, so that they should not hang loose, and come apart; so the Lord had prescribed to Moses.

20 They made a tunic, too, to go with the mantle, all of blue, with an opening in the middle of it at the top, that had a woven border round it. Underneath, round the skirt of it, there were ornaments of blue thread and purple and scarlet, and twisted linen thread, pomegranate-shaped; bells, too, of pure gold, which they put in between the pomegranates all round, at the edge of the tunic; first a golden bell, then a pomegranate. Such, according to the prescription the Lord had given Moses, was to be the dress of the priest when he went in to perform his sacred office. They made, too, woven robes of lawn for Aaron and his sons, and mitres of lawn with rings about them, breeches, too, woven of fine linen thread, and a girdle of twisted linen thread, embroidered with threads of blue and purple and scarlet twice-dyed, as the Lord had prescribed to Moses. They also made a plate of pure gold, a thing most sacred, inscribed with all the engraver's skill, with the words, Set apart for the Lord; and this, according to the prescription the Lord gave Moses, they fastened with a blue cord to the mitre.

So the sons of Israel finished making the tabernacle, and all that covered in the sacred record, carrying out all the prescriptions the Lord had given to Moses. And they brought the tabernacle to Moses, the tent itself and all its furniture, rings, frames, poles, posts and sockets; the canopy of rams' fleeces dyed red, and the other canopy of skins dyed violet; the veil, the ark with its poles, and the throne; the table with its appurtenances and the loaves that were to be set out on it; the lamp-stand, with its lamps and its other appurtenances, and the oil for it; the golden altar, the ointment, and the incense made from spices; the hanging for the tabernacle approach; the brazen altar, with its grate, its poles, and all its appurtenances; the basin with its stand; the hangings for the court, and the posts with their sockets; the hanging for the entrance of the court, its ropes and its pegs. Nothing was missing of all the appurtenances that had been prescribed for the needs of the tabernacle, the shrine of the covenant. The vestments, too, that were to be worn by the priests, both Aaron himself and his sons, in the sanctuary, were brought to Moses by the Israelites, in fulfilment of the Lord's command. And when Moses saw that they had completed all their task, he gave them his blessing.

40 And now the Lord said to Moses, When the first day of the first month comes, set up the tabernacle that is to bear record of me, and put the ark in it, and screen the ark with the veil. Then bring in the table, and set out due offerings there; the lamp-stand, too, must be in its place, with lamps on it, and the golden altar upon which incense is burnt, there before the ark that bears record of me. Stretch out the hanging at the entrance to the tabernacle, and set down before it the altar for burnt-sacrifice, with the basin there, full of water, between altar and tabernacle; and screen off the court and its entrance with the hangings. Then bring out the anointing-oil, and hallow by unction with it the tabernacle and its appurtenances; the altar for burnt-sacrifice and all that belongs to it, and the washing-basin with its stand; all must be consecrated with the anointing-oil, to be 12 holiness itself. Bring Aaron, too, and his sons to the doors of the tabernacle that 13 bears record of me, and, when they have washed, clothe them with the sacred vestments in which they are to minister to me, and anoint them to be my priests for ever.

14 Moses did as the Lord bade him; and on the first day of the first month, in this second year of wandering, the tabernacle 15 was set up. To set it up, Moses must first dispose the frames, with their sockets and 17 poles, and erect the posts; then he spread the tapestry over the tabernacle, and covered it, as the Lord bade him, with the 18 canopy. He put the tablets of the law in the ark, and passed the poles through at the base of it, and fixed the throne above 19 it. Then, bringing the ark into the tabernacle, he spread the veil in front of it, in 20 fulfilment of the Lord's command. In front of the veil, at the northern end of the tabernacle that bore record of the Lord, 21 he put down the table, and on it, as the Lord bade him, he set out the consecrated 22 loaves. On the south side of the tabernacle, opposite the table, he set up the 23 lamp-stand, with all its lamps in position as the Lord bade him. And before the 24 veil, still under the tabernacle roof, he placed the golden altar, on which, at the Lord's command, he burnt incense made from spices.

And now he must hang the screen at the 26 entrance of the tabernacle, and by the door 27 of the tabernacle must stand the altar for burnt-sacrifice, on which he offered the victims and sacrificial gifts which the Lord had prescribed. He put the basin, too, 28 between the tabernacle and the altar, filling it with water, so that Moses and Aaron 29 and Aaron's sons could wash their hands and feet whenever they would enter the 30 tabernacle that bore record of the covenant, or approach the altar, as the Lord had commanded him. He also set up the 31 court round the tabernacle and the altar, and hung the screen at the entrance to it.

When all was done, a cloud covered the 32 tabernacle, and it was filled with the brightness of the Lord's presence; nor 33 could Moses enter the tabernacle that bore record of the covenant, so thick the cloud that spread all about it, so radiant was the Lord's majesty; all was wrapped in cloud.
Whenever the cloud lifted from the taber- 34 nacle, the Israelites would muster and set out on the march, and while it hung there, 35 they halted. The divine cloud by day, the 36 divine fire by night, still brooded over the tabernacle for all Israel to see it, wherever they halted on their journey.

THE BOOK OF LEVITICUS

THE Lord summoned Moses, and, from the tabernacle that bore record of him made known his will.

2 These rules the Israelites were to follow, when any of them would offer the Lord a beast as a victim, from herd or from flock. The man who would win the Lord's favour with burnt-sacrifice of cattle must bring a male beast, without blemish, to the door of the tabernacle, and lay his hand on the beast's head, and so it will be accepted, and will serve to make atonement for him. 3 Then he will immolate the calf in the Lord's presence, and the priests of Aaron's line will make an offering of its blood, which they will pour round the altar at the tabernacle door. Then they will skin the victim and cut its limbs into joints; and, lighting a fire on the altar, where a pile of wood lies ready, they will lay on it the joints, the head and the fat¹ round the liver. The entrails and feet must first be washed with water. So the priest will make a burnt-sacrifice of it all, there on the altar, and the smell of its burning will be acceptable to the Lord.

10 As with the herd, so with the flock; if he would offer sacrifice, sheep or goat, let him bring a male without blemish, and immolate it at the northern side of the altar; and the priests of Aaron's line will pour its blood round about, and will separate the limbs, the head, and the fat round the liver, and lay them upon the wood over the fire; the entrails and the feet first washed in water. So the priest will burn the whole offering as a burnt-sacrifice, and the Lord will accept the smell of its burning.

14 If a bird is offered to the Lord as a burnt-sacrifice, it will be a turtle-dove, or a young pigeon. And the priest will bring it to the altar, where he will wring its neck and slit it open;² then he will let the blood run over the foot of the altar, casting away the crop and feathers near by on the eastern side, where the ashes are poured out. He will break the bird's wings, but will not cut it up into joints with a knife; he will burn it whole over wood kindled on the altar. So it will be a burnt-sacrifice, and the smell of its burning will be acceptable to the Lord.

2 If anyone would bring the Lord a bloodless offering,³ his gift must be of flour; over this he will pour oil, and lay incense on it, and so he will bring it to the priests of Aaron's line; one of whom will take up a handful of the wheat and oil, with all the incense, and cast it on the altar as a token-sacrifice,⁴ acceptable to the Lord in its fragrance. All that is left of this sacrifice shall belong to Aaron and his sons; the remnant of the Lord's own offering, it is set apart for holy uses.

If this bloodless offering of thine is cooked in the oven, it shall be of unleavened wheaten loaves, kneaded with oil, and unleavened cakes with oil poured over them; if it is cooked in the pan, it shall be of unleavened flour kneaded with oil, cut up into small pieces, with oil poured over them; if it is cooked on the gridiron, it must still be of flour mingled with oil. Thy gift to the Lord, it shall be put into the priest's hands; and he, in offering it, will separate the token-sacrifice, which he will burn there on the altar, acceptable to the Lord in its fragrance; the rest shall belong to Aaron and his sons; the remnant of the Lord's offering, it is set apart for holy uses.

All such offerings must be made to the Lord unleavened; no leaven or honey must be burnt with the Lord's sacrifice. Of such things, you may offer first-fruits, or bring gifts, but they shall not be put on the altar, to give out fragrance there. Whatever sacrifice thou offerest is to be seasoned with salt; thou shalt not grudge thy God the

³ 'A bloodless offering'; literally, in the Latin, 'an offering (by way) of sacrifice', in the Hebrew text simply, 'a gift'. The word is technically used to distinguish offerings made of vegetable things from those which involved the destroying of animal life.

⁴ Literally, 'as a memorial'. The use of the word in this connexion is obscure, but it is always used of these (less expensive) vegetable offerings.

14 salt which his covenant demands; salt shall be a part of every offering. If thou makest the Lord a gift of thy first-fruits, thou shalt 15 roast the ears, while they are still fresh, over the fire and bruise them as flour is bruised, and so offer the Lord thy first-15 fruits. Thou shalt pour oil on them, too, and lay incense on them, to shew that they 16 are an offering made to the Lord; and the priest, for a token-sacrifice, shall burn part of the bruised grain and the oil, with all the incense.

3 The man who would make a welcome-offering¹ of cattle, must bring to the Lord a beast without blemish, bul-2 lock or heifer as he will. He is to lay his hand on the head of the victim, and it is to be immolated at the entrance of the tabernacle that bears record of me, the priests who represent Aaron's family pouring its 3 blood about the altar. The parts of the victim that must be given to the Lord in a welcome-offering are the fat enclosing 4 the entrails and the fat on the entrails, the two kidneys and the fat round the flanks, and with the kidneys the caul of the liver.
 5 All these, once the wood is kindled, they shall offer on the altar as a burnt-sacrifice, and the Lord will accept the smell of their burning.

6 As with the herd, so with the flock; the victim can be male or female, as long as it 7 is without blemish. If it is a lamb that he 8 offers to the Lord, he will lay his hand upon the head of the victim, and it will be immolated in front of the tabernacle that bears record, the sons of Aaron pouring 9 its blood about the altar. And the parts of the victim sacrificed to the Lord in this welcome-offering will be the tail with all 10 the fat on it, the kidneys, all the fat which encloses belly and entrails. Both kidneys are to be offered with the fat round the flanks, and with the kidneys the caul of the 11 liver. All these the priest will burn on the altar, to feed its fire and to give the Lord 12 his offering. So, too, if the victim he brings 13 to the Lord is a goat, he will lay his hand upon its head, and immolate it in front of the tabernacle that bears record, the sons of Aaron pouring its blood about the altar.

 The same parts must be cut away to feed 14 the fire of the Lord's sacrifice; the fat which covers belly and entrails, the two 15 kidneys, and with the kidneys the caul and the fat of the liver, close to the flanks; these 16 are for the priest to burn on the altar, feeding the flame and giving out acceptable fragrance. All that is fat shall belong to the Lord; this rule you must observe 17 continually, age after age, wherever you dwell; neither fat nor blood are for your eating.

4 And now the Lord spoke to Moses again, making known his will to the 2 sons of Israel: It may be that a man has transgressed through inadvertence, disobeyed, without thinking to disobey, some one of the Lord's precepts. Such a trans-3 gression, if it be committed by the high priest then in office, brings guilt upon the whole people, and he must make amends for it by offering to the Lord a young bullock without blemish. He will bring it 4 into the Lord's presence, at the door of the tabernacle, and, laying his hands on its head, will immolate it to the Lord. Then 5 he will draw off some of its blood, which he will take with him into the tabernacle;
 and there he will dip his finger in the blood, 6 and sprinkle it in the Lord's presence, before the sanctuary veil, seven times. Some 7 of this blood he will smear on the horns of the altar; that altar within the tabernacle, on which the fragrant incense is burnt for the Lord's acceptance; the rest he will pour away at the foot of the sacrificial altar, near the tabernacle door. And now, to 8 make amends for his fault, he will cut away the bullock's fat, the fat enclosing the entrails and all else that is found within it, the two kidneys, and with the kidneys the 9 caul and fat of the liver, close to the flanks, as if it were the victim of a welcome-offering, and burn these on the sacrificial altar. The skin and all the flesh, with the 11 head, the feet, the entrails and the dung, and all the rest of its carcase, he will carry 12 away from the camp to the place you have hallowed for pouring the ashes away, and

¹ 'A welcome-offering'; literally, in the Latin, 'an offering of things that make peace'. The Hebrew text is understood by some as implying a sacrifice made for the 'peace', that is, welfare, of the worshipper; by others as implying thanksgiving. But the implication seems to be that of friendship; the sacrifices thus described were distinguished from others by the fact that the worshipper himself shared the sacrificial meal, as if by way of hospitality, instead of devoting all to the service of the sanctuary.

burn them over a wood fire, there on the ash-pit.

13 Or perhaps the whole people of Israel has been betrayed into a fault, transgressing the Lord's command unwittingly. If so, when they find out their error, they will bring a young bullock to the tabernacle door in amends. There, in the Lord's presence, the elders of the people will lay their hands on its head; and when the bullock has been immolated before him, some of its blood will be taken into the tabernacle by the high priest then in office, who will dip his finger and sprinkle it before the veil seven times, smear with it the horns of the altar that stands within the tabernacle in the Lord's presence, and pour away the rest about the foot of the sacrificial altar, by the tabernacle door. He will separate the fat and burn it on the altar, treating it like the bullock aforementioned; and at the priest's intercession, the Lord will have mercy. The bullock itself he will take away from the camp, as before; and so amends will be made for the general transgression.

22 Be it one of the rulers that has transgressed by breaking some one of the laws inadvertently, and later has recognized his fault, he must offer to the Lord a he-goat, without blemish, as his victim. He will lay his hands on its head, and immolate it, in amends for his fault, where the Lord's burnt-sacrifices are immolated; and the priest will dip his finger in the blood of this transgression-victim, smearing some of it on the horns, this time, of the sacrificial altar, and pouring the rest away about its foot. On this altar, too, he will burn the fat, as the fat of the welcome-offering is burnt; and so, at the priest's intercession, the ruler's fault will be forgiven.

27 Be it one of the common folk that has transgressed through inadvertence; the law has been broken nevertheless, and guilt incurred. Such a man, when he becomes aware of his fault, must offer a she-goat without blemish, lay his hand on the head of this transgression-victim, and immolate it where the burnt-sacrifices are immolated. The priest will smear the sacrificial altar with some of the blood, and pour the rest away at its foot; then separate the fat, as if this were a welcome-offering, and burn it on the altar, where the smell of its burning will be acceptable to the Lord. And so, at the priest's intercession for him, the guilty man will be pardoned. Or he may choose, as his transgression-victim, a ewe-lamb without blemish from his flock, lay his hand on its head, and immolate it where the burnt-sacrifices are immolated. The priest will use the victim's blood as before, separate the fat, as if this were the ram of the welcome-offering, and burn it on the altar, offer it to the Lord by fire; so, at the priest's intercession, the guilty man will be pardoned.

5 Here is a sin men commit; a man hears the call that puts him under oath, and can bear witness of what he has seen or known, yet witness he bears none; he must pay the penalty.¹

A man may have touched what has been killed by a wild beast or has fallen dead, or the carcase of a reptile,² or some other unclean thing, unaware of his defilement at the time; yet he has incurred guilt by the fault. Or he has touched some defilement of the human body; there are many such; he may be unaware of it till afterwards, but he has incurred guilt. Or he has taken an oath, pronounced with the lips, to do this or that³; he has given his pledged word, and then forgotten that he gave it, but remembers it afterwards. For all such faults as these a man must do penance,⁴ offering up a ewe-lamb or a she-goat from his flock; so the priest will make intercession to have his fault pardoned. If he has no beast to give, he must offer two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons to the Lord instead, one in amends for his fault, and the other as a burnt-sacrifice. The priest, when these are brought to him, will offer the first as a transgression-victim, bending its head right back to the wings, but so that it is still attached to the neck, not completely

¹ If the text has been correctly preserved, it looks as if this verse must belong to some other context. The offence it contemplates is evidently deliberate, like those at the beginning of chapter 6, whereas the faults mentioned in 5. 2-4 are the results of inadvertence, and classed as such (cf. 4. 27 above and 5. 15 below).

² 'Or the carcase of a reptile'; literally, in the Latin version, 'or any other reptile'. In the Hebrew text, it is a question of touching the carcase of any unclean beast or reptile.

³ 'To do this or that'; literally 'to do evil or good', but this is Hebrew idiom for 'anything whatsoever'. The oath has been forgotten, until it was too late to fulfil it; the fault is therefore only one of inadvertence.

9 severed, and sprinkling some of its blood on the side of the altar; the rest he will allow to drip down at the altar's foot, to make amends for the transgression. Of the other he will make a burnt-sacrifice, in the customary way, and, at the priest's intercession, the man will be pardoned. If he cannot even lay his hand on two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, the transgression-offering must be a tenth of a bushel of flour; but he will not mix oil with it, or lay incense on it; this is an offering for transgression. He will hand it to the priest, who will take a handful and burn it on the altar, as a token-sacrifice for the man who brought it, praying and making atonement on his behalf; the rest of it the priest will keep as his own offering.

14 And this, too, was a commandment which the Lord gave Moses: If anyone commits a fault by inadvertence, defrauding the Lord of his due over things consecrated, he must make amends for his guilt by offering a ram without blemish out of his flock, such a ram as is worth two silver pieces by sanctuary reckoning. He must also make restitution of the sum that is lacking, and a fifth part of it besides, handing this to the priest, who will make intercession for him when he offers up the ram, and win him pardon. Or, if the fault of inadvertence lies only in disobeying the law, it is enough that, when he becomes aware of his guilt,¹ he should bring the priest a ram without blemish out of his flock, of greater or less worth as the fault demands. And the priest shall intercede for the unwitting transgressor, winning him pardon because he did the Lord a wrong inadvertently.

2 6 And the Lord said to Moses, There are faults, too, committed in the Lord's despite, when a man defrauds his neighbour of some loan that was entrusted to him for safe keeping, or extorts money by violence, or wrongs him at law, or perjures himself in denying that he has found something lost, or is guilty of some other offence such as men are prone to commit. 4 If he is found guilty, he must make restitution, giving back in full all that he hoped to gain by his knavery, and a fifth part besides, to the owner whom he has wronged. He must make amends, too, for his fault by bringing to the priest a ram without blemish out of his flock, of greater or less worth as the wrong demands. The priest will make intercession for him before the Lord, and win pardon for all his wrongful deeds.

The Lord also spoke to Moses giving him a commandment for Aaron and his sons: This is the rule which governs burnt-sacrifice. It is to be burnt on the altar all night till morning comes, with the altar's own fire. The priest, clothed in his robe and linen breeches, will take away the ashes left by the fire which consumes it, and lay these down by the altar. Then, taking off the clothes he wears and putting on others, he will take the ashes away from the camp to a place already purified, and there calcine them.² The fire on the altar must burn continually; each morning the priest will feed it with fresh logs, on which he will lay first the burnt-sacrifice, then the fat taken from the welcome-offering. Never must the altar be empty of this perpetual fire. And this is the rule that governs the bloodless offering which Aaron and his sons will make before the altar in the Lord's presence. The priest will take a handful of the flour mingled with oil, and all the grains of incense that are laid on it; and these he will burn on the altar as a token-sacrifice, whose fragrance the Lord will accept. The rest of the flour, still with no leaven in it, Aaron and his sons will eat, upon hallowed ground within the court of the tabernacle that bears record of me. No leaven must be put into it, shared as it is with the Lord's burnt-sacrifice; it is set apart for holy uses, like the offerings that are made for a fault or for a wrong done. Only the male descendants of Aaron may eat it. This is the rule to be observed continually, age after age, in offering the Lord sacrifice; whoever touches it becomes holy thereby.

The Lord also said to Moses, This is the offering Aaron and his sons must make to the Lord when they are anointed; one tenth of a bushel of flour for a continuous offering,¹ half of it in the morning and half in the evening, mingled with oil and fried in a pan. It shall be offered still warm, acceptable to the Lord in its fragrance, by each priest succeeding to his father's office, and the whole of it must be burnt on the altar. Every sacrifice made by the priests themselves must be altogether destroyed by fire; no one must eat any part of it.

And the Lord spake to Moses again, giving him a message for Aaron and his sons: This is the rule that governs the offering of a victim for transgression; it must be immolated before the Lord in the same place where burnt-sacrifices are offered; it is set apart for holy uses. The priest who offers it must eat his share on hallowed ground in the tabernacle court; whatever touches the flesh of it becomes holy thereby, and if his clothing is stained by its blood, it must be washed on hallowed ground. Even the earthenware pot in which it was cooked must be broken; or, if it is cooked in a pan of bronze, the pan must be scraped clean and washed in water. The flesh is set apart for holy uses, but it may be eaten by any male person belonging to the priestly family, except that of the transgression-victim whose blood has been taken into the tabernacle, to make atonement in the sanctuary; such a victim is not to be eaten, it must be destroyed by burning.²

7 And this is the rule which governs the offering of a victim for wrong done.³ Such a victim is set apart for holy uses, and must be immolated where burnt-sacrifices are immolated; its blood must be poured round the altar. The parts which must be offered are the tail, and the fat which covers the entrails, the two kidneys and the fat that is close to them, and with the kidneys the caul of the liver. All these the priest will burn on the altar, as a burnt-sacrifice to the Lord in amends for the wrong done; the flesh of the victim is set apart for holy uses, but it may be eaten by any male person belonging to the priestly family. Victims are to be offered for a wrong done just as they are for a fault; the rule is the same for either, and either victim belongs to the priest who offers it.

The priest who offers a victim in burnt-sacrifice, may keep the skin for himself; and every offering of flour cooked in the oven, or prepared with gridiron or pan, is made over to the priest who offers it; kneaded with oil or dry, such gifts must be divided equally between all the men of Aaron's race.

And this is the rule which governs the welcome-offerings that are brought to the Lord. If it is a thank-offering, there must be loaves of unleavened bread kneaded with oil, unleavened cakes with oil poured over them, pastry kneaded with oil, and loaves, too with leaven in them. All these must go with the victim which is immolated as a welcome-offering in thanksgiving; and one of each must be offered to the Lord as first-fruits, so that it will belong to the priest who sheds the victim's blood. The flesh of the victim must be eaten the same day, none of it left till the morrow. If the offering is made in performance of a vow, or simply from devotion, it should be eaten on the same day; but if any is left till the morrow, it may still be eaten; whatever the third day finds still unfinished must be destroyed by fire. If any such flesh is eaten on the third day, the offering will be null and void, and the giver will have no advantage from it; indeed, whoever contaminates himself by eating such food is guilty of an offence. If it has touched anything unclean, it must be destroyed by fire, not eaten. Only one who is free from defilement may partake of it; the man who eats any of the victim for a welcome-offering, when he is himself defiled, is lost to his people; and he, too, who eats such flesh after touching any defilement left by man or beast, or anything that makes him unclean.

And the Lord spoke to Moses, giving him this message for the sons of Israel: You are not to eat the fat of sheep or ox or goat; but you may keep the fat of anything

³ It is clear that a distinction is here drawn between offerings-for-a-fault (or 'transgression') and offerings-for-a-wrong; the Hebrew terms differ. Probably the latter term involves the idea of compensation for an injury. It is generally agreed that we are concerned with faults in 4: 5. 1-13; and 6. 24-30; with wrongs in 6. 1-7 and this chapter. The position of offences referred to in 5. 14-19 is somewhat doubtful.

that falls dead, or is killed by a wild beast, 25 for various uses. Anyone who eats the fat which ought to be offered, as part of the Lord's burnt-sacrifice, is lost to his people.
 26 Nor must you use the blood of any living 27 thing, bird or beast, as food; whoever consumes the blood, is lost to his people.

28 And the Lord spoke to Moses giving him this message, too, for the sons of Israel: The man who brings the Lord a welcome-offering must surrender, in doing so, his sacrificial due, the choice por-30 tions of the victim. He will carry with him the fat and the breast of the victim, and both these, when they have been held up in sign of consecration to the Lord, he will 31 hand over to the priest, who will burn the fat on the altar, while the breast belongs, 32 as their due, to Aaron and his sons. The right shoulder of the victim slain in welcome-offering is also the priest's preroga-33 tive; whichever of Aaron's sons offers the blood and the fat, is to have the right 34 shoulder for his portion. The breast that is held up in sign of consecration, the shoulder that is separated from the rest, are the portions of the welcome-offering which I demand of the Israelites; making them over to Aaron, my priest, and to his descendants, as a right due to them at all times from the sons of Israel.

35 Such are the privileges¹ Aaron and his sons enjoy in the worship offered to the Lord, ever since the day when Moses pre-16 sented them to him to be his priests; such gifts the Lord bade the Israelites bestow upon them by a right unalterable, age after age.

17 Thus far the rules which govern burnt-sacrifice,² and sacrifices for a fault or a wrong done, for the hallowing of priests, and for the victims used in welcome-18 offering, as the Lord prescribed them to Moses on mount Sinai, when he commanded the sons of Israel, there in the desert of Sinai, to bring him their offerings.

8 And now the Lord said to Moses,
 2 Bring with thee Aaron and his sons, and their sacred vestments, and the oil for anointing, and a young bullock such as is offered for a fault, and two rams, and a 3 basket of unleavened bread, and gather the whole assembly of the people at the taber-4 nacle door. Moses did as the Lord had bidden him; and when all the people had gathered before the entrance to the taber-5 nacle, he told them, I do this at the Lord's express command.

With that, he presented Aaron and his 6 sons; and when they had been duly washed, he clothed the new high priest in 7 the linen robe, and girded him with the girdle, and put the blue tunic on him, and the mantle over that, binding it close with 8 its band, and attaching to it the burse in which were the touchstones of wisdom and of truth. He covered his head, too, with 9 the mitre, and put in front of it the golden plate, sacred and set apart, as the Lord had bidden him. Then he took the oil used for 10 anointing, and with it he anointed the tabernacle and all its furniture; anointed 11 the altar, too, after consecrating it seven times by sprinkling, with all its appurtenances, and consecrated the basin and its stand with oil. Then, pouring oil over 12 Aaron's head, he anointed and hallowed him. Aaron's sons, too, he brought for-13 ward, dressed them in linen robes, girded them with girdles, and put mitres on them, as the Lord had bidden him.

Then he offered a young bullock for 14 their faults; Aaron and his sons laid their hands on its head, and Moses immolated 15 it, drawing off its blood. In this he dipped his finger, and smeared it round the horns of the altar, till all was cleansed and hallowed; the rest he poured away at the 16 altar's foot. The fat on the entrails, the caul of the liver, and the two kidneys with their fat, he sacrificed on the altar, burning 17 the carcase, skin and flesh and dung, away from the camp, as the Lord had bidden him.

He offered a ram, too, as a burnt-sacri-18 fice; Aaron and his sons laid their hands on its head, and so he immolated it, pouring 19 away its blood round the altar. This ram he cut into joints, and sacrificed it, head 20 and limbs and fat, upon the altar, first washing its entrails and its feet; so he burnt the whole ram on the altar, a sacrifice such as the Lord had commanded, to please him with the smell of its burning.

Another ram he offered for the hallow-22 ing of the priests; Aaron and his sons laid offerings'.

² 'Burnt-sacrifice'; in the Hebrew text, 'burnt-sacrifice and bloodless offerings'.

23 their hands on its head and now, after immolating it, Moses took some of its blood and put it on the tip of Aaron's right ear, the thumb of his right hand, and the great 24 toe of his right foot. Then he brought forward Aaron's sons, smeared them, ear and thumb and toe, with the ram's blood, and poured away what was left of it about the 25 altar. He set on one side the fat of the tail, and all the fat that covered the entrails, the caul of the liver, the two kidneys with their 26 fat, and the right shoulder. Then he added to the fat and the shoulder an unleavened loaf, a cake made with oil, and a piece of pastry, from the basket of unleavened 27 bread that lay there before the Lord; and he gave all these to Aaron and his sons, who 28 lifted them up in the Lord's presence. So they were handed back to Moses, and he burnt them on the sacrificial altar as an offering for their consecration, a smell of 29 burning for the Lord to accept. The breast of this ram they were hallowed with, he took, as the Lord bade him, for his own portion, after lifting it up in the Lord's presence.

30 Then he took the holy oil, and the blood from the altar, and sprinkled them over Aaron and his sons, and the vestments they 31 wore. And now that they were hallowed, vestments and all, he told them, Cook the flesh before the tabernacle door, and eat it there; the bread, too, that is offered for your hallowing, that lies there in the basket; such was the Lord's command to me, 32 Aaron and his sons shall eat it. If any is left over, of the meat or of the bread, it 33 must be destroyed by fire. But you must not leave the entrance of the tabernacle for seven days, till the time of your hallowing is complete; for seven days your hallowing 34 must continue with all to-day's solemnities, before the rite of your consecration 35 takes full effect. Night and day you must make the tabernacle your home, on pain of death, keeping vigil in the Lord's honour;
this was the command given to me.

36 Such was the Lord's bidding through Moses, and Aaron and his sons faithfully observed it.

9 And now, when the eighth day came, Moses summoned Aaron and his sons, with the elders of Israel, and said to 2 Aaron, Choose out a young bullock to atone for your faults, and a ram for burnt-sacrifice, both without blemish, and offer them to the Lord. And bid the sons of 3 Israel choose out a goat to atone for their faults, with a bullock and a lamb, both one year old, both without blemish, for their burnt-sacrifice; an ox, too, and a ram, by 4 way of welcome-offering. They must im-molate them here before the Lord, and offer up flour kneaded with oil to accompany each sacrifice; this day, the Lord means to appear among you. So they 5 brought to the tabernacle door all that Moses bade them bring; and to the whole multitude there assembled Moses pro-6 claimed, Here is a command laid upon you by the Lord; fulfil it, and his glory will be revealed to you. Then he said to Aaron, 7 Go up to the altar, and immolate the victim that is to atone for thy faults; offer burnt-sacrifice, to win pardon for thyself and for the people; the people too, have a victim thou must immolate, making intercession for them as the Lord bids thee.

8 With that, Aaron came up to the altar, and immolated the bullock that was to atone for his own faults. His sons held out 9 the blood before him, and he dipped his finger and smeared the horns of the altar with it, pouring the rest away at the altar's foot. Then, obedient to the command 10 which the Lord had given Moses, he sacrificed on the altar the fat, the kidneys, and the liver-caul of this transgression-victim, taking its flesh and skin away from the 11 camp to be destroyed by fire. After this, 12 he immolated the victim of the burnt-sacrifice, his sons holding out first the blood, which he poured away round the altar; then the carcase, cut up into joints, 13 with its head and all its limbs complete, which he burnt on the altar, first washing 14 its entrails and its feet in water.

15 Next, he immolated the goat, as an offering for the people's faults, and, purifying the altar, went on to the burnt-16 sacrifice, to which he added, burning them 17 on the altar, the customary gifts, over and above all the ceremonies of the morning sacrifice. Then he immolated the ox and 18 the ram, by way of welcome-offering for the people. His sons held out the blood, and he poured it round the altar; the fat of 19 the ox, and the ram's tail, and the kidneys with their fat, and the cauls of the livers,

20 they laid on the breasts of the victims, and when the fat had been burnt on the altar,
21 Aaron set apart the two breasts and the two right shoulders, which he lifted up in the Lord's presence, as Moses had bidden 22 him. Then he stretched out his hands over the people, and blessed them; and so, the sacrifice done, the atonement for faults, the burnt-sacrifice, and the welcome-offering, he came down from the altar.
23 After this, both Moses and Aaron went into the tabernacle that bears record and blessed the people as they came out. Whereupon the glory of the Lord shone out upon 14 the whole multitude, and suddenly the Lord sent down fire, which consumed the burnt-sacrifice, and all the fat that lay on the altar. At the sight, the whole people raised a cry of praise, and fell face to ground in worship.

10 There were two of Aaron's sons, Nadab and Abiu, who took up their censers and put coals and incense into them, to burn unhallowed fire in the Lord's presence,¹ not in accordance with his command; whereupon the Lord sent down fire which devoured them, and they died 2 there in the Lord's presence. And Moses told Aaron, The Lord gave us warning of this when he said: I mean to vindicate my holiness among those who come near me, win reverence in the eyes of the whole people. And with that, Aaron kept silence.
4 Meanwhile, Moses summoned Misael and Elisaphan, sons of Oziel that was Aaron's uncle, and said to them, Go and remove the bodies of your brethren from the tabernacle door, and carry them away from the 5 camp. So they went without more ado and took them up just as they lay there, still clothed in their robes of linen; and they 6 carried them away as he bade them. Then Moses said to Aaron and his sons Eleazar and Ithamar, Do not bare your heads or rend your garments, on pain of death, and such vengeance as may overtake the whole people; let your brethren, and all the race of Israel bewail this fresh kindling of the 7 Lord's fire. You must not, on pain of death, leave the tabernacle door, with the oil of your consecration still upon you. So they did as Moses bade them.

The Lord, too, said to Aaron, When you are for entering the tabernacle, thou and thy sons, drink neither wine nor strong drink, on pain of death; such is the commandment you must observe, age after age. It is your task to distinguish between 10 what is holy and what is profane, what is defiled and what is clean; and to teach the 11 sons of Israel all these commandments of mine, the Lord's word to them through Moses.

And now Moses said to Aaron, and to 12 his surviving sons, Eleazar and Ithamar, You must take up what is left of the bloodless sacrifice offered to the Lord, and eat it, still unleavened, near the altar; it is set apart for holy uses, and on holy ground it 13 must be eaten, as the share given to thee and to thy sons in the Lord's own offering; such was the Divine command. The breast, too, that was held up in worship, and the 14 shoulder that was set apart, you must eat in a place that is clean of all defilement, thou and thy sons and thy daughters, too, with thee. This share of the welcome-offerings the sons of Israel bring is kept for 15 thee and thy children; priestly hands have lifted up, in the Lord's presence, the shoulder and the breast and the fat which was afterwards burnt on the altar, and it is the Lord's bidding that they should belong to thee and thy sons, by right perpetual.

Meanwhile, when Moses went to look 16 for the goat that was their transgression-victim, he found its body all consumed by fire, and angered by this, he asked Eleazar and Ithamar, Aaron's two surviving sons, Why did you not eat, on holy ground, this 17 transgression-victim, all holiness, which was handed over to you so that you might take the faults of the people on yourselves, and make intercession for them in the 18 Lord's presence? Its blood had not been carried within the sanctuary; you should have eaten it on holy ground, in obedience to the commandment that was given me. But Aaron's answer was, Why, this very 19 day transgression-victim and burnt-sacri-

¹ 'Unhallowed'; literally 'foreign'. It is clear that the two priests offended by some act of contumacious disobedience, but the exact nature of their offence remains doubtful. Some think they had neglected the command given in Ex. 30. 9 (where the literal meaning of the Hebrew is 'foreign incense'); others, that they ought to have lighted their censers from the holy fire on the altar.

10 fice have been offered to the Lord, and thou seest what has befallen me in spite of it. How could I find acceptance with the Lord in eating my share of it, with a heart 20 so mournful? And with that, Moses was content.¹

2 11 This was a message the Lord gave to Moses and Aaron for the sons of Israel: Among all the living creatures on earth, these only are to be your food.
3 Among the beasts, those which chew the cud and have cloven hoofs. Such beasts as the camel, ruminants with their hoofs single, you must hold unclean, not to be eaten; the rock-rabbit, too, is unclean, a ruminant without cloven hoofs, and 7 hare in the same way. The sow for the opposite reason; it has cloven hoofs but does not chew the cud. You are not to eat the flesh of these animals, or touch their carcasses; you must regard them as unclean.

9 Everything that lives in the water is food for your eating as long as it has fins and scales, whether it be sea or river or lake fish. Creatures that live and move in the water without scales or fins you must 10 hold in abomination, so abominable that you will not eat their flesh or even touch their carcasses; there is defilement in all that lacks fins and scales.

13 Of the birds, you must avoid these as forbidden food, the eagle, the griffon, the osprey, the falcon and the vulture with all else of their kind, anything that belongs 16 to the raven tribe, the ostrich,² the night-owl, the sea-mew, every kind of hawk, the horned owl, the cormorant, the ibis, the swan, the pelican, the coot, the stork, birds of the curlew kind, the hoopoe and the bat.

20 The winged things that are four-footed you must hold in abomination, except those which have the hinder legs longer, and leap from one spot to another; these you may eat, the locust and all its kindred, 23 bruchus or attacus or ophiomachus. But winged creatures that must walk on four feet you are to hold in detestation; no one that touches their carcasses but is defiled thereby, and must count himself unclean till the evening comes; even if necessity 25 bids him carry such a carcass, he must wash his clothes afterwards, and count himself unclean till set of sun.

Any beast that has hoofs, but not cloven hoofs, and does not chew the cud, is to be unclean, and the man who touches it, defiled. Any four-footed beast that walks on its paws is to be unclean, and to touch its carcass is to be defiled till evening comes; whoever carries such a carcass must wash his clothes, and count himself unclean till set of sun; all these things you must hold contaminated.

And there are things that creep along the ground which you must hold unclean, every weasel and mouse and skink, shrew-mouse and chameleon and newt and lizard and mole. All these are unclean; the man who touches one when it is dead is defiled till evening comes. Let such a carcass fall on a bucket or a garment or a skin or a piece of sackcloth or anything else that is in use, and it is defiled; it must be washed in water, and not counted as clean even then till set of sun. If it defiles an earthenware pot by falling into it, the pot must be broken. Whatever you drink out of such a vessel, and even the food you eat, if water out of such a vessel is poured over it, becomes unclean. Wherever such a carcass falls it brings uncleanness; oven or chafing dish that is contaminated by it must be destroyed. Springs or cisterns in which water is collected remain undefiled by it, but anyone who touches the carcass itself becomes unclean. So, too, if it falls on seed-corn, there is no defilement, unless 38 someone has first watered the seed-corn, and then the carcass falls on it; if so, it becomes unclean at once.

Whoever touches the carcass of an animal that falls dead, though it be one of those you are allowed to eat, is defiled till evening comes; and anyone who eats of it, or carries it, must wash his clothes, and until evening comes count himself unclean.

¹ The offering made in 9. 15 above was not that ordinarily made for the faults of the whole congregation, a bullock whose blood was sprinkled before the veil in the sanctuary (4. 16) and whose flesh was not eaten but burnt (6. 30). On this special occasion of Aaron's hallowing, the people offered what was ordinarily the transgression-victim for a ruler, a goat whose blood was only smeared on the altar of burnt-sacrifice (4. 25), and whose flesh should therefore have been dealt with on the general principle laid down in 6. 25. Aaron explains that he and his sons burnt the goat's flesh because they had no heart to eat it. The words 'with a heart so mournful' are not in the Hebrew text. ² Many of the creatures named in this chapter cannot be identified with any certainty. It would appear that the divine Law was content to classify them according to popular notions, which ranked the hare (for example) among ruminants, and the bat among the birds.

All that creeps along the ground must be held in abomination, and never used for food; whether it walks on four feet with its belly close to the ground, or has many feet, or glides along, it is no food for you, you must hold it abominable. Keep your persons undefiled, touching no such thing, for fear of contamination. I am the Lord your God; you must be set apart, the servants of a God who is set apart. Do not contaminate yourselves with any of these beasts that creep along the ground. I am the Lord your God, who rescued you from the land of Egypt; I am set apart and you must be set apart like me.

Such is the rule that governs the use of beast and bird, and all the life that moves through the water or creeps along the ground, teaching you the difference between clean and unclean, what food you may eat and what food you must reject.

12 And the Lord spoke to Moses, giving him this message for the Israelites: If a woman conceives, and gives birth to a boy, she will be unclean for seven days, as she is unclean at her monthly times. On the eighth day, the child must be circumcised, and after that she must wait for thirty-three days more to be purified after her loss of blood, touching nothing that is hallowed, never entering the sanctuary, until the time is up. If she gives birth to a girl, she will be unclean as at her monthly times, for fourteen days, and she will wait for sixty-six days more to be purified after her loss of blood. When the days needed for her purification, after the birth of boy or girl, have run out, she must bring a lamb of one year old as a burnt-sacrifice, and a young pigeon or a turtle-dove by way of amends, to the tabernacle door. These she will hand over to the priest, who will offer them to the Lord and intercede for her, to win purification for her after the blood-losing. Such is the rule governing the birth of boy or girl. If she cannot lay her hand on a lamb fit to be offered, she must bring two turtle-doves or two young pigeons, one as a burnt-sacrifice and one by way of amends; these will suffice, and at the priest's intercession she will be purified.¹

13 This, too, the Lord said to Moses and Aaron, If there should appear on anyone's skin, the change of colour or the scab or the shiny patches that betoken the scourge of leprosy, he must be brought before the high priest Aaron, or one of his sons. If the priest, looking at the place on his skin, finds that the hairs have turned white, and the skin of the part affected seems shrunken compared with the rest of the skin round it, this is the scourge of leprosy; and when the priest so pronounces, the man must be segregated from his fellows. If the skin is marked by a shiny white patch, but is not shrunken, and the hairs have kept their colour, the priest will keep him shut away for a week, and on the seventh day examine him. If, by now, the infection has not grown worse or spread, he will shut him away for a week more. And now, if he finds on the seventh day that the infection is less marked, and has not spread further in the skin, he will declare the man clean; it is only a scab, and he will be clean once he has washed his garments. If the infection begins to grow worse, after he has been examined and pronounced clean, he must be brought back to the priest, and pronounced unclean after all.

When a man is brought to the priest bearing the marks of infection, and he, upon examination, finds a white swelling that has turned the hair white, and shews the raw, live flesh, then it must be pronounced leprosy inveterate, deeply rooted in the skin, and the priest must pronounce him unclean without being at pains to shut him away; his uncleanness is manifest. But if the infection has broken out all over his skin, covering it from head to foot, wherever it is observed, the priest who examines him will decide that his infection is no defilement; when it shews white all over him, he is to be declared clean. But whenever the raw flesh shews, the priest will declare him contaminated, and he is to be reckoned unclean; the raw flesh betokens leprosy and uncleanness. If, afterwards, the skin turns white all over his 17 body, the priest, examining him again, will pronounce him clean.

18 When an ulcer formed in flesh or skin 19 heals up and leaves a white or reddish scar behind it, the man so marked must be 20 taken to the priest; and if the priest sees that this part of the skin has shrunk compared with the rest, and the hairs have turned white, he will pronounce him de-21 filed; the scourge of leprosy has broken out in the ulcer. But if the hair keeps its old colour, and the scar is dark, and there is no shrinking of the skin, he will shut the 22 man away for a week; and then, if it has spread, he will declare him a leper, but if 23 it is still confined to the same spot, it is but the scar of the ulcer, and the man is clean.

24 So, too, if flesh and skin that have been injured by a burn shew a white or reddish 25 scar, and the priest who examines it finds that it has turned the hair white and is shrunk, he will declare such a man unclean; leprosy has broken out in the burn.
26 But if the hair has kept its colour and there is no shrinking, and the look of the place itself is dark, he will shut the man away for 27 a week, and if in that time he finds that infection has spread in the skin, he will 28 pronounce the man unclean; but if the whiteness has not spread, and shews less plain, the burn is the cause of it, and the man is clean; it is only the scar of a burn.

29 Man or woman suffering from an infection of the head or chin must be 30 examined by the priest, and if the skin has shrunk and the hair gone yellow and thinner than it was, they must be pronounced unclean; there is leprosy in the head or 31 beard. But if he finds the skin level and the hair still dark, they must be shut away 32 for a week, and if he finds that the disfigurement has not spread, and the hair 33 keeps its colour, and the skin is level, the hair must be shaved all round the infected part. For a week more they must be shut 34 away, and if then he finds that the infection is confined to the same spot, and there is no shrinking of the skin, he will declare them clean, and they will be free from defilement when their clothes have 35 been washed. If, after they have been pronounced clean, the infection spreads in the 36 skin, he need not look to see whether the hair has gone yellow; the uncleanness is manifest. But if the infection remains 37 where it was, and the hair is black, he may be sure that the man is healed, and pronounce him clean without scruple.

When whiteness appears on the skin of 38 man or woman, and the priest, examining 39 them, finds it is only a dull whiteness that shews there, he will recognize that it is not leprosy, but ring-worm, and the man or woman is clean.

A man may lose the hair on his crown, 40 and still be clean; may lose the hair on his 41 forehead, and still be clean, despite his baldness. But if in the bald patch on crown 42 or forehead a white or reddish tinge is shewing, the priest who finds it there will 43 hold him unclean beyond all doubt; the bald patch is leprosy.

The man who is infected with leprosy, 44 and segregated at the priest's bidding, must 45 go with rent garments and bared head, his face veiled, crying out, Unclean, unclean.
And still, as long as he remains unclean 46 through leprosy, he must dwell away from the camp, alone.

A garment of wool or linen, that is in- 47 fected in warp or woof, or a skin, or any- 48 thing made of leather, if it is stained with 49 white or reddish spots, is suspect of leprosy and must be shewn to the priest. He will 50 examine it, and shut it away for a week;
and if, looking at it again at the end of that 51 time, he finds that the patch has spread, it is malignant leprosy; he will pronounce the garment, or whatever else is infected, unclean, and it must be destroyed by fire 52 accordingly. But if he finds that the patch 53 has not spread, he will give orders for the infected thing to be washed, and so he will 54 shut it away for a week more. If it shews 55 the same as before, although the patch may not have spread, he will pronounce it unclean and destroy it by fire, as a thing infected, whether outwardly or all through 56 with leprosy. But if the infected patch is less marked after the washing, he will cut 57 it away and separate it from the rest. And if, after that, patches begin to shew where all was once unspotted, it is leprosy spreading this way and that, and the thing must be burnt. If, on the contrary, the infection 58 ceases, the part that is left uncontaminated must be washed in water again, and now it is clean. Such are the rules for pro- 59 nouncing judgement of cleanness or un-cleanness upon infection in any garment of wool or linen, its warp or its woof, as well as any piece of leather-work.¹

14 The Lord also told Moses, This is the ceremonial to be used when a leper is to be pronounced no longer unclean. He must needs present himself before the priest; the priest, therefore, will go out of the camp to find him, and if it appears that leprosy no longer defiles him, he will tell him what offerings to make by way of purgation for himself. These are, two living birds, of such a kind as may be used for food, cedar-wood, and scarlet stuff, and hyssop. One of the birds must have its blood shed over spring water held in an earthenware pot; the one which is left alive must be dipped (together with the cedar-wood, the scarlet stuff, and the hyssop) into the dead bird's blood, and with this the priest must sprinkle the defiled man seven times, to effect his due cleansing. Then the living bird must be allowed to fly away into the open. And now the man must wash his clothes, shave the hair on his body, and bathe in water; so purified, he will enter the camp, but on the condition that he does not go into his tent for a whole week.

On the seventh day he must shave all his hair, head and beard and eyebrows and all, and he must wash again, both his clothes and his body. On the eighth day he will take two lambs and a yearling ewe, all without blemish, three tenths of a bushel of flour, kneaded with oil, for a bloodless offering, and a pint of oil besides. The priest who is pronouncing him clean will bring him into the divine presence, together with these gifts of his, at the door of the tabernacle which bears record of me; and there he will take one of the lambs and offer it as a victim for wrong done. He will take the pint of oil, too, and all the rest, and hold them up in the Lord's presence. The lamb must be immolated on holy ground, where the offerings for faults and the burnt-sacrifices are offered; and the victim for wrong done, like the victim for a fault, becomes the property of the priest; it is set apart for holy uses.

The priest will take some of the blood from this victim which is offered for wrong done, and set a mark with it on the man he is pronouncing clean; on the tip of his right ear, his right thumb, and the great toe of his right foot. Then he will take some of the oil in his left hand, dip a finger of his right hand in it, and sprinkle it seven times in the Lord's presence. The rest of the oil in his left hand he will use to anoint the man he is cleansing; over the victim's blood smeared on ear and finger and toe, and finally on his head. So he will intercede for him in the Lord's presence, and offer, first a sacrifice for his fault, then a burnt-sacrifice; this he will put on the altar, with its accompanying gifts, and so the man will be duly declared clean.

If he is poor, and cannot lay his hand on all the victims aforesaid, he must bring a lamb by way of offering for wrong done, with which the priest will make intercession for him, the tenth of a bushel of flour, kneaded with oil, for a bloodless offering, and a pint of oil, and two turtle-doves or two young pigeons, one by way of offering for his fault, and the other as a burnt-sacrifice. These he will bring before the priest at the tabernacle door in the divine presence, on the eighth day of the cleansing. The priest will take the lamb, the offering for wrong done, and the pint of oil, and hold them up together; then he will immolate the lamb, and set a mark with its blood on the man he is pronouncing clean, on the right ear, the right thumb, the great toe of the right foot. Then he will take some of the oil in his left hand, dip in his right hand, sprinkle the oil seven times in the Lord's presence, anoint the stains on ear, thumb and toe, and pour the rest of the oil in his hand over the head of the man who is being cleansed, to win him the Lord's favour again. Finally he will offer the two birds, whether turtle-dove, or young pigeon; one of them as for a fault and one by way of burnt-sacrifice, together with the gifts that accompany it. Such is the offering to be made by a leper who cannot afford the full price of his cleansing.

This was a further message the Lord gave to Moses and Aaron: When you reach the home I mean to give you in the land of Chanaan, it may be that a house will suffer infection. If so, the owner of it will go and

¹ Throughout this chapter the Hebrew text, followed by the Latin version, uses the same word to express (i) infection doubtful in its nature and (ii) ascertained leprosy.

36 tell the priest that his house is suspect of 37 leprosy; and the priest, before going to ascertain whether it is leprosy or not, will have everything taken out of the house, for fear that all its contents might become defiled. Then he will go in to examine the 38 infection in the house; and if he sees dents in the surface of the walls that are pale or 39 reddish in colour, he will go out of doors and shut the house up for a week. And if, when he comes back to examine it on the seventh day, he finds that the infection has 40 spread, he will order the stones that are infected to be prised out, and thrown into 41 a refuse pit, away from the city; the inside of the house, too, must be scraped all round, and the dust scraped from it must 42 also be scattered over the refuse pit. Then other stones will be put in, in place of the old, and the house will be plastered afresh.

43 If, after the removal of the stones, and 44 the scraping, and the new plastering, the priest comes in and finds that the infection has returned, and the walls are still disfigured with spots, this is malignant le-45 prosy, and the house is unclean. It must be destroyed at once, stone and wood and plaster alike must be thrown into a refuse 46 pit, away from the town. Anyone who has entered it since the priest shut it up will be 47 unclean till evening comes, and anyone who has slept or eaten there must wash his clothes.

48 But if the priest finds that the infection has not spread in the house after the new plastering, he will cleanse it, in token that 49 it is now free of disease. To effect this cleansing, he will take two birds, some cedar-wood, and scarlet stuff, and hyssop, 50 shed the blood of one bird into spring water in an earthenware pot, dip the cedar-51 wood, the scarlet stuff, the hyssop, and the living bird into the water stained with the dead bird's blood, and sprinkle it over the 52 house seven times. So, by the use of blood and water and a living bird and cedar-wood and hyssop and scarlet stuff, the cleansing 53 will be effected; and letting the bird fly away into the open, the priest will make intercession for the house, and it will be duly declared clean.

54 Such are the rules for all leprosy and 55 scab, for the infection that breaks out in 56 garments or in houses, for scars and ulcers, and for shiny patches on the skin that change their colour; such are the means 57 for ascertaining when it is time to declare anything clean or unclean.

15 And the Lord gave Moses and Aaron this message for the Is-2 raelites: The man who has a running of the reins is unclean. And he must still be 3 considered unclean, even though his defilement, at certain times, dries up and causes a stoppage. Any bed he lies on, 4 anything he sits on, becomes unclean. The man who touches his bed, must wash his 5 garments and bathe, and hold himself unclean till sundown; and there is the same 6 washing, and bathing, and uncleaness for the man who sits where he sat; the same 7 washing, and bathing, and uncleaness, for the man who touches him; the same 8 washing, and bathing, and uncleaness for the man on whom his spittle falls. Unclean 9 the saddle on which he has ridden, unclean, till evening comes, everything on 10 which the man so afflicted may rest; the same washing, and bathing, and unclean-11 ness for anyone who carries it in his hands;
 the same washing, and bathing, and un-cleaness for anyone whom he touches, 12 unless he washes his hands first. Any earthen pot he touches must be broken, any bucket of wood he touches, rinsed with water.

If a man so afflicted is healed, he must 13 count seven days from the time of his healing,¹ and then, when he has washed his clothes and his whole body in spring water, he is clean. On the eighth day, he 14 must bring two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, to the door of the tabernacle that bears record of me, and give them to the priest. The priest will sacrifice one as a 15 victim for his fault, and the other as a burnt-sacrifice, and so make intercession for him in the Lord's presence, that he may be clean from the defilement of his body.

The man who loses the seed of pro-16 creation must wash his whole body in water, and remain unclean till evening comes; wash, too, in water his garment of 17 stuff or of leather, and that too, till evening comes, is unclean. If he has had commerce 18 with a woman, she too must wash, and she too, till evening comes, is unclean.

¹ The sense of the Hebrew text is rather 'up to the time of his cleansing'.

19 The woman who loses blood, because her monthly time has come round, must remain a whole week apart; whoever touches her is unclean till sundown, and all she lies upon or sits upon during this time of separation, becomes defiled thereby. The man who touches her bed, must wash his garments, and bathe, and hold himself unclean till evening; and there is the same washing, and bathing, and uncleanness for anyone who touches any piece of furniture on which she has sat down to rest. If a man has commerce with her at her monthly time, he remains unclean for a whole week; unclean, too, is any bed on which he lies.

25 A woman who loses blood continually at other times, or when her monthly time is over, must be considered unclean in the same way, as long as her affliction lasts; unclean the bed she sleeps on, and all that she rests on, unclean, till evening comes, everyone who has touched her, and meanwhile he must wash his garments and bathe in water. If the issue of her blood dries up, she must count seven days from the time of her healing,¹ and on the eighth day she will bring two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, to the priest at the door of the tabernacle. The priest will sacrifice one as a victim for her fault, and the other as a burnt-sacrifice, and so make intercession for her in the Lord's presence over the issue of blood that has defiled her.

31 You must teach the sons of Israel to be on their guard against uncleanness; or they may be punished with death for the irreverence which has profaned my tabernacle, here in their midst. Such are the rules which concern men who are defiled by a running of the reins, or by intercourse with woman, and for women who must remain apart because of their monthly time, women who have a continuous issue of blood, and men with whom such women have commerce.

² According to the Hebrew text, one lot was for the Lord, the other for 'azazel'. The meaning of this word is uncertain; it does not occur in the Bible outside this chapter. It appears in later Jewish literature as the name of an evil spirit; and some think that it has that meaning here, the scapegoat being handed over into the power of an evil spirit, such as might be supposed to inhabit the desert, far from the haunts of men (Tob. 8. 3; Mt. 12. 43). In any case, it is clear that the sins of the people were laid, symbolically, on the head of the goat, so that in discharging it from the camp they discharged themselves from guilt.

16 After the death of Aaron's two sons, that were punished for offering up unhallowed fire, the Lord spoke to Moses giving him a message for his brother Aaron: He must never present himself without due preparation within the sanctuary, behind the veil, where the throne stands above the ark. If he does so, the penalty is death; it is over this shrine that I mean to reveal myself in cloud. And this is the preparation he must make; he must offer a young bullock as a victim for his faults, and a ram by way of burnt-sacrifice. He must be clad in the linen robe, with linen breeches for decency, and must be girt with a linen girdle, and wear the linen mitre on his head; these are the sacred vestments he must put on, after washing himself. And the whole people of Israel must provide him with two goats as victims for their faults, and a ram for burnt-sacrifice.

He will offer the bullock to make intercession for himself and for his family. The two goats he will present before the Lord, at the door of the tabernacle that bears record of me, and will cast lots between them; one is to be the Lord's due, the other is for discharge.² The one chosen by lot to be the Lord's due must be offered for their faults; the one chosen for their discharge must be presented before the Lord alive, to let intercession fall upon it, and then be turned loose in the desert.

So, with due ceremony, he will offer the bullock, making intercession for himself and his family, and immolate it. And now, filling his censer with coals from the altar, and taking a handful of beaten spices for incense, he will pass beyond the veil into the inner sanctuary, putting incense on the coals, so that a cloud of smoke may hide that shrine over the ark, which none may see and live. He will take some of the bullock's blood, too, and sprinkle it with his finger seven times over the eastern end of the sanctuary, opposite the throne.³ And afterwards, when he has immolated the goat for the faults of the people, he will carry some of its blood, too, within the veil, and sprinkle it there opposite the shrine, like the bullock's blood. So he will purify the sanctuary from all the faults the sons of Israel have committed, their transgressions and their uncleanness. With the same ceremony he shall purify the tabernacle that bears the Lord's record, pitched there amongst them, with all the defilement of their dwellings round about.

17 No one must be there in the tabernacle from the time when the high priest enters the inner sanctuary, to make intercession for himself and his family and the whole people of Israel, till the time when he comes out again. And when he comes out to the altar that stands there in the Lord's presence, he must make intercession for himself, pouring the blood of bullock and goat all round the horns of it; and so, sprinkling it with his finger seven times, he must make expiation, and cleanse it from all the defilement incurred by the sons of Israel.

18 Sanctuary, and tabernacle, and altar so cleansed, he has still to offer up the goat that is left alive. He must put both hands on its head, confessing all the sins and transgressions and faults Israel has committed, and laying the guilt of them on its head. And there will be a man standing ready to take it into the desert for him; so the goat will carry away all their sins into a land uninhabited, set at large in the desert.

19 Then Aaron will come back to the tabernacle, and take off the vestments he wore when he entered the sanctuary, and leave them there; he will wash on holy ground, and put on his own garments instead. He will come out, and offer his own burnt-sacrifice, and that of the people, making intercession for himself and for the people both at once, and burn the fat of the transgression-victim on the altar. The man who let loose the goat that was discharged must wash his clothes and bathe before he returns to the camp. As for the transgression-victims, the bullock and the goat, whose blood was carried into the sanctuary to make expiation there, the carcasses must be taken away from the camp and destroyed by fire, skin and flesh and dung together. And the man who burns them, before he returns to the camp, must wash his clothes and bathe like the other.

This ceremony you are to observe for all time. On the tenth day of the seventh month you will keep a fast;¹ no work is to be done by citizen or by alien that day. It is a day of atonement on your behalf, to cleanse you from all fault, and make you clean in the Lord's sight; it must be all repose; so that you can observe the fast, year after year. He who then holds the office of high priest, duly anointed to serve in place of his father, will make atonement, clad in linen robe and sacred vestments; purify sanctuary, tabernacle, altar, priests and people. You will continue for all time to make intercession, once a year, for the children of Israel, and for all the faults they have committed.

And Aaron carried out the commands which the Lord had given to Moses.

17 And the Lord spoke to Moses, bidding him tell Aaron and his sons and all Israel, Here is a commandment the Lord has for you. Any Israelite who kills sheep or ox or goat,² within the camp or without, and does not make an offering to the Lord at the tabernacle door, shall pay for it with his life; blood has flowed, and the shedder of it is lost to his people. Whatever beasts they kill on their farms, the sons of Israel must bring to the priests as victims, consecrating them to the Lord's honour at the tabernacle door, and immolating them as welcome-offerings to him. And the priest will pour out the blood at the altar which stands before the tabernacle, and burn the fats for the Lord to accept the smell of its burning. You have prostituted yourselves to the worship of false gods; to them you must offer victims

² The word translated 'killed', here and in verse 5 below, is one of frequent occurrence in the Mosaic law, and everywhere else it is a sacrificial term, 'immolate'. It is not, therefore, clear whether this regulation applies to all slaughtering of cattle for food; or whether it forbids the private sacrificing of cattle, which might easily degenerate into the idolatry condemned in verse 7. But perhaps at the time of the Exodus, when food was scarce, the killing of a beast was confined to special occasions, such as would call for sacrifice; after the conquest of Palestine, the situation was altered (Deut. 12. 20-22).

no longer. Such is the law they and their 8 descendants must obey for all time; tell them that if any Israelite or any alien living among them offers burnt-sacrifice 9 or victim without bringing it to the door of the tabernacle which bears record of me, and offering it to the Lord, he is lost to his people.

10 Any Israelite, or alien dwelling among you, who consumes the blood when he eats, becomes my enemy; I will sever him 11 from my people. It is the blood that animates all living things, and I have destined it to make atonement for your souls upon the altar, blood for the purgation of your 12 souls. That is why I have warned the sons of Israel that neither they nor the aliens who dwell among them must consume the 13 blood when they eat. Any Israelite, or alien living among you, who hunts down a beast or snares a bird, such as you are allowed to eat, must drain its blood and 14 cover it with earth. Because it animates all living things, I give the sons of Israel this warning: Never, on pain of death, turn it to your own use, the blood that holds the life.

15 Anyone, citizen or alien, who eats what has fallen dead or been the prey of a wild beast, must wash his clothes and bathe in water, and be reckoned unclean till sun-down. Then he will be clean again; 16 but if he does not wash his clothes and bathe himself, he will be held to account for it.

18 And the Lord spoke to Moses 2 bidding him give the sons of Israel this message: I am the Lord your 3 God; it is not for you to live by the customs of that Egyptian land in which you once dwelt, or to imitate the men of Chanaan, the new home I am giving you, and follow 4 their observances. It is my decrees you will execute, my commands you will obey, following them closely; am I not the Lord 5 your God? It is my laws, my decrees you must keep; they give life to the man who 6 lives by them; am I not the Lord? And it is I, the Lord, who tell you that no man is to betake himself to a woman who is near of kin to him, and mate with her.

7 Thou shalt not come between thy father's sheets, and mate with her that bore thee; wouldst thou mate with thy own 8 mother? Thou shalt not mate with her that is thy father's wife; her shame is his.

 9 Thou shalt not mate with thy sister by either parent, born in the same house or 10 born elsewhere. Thou shalt not mate with the daughter of thy own son or daughter; her shame is thine. Thou shalt not mate 11 with any daughter thy father's wife bears him; she is thy sister. Thou shalt not mate 12 with thy father's sister, thy own father's flesh and blood; nor with thy mother's 13 sister, thy own mother's flesh and blood.
 Thou shalt not come between thy uncle's 14 sheets and mate with his wife; she is bound to thee by affinity. Thou shalt not mate 15 with thy daughter-in-law; wouldst thou mate with the wife of thy own son? Thou 16 shalt not mate with thy brother's wife;¹ her shame is his. Thou shalt not mate with 17 a woman and also with her daughter, no, nor with any grand-daughter of hers; they are flesh and blood of hers, and all such 18 commerce is incestuous. Thou shalt not make a concubine of thy wife's sister, mating with her while thy wife still lives.
 Thou shalt not come nigh a woman and 19 mate with her during her monthly time.
 Thou shalt not defile thyself by bedding 20 with thy neighbour's wife.

Thou shalt not yield up any child of 21 thine to be devoted to the false god Moloch, doing dishonour to the name of thy God; am I not the Lord? Thou shalt 22 not have commerce with a man as if it had been with a woman; such commerce is abominable. Thou shalt not defile thyself 23 by commerce with a beast; nor shall a woman allow any beast to have commerce with her; it is foully done.

Do not defile yourselves like the nations 24 I am dispossessing to make room for you;
 the whole land is contaminated by their 25 presence, and I am calling it to account for these ill deeds, till it vomits out its own 26 inhabitants. Citizens alike and aliens, that dwell among you, must observe these laws and decrees I am giving you, and keep 27 clear of all such abominations; the very abominations by which the former inhabitants of the land have contaminated it.
 Be sure that it will vomit you out like those 28 others, if you do as they did. Whoever is 29 guilty of any such abomination is lost to his

¹ That is, presumably, while the brother is still alive; cf. 20. 21 below, and Deut. 25. 5.

30 people. Keep my commandments, and do not defile yourselves by imitating your forerunners; am I not the Lord your God?

2 19 The Lord, too, spoke to Moses, bidding him give the whole company of Israel this message: You must be men set apart, as I am set apart, I, the Lord your God. Worshippers of such a God, you must reverence father and mother, and keep my day of rest; worshippers of such a God, you must not betake yourselves to idols, make molten images at your pleasure.

5 If you immolate a victim by way of welcome-offering, to win the Lord's favour, eat it on the day of its immolation, or the day after; whatever remains on the third day must be destroyed by fire. The man who eats of it when two days have passed defiles it and displeases me; he will be held to account for profaning what is consecrated to the Lord; he shall be lost to his people.

9 When thou reapest the crops on thy land, do not rase all to the level of the ground,¹ or pick up the scattered ears; do not hoard up the clusters or the grapes that have fallen. Leave something for poor men and wanderers to glean; remember what God you worship.

11 Do not steal, and lie, and deceive one another. Do not violate the honour of thy God by swearing falsely in my name; the Lord's name. Do not wrong thy neighbour or despoil him by violence; do not withhold the wages of thy hired servants till morning comes. Do not miscall the deaf, or put a stumbling-block in the blind man's way; thou hast the vengeance of thy God to fear; the Lord's vengeance. Do not pervert justice by giving false awards, whether by taking a man's poverty into account,² or by flattering the great; give every man his just due. Do not whisper calumnies in the public ear, and swear away thy neighbour's life; the Lord hears thee. Do not nurse resentment against thy brother; put thyself in the right by confronting him with his fault. Do not seek revenge, or bear a grudge for wrong done to thee by thy fellow-citizens; thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself; thy Lord is his.³

Keep true to my commandments; do not mate any beast of thine with one of another sort, or sow thy field with a mixed crop, or wear garments woven of two different fabrics.⁴

If a man has commerce with a slave-woman promised in marriage, but not yet redeemed or set free, both shall be beaten, but they shall not be put to death, as if she were a free woman. The man must offer a ram to the Lord at the tabernacle door for wrong done, and so the priest will make intercession before the Lord for the fault he has committed, and the Lord will be merciful, and pardon his fault.

When you reach your own country and plant fruit-trees there, you must strip them of the fruit they bear,⁵ as something unclean, not for your eating, till the fourth year; then you must offer the whole crop to the Lord as an acceptable sacrifice. You must not gather the fruit on them for your own eating till the fifth year; the Lord your God comes first.

Do not eat anything that has the blood still in it.

Do not consult omens, or pay regard to dreams. There must be no tonsuring of heads and mutilating of beards, no gashing your bodies when a man dies, no branding them with marks and designs; the Lord forbids it. Do not expose any daughter of thine to dishonour; so thou wilt bring dishonour on the whole land, and fill it with lewdness. Keep your observance for my sabbaths, your reverence for my sanctuary. Do not betake yourselves to sorcerers, or consult wizards, to your defilement; you are the Lord's worshippers.

Rise up from thy seat in reverence for grey hairs; honour the aged, as thou dost fear God, the Lord thy God. If an alien comes to dwell in your land, and settles down among you, do not treat him disdainfully; welcome him as if he were native born, and do him kindness as if he were one of yourselves, remembering that you were aliens once, in the land of Egypt; the Lord your God remembers. There must be no tampering with justice, with the rule or the weight or the measure you employ; an even scale, a true balance, a full bushel, a full pint-measure; ever just the Lord your God is, that rescued you from Egypt.

Remember all these laws, all these decrees of mine, and live by them; the Lord's decrees.

20 And the Lord spoke to Moses, giving him this message for the sons of Israel: If any Israelite, or alien living among you, sacrifices a child of his to the false god Moloch, his life must pay for it; he must be stoned publicly. On such a man my ban rests, and I will not let him live among my people any longer, once he has outraged my sanctuary, dragged my holy name in the dust, by sacrificing his child to Moloch. Does the people neglect its duty, defy my commandments? Does it condone the sacrifice, and refuse to kill him? Then shall my ban rest upon all his kindred too, and I will rid my people of the man who played the wanton with Moloch, and all who consented to it. If anyone betakes himself to sorcerers and wizards, on him too my ban shall rest for prostituting himself to such arts, and I will rid my people of him. Keep yourselves apart, and be a holy people; remembering what God you worship. Keep these commandments of mine and live by them; I, the Lord, have set you apart.

If a man curses father or mother, his life must pay for it; he has put himself beyond hope of pardon,¹ in cursing father or mother.

If a man commits adultery by having commerce with his neighbour's wife, the lives of both, adulterer and adulteress, must pay for it. If a man has commerce with his step-mother, coming between his own father's sheets, the lives of both must pay for it; they must find no mercy. No mercy must be shewn when a man has commerce with his daughter-in-law; order has been violated, and both must die. No mercy, either, when a man has commerce with another man as if he had been a woman; either is guilty of a foul deed, and both must die. The man who mates with daughter and mother both, is guilty of a foul deed; he and they must be burnt alive, and such guilt as theirs be found in your midst no longer.² If a man has commerce with a beast, his life must pay for it; the beast too must be killed; and the woman who allows a beast to have commerce with her, must die with the beast; no mercy must be shewn to any such. If a man takes his own sister to his bed, whether she is his father's daughter or his mother's, to her shame and his, it is great disgrace; both must be held to account for it, and be put to death publicly, for bringing shame on one another. If a man has commerce with a woman in her monthly time, and intrudes upon the flowing of her blood, both must be lost to their people.

Thou shalt not mate with any sister thy father or thy mother; the man who does this dishonours his own flesh and blood, and both will be held to account for it. If a man has commerce with the wife of his father's brother, or his mother's brother, bringing shame on his own kindred, man and woman will be held to account; they shall not live to breed children. The man who takes his brother's wife in marriage does a forbidden thing, bringing shame on his own brother; children they shall have never.³

Remember these laws and decrees of mine, and live by them, or you too will be vomited up again by the land you are soon to invade and occupy; it is not for you to imitate the practices of the nations I am driving out to make room for you. Was it not these very practices that made me their enemy? And now, if I bid you take possession of their land, a land all milk and honey, and make it your home, it is because I, the Lord your God, have set you apart

² It is not clear why this special punishment is reserved for this special offence. The word 'alive' is not found in the Hebrew text; and we find a sentence of stoning followed by burning in Jos. 7. 25.

25 among all the nations of the world; and you too must set what is clean apart from what is unclean, whether beast or bird; you are not to incur defilement over such beasts and birds and other living things as 26 I have bidden you hold abominable. You must be set apart for my service, as I am set apart, I, your God, who have chosen you out among all the nations of the world, to belong to me.
 27 If man or woman is possessed by a spirit of witchcraft or divination, their lives must pay for it by stoning; they have put themselves beyond hope of pardon.

21 The Lord also spoke to Moses giving him a message for the priests, the sons of Aaron: When a fellow-citizen dies, a priest is not to expose himself to defilement, unless it be the funeral of one of his near kin, father or mother, son or daughter, a brother of his or a sister that is a virgin unwed. Nay, he must not expose himself to defilement even for the ruler among the people.¹

5 Priests are not to shave their heads or beards, or make gashes in their skin for mourning. They are men set apart for their God, and must never bring reproach on his name; they burn incense² to the Lord, offer their God his consecrated loaves, and shall they not be holy? They must not wed harlots, or women dishonoured, or those whom their husbands have rejected, these men vowed to the service of their God, 8 who set out the consecrated loaves before him. They must be set apart, as I, the Lord, am set apart, the Lord that hallows 9 them. If the daughter of a priest is convicted of playing the harlot, and bringing dishonour on her father's name, she must be given to the flames.

10 The high priest, that one who is chief among his brethren, whose brow has been anointed with the holy oil, and his hands consecrated for the priestly office, who wears the sacred vestments, may never 11 bare his head, or rend his garments, or go near a dead body upon any occasion. Though it be his father or mother, he must not expose himself to defilement, but keep 12 within the Lord's holy precincts, so as not to bring defilement on them, a man consecrated to his God by the holy oil that anointed him; the Lord's own priest. And 13 when he marries, he must marry a virgin; not a widow, or a rejected wife, or a harlot, 14 or a woman dishonoured; she must be a virgin of his own clan,³ so that the stock of 15 his family is not debased by the blood of common folk; I, the Lord, have set him apart.

The Lord, too, spoke to Moses, bidding 16 him tell Aaron: No descendant of thine that has any blemish shall be allowed to offer his God the consecrated loaves, nor 18 to come forward and do him service. Such are the blind, the lame, one whose nose is deformed in size or twisted awry,⁴ one who 19 has a crushed hand or foot, is hunch-backed or bear-eyed,⁵ or wall-eyed, has a 20 continual scab or itch on him, or a rupture. No one of the priestly line of Aaron who 21 has such a blemish must come forward to sacrifice to the Lord, or offer his God the consecrated loaves. He is allowed to eat 22 the bread which is offered in the sanctuary, but he must have no access to the veil,⁶ 23 must not go near the altar; my sanctuary must not be profaned by any blemish. I, the Lord, have set priests apart for myself.

All these commands Moses handed on 24 to Aaron, and to his sons, and to the people of Israel.

22 And the Lord spoke to Moses giving him this command for 2 Aaron and his sons: They must beware what use they make of the offerings brought by Israel; they must not profane the honour of these consecrated things; of things consecrated to the Lord. Tell them, 3 tell all who follow, that if any of their race comes near these sacred offerings in a state of defilement, he is lost to my service; the

¹ The sense of this verse in the Hebrew text is uncertain.

² According to the Hebrew text, 'offerings'. In this chapter, by a metaphor, the priests seem to be thought of as servants waiting at their master's table.

³ Literally, 'his own people', but the context seems to indicate that the Latin version uses the word here in a restricted sense. The Hebrew text has simply 'She must be a virgin, of his own people, and he must not dishonour his race among his people'.

⁴ The Hebrew text is generally understood as meaning 'one who is mutilated (probably in the face) or has an over-developed limb'.

⁵ The word in the Hebrew text seems to mean 'withered'.

4 service of the Lord. Any of Aaron's race who is a leper, or has a running at the reins, must cease to have any share of the hallowed food, until he is cured. Anyone of them who has touched a thing defiled by death, or has lost the seed of procreation, 5 or perhaps has touched some creeping animal, or anything whose touch defiles, 6 remains unclean till sundown, so that he must not share the holy food. Not till he 7 has bathed in water, and waited for the sun to go down, may he enjoy his privilege of 8 sharing in it. The priests must not defile themselves by eating anything that falls dead, or has been a prey of a wild beast; 9 they are the Lord's priests. They must observe my commands, and commit no fault; death shall overtake them, there in my sanctuary, if they profane it. It is I, the Lord, who have set them apart.

10 No one that is not of their family may share the holy food, no guest the priest entertains, no hired servant of his; only a slave bought with his money or born in his 12 house has the privilege. If a priest's daughter marries out of her clan, she loses 13 her right to these hallowed offerings; but if she becomes a widow, or is rejected by her husband and comes home childless, she may eat with her family as when she was still a maid. It is only those who belong to another clan that may not share it. 14 If anyone partakes of the holy food through inadvertence, he must go to the sanctuary and make restitution to the priest of the same quantity, with a fifth part added. 15 There must be no profaning what the sons 16 of Israel have offered to their God; they will be held to account for it, if they eat this holy food. It is I, the Lord, who have set my priests apart.

17 And the Lord spoke to Moses bidding him tell Aaron and his sons and all Israel: When any Israelite, or any alien dwelling among you, would offer the Lord burnt-sacrifice, either in payment of a vow, or out 19 of devotion, and must present it through your hands, it must be a male victim, ox or 20 sheep or goat, without blemish. If it has any blemish, it is unacceptable, and must not be offered. And anyone who makes the 21 Lord a welcome-offering, either in payment of a vow or out of devotion, must offer an ox or a sheep that is without blemish, if it is to be acceptable. It must 22 have no blemish of any sort; if it is blind, or crippled, or scarred, disfigured by blisters or scab or mange, you must not offer it to the Lord, or burn it on the Lord's 23 altar. Ox or sheep that has ears or tail cut off may be offered out of devotion, but not 24 in payment of a vow.¹ No beast that has suffered crushing or bruising or gelding may be offered to the Lord; there must be 25 no such custom in your country. You must not offer to your God either bread or any other gift that comes from an alien;² such gifts are tainted, there is a blemish in them, they shall find no acceptance with you.

And the Lord gave Moses this message: 26 Calf, or lamb, or kid, when it is newly born, 27 must be allowed to suck for a whole week; only on the eighth day and afterwards may it be offered to the Lord. Cow or ewe, the 28 dam must not be slaughtered on the same day as its young. When you sacrifice 29 a victim to the Lord by way of welcome-offering, to win his favour, you must eat it 30 the same day, none must be left over till the morrow; the Lord will have his precepts observed. Remember these com- 31 mandments of mine, and live by them; the Lord's commandments. Do not dishonour 32 my holy name; it is among the sons of Israel that I would vindicate my holiness, I, the Lord, who have set you apart for myself, and rescued you from the land of 33 Egypt, so as to be your God; am I not the Lord?

23 The Lord also spoke to Moses, bidding him tell the sons of Is- 2 rael: These are the feasts which the Lord will have you proclaim as specially set 3 apart.³ You have six days to work in; the seventh day must be kept set apart as a day that is all repose; you must refrain from all work that day, and there must be repose in every dwelling-place of yours, in the Lord's honour. And these are the feasts you must observe as consecrated to the Lord when certain times of year come round.

¹ 'Has ears or tail cut off'; the Hebrew text probably signifies, 'has an over-developed or an under-developed limb'.

² That is, one resident abroad (see verse 18 above). The meaning of the Hebrew text appears to be, 'If any alien offers one of the things mentioned as bread (i.e. food) for the Lord'; it is not clear whether the sense is that an alien must not (any more than an Israelite) offer any victim which has a blemish, or that no alien may offer ox, sheep, or goat in sacrifice.

On the evening of the fourteenth day of the first month, the Lord's Pasch begins; and with the fifteenth day of the month comes the feast of unleavened bread; for a whole week you will eat your bread without leaven. This first day you shall hold in great honour and reverence, doing no servile work on it; you will offer burnt-sacrifice to the Lord, and these sacrifices shall continue all through the week. The seventh day, too, is one which is to be kept with special honour and reverence, and no servile work is to be done.

And next, the Lord spoke to Moses, bidding him give this message to the Israelites: When you have reached the land I mean to make yours, you will have a harvest to gather in. You must bring sheaves of corn, the first-fruits of your crop, to the priest, and he, the day following the sabbath, will consecrate each sheaf, lifting it up in the Lord's presence to win his favour for you. The same day on which the sheaf is hallowed, a yearling lamb without blemish must be offered to the Lord as a burnt-sacrifice; and with it, as a bloodless offering, a peck of flour, kneaded with oil, to burn before the Lord and please him with the smell of its burning. And you must add a quart of wine by way of libation. You must not eat bread or pearl-barley or porridge made from the new crop until you have brought your God this offering. This is a law you must observe at all times and everywhere.

From that day, the next after the sabbath, when the sheaf of first-fruits was offered, you will count seven full weeks; and on the day after the end of the seventh week, that is, on the fiftieth day, you will offer the Lord a sacrifice out of your new harvesting. Each household must provide two loaves by way of first-fruits; a peck of flour cooked with leaven as first-fruits given to the Lord. With the loaves, you will offer seven yearling lambs without blemish, a calf chosen from the herd, and two rams; a burnt-sacrifice with your gifts to accompany it, for the Lord to accept the smell of its burning. And you must sacrifice a goat as a transgression-victim, and two yearling lambs by way of welcome-offering. These the priest will lift in the Lord's presence together with the first-fruits, and they shall be for his own use. You must keep this day with great honour and reverence, doing no servile work on it; that is a law you must observe at all times and everywhere. And when you reap your land, you will not rase all to the ground, or gather the stray ears; you will leave them for the poor man and the wanderer to glean; remember what God you worship.¹

And next, the Lord spoke to Moses, bidding him tell the Israelites: You must keep the first day of the seventh month as a day of rest; it shall be proclaimed holy with blowing of trumpets, to keep the Lord in mind of you. You must cease from all work, and offer the Lord burnt-sacrifice. And moreover (so ran the Lord's word to Moses) the tenth day of this seventh month is the day you are to honour by making atonement; it will be proclaimed holy, and you will fast on it, as well as offering the Lord burnt-sacrifice. During this day you are to do no servile work; it is a day of atonement, to win the Lord's mercy for you. If anyone does not fast that day, he is lost to his people; and I will rid the people, too, of anyone who does any work on it. It must be an unalterable rule with you at all times and everywhere to cease work on that day; it is to be all repose. The fast will begin on the evening of the ninth day, and from evening to evening you will rest.

And the Lord also spoke to Moses giving him this message for the Israelites: From the fifteenth day of this seventh month onwards, you will keep, for a whole week, the feast of Tent-dwelling. The first day is to be held in all honour and reverence; you will do no servile work on it. On each of the seven days you will offer the Lord burnt-sacrifice, and the eighth day too you must keep with all honour and reverence, with burnt-sacrifices to the Lord; the people must assemble together, and no servile work is to be done.

These are the Lord's feasts, which you must proclaim with honour and reverence,

bringing the Lord your offerings, burnt-sacrifice and the gifts that go with it, as the rite of each day prescribes; to make no mention of the sabbath, and of those offerings which you will make to the Lord in performance of a vow, or out of devotion.

This is how you will celebrate your week of feasting in the Lord's honour, at the time when the last of your crops have been gathered in, from the fifteenth day of the seventh month onwards. The first and the eighth days will be all repose. And on the first day you will pluck fruit from some favourite tree, and branches of palm, leafy boughs, and osiers from the river banks, and so keep holiday in the presence of the Lord your God. For a whole week every year you will honour this observance, making it a law at all times and everywhere.
It is to be kept in the seventh month, and for seven days you will live in arbours; the whole race of Israel will become tent-dwellers, to remind those who come after you that I bade the sons of Israel dwell in tents when I rescued them from the land of Egypt; I, the Lord your God.

So Moses gave word to the Israelites about the feasts they were to celebrate in the Lord's honour.

24 And the Lord said to Moses, Bid the sons of Israel bring thee oil of the olive, pure and clear, to feed at all times the lamps before the veil, where the ark bears record of me in the tabernacle that attests my covenant. Aaron shall set them there to burn before the Lord from evening to morning; a rite you shall observe continually, age after age. They shall be set there always in the Lord's presence, on the lamp-stand that is of pure gold.

Take flour, too, and bake twelve loaves of it, a peck of flour to each of them; these must be set on the table of pure gold that stands there before the Lord, six on each side of it. And put grains of fine incense on them; the bread is to be a token-sacrifice to the Lord. Every sabbath day new loaves shall be set there, Israel's covenanted gift in perpetuity; the old will be for the use of Aaron and his sons, who are to eat them on holy ground; they are set apart for holy uses, reserved out of the Lord's offerings as the prerogative of the priests for ever.

There was a man who had been born in the camp of Israel, his mother an Israelite, his father an Egyptian; and this man, quarrelling there with a true-born Israelite, blasphemed the Lord's name in heaping curses upon him. So they brought him before Moses. (His mother's name was Salumith, daughter to Dabri, of the tribe of Dan.) And he was put under guard, while they waited to know the Lord's mind concerning him.

And this was the word the Lord gave Moses: Take the blasphemer beyond the confines of the camp; let all those who were listening lay their hands on his head, and let the whole people put him to death by stoning. Tell the Israelites this: The man who curses his God will be held to account for it; he blasphemed the Lord's name, and he must die. Be he citizen or stranger, he must be stoned by the whole people; death for the blasphemer. Death, too, for anyone who smites a man and kills him. If he injures a beast, he can make it good; one beast will do as well as another;
but if he causes injury to one of his fellow-countrymen, he must pay for it in the same coin, making amends for broken limb with broken limb, for eye with eye, for tooth with tooth; the loss he inflicted, he must undergo. Restitution for harm done to a beast; for harm done to a man, punishment. Your award must be the same, whether it was citizen or stranger that did the wrong; it is a just God you worship.

So Moses gave word to the Israelites,
and they, obedient to the Lord's command, took the blasphemer beyond the confines of the camp, and there stoned
him.

25 And there, on mount Sinai, the Lord spoke to Moses, bidding him give these commands to the sons of Israel. When you reach the land I mean to make yours, there will be times of repose to be kept in the Lord's honour. For six years thou mayest sow thy land, for six years thou mayest prune thy vineyard, and gather in its fruit; in the seventh year the land must have rest, lie fallow in the Lord's honour; no field must be sown, no vineyard pruned. Thou shalt not make a harvest of the land's aftergrowth, or hoard up, at vintage time, the dedicated grapes, in 6 this year when all is repose;¹ thou shalt leave them to be sustenance, as need arises, for thyself, thy slaves and slave-women, thy hired labourers, and the aliens in thy household; for thy beasts of burden, too, and for thy cattle, the aftergrowth shall provide food enough.

8 Of these cycles of seven years thou shalt count seven, forty-nine years in all, and then, on the tenth day of the seventh month, the day of atonement, there shall be sounding of trumpets all through the land. The fiftieth year thou shalt set apart, by proclaiming release to all that dwell in thy country; it is the year of jubilee, in which every man comes into his own lands again, and is restored to his old home. In this fiftieth year, the year of jubilee, thou shalt neither sow crops nor make a harvest of the aftergrowth, nor gather in the dedicated grapes; that would profane the jubilee; all must be eaten as it comes to hand.

13 In the year of jubilee, everyone will come into his own lands again. If, then, thou art selling land to one of thy fellow-countrymen, or buying it from him, do not drive a hard bargain with him. If thou art buying, take into account the number of years since the jubilee, and pay him according to what value there is in the remaining harvests. If many years are still to run before the next jubilee, the price will be higher; if few, the price must be brought down. It is but the succession of so many harvests that he is selling thee. Do not take advantage of your own fellow-countrymen; each of you has a divine vengeance to reckon with; the vengeance of the Lord, your God.

18 Do my bidding, remember the decrees I make, and carry them out; so you shall remain secure in your possession of the land; such crops it will bear as shall give you food to your hearts' content, shall deliver you, come what enemy may, from fear of famine. Would you ask, how you are to live in the seventh year, since you have neither sowed nor gathered in crops? Be assured that in the sixth year my blessing shall be upon the land, and it will yield food for three years to come; you will still

The land must not be sold in perpetuity; it is mine, and you come into it as strangers whom I have settled there. Nothing that is yours must be sold but on the condition that it can be redeemed. If thy brother-Israelite falls on evil days, and must sell thee his little plot of ground, his next of kin, if he will, may redeem what was sold. Or, if he has no near kinsman, but is able to find the money himself, let him pay the sale price, less the value of the crops since the time of the sale, and so recover possession. If he cannot find the money, then the buyer will remain in possession till the year of jubilee comes; that year, all which has been sold comes back to its true master, who held it in earlier days.

The man who sells a house within the walls of a city, is free to effect its redemption till a year has passed; if it remains unredeemed at the end of the year, it passes into the possession of the man who bought it, and of his heirs in perpetuity; there is no redeeming it now, even in the year of jubilee. But if the house stands in some unwall'd village, there is the same right of redemption as if it were land; it will return to its true master in the year of jubilee, if he has not redeemed it first. The houses which the Levites own in their cities can always be redeemed, and if they are not redeemed they return to their masters in the jubilee year; that is because the Levites have been granted their cities in lieu of lands such as their brethren enjoy. The land round their cities must never be sold; it is their inalienable property.

If thy brother-Israelite falls on evil days, or his strength fails him, and thou givest him lodging as if he were some alien guest of thine, thou shalt not claim interest over and above what thou hast spent on him. Thou hast the vengeance of thy God to fear; see to it that thy brother has freedom to lodge with thee. It is not for thee to receive interest on what thou spendest, and entertain him to thy own profit. Bethink you how I, the Lord your God, rescued you from Egypt and gave you a home in Chanaan, to make you mine.

39 And if thy brother-Israelite is brought by poverty to sell his own liberty to thee, do not submit him to bondage with thy slaves; let him work in thy household as if he were a hired servant or a free alien, till the year of jubilee comes. Then, with his children, he must be restored to his kindred and to his ancestral lands. The Israelites know no master but me, their rescuer from Egypt; they must not be bought and sold like slaves; do not use thy power over him, then, to treat him ill, as thou fearest God's vengeance. Your men-slaves and women-slaves must come from the nations round about you; or they must be aliens who have come to dwell among you, or children of theirs born on your soil; these you may hold as chattels, passing them on to your children by right of inheritance, as belonging to you in perpetuity; but you must not lord it over your brother-Israelites.

47 If an alien comes to dwell among you and grows rich, and one of thy brother-Israelites sells his liberty to this man, or to some descendant of his, there is still opportunity for him to be redeemed after the sale. He may be redeemed by any of his clan, uncle or cousin or kinsman by blood or kinsman by affinity. Nay, if he can lay hands on the money, he may redeem himself. In doing so, he will reckon up the number of years from the time of his sale to the next jubilee, and divide the price he was sold for by the number of years, as if he was a hireling paid yearly wages. If there are many years to run before the jubilee, he must pay the full price for them; if there are few, he will settle his account by paying his master the value of those few years' work. Full allowance must be made for the years he has served already; thou shalt not stand by and see him treated unjustly. And if, even so, he cannot find the price of his redemption, in the year of jubilee he and his children shall go free. 55 They are no one's servants but mine, these sons of Israel whom I rescued from the land of Egypt.

26 I am the Lord your God; and if I, the Lord, am your God, you must not make yourselves idols or carved figures, or set up monuments or engraved stones in any part of your country, so as to pay them worship. It is for you to observe my sabbaths, to reverence my sanctuary; the Lord's sanctuary. If you live by my law, if you remember my commands and obey them, rain shall fall on you when fall it should; the land will yield its increase, and the trees will be bowed with fruit, threshing not done with by vintage time, or vintage by seed-time; you shall have food to your hearts' content. Surely you shall hold your lands; sleep safe in your beds, with peace on all your frontiers. I will rid you, too, of ravenous beasts, and never the sword shall lay your country waste. You shall rout your enemies, and beat them down before you; five of you putting a hundred aliens to flight, and a hundred of you ten thousand; so shall your enemies bite the dust at your approach. Under the eye of my favour you shall increase and multiply, all my promises to you I will make good; ever the old harvest shall suffice, till you rid yourselves of it to make room for the new. I will make my dwelling among you, and never shall my love cast you off, still coming and going in the midst of you, I your God, and you my people. Was it not I, the Lord your God, that rescued you from your masters in Egypt, struck the chains from your necks, and gave you the upright carriage of free men?

Will you refuse me a hearing? Will you leave all my commands unfulfilled? Will you defy my laws, let my decrees go for nothing, neglect my bidding, annul my covenant with you? If so, this shall be my answer to you. I will be quick to punish you with dearth, and send fever to dim your eyes and waste your lives away; your crops shall be sown in vain, for the enemy to consume them. You shall feel my displeasure, when you are beaten down before your enemies, when you submit to tyrants who hate you, when you take flight before ever your foes attack.

And if you still refuse obedience, I will exact sevenfold punishment for your sins, till I have tamed this stubborn pride of yours. The skies shall be iron above you, and the earth bronze; all your labour will be spent in vain, earth will yield you no harvest, and the trees no fruit. Cross me, 21 refuse me a hearing, and I will add fresh plagues, in sevenfold punishment of your sins. I will send wild beasts to prey upon you and your cattle, till you are few in number, and your roads lie deserted. And if you refuse to be chastened, and cross me still, I will cross you in my turn, punishing your sins sevenfold. I will let war loose upon you in return for breaking your covenant with me; and when you take refuge in the cities, I will send pestilence among you. And soon you will be fain to surrender to your enemies, when I have cut off your supply of bread, so that ten women can bake in one oven, and dole out the bread by weight to men that eat and are still hungry.

Will you refuse me a hearing, will you cross me, even then? If so, I will cross you in my turn, hot with anger, plaguing you sevenfold for your sins, till you must needs eat the flesh of your own sons and daughters. I will destroy your hill-shrines, break your idols, and where your idols have fallen, you too will fall. Such will be my loathing for you that I will turn your cities into a wilderness, and your holy places into a desert; the fragrance of your sacrifices will be acceptable to me no more. I will make a havoc of your land, so that your very enemies, as they come to dwell there, will stand aghast. For yourselves, I will scatter you wide among the nations, and my sword shall be at work on what you have left behind you, turning your land into a desert, your cities into ruins. Then, in those days of desolation, your land will enjoy a sabbath indeed; while you are far away, exiled among your enemies, it will be at rest, it will repose in a sabbath of utter loneliness, that land which was never given rest by any sabbath of yours, while you dwelt there. Those of you who are left will be faint-hearted in the lands of your enemies, ready to take flight at the fall of a leaf, as if it were a sword threatening them, prostrate before ever their foes attack, stumbling over one another as if routed in battle, so little heart will be left among you to withstand your enemies. You will be lost among the Gentiles, swallowed up by a hostile country. Those few who live on will live on to pine away, still unpardoned, exiles in a land that hates them, in punishment for their sins, punishment for the sins of their fathers. So it must be, until they confess their sins and the sins of those fathers of theirs who rebelled against me and crossed me. I must cross them still, condemning them to exile in a land that hates them, until those defiled hearts learn to be ashamed.¹

Then they will make atonement for their sins, and I will remember my covenant with Jacob, Isaac, and Abraham, remember the land which they have left, sunk now in the enjoyment of its long repose, uninhabited because of their sins. They will make atonement at last for their sin in rejecting my decrees, forgetting my law. And it will prove that all the while, even when they were exiled among their enemies, they were not rejected, they were not forgotten altogether; I would not let them perish, would not annul my covenant with them. No, I am the Lord their God, and I will bethink me of the covenant I made long ago, when I rescued them from Egypt under the eyes of the Gentiles, and proclaimed myself the God who protects them, I, the Lord.

Such were the decrees and the laws by which the Lord bound the sons of Israel to himself on mount Sinai, with Moses for his spokesman.

27 And the Lord spoke to Moses giving him this message for the Israelites: If anyone makes a vow by which he promises to God a life that belongs to him, he must pay a fixed ransom. A man between the ages of twenty and sixty must pay fifty silver pieces by sanctuary reckoning, and a woman of the same age must pay thirty. Between the ages of five and twenty, a boy must pay twenty silver pieces, a girl ten. From the age of one month to the age of five years, five silver pieces will be the price for a boy and three for a girl. A man of sixty or over will pay fifteen pieces, a woman of the same age ten. If the maker of the vow is poor, and cannot pay the full price, he must present himself before the priest, and pay whatever the priest judges to be within his means.

If anyone vows such a beast as is fit to be immolated in the Lord's honour, that beast is consecrated, and there is no exchanging better for worse, or worse for better; if he sacrifices one beast in exchange for another, that other is none the less forfeit. If it is some unclean beast, which cannot be offered to the Lord in sacrifice, it must be brought before the priest, who will fix its value, according as he thinks it to be good or bad of its kind; and if the worshipper would pay to redeem it, he must add on a fifth part to this valuation.

If a man vows to consecrate his house to the Lord, the priest shall examine it and decide its worth. The valuation he makes shall be the price assigned to it, and if the worshipper would redeem it, he must pay that price and a fifth besides, to recover possession of the house.

If a man vows to consecrate to the Lord some piece of land which is part of his patrimony, it must be valued according to the worth of its yield; if it takes eight bushels to seed it, the price fixed will be fifty silver pieces. If he vows the field in the first year of a jubilee period, it must be estimated at its full worth; but if some time has passed, then the priest will count up the years still left before the jubilee comes, and will lower the price accordingly. And if the worshipper would redeem it, he must pay that price and a fifth besides, to recover the field. If he does not wish to redeem it, and it is sold to some other, the worshipper has no further opportunity of redeeming it; and when jubilee time comes round, it will be forfeit to the Lord; a consecrated piece of ground belongs to the priests by right. If the piece of land consecrated to the Lord was bought, and not part of the worshipper's ancestral property, then the priest will reckon its value according to the number of years till jubilee time, and the worshipper will pay that sum to the Lord; when the jubilee comes, it will go back to its former owner, who sold it, since it is part of his patrimony. Every valuation must be made by sanctuary reckoning. The silver piece is worth twenty pence.

First-born creatures, which belong to the Lord already, cannot be the subject of a vow or a consecration; ox or sheep, it belongs to the Lord by right. But if it is the first-born of some unclean animal, thou, the priest, shalt put a value on it; if the worshipper would redeem it, let him pay that price and a fifth besides, if not, let it be sold at the price thou hast reckoned.

What is forfeit to the Lord, whether man or beast or piece of ground, can neither be sold nor be redeemed; once forfeit, it is set apart for holy uses, consecrated to the Lord.¹ No human life that is forfeit can be redeemed; death is the only way.

The tenth part of what the land yields, whether grain crop or fruit from the trees, belongs to the Lord, and is consecrated to him; if anyone would redeem his tithe, he must pay a fifth part besides. There will be tithes, too, of oxen and sheep and goats; every tenth beast, as they pass under the herdsman's rod, must be consecrated to the Lord. No choice must be made of good or bad, and there must be no exchanging one beast for another. If any exchange is made, both beasts are forfeit to the Lord, and there is no redemption.

Such are the commands the Lord gave Moses on mount Sinai, to be proclaimed to the sons of Israel.

¹ The word 'forfeit' is elsewhere used of persons or things placed under a public ban (cf. Num. 21. 2-3), and the same custom may be alluded to here. But the bearing of verses 28 and 29 is obscure.

THE BOOK OF NUMBERS

IN the second year after the escape from Egypt, on the first day of the second month, the Lord spoke to Moses in the tabernacle which attested his covenant, there in the desert of Sinai, giving him this message: Register the whole people of Israel by their clans and their households¹ and their several names, all that are of the male sex, of twenty years or more. Count up, thou and Aaron, the warriors of Israel by their companies; and from each tribe you shall have one man to help you, the head of a household and of a clan. These are their names; Elisur son of Sedeur for Ruben, Salamiel son of Surisaddai for Simeon, Nahasson son of Aminadab for Juda, Nathanael son of Suar for Issachar, Eliab son of Helon for Zabulon; and among the descendants of Joseph, Elisama son of Ammiud for Ephraim, and Gamaliel son of Phadassur for Manasses. For Benjamin, Abidan son of Gedeon; for Dan, Ahiezer son of Ammisaddai; for Aser, Phegiel son of Ochrán; for Gad, Eliasaph son of Duel; for Nephthali, Ahira son of Enan. These were the men chosen out of the whole multitude to represent their tribes and clans, the leaders of Israel's host. They were summoned by Moses and Aaron in the presence of the whole multitude, assembled there on the first day of the second month, and together they made a register by clans and households and families and persons, enrolling each man who was twenty years old or more. All alike were counted, there in the desert of Sinai, as the Lord had bidden Moses count them.

Clan and household that came down from Ruben, Israel's first-born, could muster warriors of twenty years and more, forty-six thousand five hundred. Of Simeon, fifty-nine thousand three hundred. Of Gad, forty-five thousand six hundred and fifty. Of Juda, seventy-four thousand six hundred. Of Issachar, fifty-four thousand four hundred. Of Zabulon, fifty-seven thousand four hundred. Among Joseph's descendants, of Ephraim, forty thousand five hundred; of Manasses, thirty-two thousand two hundred. Of Benjamin, thirty-five thousand four hundred. Of Dan, sixty-two thousand seven hundred. Of Aser, forty-one thousand five hundred. Of Nephthali, fifty-three thousand four hundred.² Such was the register Moses and Aaron and the twelve chiefs of Israel made, household by household and family by family; so that the whole muster-roll of warriors in Israel, twenty years old or more, by their households and families, was six hundred and three thousand five hundred and fifty men.

But no family in the tribe of Levi was counted in the reckoning; the Lord had said to Moses, Do not count the tribe of Levi, or register them among the sons of Israel. Give them charge of the tabernacle that bears record of me, all its appurtenances and all that goes with its worship. It is they who will carry the tabernacle with its appurtenances, they who will attend to the tabernacle and pitch their tents about it. The Levites will take the tabernacle down when the order is given for marching, and set it up when the order is given for encamping; no one else must come near it, on pain of death. Each Israelite will pitch his tent among the regiment, the company,³ in which he goes to battle; round the tabernacle itself none but the Levites must encamp, or the whole people of Israel will incur my displeasure; theirs it is to keep watch over the tabernacle that bears record of me. Such was the Lord's bidding to Moses, and the sons of Israel faithfully observed it.

2 And the Lord gave Moses and Aaron this command: All the Israelites are to encamp in their several companies, under banners and emblems of their own, by their families, with the tabernacle that bears witness of me in the middle. At the eastern end the sons of Juda will pitch their tents, arranged according to the companies in which they go to war, with Nahasson the son of Aminadab at their head, the full muster-roll of their warriors, seventy-four thousand six hundred strong. Next to them, under Nathanael son of Suar, Issachar was to encamp, a force of fifty-four thousand four hundred fighting men. Zabulon was led by Eliab son of Helon; there were fifty-seven thousand four hundred of them under arms. Thus the whole camp of Juda mustered a hundred and eighty-six thousand four hundred men; and their companies were to be the vanguard.

Ruben, under Elisur son of Sedeur, was to encamp on the south, with a roll of forty-six thousand five hundred warriors; next to him the tribe of Simeon under Salamiel son of Surisaddai, with a roll of fifty-nine thousand three hundred; then the tribe of Gad under Eliasaph son of Duel, with a roll of forty-five thousand six hundred and fifty. And the camp of Ruben, reckoning a hundred and fifty-one thousand four hundred and fifty men in their companies, were to march second. Then came the tabernacle, and the companies of Levi had the carrying of it; they were to take it down in the same way as they had set it up, and march with due place and rank assigned to them. To the west, Ephraim would encamp, under Elisama son of Ammiud, with a roll of forty thousand five hundred, and with them the tribe of Manasses, under Gamaliel son of Phadassur, with a roll of thirty-two thousand two hundred; then the tribe of Benjamin under Abidan son of Gedeon, with a roll of thirty-five thousand four hundred. The camp of Ephraim, reckoning a hundred and eight thousand one hundred men in their companies, were to march third. On the north, Dan would encamp under Ahiezer son of Ammisaddai, with a roll of sixty-two thousand seven hundred; next to him the tribe of Aser under Phegiel son of Ochran, with a roll of forty-one thousand five hundred; and then the tribe of Nephthali under Ahira son of Enan, with a roll of fifty-three thousand four hundred. The camp of Dan, with a roll of a hundred and fifty thousand six hundred men, were to march last. Such was the number of the Israelites, when their whole array was marshalled by its families and its companies, six hundred and three thousand five hundred and fifty strong. But the Levites, in obedience to the command the Lord gave to Moses, were not reckoned among the Israelites. And the Israelites carried out all the Lord's bidding; in marching order they pitched their tents, and their marching order was by families and households.¹

3 Aaron and Moses had already sons to succeed them at the time when the Lord spoke to Moses on Sinai; and these were the names of Aaron's sons, Nadab, his first-born, then Abiu, Eleazar and Ithamar. All these sons of Aaron were anointed priests, their hands enriched and consecrated for priestly duties, but Nadab and Abiu, who offered unhallowed fire in the Lord's presence, died there in the desert of Sinai without issue; it was only Eleazar and Ithamar that performed the duties of the priesthood now, under the eye of Aaron their father.

And now the Lord gave Moses this command, Dedicate the tribe of Levi to me, and bid them wait on the pleasure of Aaron, the high priest; doing him service and keeping watch, carrying out the duties that belong to public worship before the tabernacle, keeping safe, too, the appurtenances of the tabernacle, and attending to its needs. Thou shalt put the Levites at the disposal of Aaron and his sons, to whom the Israelites have assigned them; but it is to Aaron and his sons that thou wilt entrust the priestly office. No one else must minister there, on pain of death. This, too, the Lord said to Moses, Among all the sons of Israel, I have singled out the Levites to be my own, in lieu of those first-born Israelites that handsel the womb; all first-born things belong to me. Ever since

¹ Literally, 'they pitched their tents in companies, and marched by families and households'; but the whole sense of the chapter seems to imply that the two principles of division were one and the same.

I smote the first-born in the land of Egypt, I have claimed the eldest birth, whether of man or of beast, as forfeit; forfeit to me, the Lord.

14 And while they were still in the desert 15 of Sinai, the Lord bade Moses register the sons of Levi by their households and their families, all of them that were more than 16 a month old. So Moses made a register, as the Lord had bidden him; giving the 17 names of Levi's sons in their order, Gerson, Caath and Merari; then the sons of 18 Gerson, Lebni and Semei, the sons of 19 Gerson, Amram, Jessar, Hebron and Oziel and the sons of Merari, Moholi and Musi.
20 The two families that came down from 21 Gerson through Lebni and Semei amounting to seven thousand five hundred males, 22 above the age of a month; these were to 23 encamp behind the tabernacle, to the west, under Eliasaph the son of Lael. The parts 24 of the tabernacle which were to be in their charge were the tent itself and its canopy, 25 and the screen stretched over the doorway by which the tabernacle was entered; the curtains for the court, and the hanging at the entrance to the court, with all that belongs to the service of the altar;¹ the tabernacle ropes, too, and its appurtenances in general.

26 The race of Caath, comprising the families that were named after Amram, Jesaar, 27 Hebron and Oziel, which counted eight thousand six hundred males above a month old, were in charge of the sanctuary.
28 They were to encamp south of it, under 29 Elisaphan the son of Oziel, and have the keeping of the ark, the table, the lamp-stand, the altars, the vessels for worship in the sanctuary, the veil, and all other such 30 furniture. These guardians of the sanctuary had the chief of all the Levites at their head, Eleazar, son of the high priest 31 Aaron. The two families of Merari's line, 32 named after Moholi and Musi, counting six thousand two hundred males above a month old, were to encamp on the north, 33 under Suriel the son of Abihaiel. They were to guard the frames and poles of the tabernacle, the posts with their sockets, 34 and all that went with such an office; the posts of the outer court, too, with their sockets, the pegs and the ropes. In front of the tabernacle, that is, on the east, Moses and Aaron were to encamp with their sons, keeping guard over the sanctuary in the midst of the Israelite people;

it was death for any other to come near it.
The whole strength of the Levites, all the families registered at the Lord's command by Moses and Aaron, was twenty-two thousand males above a month old.²

And now the Lord said to Moses, Count up all the male first-born in Israel who are more than a month old, and find their number. I must have a Levite for every male in Israel; it is the Lord's due. And they must have cattle to match in number all the first-born cattle the Israelites possess. So Moses counted the first-born of Israel, as the Lord bade him, and found that there were twenty-two thousand two hundred and seventy-three such persons.
And the Lord said to Moses, Set apart the Levites to be my own, instead of the first-born Israelites, and the cattle of the Levites to be mine, instead of the first-born cattle; it is the Lord's due. Meanwhile, here are two hundred and seventy-three first-born who have no Levites to match their number; for these, ransom must be paid.
Claim five silver pieces, by sanctuary reckoning, for each of them, (the silver piece is worth twenty pence), and pay the money to Aaron and his sons, as the ransom for the first-born who are left over.
So Moses took ransom for those who were left out of the count when the Levites stood as ransom for the first-born sons of Israel, a thousand three hundred and sixty-five silver pieces by sanctuary reckoning; and these he paid over to Aaron and his sons as the Lord had bidden him.

4 Then the Lord bade Moses and Aaron register the sons of Caath, household by household, family by family, apart from the rest of the Levites; men between the ages of thirty and fifty, who went into the tabernacle to wait and work there. The sons of Caath, he said, there in the tabernacle, are to have the holiest task of all. When the order is given for marching, it is for Aaron and his sons to go in and take down the veil at the sanctuary entrance, in which they will wrap up the ark; then they will enfold it again in a covering of skins dyed violet, and spread a cloth over it all of blue, and so they will put the poles in to carry it. They will spread another blue cloth over the table, which will have its cups and bowls and dishes on it, and goblets for pouring out libations, and the bread set forth there as always; a red cloth over that, and a covering dyed violet, and put the poles in. Then, with a blue cloth, they will cover the lamp-stand, with its lamps, tongs, snuffers, and all the phials of oil for feeding the lamps, enfolded all in skins dyed violet, and so they will make it ready for carrying. Then a blue cloth, and a covering of violet skins, for the golden altar; and all the appurtenances of sanctuary worship they shall cover up in the same way, and make these, too, ready for carrying. The brazen altar they will rid of its ashes, and wrap it in a purple cloth, enclosing with it all the appurtenances used for its ceremonies, fire-pans, flesh-hooks, forks, pot-hooks and shovels; they must wrap up all the appurtenances of this altar in a covering of violet skins, and then put poles through the rings of the altar itself. Then when Aaron and his sons have wrapped up the sanctuary and all its appurtenances ready for the march, the sons of Caath will enter and carry them away in their wrappings; they are not to touch the things of the sanctuary, on pain of death. Such charge will the sons of Caath have over the tabernacle that attests my covenant; and Eleazar, son of the high priest Aaron, will be in command of them. Under his care is the oil for feeding the lamps, and the spices for the incense; under his care the continual sacrifice, and the oil used for anointing, and all that concerns the worship paid in the tabernacle, and all the furniture of the sanctuary. This warning, too, the Lord gave to Moses and Aaron; Would you have the family of Caath lost to Levi's tribe? If you value their lives, order their doings thus; death is the penalty, if they should touch what has been set apart for holy uses. Only Aaron and his sons may enter; and they will direct what is to be the task of each Levite, what burden he is to carry. None must pry into the secrets of the shrine while they are yet uncovered, on pain of death.

Then the Lord bade Moses register the sons of Gerson, by households and families; men between the ages of thirty and fifty, who went into the tabernacle to work there. The task of these sons of Gerson, he told them, is to carry the curtains of the tabernacle, and the second covering that makes a roof over the place of covenant, and the purple canopy over all, and the screen at the entrance of the tabernacle; the hangings, too, of the court, and the screen at the entrance of the court, opposite the tabernacle.¹ All that belongs to the altar, and all the ropes, and the appurtenances that go with them, shall be carried by the family of Gerson, as Aaron and his sons shall direct; they will make known what burden falls to each. This is the charge which the sons of Gerson will have over the tabernacle which attests my covenant, and Ithamar, son of the high priest Aaron, will have the disposal of them. The households and families of Merari's line must also be registered; men between the ages of thirty and fifty, who go about their work in the shrine of the covenant. They have the charge of carrying the frames and poles of the tabernacle, its posts with their sockets; posts, too, sockets and pegs and ropes for the court round about. All such appurtenances shall be handed over to them one by one, to carry with them. Such duties and tasks the sons of Merari will have, in the tabernacle that attests my covenant, and these too will be at the disposal of Ithamar, son of the high priest Aaron.

So Moses and Aaron and the chieftains registered the households and families of Caath, all the tabernacle servants between the ages of thirty and fifty; of these there were two thousand seven hundred and fifty. Then the Gersonites; of these there were two thousand six hundred and thirty. Then the Merarites; of these there were three thousand two hundred.² So that the full register of the Levites, which Moses and Aaron and the chieftains made, household by household and family by family, 47 men between thirty and fifty, fit to carry burdens and do the work of the tabernacle, 48 contained eight thousand five hundred and 49 eighty names altogether. And Moses, as the Lord had bidden him, registered all their names with the duties and burdens that fell to each.

5 This was the Lord's word to Moses, 2 Bid the sons of Israel cast out from their encampment all the lepers, all those who have a running at the reins, or are 3 defiled by contact with the dead. Men and women alike must be shut out from the camp, so as not to pollute it when 4 I am making my abode with you. This the Israelites did, shutting out such persons from the camp in obedience to the command which the Lord gave to Moses.

5 This, too, was a message the Lord gave to Moses for the sons of Israel, If man or woman commits any of those wrongs mankind is prone to commit, and incurs guilt by neglecting the Lord's commandment, 7 confession must be made of it, and the sum paid back, with a fifth part added besides, 8 to the wronged party. If there is no one to whom restitution can be made, they must make their payment to the Lord, and it will belong to his priest, over and above the ram which is offered in expiation, to win pardon for the wrong done. So, too, 9 all the first-fruits which the Israelites offer belong to the priest; and all offerings made to the sanctuary, once they have been put in the priest's hand, become his.

11 This, too, was a message the Lord gave to Moses for the sons of Israel: It may be that a married woman will leave her duty, 12 and, in despite of her own husband, bed with another; yet her husband will have no means of discovering her guilty secret; no witness caught her in the act of adultery. 14 What, then, if a man be inflamed with jealousy against his wife, that either is defiled, or has brought false suspicion on herself? He must bring her before the priest, and make offering for her of barley-meal, the tenth part of a bushel. He will pour no oil over it, put no incense on it; 15 this is the jealous man's sacrifice, and the purpose of his offering is to detect unfaithfulness. The priest will cause her to appear, 16 and bring her into the Lord's presence, and will take up an earthen jar of 17 lustral water, into which he will put a handful of dust from the tabernacle floor. Then he will unveil the woman's head, 18 as she stands there in the Lord's presence, and put into her hands the token-sacrifice, the jealous man's offering; in his own hand will be the baneful waters, embittered now by his curse.¹ And he will put the ban on 19 her; If it is true no stranger has bedded with thee, and thou hast never defiled thyself by forsaking thy husband's bed, then these baneful waters I have cursed will have no power to harm thee. But if thou 20 hast left thy duty towards thy husband, and defiled thyself by bedding with another man, then this curse of mine will bind thee: The Lord make thee a by-word of all that is accursed among his people, make thy thigh rot and thy belly swell till it bursts. Once this cursed water has entered thy belly, belly must swell and thigh rot. And here the woman shall answer, Amen, amen. This ban the priest shall 23 write down in a book, and wash it with the baneful waters he has cursed, and so make 24 her drink them. When she has finished the draught the priest will take the jealous 25 man's sacrifice from her hand, lift it up in the Lord's presence, and lay it on the altar. Only, before all this is done, he must take 26 a handful of what is offered, by way of token-sacrifice, and burn it on the altar; then he will make her drink the baneful waters.

And when she has drunk them, if she is 27 indeed defiled, and has been guilty of adultery in her husband's despite, the cursed water as it passes into her will make her belly swell and her thigh rot, and she will be a by-word of all that is accursed among the people. But if she is innocent, she will 28 take no harm, and will become a mother of children. Such is the law concerning 29 jealousy. If a woman leaves her husband and is defiled, and her husband, inflamed with jealousy, brings her into the Lord's presence, so that the priest can carry out the rite aforesaid, the husband is without 31 blame; the fault is hers, and she must answer for it.

6 This message, too, the Lord gave to Moses for the sons of Israel. Man or woman that would be set apart for the Lord by taking the Nazirite vow must abstain from wine, and from all strong drink. They must not drink vinegar made from wine or from any such liquor, nor any draught that is strained from the grape; they must not eat grapes, whether fresh or dried. No fruit of the vine, grape or raisin,¹ must pass their lips while the days of their consecration last.

The Nazirite, while he is set apart, must not pass any razor over his head until his consecration to the Lord has been completed; the growth of his hair is a sign of dedication. Nor, during his time of consecration may he come near any dead body, nor may he incur defilement when father or mother, brother or sister is buried; the hair is a sign of his dedication to his God, and he is set apart for the Lord as long as the time of his consecration lasts. If he is present when a death befalls unexpectedly, his consecrated head is defiled thereby; he must shave it there and then, on the very day when the need for purification arises, and again on the seventh day. On the eighth day, he will offer to the priest two turtle-doves or young pigeons at the tabernacle door, and the priest will offer one by way of amends for the fault, and the other in burnt-sacrifice; then he will pray for pardon for the fault which the death occasioned. On the same day, his head sanctified afresh by the priest, he will dedicate to the Lord his new period of consecration, and offer a yearling lamb in amends. His former days of consecration go for nothing, once they have been interrupted by defilement.

And this is the rite he must follow when the period of his vow is completed. He will be brought to the tabernacle door, and there he will make his offering to the Lord, a yearling he-lamb without blemish in burnt-sacrifice, a yearling ewe without blemish to make amends for fault, and a ram without blemish as a welcome-offering; a basket, too, of unleavened bread kneaded with oil, and cakes with oil poured over them, and the gifts proper to each. All these the priest will offer in the Lord's presence, performing there the sacrifice of amends and the burnt-sacrifice, and im-¹⁷ molating the ram before the Lord as a welcome-offering; at the same time he will present the basket of unleavened things and the customary gifts. Then, before the¹⁸ tabernacle door, the Nazirite will shave off the consecrated growth of hair, and throw it upon the fire that consumes his welcome-offering. And now the priest¹⁹ will take the ram's shoulder, which has been cooking, and one of the loaves from the basket and one of the cakes, and put them into the hands of the newly shaved Nazirite, who will give them back to him,²⁰ so that he can offer them up in the Lord's presence. These parts of the offering are set apart for the priest, like the breast that has been duly cut away, and the thigh.

After this, the Nazirite is free to drink wine again. So must the time of his dedi-²¹ cation be brought to an end, and so must his vow be fulfilled; apart from any special undertaking he may have made. To achieve the purpose of such consecration, he must carry out the full intentions of his vow.

And this was a message the Lord gave²² to Moses for Aaron and his sons: When you give the Israelites your blessing, you are to say: The Lord bless thee, and keep²⁴ thee; the Lord smile on thee, and be mer-²⁵ ciful to thee; the Lord turn his regard²⁶ towards thee, and give thee peace. So shall²⁷ they invoke my name over the sons of Israel, to win a blessing from me.

7 At the time when Moses finished the tabernacle and set it up, anointing and hallowing both the tabernacle and altar with all their appurtenances, an offer-² ing was made by the chieftains of Israel, the heads of families, who were in charge,
each for his own tribe, of the registering.
They gave to the Lord six covered waggons³ and twelve oxen, one wagon for every two of the chieftains, and one ox for every one of them. When they presented these before the tabernacle, the Lord said to Moses,⁴ Accept these gifts for the service of the⁵ tabernacle, and make them over to the Levites, for the better carrying out of their various duties. Moses, therefore, accepted⁶ the waggons and the oxen, and gave them⁷ to the Levites, assigning two waggons and four oxen to the sons of Gerson for their ¹ 'Grape or raisin'; in the Hebrew text, the Nazirite is forbidden to eat even the pips or the skin.

8 needs, and the remaining four waggons and eight oxen to Ithamar, son of the high priest Aaron, for the needs of the Me-9 rarites. No waggons or oxen were given to the sons of Caath, because their business was with the sanctuary, and every burden must be carried on their own shoulders.

10 And when the altar was to be anointed, the chieftains had their dedication gifts to 11 bring before it; so the Lord said to Moses, Let the chieftains bring their dedication 12 gifts on successive days. The first day, Nahasson son of Aminadab; of Juda, made 13 his offering; a silver dish of a hundred and thirty, and a silver bowl of seventy sicles' weight, by sanctuary reckoning, both full 14 of flour kneaded with oil for sacrifice; a gold saucer weighing ten sicles, full of 15 incense; a bullock, a ram, and a yearling 16 he-lamb for burnt-sacrifice; a goat to make 17 amends for fault; and for a welcome-offering, two oxen, five rams, five goats, and five yearling he-lambs. Such was the 18 gift of Nahasson son of Aminadab, and 19 next day Nathanael son of Suar gave dish and bowl and saucer, of the like workman-20 ship and with the like contents, and the 21 same burnt-sacrifice, transgression-vic-22 tim, and welcome-offering for Issachar.
23 On the third day it was the turn of Eliab, 24 son of Helon, to give dish and bowl and 25 saucer, and the same burnt-sacrifice,
26 transgression-victim, and welcome-offer-27 ing for Zabulon. On the fourth day Elisur, 28 son of Sedeur, gave dish and bowl and 29 saucer, and the same burnt-sacrifice,
30 transgression-victim and welcome-offer-31 ing for Ruben. On the fifth day Salamiel, 32 son of Surisaddai, gave dish and bowl and 33 saucer, and the same burnt-sacrifice,
34 transgression-victim and welcome-offer-35 ing for Gad. On the seventh day Elisama, 36 son of Ammiud, gave dish and bowl and 37 saucer, and the same burnt-sacrifice,
38 transgression-victim and welcome-offer-39 ing for Ephraim. On the eighth day 40 Gamaliel, son of Phadassur, gave dish and 41 bowl and saucer, and the same burnt-sacri-42 fice, transgression-victim, and welcome-offering for Manasses. On the ninth day 6 Abidan, son of Gedeon, gave dish and 6 bowl and saucer, and the same burnt- 6

sacrifice, transgression-victim, and wel- 6
come-offering for Benjamin. On the tenth 6 day Ahiezer, son of Ammisaddai, gave dish 6 and bowl and saucer, and the same burnt- 6
sacrifice, transgression-victim, and wel- 7
come-offering for Dan. On the eleventh 7 day Phegiel, son of Ochrhan, gave dish and 7
bowl and saucer, and the same burnt- 7
sacrifice, transgression-victim, and wel- 7
come-offering for Aser. On the twelfth 7 day Ahira, son of Enan, gave dish and 7
bowl and saucer, and the same burnt- 8
sacrifice, transgression-victim, and wel- 8
come-offering for Nephthali.¹

All these dedication gifts were offered 8 by the chieftains of Israel at the time when the altar was hallowed. There were twelve silver dishes, twelve silver bowls and twelve saucers of gold. A hundred and 8 thirty sicles of silver went to each dish, seventy to each bowl, making two thousand four hundred sicles of silver in all, by sanctuary weight. And the twelve golden 8 saucers with incense in them weighed ten sicles each, by sanctuary weight, making a hundred and twenty sicles of gold altogether. For burnt-sacrifice, there 8 were twelve bullocks, twelve rams, and twelve yearling he-lambs, with the bread-offering proper to them; in amends for fault, twelve goats; for welcome-offering, 8 twenty-four oxen, sixty rams, sixty goats, and sixty yearling he-lambs. Such were the gifts made, when the altar was hallowed and anointed.

Whenever Moses went into the taber- 8 nacle that attested God's covenant, to consult the oracle there, he heard a voice speaking to him from the shrine between the two cherubs, standing above the ark;
there it was that God spoke to him.

8 The Lord gave Moses this message for Aaron, When thou dost put the seven lamps in their place, the lamp-stand must be set up on the south side of the tabernacle; and give orders that the lamps face northwards, towards the table of the loaves on the other side, the lamp-stand turned towards it, and so shedding light upon it. Such was the rule the Lord enjoined on Moses, and such was ever the rule Aaron followed, in setting out the lamps.¹ This lamp-stand was fashioned of wrought gold, both the stem in the middle of it and the branches that sprang from either side and all their ornament; the pattern the Lord had shewn him was the pattern Moses gave it.

And this was the Lord's word to Moses, Separate the Levites from the rest of Israel, and purify them. To be purified, they must be sprinkled with lustral water, and must shave all the hair on their bodies. They will wash their clothes, too, and cleanse themselves. After this, they will provide an ox and the bread-offering that goes with it, of flour kneaded with oil, and a second ox must be provided as a transgression-victim; and so thou wilt bring them out in front of the tabernacle that attests my covenant, where all Israel will be assembled. And the Israelites will lay their hands upon the Levites, as they stand there before the Lord, and Aaron will offer them to the Lord on Israel's behalf, to do him service. Then the Levites will lay their hands upon the heads of the oxen; one of these thou wilt offer as a victim for fault, and the other in burnt-sacrifice to the Lord, to make intercession for them. So thou wilt present the Levites before Aaron and his sons, set apart and offered to the Lord, separated from the rest of Israel to be mine; after that, they may enter the tabernacle which attests my covenant and do me service. They must be purified, set apart, and made over to me, because they are a gift to me from the Israelites, which I have accepted in lieu of every first-born son in Israel that handsels the womb. All first-born things in Israel, man or beast, belong to me and are forfeit to me since the day when I smote the first-born in the land of Egypt; and in lieu of all Israel's first-born sons I claim the Levites for myself; I have chosen them out from the rest of the people to be at the disposal of Aaron and his sons, to do me service in the tabernacle and offer me prayer on Israel's behalf. The rest of the people must not come close to the sanctuary, on pain of being smitten with a plague. These commands of the Lord by Moses they carried out faithfully, Moses and Aaron and all the people of Israel; the Levites were purified, and washed their clothes, and Aaron made an offering of them in the Lord's presence, and made intercession for them. And now they were free to enter the tabernacle, to perform their duties at the pleasure of Aaron and his sons, Levites purified as God bade Moses purify them.

This, too, was the Lord's word to Moses, The law governing the Levites is that they should begin their tabernacle service from the age of twenty-five onwards; when they have reached the age of fifty, they are no longer bound to service, but they will attend on their brethren in the tabernacle and keep guard there as they are appointed, without doing the work of it any longer. Such is the direction thou wilt give the Levites about their duties.

9 In the second year after the escape from Egypt, the Lord gave a message to Moses in the desert of Sinai, in the first month of the year. The Israelites, he said, must celebrate the paschal feast, now that the time has come round; it begins with evening on the fourteenth day of this month, and all the ceremonies prescribed for it must be duly observed. So Moses bade the Israelites keep the pasch, and when the evening of the fourteenth day came, keep it they did, there in the desert of Sinai. There was no word the Lord gave to Moses, but Israel obeyed it. But a doubt arose; here were some men who could not keep it that day, because they were defiled by contact with a corpse. And these came to Moses and Aaron with the complaint, Must we, who are defiled by touch of the dead, be robbed of our opportunity to make the Lord such an offering as the season claims, with the rest of Israel? 8 And Moses bade them wait till he could find out what was the Lord's will for them.

¹ vv. 1-3 involve considerable difficulty. v. 2, in the Hebrew text and equally in the Septuagint Greek, is much shorter: 'When thou settest up (or, lightest) the lamps, the seven lamps shall give light in front of the lamp-stand'. Perhaps, owing to the difficulty of attaching any meaning to this phrase, the Latin interpreter expanded it. (The similar phrase in Ex. 25. 37 probably means that the light of the lamp is to fall on the table where the bread was set out.) The end of verse 2 reads literally, in the Latin, 'they must shine over against that part towards which the lamp-stand looks', as if the lamps were shaded in some way, and only shone in one direction; but nothing of this kind is indicated in the directions for their manufacture (Ex. 25. 31-39). It is possible to understand the direction as meaning that the side of the lamp-stand, not its end, should face the table.

9 Thereupon the Lord gave Moses this message for the Israelites, If any of Israel's race, at such times, is defiled by contact with a corpse, or is away on a journey, he 10 must keep pasch in the Lord's honour on the fourteenth day of the second month instead; eating unleavened bread and wild 11 herbs with it, leaving nothing till the morning, breaking no bone of the victim, 12 so as to observe the full paschal rite. But if anyone who is clean of defilement and not hindered by his travels neglects to keep 13 the pasch, he is lost to his people. Paschal time came, sacrifice to the Lord he would 14 not; he will be held to account for it. Even aliens that lodge with you or have come to dwell among you must omit no rule of 15 observance when they keep pasch in the Lord's honour; the law binds citizen and alien alike.¹

15 On the day when the tabernacle was set up, a cloud overshadowed it; and when evening came, fire seemed to hang over the 16 canopy of it till morning. So it was continually; by day, cloud hung above it, by 17 night, what seemed like fire; it was when this cloud left its post over the tabernacle that the Israelites marched on, never 18 camping again until it settled. At the Lord's bidding they marched, at the Lord's bidding they pitched their tents. There was no moving as long as the cloud 19 hung over the tabernacle; even if it lingered many days there, they were the Lord's sentinels, these men of Israel, and must not leave their post while the tabernacle was in cloud; only at the Lord's 20 bidding might they pitch their tents, only at his bidding let them down.² Sometimes the cloud would only rest there from evening to morning, and move away at dawn, so that they could march at once; sometimes they must wait, before marching, till 21 day too had passed. And sometimes it would be two days, or a month, or even longer, that the Israelites stayed motionless, because the cloud was still there. Then, once it had lifted, they moved camp.

10 And the Lord bade Moses make 2 two trumpets of wrought silver, to give the signal when he would gather the whole people round him, when he would order them to move camp. Sound both 3 trumpets, he told him, and all must assemble to meet thee at the tabernacle door; sound but one, and it will bring only the 4 chieftains, that represent the many thousands of Israel. But if it is a long blast that rises and falls, first of all those on the east will move camp; when the sound comes 5 again, a second wail of the trumpet, those on the south will fold their tents; and so with the rest, as the wail of the trumpet bids them set out. When the signal is given 6 for the people to assemble, the blast of the trumpet will be on one note, without any wailing rise and fall. The trumpets are to 7 be blown by the priests, the men of Aaron's line; this custom you must keep unaltered, age after age. When your country goes out to war, to repel hostile attack, the trumpets must give a wailing sound, 8 appealing to the Lord your God to save you from the power of your enemies. And 9 when you keep feast or holiday, and at the new moon, you will make burnt-sacrifice and welcome-offering to the sound of the trumpet, to claim the divine audience; audience from the Lord your God.

10 And now, in the second year, on the twentieth day of the second month, the cloud lifted from the tabernacle, and the 11 sons of Israel marched away, company by company, from the desert of Sinai, till the cloud came to rest again in another desert, that of Pharan. First, as the Lord's word 12 to Moses commanded them, went the companies of Juda, under Nahasson son of Aminadab, then Issachar under Nathanael son of Suar, then Zabulon under 13 Eliab son of Helon. Meanwhile, the tabernacle had been taken down, and the sons of Gerson and Merari set out bringing it with them. Then came the companies of 14 Ruben under Helisur son of Sedeur, then 15

² In the Hebrew text, this verse forms a new sentence: 'And sometimes it lingered only a few days over the tabernacle, but it was always at the Lord's bidding that they pitched their tents', etc.

Simeon under Salamiel son of Surisaddai, then Gad under Eliasaph son of Duel. After these the Caathites marched, with their holy burden;¹ the tabernacle going on first, so as to be ready for them when they reached the place where it was set up. Then came the companies of Ephraim under Elisama son of Ammiud, then Manasses under Gamaliel son of Phadassur, then Benjamin under Abidan son of Ge-deon. And in the rear came the companies of Dan under Ahiezer son of Ammisaddai, the tribe of Aser under Phegiel son of Ochran, and the tribe of Nephthali under Ahira son of Enan. Such was the order of march in which Israel's various companies set out, whenever they moved camp.

And now Moses said to Hobab, son of Raguel the Madianite, his father-in-law, We are on our way to the home the Lord means to give us; come with us, and share our fortunes; the Lord has promised to bless Israel. I cannot come with thee, he said; I must go back to the land where I was born. And Moses answered, Do not leave us; thou canst tell us where best to encamp; we look to thee for guidance. Come with us, and the best of all the Lord gives us shall be thine.

So they travelled three days' journey from the mountain of the Lord; and all those three days' journey the ark that bore record of the Lord's covenant went at their head² to choose their camping-place. The divine cloud, too, overshadowed them all day while they marched. Whenever the ark was lifted from the ground, Moses would say, Bestir thyself, Lord, and rout thy enemies; confront thy ill-wishers and put them to flight. And when it was put down again, he would say, Restore thy presence, Lord, to the thronging armies of Israel.

11 Meanwhile, the people were as-sailing the Lord with complaints, and bemoaning their hard lot. The Lord was roused to anger when he heard it, and sent a fire which burnt up the outlying part of the camp. Whereupon the people had recourse to Moses; and when Moses prayed to the Lord, the fire died down. It was this divine punishment by fire which gave the place its name, the Place of Burning.

They were still accompanied by a crowd of mixed breed;³ and these infected the Is-raelites by their example, as they sat there lamenting; If we had but meat to feed on! they said. How well we remember the fish that Egypt afforded without stint, the cu-cumbers, the melons, leeks and onions and garlic! Our hearts faint within us, as we look round, and nothing but manna meets our eyes. (This manna was a food that looked like coriander-seed, its colour like bdellium. The people would go round gathering it, and grind it in the mill or bray it in a mortar; then they would cook it in pots, making it into rolls that tasted like bread kneaded with oil. Every night, as the dew fell on the camp, the manna fell there too.)

From household after household Moses heard these complaints, as the men sat be-moaning themselves at their tent doors, till he could bear it no longer, that the Lord's displeasure should be provoked so grievously. Lord, he said, why dost thou treat me thus? How is it that I have fallen out of favour with thee? Must I carry a whole people like a weight on my back? I did not bring this multitude of men into the world; I did not beget them; and thou wouldst have me nurse them in my bosom like a child, till they reach the land promised to their race. Where am I to find meat for such a host as this? And that is the complaint they bring me; they would have meat for their food. I cannot bear, alone, the charge of so many; it is too great a burden for me. If I may not have my way in this, then in mercy, I beseech thee, rid me of these miseries by taking my life away.

Whereupon the Lord said to Moses, Choose out for me seventy Israelites of ripe age, men already known to thee as elders and officers of the people, bring them to the door of the tabernacle that bears record of my covenant, and let them stand there at thy side. I will come down and converse with thee there; taking away some of the spirit which rests upon thee and giving it to them instead, so that they may share with thee that charge over the people which thou canst not support unaided. And say to the people, You must purify yourselves in readiness for the banquet of meat you will have to-morrow. I have heard you complaining that no meat is given you; that you were better off in Egypt. And now the Lord will give you meat to feed on, not for one day or two, for five days or ten, or for a score of days, but for a whole month, till it comes out at your nostrils, and you are sick with surfeit. That shall be your reward for disowning the Lord that dwells among you, and lamenting, here in his presence, that you ever left Egypt behind. Why, said Moses, here is a people that counts six hundred thousand foot-soldiers; wilt thou promise them meat for a whole month? If all the flocks and herds were slaughtered, would that be enough for them? Nay, if all the fish in the sea could be brought into one place, would they even so be content? And the Lord's answer was, Has my arm lost its power? Thou wilt see for thyself, in a little, whether this promise of mine comes true. So Moses went back to the people, and told them what the Lord had said. Then he chose seventy of the elders of Israel, and ranged them in a half-circle at the tabernacle door. And when the Lord came down, hidden in the cloud, to converse with him, he took some of the spirit which rested upon Moses and gave it to the seventy elders instead; whereupon they received a gift of prophecy which never left them.¹ This same spirit rested even upon two men, Eldad and Medad, who were still in the camp; their names were enrolled among the rest; but they had never gone out to the tabernacle. There in the camp they fell a-prophesying, and a messenger ran to bring Moses tidings of it. At this, Josue the son of Nun, that was Moses' favourite servant, cried out, My lord Moses, bid them keep silence. What, said he, so jealous for my honour? For myself, I would have the whole people prophesy, with the spirit of the Lord resting on them too. So Moses went back to the camp, and the elders of Israel with him.²

And now the Lord sent a wind that brought a flight of quails over the sea, and drove them down where the camp was, a day's journey away on each side; quails that hovered only two cubits above the ground. All that day and that night and the next day the Israelites busied themselves gathering in the quails, which lay so thick that a man made nothing of gathering a hundred bushels; then they spread them out to dry, round the camp. They had meat between their teeth yet, and the supply had not begun to fail, when suddenly a grievous plague fell on them, sentence of the divine anger they had provoked; and the place was called ever after, The Graves of Greed, from the men that lay buried there whose greed was their undoing. From the Graves of Greed they made their way to Haseroth, and there encamped.

12 Mary, too, and Aaron had complaints to make against Moses; the desert wife he had married was the cause of it.³ Was the Lord, they asked, sent his word by Moses and no other? Has he not spoken to us too? Such were the complaints the Lord must needs listen to. As for Moses, whom they attacked, never was a man more patient on the whole face of the earth. But the Lord at once commanded him, and Aaron, and Mary to come out by themselves to the tabernacle; and when they reached it, he himself came down, hidden in cloud, summoning Aaron and Mary to him. So they went apart; and this was his word to them, which he bade them mark well: Prophets there may be among your race; to one I appear in a vision, to another I reveal my thoughts in 7 a dream. Moses is not my servant on such terms as these; I entrust him with the 8 management of all my household, speak with him face to face, and when he has sight of the Lord, it is not by means of parable and image. How is it that you were not afraid to slight Moses, my own 9 servant? Then, in anger, he left them; the cloud, too, no longer appeared over the tabernacle; and all at once Mary's skin shewed white as snow with leprosy. And Aaron, looking upon her and seeing her 1 covered with leprous sores, cried out to Moses, My lord, I entreat thee, do not hold us to account for this mad rebellion of ours.

¹ According to the Hebrew text, 'which did not continue with them'. ² It seems to be implied in verses 26-30 that the tabernacle was now pitched outside the camp (cf. 10. 33), not, as was customary, in the middle of it (2. 2). Some think that Eldad and Medad were among the seventy; but this would contradict verse 24 above, and we are perhaps meant to understand that six elders were chosen from each tribe, so that the two persons in question were left behind when the seventy presented themselves before the tabernacle. ³ 'Desert wife', literally, 'Ethiopian wife'; but there is some reason to think that the name was given to the inhabitants of the Arabian desert, as well as to those of Africa. The wife in question is therefore probably Saphora, Ex. 2. 21. It seems possible that Mary and Aaron suspected their brother of intending to found a dynasty, and objected that his sons were not pure Israelites.

 2 Must she, then, be no better than a dead woman, cast off like an untimely birth? See, how her flesh is already half devoured with leprosy! When Moses cried to the Lord, beseeching him to restore her, the Lord answered, Nay, if her father had spat in her face, must she not have spent seven days hiding her blushes? Let her be shut out from the camp for seven days, and then brought back. So for seven days Mary was shut out from the camp, and there was no marching on for the people until Mary returned to them.

13 It was after leaving Haseroth that the people encamped in the desert of Pharan; and here the Lord spoke to Moses, bidding him send out men of mark, one from each tribe, to survey Israel's promised inheritance, the land of Chanaan. This Moses did; and the names of the leading men he despatched from the desert of Pharan were these: Sammuah son of Zechur from Ruben, Saphat son of Huri from Simeon, Caleb son of Jephone from Juda, Igal son of Joseph from Issachar, Osee son of Nun from Ephraim, Phalti son of Raphu from Benjamin, Geddiel son of Sodi from Zabulon, Gaddi son of Susi from Manasses' branch of the tribe of Joseph, Ammiel son of Gemalli from Dan, Sathur son of Michael from Aser, Nahabi son of Vapsi from Nephthali, Guel son of Machi from Gad. Such were the names of the men Moses sent out to survey the land, and to Osee, son of Nun, he gave the fresh name of Josue.

And these were the directions Moses gave them for their survey of Chanaan:

Make your way in by the south, and when you reach the hill country look well at the land about you. Are its inhabitants strong 19 or weak, many in number or few? Is the land itself prosperous or starved, has it 20 walled cities or unwalled, fertile soil or barren, is it well wooded or bare? Take 21 heart for your enterprise, and bring back with you some sample of what the land yields. (It was the season, then, at which early grapes are already fit to eat.)

So they surveyed the land all the way up 22 from the desert of Sin to Rohob, on the way to Emath. At the southern end of it, 23 when they reached Hebron, they found the sons of Enac there, Achiman and Sisai and Tholmai; Hebron had been founded seven years before the Egyptian city of Tanis.
 They also made their way to the Ravine of 24 Grapes and cut off a branch with a cluster hanging from it, that needed two men with a pole to carry it; these they brought with them, as well as some of the pomegranates and figs that grew there. It was from this 25 cluster which the Israelites carried away that the place got its name of Nehelescol, the Ravine of Grapes.

Forty days had passed before they re-26 turned from their survey, after traversing the whole country, to find Moses and 27 Aaron and all the people of Israel still in the desert of Pharan, by Cades. To these and to the whole multitude they made their report, and shewed them what fruit the land yielded. And this was the story they 28 told: When we reached the land where our errand lay, we found it indeed a land all milk and honey, as this fruit will prove to you; but it is a powerful race that dwells 29 in it, with strong walled cities; such were the sons of Enac, whom we saw there. The 30 south is occupied by Amelec, the mountain parts by Hethites, Jebusites and Amorrhites; by the sea, and round the Jordan river, the Chanaanites are in possession. And now, to still the rising outcry 31 against Moses, Caleb spurred the people on to invade the land and conquer it; It is ready to fall into your hands, he said. But 32 his companions told them, We cannot attack such a people as this; they are too strong for us. And they gave the Israelites 33 an ill account of what they had seen in Chanaan; This country we surveyed, they told them, has too many inhabitants already.¹ Tall of frame are the men we 34 viewed there; nay, some we saw, the race of Enac, of monstrous size as if they were sprung from giants; we looked no bigger than locusts beside them.

14 So, that night, the whole multi-2 tude of the Israelites fell to weeping, and were loud in their complaints 3 against Moses and Aaron: Better that we had died in Egypt, better we should meet our end in this waste desert, than march at the Lord's bidding into such a land as that, where we shall fall at the sword's point, and our wives and children be led off as captives! Were it not better to go 4 back to Egypt? A leader, they said to one another, let us set up a leader who will take us back to Egypt! Moses and Aaron, on 5 hearing it, cast themselves down to earth before the whole assembly of Israel; 6 meanwhile Josue the son of Nun and Caleb the son of Jephone, who had taken their part in surveying the country, tore their 7 garments in dissent. Nay, men of Israel, they cried, it was a land of great plenty we 8 passed through. The Lord, of his mercy, will find a way in for us, and it will be ours, 9 a land that is all milk and honey! Would you defy the Lord's will, daunted by the Chanaanites? Why, they are bread for our eating; they may not hope to defend themselves. The Lord is on our side; never be afraid of them!

10 At this, all the people cried out, and were for stoning them. But suddenly, over the tabernacle, the glory of the Lord's presence made itself known to the whole 11 of Israel. And the Lord said to Moses, Am I to be always slighted by this people of mine? Will they never learn to trust in me, for all the marvellous deeds of mine they 12 have witnessed? Enough; I will smite them with pestilence, and make an end of them; I will find a people greater and sturdier than this to march under thy leadership.

13 Good news, Lord, said Moses, for the Egyptians, from whose power thou didst 14 once rescue thy people; good news, too, for the inhabitants of this land. They know how thou dwellest among thy people, letting thyself be seen face to face, sheltering us with cloud, going before us in a pillar of cloud by day, of fire by night. Are they to be told that thou hast annihilated, at a blow, all this host of thine? Ah, they will say, he could find no means to grant his people their promised home, so he was fain to destroy them in the wilderness!

 Nay, Lord, vindicate thy power; hast thou not said, The Lord is slow to take vengeance, rich in kindness, pardoning the guilt of the wrong-doer? Though indeed thou holdest no man innocent, and wilt have the son make amends for the father's guilt, to the third and fourth generation.
 Forgive, I implore thee, this people of thine, as thou art ever abundantly merciful, as thou hast ever shewn favour to us while we made our way from Egypt to this spot.

Then the Lord said, At thy request, I forgive. But as I am the living Lord, whose glory must spread wide as earth, these men who have been witnesses of my greatness, of all the marvellous deeds I did, in Egypt and in the desert, yet must needs challenge my power half a score of times, and disobey my will, these shall never see the land I promised to their fathers; it shall never be enjoyed by those who slighted me. My servant Caleb was of another mind; he took my part, and I will allow him to enter the land which he surveyed, and leave his race an inheritance there.
 The sons of Amalec and Chanaan may rest secure in their mountain glens; to-morrow you must move camp, and go back to the desert by the Red Sea.

Such was the Lord's message to Moses and Aaron: Will this thankless multitude never cease complaining; must I hear nothing but lament from the sons of Israel?
 Tell them this, As I am living God, the Lord says, the very words you have used in my hearing shall come true; your bones shall be left to lie in this desert. Of all you that were registered above the age of twenty years, you that have made complaint against me, not a man shall enter the land in which I swore to make a home for you, except Caleb the son of Jephone and Josue the son of Nun. These shall make their way in instead, these children of yours that were to be a prey, you thought,

¹ Literally, 'devours its inhabitants'. In Ez. 36. 13 this implies a failure of a country, through famine, to support its inhabitants. Here, since the fertility of the land has already been admitted (verse 28 above), the emphasis must rather be on the fact that it is too thickly populated to allow of further immigration.

to the enemy; they shall have sight, instead, of the land their fathers belittled.

32 In the desert your bones shall lie; and until the desert has swallowed them up, these sons of yours shall wander to and fro in it for forty years, doing penance for your unfaithfulness. For forty days you surveyed the land, and for each day you shall have a year of penance for your sins, and 34 feel my vengeance. See if I do not make good the threats I have uttered against a thankless and rebellious people, leaving them to faint and die in the desert.

36 As for the men Moses had sent to survey the country, who returned to embitter the multitude against him by the ill report they brought with them, they died of plague, 37 there in the Lord's presence; of all that went on that errand, only Josue the son of Nun and Caleb the son of Jephone were left alive.

39 Meanwhile the people of Israel, upon hearing all this from Moses, were full of remorse; and at dawn of day they were all up on the mountain heights, crying, We confess our fault; now we are ready to attack the land which the Lord has promised us. What, said Moses, Would you go beyond the Lord's word? You will gain nothing by it. The Lord is not on your side; do not march to the attack, or you will be overthrown by your enemies. The Lord will not take part with men who have refused him obedience; you will be met by Amalecite and Chanaanite, and their 41 swords will lay you low. Yet, in their blind confidence, they marched on into the hill country, though the ark of God, and Moses with it, remained there in the camp. And the men who dwell in the hill country, Amalecites and Chanaanites, fell on them from above, setting upon them and cutting them down till they had pursued them all the way to Horma.

15 The Lord gave Moses this message for the sons of Israel: Here are rules to be kept, when you have reached the settled home I mean to give you. When you offer the Lord ox or sheep in burnt-sacrifice, or by way of welcome-offering (whether in payment of a vow, or out of devotion, or because you would greet the Lord with acceptable fragrance on occasion of some solemn feast), the man who is immolating such a victim must make the Lord a bloodless offering as well. This must be a tenth of a bushel of flour, kneaded in three pints of oil, with the same measure of wine for a libation, for every lamb offered.¹ For every ram a fifth of a bushel of flour, two quarts of oil, and the same measure of wine, a fragrant offering for the Lord's acceptance. But when, by way of burnt-sacrifice, or offering for a vow, or welcome-offering, thy victim is a bullock, with each bullock thou must use three tenths of a bushel of flour, six pints of oil, and the same measure of wine, a fragrant offering, this too, for the Lord's acceptance. A separate offering must be made to go with each bullock, or ram, or lamb, or kid. Native-born or foreign residents, all must use the same rite in doing sacrifice; precept and award are binding on you and on the aliens that dwell with you, without distinction.

And the Lord gave Moses this command, to be laid on the sons of Israel: When you have reached the land I mean to give you, you must not eat the bread its harvest yields without assigning to the Lord first-fruits from your table. Just as you set apart first-fruits when your corn is threshed, you must give the Lord the first share when your dough is kneaded.

It may be you will neglect one of these commandments through inadvertence; so many has the Lord given to Moses to be handed on to you, from the day when first he spoke to you till now. If it is the whole congregation that has thus unwittingly offended, they must offer a bullock, a burnt-sacrifice to please the Lord with the smell of its burning, and the bloodless offering and libations which due order demands; a goat, too, by way of offering for a fault.² So the priest will make intercession for the whole congregation of Israel, and their fault shall be pardoned. It was an unwitting offence, and even so they have brought the Lord burnt-sacrifice, and a victim for fault, to atone for their error.

¹ The Latin text here appears to join the words 'for every lamb offered' with the sentence which follows; probably through some error, since it destroys the meaning of verse 5 by leaving the victim unspecified.

² In Lev. 4. 13 sqq. the people, in similar circumstances, offer the bullock as a victim for fault, not in burnt-sacrifice, and there is no mention of the goat. Some think the reference there is to faults of commission, here to faults of omission. There is a similar discrepancy between verse 27 here and verses 27 sqq. of Lev. 4.

26 When the whole congregation is guilty of such a fault through inadvertence, not only the people of Israel, but all the aliens that dwell among them, will receive forgiveness.

27 If it is one person only that has unwittingly offended, the sacrifice due for the fault will be a yearling she-goat; and when the priest makes intercession for what was inadvertently done amiss, grace and pardon will be given. This law about faults of inadvertence must be observed by all alike, native-born or foreign resident.

30 But if anyone, citizen or alien, is guilty of an offence through pride, and in a spirit of rebellion against the Lord, he is lost to his people. Would he despise the Lord's word, annul his commandment? That fault deserves death, and he will be held to account for it.

32 It happened once, as the Israelites were passing through the desert that a man was found gathering firewood on the sabbath day. When he was brought before Moses and Aaron and the common assembly of the people, they put him in ward, uncertain what they should do with him. But the Lord said to Moses, His life must pay for it; he must be stoned by the whole multitude, away from the camp. So they took him out and stoned him to death, as the Lord had bidden them.

37 This, too, was the Lord's word to Moses, Bid the Israelites pass blue cords through the corners of their cloaks, and hang tassels on them; reminding themselves, as they look on these, of all the commandments the Lord has given them. They must not let their thoughts and eyes wander free, into all manner of unfaithfulness, but rather bethink them of the Lord's decrees and carry them out, a people set apart for their God; and that God the Lord, who brought them out of the land of Egypt to make them his own people.

sons of Eliab, and Hon son of Pheleth, a man of Ruben. These rose in rebellion against Moses, and there were two hundred and fifty others, whose names stood high in the councils of the people, that took part with them. And they confronted Moses and Aaron, making their protest thus: You presume too much; are not all the Israelites men set apart? Does not the Lord make his dwelling among all of us alike? We are the Lord's people; who are you that you should take command of us?¹

At hearing this, Moses cast himself down to earth. To Core, and to his faction, he said, Wait until to-morrow; then the Lord will make it plain which of us he has set apart for himself, and admit them to his presence. Those whom the Lord has chosen will find access to him. Let this be the test; bring censers with you, Core and all you that are of his faction, and to-morrow, in the Lord's presence, put incense on the lighted coals in them; so the Lord will make his choice, and we shall know which of us he has set apart; it is you, sons of Levi, that presume too much. And he made this further answer to Core: Listen, men of Levi; the God of Israel has separated you from the rest of the people and made you his own, to do him service in the tabernacle, and stand up, with the eyes of the whole multitude upon you, as his ministers; does not that content you? If he has given thee and all thy brother Levites access to himself, must you needs claim the priesthood too? Must thou and all thy company rebel against the Lord? Aaron, what has he done that you should complain so loudly of him?

Then Moses summoned Dathan and Abiron, sons of Eliab, to his presence, but they refused to come. What, they said, wouldst thou lord it over us now? When thou hast brought us away from Egypt, a land that was milk and honey indeed, to die here in the desert? No land of milk and honey for our journey's end, no fields and vineyards to enjoy; what more wilt thou ask of us? Wilt thou pluck out our eyes too? No, we will not come. At this, Moses said to the Lord, in great anger, Spurn every gift these men offer thee! Thou knowest that I have never robbed them of an ass, or done them any harm. Then he said to Core, Present yourselves before the Lord to-morrow, thou and the whole of thy company; you shall stand on one side, and Aaron on the other. Bring your censers with you, and you shall put incense on them there; you with two hundred censers, and Aaron with his censer all alone.

There, on the morrow, Moses and Aaron stood, and those others did as they were bidden, and gathered the whole multitude to meet them at the tabernacle door. And the glory of the Lord's presence was revealed to them all. But it was to Moses and Aaron that the Lord spoke; Stand apart, he said, from all the concourse that surrounds you; I mean to make an end of them here and now. Whereupon they fell flat on the ground, crying out, God all-powerful, Lord of every spirit that breathes, wilt thou take vengeance on all for one man's fault? And the Lord said to Moses, Bid all the rest of the people stand apart from the tents of Core, Dathan, and Abiron. And Moses, rising to his feet, went over to where Dathan and Abiron stood; with him were the elders of the people. Withdraw, he told the multitude, from the tents of these rebels; avoid the touch of anything that belongs to them, so that you may not be involved in their guilt. So they withdrew to this side and that, from the dwelling-places of Core, Dathan and Abiron; and now Dathan and Abiron came out and stood at their tent doors, with their wives and children and all their households. Here is proof, Moses said, whether it is at the Lord's bidding I do all you see me do, or prompted by my own spirit. If these men are left to undergo the common lot of mortality, called to their account as others are called to their account, then they are right; the Lord has given me no commission. But if the Lord alters the order of nature, so that earth gapes and swallows them up with all that is theirs, and they go down still living to the depths beneath, then you will have proof that they have spoken blasphemy against the Lord.

He had scarce done speaking, when the ground parted under their feet, gaped ³² open, and swallowed them up, with their tents and all that was theirs. Still living ³³ they went down to the depths beneath, and earth closed over them, and their names were lost to the muster-roll of the people. And now all the Israelites who stood round ³⁴ and heard the shrieks of the dying fled away, in dread that they too would be swallowed up by the earth; but not before ³⁵ the two hundred and fifty men who stood there offering incense had perished by fire sent from heaven. Then the Lord said to ³⁶ Moses, Bid Aaron's son, the priest Eleazar, ³⁷ gather up the censers that lie there among the flames, and scatter the coal in them this way and that. They are forfeit, now, ³⁸ through the death of these sinners;¹ he must beat them out into plates, which he will nail to the altar. Incense has been offered to the Lord in them, and they must be consecrated things, a portent and a warning to every Israelite who sees them. So the priest Eleazar took these brazen ³⁹ censers from the hands of the dead men the fire had killed, and beat them into plates, which he nailed to the altar, as a warning ⁴⁰ to the Israelites of after times. No interloper, that is not of Aaron's stock, must ever come forward to offer the Lord incense, or he will suffer the fate of Core and his company, the fate which the Lord, through Moses, foretold to them.

Next day, the men of Israel were en- ⁴¹ raged against Moses and Aaron, for putting the Lord's people to death. A con- ⁴² spiracy was formed, and the uproar grew fiercer, until Moses and Aaron took refuge ⁴³ in the tabernacle. As soon as they entered it, the cloud overshadowed it, and the glory of the Lord's presence was revealed. And the Lord said to Moses, Withdraw ⁴⁴ yourselves from this multitude which surrounds you; I mean, after all, to make an end of them. And as they lay there with their faces to the ground, Moses said to ⁴⁶ Aaron, Take thy censer, and put incense on the lighted coals in it, and go with all speed to find the people and make intercession for them; already the Lord has begun to wreak his vengeance, and destruction rages among them. Aaron ⁴⁷ obeyed, and ran into the midst of the throng where the fire was already making ¹ According to the Hebrew text, 'they are holy things, the censers of these sinners'.

48 havoc; ¹ he offered incense and made intercession for the people, standing there be-49 tween the dead and the living, and the divine vengeance ceased. Already fourteen thousand seven hundred men had 50 been smitten by it, not counting those who perished in the rebellion of Core. But now the destruction was over, and Aaron went back to meet Moses at the tabernacle door.

2 17 Then the Lord said to Moses, Bid the Israelites bring thee twelve rods, to represent the twelve tribes, each with the name of the tribe's chieftain writ-3 ten on it; and Levi, too, must have a rod, a single rod representing all its families, with 4 Aaron's name written on it. These thou wilt lay up in the tabernacle, before the ark, 5 my appointed trysting-place with thee. On one of these names my choice shall fall, and the rod which bears that name will sprout.
 So I will put an end to these complaints with which the men of Israel assail you.

6 Moses handed on this message to the Israelites, and the chieftain of each tribe brought him a rod, twelve rods in all, not 7 counting Aaron's, all of which he laid up in the Lord's presence, in the tabernacle.
 8 And when he went back next day he found that the rod of Aaron, representing the tribe of Levi, had sprouted; buds had formed on it and burst into flower, and these flowers, as their petals drooped, 9 turned into almonds. So Moses carried all the rods away from the Lord's presence and shewed them to all the people, and each of the chieftains had his rod returned 10 to him; but Aaron's rod, the Lord told Moses, was to be taken back into the tabernacle, to be kept there in memory of the rebellious Israelites; there must be no more complaining, no more death-penal-11 ties. Moses did as the Lord had bidden 12 him; and now the Israelites said to Moses,
 We have dwindled away; we are dead men, 13 all of us. None comes near the Lord's tabernacle, but he dies for it. Surely he will not go on destroying us, till our race is utterly extinguished?

18 This was the Lord's word to Aaron: For what is done in the sanctuary, for the duties of your priesthood,² none but thou and thy sons with thee shall be answerable; but all the sons of Levi are thy brethren, and these, all that come of thy father's tribe, thou mayest call in to relieve thee by their ministry, while thou and thy sons minister in the tabernacle that bears record of me. The Levites shall wait on thy bidding, as the service of the tabernacle requires it, yet never, at their peril and yours, having access to the things of the sanctuary, or to the altar.

 They shall be content to relieve you by waiting on the needs of the tabernacle and its worship, in which no other tribe may take part. It is for you, if you would not have my displeasure fall on Israel, to guard the sanctuary and serve the altar's needs.
 If I have separated your fellow-Levites from the rest of the people, and dedicated them as a gift to myself, I have designated them only for the menial offices of my tabernacle; the priesthood is for thee and for thy sons. All the ceremonies of the altar, all that is hidden within the veil, belongs to the priests' charge; it is death for any other to take part.

This, too, the Lord said to Aaron: Hereby I put the offerings made to me at thy disposal; all that the sons of Israel dedicate to me, I pass on to thee and to thy sons, a portion assigned to the priesthood by right inalienable. All that is set apart, when offerings are made to the Lord, is my gift to thee; whatever is offered by way of bloodless sacrifice, or to atone for some fault or wrong done, and vowed to holy uses, belongs to thee and thine. It must be eaten on holy ground, and only by men, this consecrated gift I make thee. The first-fruits which the Israelites dedicate to me, and hold up in my presence, belong at all times to thee and to thy sons and to thy daughters as well; all that are clean of defilement in thy household may partake of them. Do they bring me the best of their oil, their wine, their corn, or any other kind of first-fruits? It is thine; no early fruits of the ground that are brought to the Lord but shall go to thy use; none of thy household that is clean of defilement but may partake. All that the Israelites give in payment of their vows, is thine. Thine, too, is every living thing that handsels the

² Literally, 'for the guilt of the sanctuary womb, and so must be offered to the Lord, be it man or beast; for the first-born of men, and for the first-born of unclean beasts, thou wilt take a ransom instead. (The ransom-price, to be paid after one month, is five silver pieces, by sanctuary reckoning; one silver piece is worth twenty pence).¹ But there is no ransoming the first-born of ox or sheep or goat; they are set apart for the Lord. Their blood is to be shed upon the altar, and their fat burned, to please the Lord with the smell of its burning; but the flesh-meat shall go to thy use; like the breast and the right shoulder, it is thy due. All the sanctuary dues which the sons of Israel offer I give to thee and to thy sons and daughters by a perpetual deed of gift; it is a covenant between the Lord and thy race that time cannot alter.²

This, too, the Lord said to Aaron: You are to hold no lands, no portion is to be assigned to you, among your fellow-Israelites. I am all thy portion; these others have their several possessions, thou hast me. And in return for the service they do me in the tabernacle that bears record of my covenant, I have allotted to the sons of Levi the enjoyment of all the tithe Israel pays. Never henceforward, upon pain of death, must other Israelites come near my sanctuary; it is for the Levites only to do the work of the tabernacle, and make themselves answerable for all the people does amiss; and it shall be a law unalterable, age after age, that they possess nothing else, but live content with the tithe which I have set apart for their use, to defray all their needs.

And the Lord bade Moses give this charge to the Levites: When the sons of Israel pay the tithe I have assigned to you, you must offer to the Lord the first-fruits of them, the tenth part of your tithe, as if you were paying dues from threshing-floor and wine-press of your own; you too must offer the Lord first-fruits of all that comes to you, making them over to the high priest Aaron. And the part of your tithe which you set aside as an offering to the Lord must be the best part, the choice part. When you have offered all that is best and richest, you will have paid your dues, as surely as if they came from threshing-floor and wine-press of your own; then you may enjoy the rest of the tithe, and your households with you; it is the reward of all your tabernacle service. You must not incur guilt by keeping the best and the richest for yourselves;³ for such misuse of the offerings which the sons of Israel make, death is the penalty.

19 And the Lord said to Moses and Aaron, Here is the law of sacrifice, divinely instituted. Bid the sons of Israel bring a red heifer, fully grown and free from blemish, one that has never borne the yoke. This you will give to the priest Eleazar, who will take it beyond the boundaries of the camp and immolate it there in the sight of all. He will then dip his finger in its blood, with which he will sprinkle the front of the tabernacle door seven times; the heifer itself he will burn publicly, committing skin and flesh, blood and dung to the flames. Cedar-wood, too, and hyssop and stuff twice-dyed in scarlet must be thrown by the priest into the fire which consumes the heifer. When all this is done, he will wash his clothes and his own person before he enters the camp again, and will hold himself defiled till evening comes; and there will be the same duty of washing, the same law of defilement, for the man who has had the burning of it. The ashes of the heifer must be collected by a man who is still free from defilement, and poured out in some place that is free from defilement; and there the people of Israel will keep them to provide lustral water, the ashes of this heifer that is burned to atone for men's faults. Even the man who has the carrying of the ashes must wash his clothes, and hold himself defiled till evening comes. This is to be a sacred observance for the Israelites, and for aliens who dwell among them, by right unalterable.

When a man has touched a dead body, and for a week counts as defiled, with this water he must be sprinkled on the third and the seventh day if he is to be purified; no purification for him on the seventh day unless he has been sprinkled on the third.

¹ This verse probably refers only to the ransoming of the human first-born (cf. Lev. 27. 6, 12).

² Literally, 'a covenant of salt for ever'. ³ 'You must not incur guilt by keeping'; according to the Hebrew text, 'you will incur no guilt if you set aside'.

- 13 One who has touched a man's dead body, and will not use this salve for his cleansing, profanes the Lord's dwelling-place; he is lost to Israel, unclean still, and bearing the burden of his defilement, until the lustral water sprinkles him.
- 14 If a man dies in his tent, this is the rule that must be followed; all those who go into the tent incur defilement for seven days, and so does all the furniture in it;
- 15 nothing escapes defilement except what is covered with a lid or wrapped up. And if
- 16 a man is killed or dies in the open, anyone who touches his body incurs defilement for seven days; so does anyone who touches some bone of a dead man, or his
- 17 grave. It was to atone for such faults the victim was burned; a handful of its ashes must be thrown into a vessel that contains
- 18 fresh water, and some man who is free from defilement, using hyssop for a brush, must sprinkle the tent with it, and the furniture of the tent, and all those who are defiled by contact with death. So, on the
- 19 third and on the seventh day, man defiled must be made clean by man undefiled; and on the seventh day he will wash his clothes, and hold himself defiled, even yet, till
- 20 evening. The man who will not avail himself of such atonement is lost to the congregation; he is a profanation to the Lord's sanctuary until the lustral water has sprinkled him.¹ This command must never be
- 21 abrogated. Even the man who has sprinkled the lustral water must wash his clothes, and everyone who has touched it
- 22 is defiled for the rest of the day. The defiled man defiles all he touches; and anyone who touches it is defiled in his turn till evening.

- 20 A new year was beginning, when the Israelites, marching in their full strength, reached the desert of Sin. Here, while they were halting at Cades,
- 2 Mary died and was buried. And now, hard put to it for want of water, the people made common cause against Moses and Aaron,
- 3 rebelling against their authority. Better for us, they said, if we had died when our brethren died, by the Lord's visitation!
- 4 What need was there you should call the Lord's people out into a desert that is death to us and to our cattle? Why must you take us away from Egypt, and bring us out to this sorry place we cannot cultivate? Figs and grapes and pomegranates it yields none, and we have no water, even, to drink.

At this, when they had broken up the gathering, Moses and Aaron went into the tabernacle that bore record of the covenant, and there cast themselves down to earth in entreaty. Lord God, they said, listen to the plea made by this people of thine, and open to them thy store-house of fresh water, to content them and put an end to their complaints! Then the bright presence of the Lord was revealed to them; and the Lord said to Moses, Take thy rod with thee, and do thou and thy brother Aaron gather all the people together. Before their eyes, lay thy command upon the rock here, and it will yield water. This water thou bringest out of the rock will suffice to give drink to the whole multitude, and to their cattle. So Moses took up the rod, there in the Lord's presence, as he was bidden, and they made the people gather before the rock. Listen to me, he said, faithless rebels; are we to get you water out of this rock? Twice Moses lifted his hand, and smote the rock with his rod; whereupon water gushed out in abundance, so that all the people and their cattle had enough to drink. But the Lord said to Moses and Aaron, Why did you not trust in me, and vindicate my holiness in the sight of Israel? It will not be yours to lead this multitude into the land I mean to give them. This is the place called the Water of Rebellion, where the Israelites challenged the Lord, and he vindicated his holiness before them.

From Cades, Moses sent envoys to the king of Edom, with a message to him from his brethren of Israel: Thou knowest what hardships have overtaken us; how our fathers made their way into Egypt, how they and we were ill-used by the Egyptians during the long time we spent there, how we cried out to the Lord, till he listened to us and sent an angel to rescue us from Egypt. And now we are here at Cades, on the frontier of thy dominions; what we ask of thee is leave to pass through this land of thine. There shall be no marching through fields or vineyards, no drinking at thy wells; we will travel by the high road, not to right or left, until we have passed beyond thy frontiers. But the Edomites refused to let them pass, threatening armed resistance. Let Israel promise as they would to use only the public highway, to pay in full for all they or their beasts might drink, without haggling over the price, to make a quick passage of it; still Edom refused, coming out to meet them there and then in great force, ready to overpower them. The Israelites, then, since no entreaties could move them to grant the right of passage, left the Edomites alone and turned elsewhere.

So, leaving Cades behind them, they reached Mount Hor, on the edge of the Edomite country; and here it was that the Lord said to Moses, Aaron must become a part of his people. For him, there is no entering the land which is your promised home, so unfaithful was he to my word at the Water of Rebellion.¹ Take Aaron and his son with thee to the top of mount Hor, strip the father of his priestly garments and clothe his son Eleazar with them instead; there Aaron shall die, and become part of his race. So Moses did as the Lord bade him; together they went up mount Hor in the sight of the whole multitude, and there he stripped Aaron of his garments and put them on his son Eleazar, and came back with Eleazar alone, leaving Aaron dead on the mountain top. And the whole people, thus apprised of Aaron's death, mourned over him, all alike, for thirty days.

21 There was a Chanaanite king that had his capital, Arad, in the south country; and when he heard that the Israelites had come there, following the Spies' Road, he levied war against them, defeating them in the field and winning spoils from them. Whereupon the Israelites took a vow, promising the Lord that if he would grant them victory over this tribe, they would raze its cities to the ground. In answer to these prayers, the Lord let his people have their way with the Chanaanite king; they killed him, and destroyed all his cities, giving to the battle-field the name of Horma, that is, Forfeited.

When they left mount Hor, they must needs march along the way that leads to the Red Sea, so as to fetch a compass round the territory of Edom. Before long, the people grew weary of this laborious march, assailing God and Moses with such complaints as these: Why didst thou ever bring us away from Egypt, only to die in the desert? We have neither bread nor water here; we are sick at heart, sick of the unsatisfying food thou givest us. Upon this, the Lord sent serpents among them, with fire in their fangs, that struck at many and killed many of them, till they came to Moses and confessed, We have sinned by making complaints against the Lord and against thee; entreat him to rid us of the serpents. So Moses made intercession for the people; and the Lord bade him fashion a serpent of bronze, and set it up on a staff, bringing life to all who should look towards it as they lay wounded. And so it proved; when Moses made a brazen serpent and set it up on a staff, the wounded men had but to look towards it, and they were healed.

After this the Israelites marched on, and encamped at Oboth, and left Oboth to encamp at Jeabarim, in the desert that faces Moab on the east. Their next march brought them to the valley of Zared; and so they passed on to encamp by the Arnon, a desert stream which meets you at the Amorrite border; it is the frontier of Moab, dividing Moab from the Amorrites. So it came to be written in the Book of the Lord's Battles, What he did by the Red Sea, he will do again in the Valleys of Arnon; among the mountain torrents that come down to rest in Ar, to flow peacefully through the lands of Moab. It was at their next encampment that a well was shown to them; Gather the people together, the Lord had said to Moses, and I will provide water for them; and it was here that Israel first sang the song called, Let the well spring up. They all sang together, Here is the well that was dug by princes; the chieftains of the host laid it open with the staves they carried, with the giver of the law to lead them. So they left the wilder-

19 ness, and reached Matthana; after Mat-20 thana, Nahaliel, and after Nahaliel, Ba-moth, and after Bamoth, a valley in the Moabite country with mount Phasga at the head of it, looking out towards the desert.

21 Here the Israelites sent envoys to Sehon, 22 king of the Amorrhites, asking him for leave to pass through his country, upon condition that they kept clear of fields and vineyards, drank no water from the wells, 23 and marched along the high road until they reached the end of his dominions. But Sehon, sooner than let them pass through his territory, mustered his forces and went out to meet them, there in the desert.
 24 Upon reaching Jasa, he offered battle, but they gave him the sword's point, and conquered all his domain, reaching from the Arnon as far as Jeboc and the Ammonite country; the Ammonite frontier had strong 25 garrisons to defend it. Thus Israel took possession of all his strongholds, and had the Amorrhite cities to dwell in, Hesebon and all the smaller towns that depended 26 on it. It was at Hesebon that Sehon, king of the Amorrhites, had made his capital, after making war on the king of Moab and occupying all the lands he held, up to the Arnon.

27 That is the meaning of the old saying: To Hesebon, to Hesebon! Strong and true be the walls that Sehon is a-building.
 28 Fire from Hesebon, a flame from Sehon's town, swallowing up Ar, the city of the Moabites, and all that dwell in the hill-29 fastnesses by Arnon's side. Woe betide thee, Moab; worshippers of Chamas, you are undone. Sehon, the Amorrhite king, has claimed their sons for exile, their 30 daughters for bondage; all their domain is lost, from Hesebon to Dibon; weary of the battle, in Nophe and distant Medaba they have taken refuge at last.

31 Israel, then, settled in the land of the 32 Amorrhites, and Moses sent spies to survey Jazer. When they had occupied the villages there, and conquered its inha-33 bitants, they turned aside, and marched by the road which leads to Basan. The king of Basan, Og, mustered his people and came 34 out to give them battle in Edrai; but the Lord said to Moses, Do not be afraid of him; I am letting thee have thy way with him, and all his people, and his territory;
 thou shalt conquer him, as thou didst conquer Sehon, the Amorrhite king that dwelt in Hesebon. And so it proved; they made 35 war on him and his sons and all his subjects until none were left, and so took possession of his country.

22 Their next encampment was in the plains of Moab, on the further side of Jordan opposite Jericho.

But there was one man that took note of 2 all this, Balac the son of Sephor. He saw how the sons of Israel had defeated the Amorrhites, how they had struck terror 3 into Moab, and could not be halted in their advance. And he said to the Madianite 4 chiefs, Here is a people that will make short work of all our neighbours, as easily as an ox tears up grass by the roots. It was in Moab that Balac himself bore rule at this time. So he sent envoys to Balaam son of 5 Beor, the soothsayer who dwelt on the Ammonite border, desiring his presence.
 Here is a people on the march from Egypt, he said, whose hosts darken the face of earth, and they are encamped at my doors; come and lay thy curse on them, or they 6 are too strong for me. I would fain overthrow them, drive them out of my country; and I know well that a blessing falls where thou dost bless, a curse where thou dost curse.

So the elders of Moab, chiefs of the 7 Madianite country, set out with gifts in their hands to fee the soothsayer. When they reached Balaam, and gave him Balac's message, he bade them stay there for the 8 night, so that he might answer as the Lord should direct him. To this they consented;
 and when God came to Balaam and asked him, What is their errand, these guests of 9 thine? he answered, They have brought me a message from Balac, son of Sephor.
 He says a people has marched there from 10 Egypt, whose hosts darken the face of earth, and he would have me come and lay my ban on them, so that he can make war on them and drive them out of his country.
 Do not go with them, the Lord said to 12 Balaam; do not lay thy curse on the people, for a blessing goes with them. So when he 13 rose next morning he bade the chiefs go back to their own country; the Lord would not allow him to accompany them. And 14 when these returned and told Balac how Balaam had refused to come with them, he sent other chiefs, more in number and greater in rank than those whom he had sent first. And the message these brought with them to Balaam in the name of Balac son of Sephor was this; Come to me with all speed; I am ready to grant thee honours and whatever else thou wouldst have, if thou wilt only come and lay thy ban on this people. But Balaam told them, Though Balac should fill his house with silver and gold and offer to give it me, I have no power to go beyond the Lord's bidding by a word great or small. Be pleased to lodge with me to-night, and wait to hear what answer the Lord will give me this time. And that night the Lord came to Balaam and said, If they are here to summon thee, rise and go with them, but do ever what I bid thee.

When Balaam arose in the morning, he saddled his ass and set out in their company. But now God was angry at his going.¹ There rode Balaam on his ass, with two servants attending him, when all at once an angel of the Lord stood in his path to prevent him. And the ass, seeing an angel standing there with drawn sword, edged away from the road and took to the open fields, so that Balaam must needs beat her, to force her into the path again. Next, the angel stood in a narrow entry between two vineyard walls; and at the sight of him the ass cowered close against one of the walls, crushing her rider's foot, and he must beat her forward again. But still the angel of the Lord would have his way; he moved on to a narrow defile, where there was no room to pass right or left, and stood there to intercept them. And now the ass, seeing him standing there, lay down under her rider; so that Balaam fell into a rage, and beat her flanks harder than ever. Hereupon the Lord endowed the ass with the power of speech, and she said, This is the third time thou hast beaten me; what have I done to deserve it? Thou hast deserved it, answered Balaam, by playing me false; if I had but a sword in my hand, I would kill thee. Why, said the ass, am

I not thy own beast, that thou hast ridden these years past? And did I ever play thee such a trick before? Never, said he; and with that the Lord opened Balaam's eyes, to make him see the angel standing there with drawn sword, and he fell to the ground in worship.

How comes it, asked the angel, that thou hast thrice beaten thy ass? I came to intercept thee, because this errand of thine is headstrong and defies my will; if the ass had not turned aside, yielding to my ban, I would have taken thy life and spared hers. I have been at fault, said Balaam, little thinking that thou wert standing in my way; if thou art displeased with my errand, I will go home again. No, said the angel, go with them, but be sure thou utterest no word save what I bid thee. So he went on with the chiefs; and at the news of his coming Balac went out to meet him, at a town where Arnon marks the furthest boundaries of Moab. I sent messengers to summon thee, he said to Balaam; why didst thou not come to me there and then? Didst thou think I had not the means to reward thee for thy pains? And Balaam answered, I have come, as thou seest; but with no message for thee save what the Lord puts on my lips. So together they made their way to this city on the frontier of Balac's dominions.² Here he sacrificed oxen and sheep, sending a portion to Balaam and to the chiefs who had accompanied him; and when morning came, he took him up to the Hill of Baal, whence he could see the furthest outposts of Israel.

23 And first, Balaam would have Balac raise seven altars there, and provide him with as many bullocks and as many rams. When his bidding was done, they offered a bullock and a ram on each altar. Wait here by the sacrifice, he told Balac; I will go and meet the Lord, if he will, and tell thee what message he has charged me with.³ No sooner had he withdrawn than the Lord came to meet him, and Balaam told him how he had raised

¹ God, it would seem, gave Balaam express permission to go with the Moabites, meaning to shew his power by making the prophet bless Israel, instead of cursing them. But he was angry with Balaam for wanting to go (because it argued covetousness in him, II Pet. 2. 15). These two attitudes are here represented as successive, as if Almighty God had changed his mind; such representation of divine things in human terms is common all through the Old Testament. ² 'This city on the frontier of Balac's dominions'; the words probably conceal a proper name, 'City of the Outposts'. ³ It is not certain what is meant, here and in verse 16, by God meeting the prophet; it should perhaps be inferred from 24. I that some form of divination by signs is intended.

seven altars, offering a bullock and a ram 5 on each. With that, the Lord put a message on his lips, bidding him return to Balac and 6 deliver it; so he returned, to find Balac standing beside the burnt-sacrifice he had made, with the Moabite chiefs about him.

7 Then Balaam prophesied: I have come from Aram, from the hills out in the east;
 it was Balac summoned me, the king of the Moabites. He bade me come and curse Jacob, come with all speed, and lay my ban 8 on Israel. Curse them, I, when God's curse does not light on them? I lay a ban, 9 where ban from the Lord is none? I will climb the high rocks to see them, the hills shall enlarge my view; here is a people destined to dwell apart, not counted among 10 the muster-roll of the nations. Sons of Israel, countless as the dust, line of Jacob, past all numbering, may death find me faithful as these, be my end like theirs!

11 And Balac asked Balaam, What trick is is this thou hast played on me? I sent for thee to curse my enemies; wilt thou bless 12 them instead? But he answered, What words should I use, save what the Lord 13 bids me utter? Nay, said Balac, come with me to another spot, from which thou wilt only be able to see a part of Israel, not the whole people; from this thou shalt lay a 14 curse on them. So he took him to the high ground at the top of mount Phasga; and there, when Balaam had raised seven altars 15 with an offering of bullocks and rams, he would have Balac wait by the burnt-16 sacrifice, while he kept his tryst. The Lord met him and put a message on his lips to 17 give Balac. And Balac, waiting there with the chiefs of Moab by the burnt-sacrifice, asked him what the Lord's word was.

18 And again he prophesied: Stand there, Balac, and listen; a message for thee, son 19 of Sephor! It is not for God to gainsay himself, as men do, to alter, like the things of earth; must he not make good his word, 20 fulfil his promise? My errand is to bless, and I cannot retract the blessing. It is no 21 false God that Jacob worships, no senseless image that has its shrine in Israel; the Lord dwells with them as their God; his royal trumpets sound for victory. This is the God that brought them out of Egypt, and made them like a wild ox for strength.

 Jacob needs no soothsayer, Israel no di-vination; time will reveal the marvellous things God does for them; a people that is like a lioness roused, a lion ready to spring, never resting till it has devoured its prey, drunk the blood of slaughtered men.

And now Balac would have no more, either of curse or of blessing; but Balaam said, Did I not warn thee that I must needs carry out God's bidding? Come, said Balac, let me find thee another vantage-point; from this perhaps, God will allow thee to curse them. And he took him up to the top of mount Phogor, looking out towards the desert. Here too Balaam must have seven altars, seven bullocks, and seven rams; and Balac did as he was bidden, offering a bullock and a ram on every altar.

24 But this time, seeing clearly that it was God's purpose to bless Israel, Balaam did not go apart, as before, to look for portents; he turned towards the desert, and there, looking about him, he saw Israel encamped, tribe upon tribe.
 With that, the spirit of God fell upon him, and he prophesied: Thus speaks Balaam, the son of Beor, thus speaks the man who has seen with eyes blindfolded;¹ thus speaks the man who has heard the words of God himself, looked on a vision sent from the Almighty, who has fallen into a trance, and learned to see aright! How lovely, Jacob, are thy tents; Israel, how fair thy dwelling! Fair as wooded valleys, as gardens fed by running streams, as bowers of the Lord's own planting,² as cedars on the river bank! Like a bucket brimming over at the well, see how their posterity spreads from one river-frontier to the next! The king that rules over them shall rival Agag himself, and take away his kingdom from him.³ God has rescued

¹ Literally, 'whose eyes were shut up', but the Hebrew text probably means 'whose eyes were opened'.

² Literally, according to the Latin, 'tents the Lord has fixed', but the word used in the Hebrew text seems to mean some kind of tree (perhaps the aloe), as indeed the context demands.

them from Egypt, and made them like a wild ox for strength; nations shall come and swallow up their enemies,¹ crush them utterly, shoot them down with arrows. Though Israel takes his rest, it is but as the crouching lion sleeps; who dares disturb the lioness in her den? A blessing, Israel, on all who bless, a curse on all who curse thee!

At this, Balac clapped his hands together in vexation; It was to curse my enemies, said he to Balaam, that I summoned thee, and thrice thou hast blessed them instead; back home with thee! It was in my mind to raise thee to high honours, but this Lord of thine has thwarted thee of thy ambition. And Balaam still answered, Did I not warn the messengers thou sentest to me, Though Balac should fill his house with silver and gold and offer to give it me, I have no power to go beyond the Lord's bidding by uttering any word of my own, for good or ill; I can only deliver the Lord's message? I will go back, then, to my own folk; but not till I have instructed thee about the dealings there must be between this folk and thine in the days that are coming.²

And once more Balaam prophesied: Thus speaks Balaam, the son of Beor, thus speaks the man who has seen with eyes blindfolded; who heard speech of God, most high, the Almighty, knew his mind, had vision of him, and in a trance, learned to see aright! My vision is not of this time, is not of the things that meet my eyes. I see a star that rises out of Jacob, a stem that springs from Israel's root; one who shall lay low the chiefs of Moab, shall bring devastation on all the posterity of Seth.³ Edom shall fall into his hands; the men of Seir will yield their lands to the enemy. Brave deeds in Israel; such a ruler for Jacob as shall leave no remnant in the captured city! Then he spoke of Amalec, Amalec, first-fruits of the nations, shall have his very gleanings destroyed; spoke²¹ of the Cinites, Though strong be thy fastness, though high thy nest, proud race of²² Cin, it shall not be for ever; Assur shall carry thee away into exile. And once more²³ he prophesied: Alas, who can survive when God brings all this about? Men will come²⁴ in ships of war from Italy, conquering the Assyrians, laying the Hebrew land waste, doomed themselves, last of all, to perish.⁴

With that, Balaam set out and made his²⁵ way home; and Balac, too, went back whence he came.

25 Meanwhile, the Israelites were dwelling at Settim; and here they fell a-whoring with the women of Moab. These bade them come and partake of their own sacrifices, and worship their own gods; so that sons of Israel learned the rites of Beelphegor. And the Lord was indignant; he would have had all the clan chiefs hanged on gibbets in the sun's heat, to avert the divine vengeance from the people. But Moses quickly bade the rulers of the people slay all those who had learned Beelphegor's worship.

And now, in full sight of Moses, and of the whole multitude that stood weeping at the tabernacle door, one of the Israelites brought in a Madianite woman to shame his brethren. Whereupon Phinees, son of Eleazar, son of the high priest Aaron, left his place among the multitude weapon in hand, and followed this Israelite into the place of shame; man and woman both he pierced through, groin to groin. With that, the Israelites were rid of the plague that had befallen them; but not till twenty-four thousand of them had perished. And the Lord said to Moses, It is Phinees, son of Eleazar, son of the high priest Aaron, who has averted my vengeance from the sons of Israel; a man roused to such indignation in my cause, that my own indignation has spared them from utter overthrow. Tell¹²

² 'The dealings there must be between this folk and thine'; in the Latin, 'what thy folk shall do to this folk', but according to the Hebrew text, 'what this folk shall do to thy folk'. If the former is the true rendering, the allusion is perhaps to Balaam's advice given on this occasion (31. 16), not to the prophecy which here follows.

him, then, that I pledge him my favour; the priesthood is secured by covenant to him and to his heirs for ever, in return for this zeal on his God's behalf, that atoned for Israel's sin. (The Israelite who was killed with the woman of Midian was one Zambri, son of Salu, a clan chief of Simeon; and the woman who died with him was called Cozbi, daughter to Sur, a man of high rank among the Midianites.)

And now the Lord said to Moses, Treat the Midianites as enemies, and smite them down; it was as enemies they treated you, when they baited a trap for you with Phogor's rites, and with their country-woman, the Midianite princess Cozbi, that died when the plague came to punish Phogor's worshippers.

26 When this toll of guilty blood had been taken, the Lord said to Moses and to the new high priest, Aaron's son Eleazar, Make a register, by households and families, of all the Israelites that have reached the age of twenty; that is, all the fighting men. So, in the plains of Moab, across the Jordan opposite Jericho, Moses and the high priest Eleazar summoned them all, the men of twenty years old or more, and passed the Lord's command on to them. And the register was as follows:

The sons of Ruben, Israel's first-born, were called Henoah, Phallu, Hesron and Charmi. These gave their names to the clans of Ruben, which counted forty-three thousand seven hundred and thirty men. Phallu had a son called Eliab, who was the father of Namuel, Dathan, and Abiron. (It was these two chiefs, Dathan and Abiron, that made head against Moses and Aaron at the time of Core's rebellion, setting the Lord at defiance. The earth gaped open, and Core was swallowed up; many of the Israelites were killed, two hundred and fifty of them by fire, and it was a great miracle that when Core perished, his sons did not perish with him.)

The clans of Simeon were named after his sons, Namuel, Jamin, Jachin, Zare and Saul; they counted twenty-two thousand two hundred. And the clans of Gad were named after his sons, Sephon, Aggi, Suni, Ozni, Her, Arod and Ariel; they counted forty thousand five hundred. Juda had two sons, Her and Onan, who died in the land of Chanaan; his other sons gave their names to clans, Sela, Phares, and Zara. (This Phares had two sons, who gave their names to the Hesronites and the Hamulites.) Juda counted seventy-six thousand five hundred. The clans of Issachar were named after his sons, Thola, Phua, Jasub and Semran; they counted sixty-four thousand three hundred. The clans of Zabulon were named after his sons, Sared, Elon and Jalel; they counted sixty thousand five hundred. The clans of Joseph were descended from his two sons, Manasses and Ephraim. Manasses' son Machir gave his name to the Machirites and Machir's son Galaad to the Galaadites; and the clans of Galaad were named after his sons, Jezer, Helec, Asriel, Sechem, Semida and Hopher. (Hopher was the father of Salphaad, who had no sons, but five daughters, Maala, Noa, Hegla, Melcha and Thersa.) Manasses counted fifty-two thousand seven hundred. The clans of Ephraim were named after his sons Suthala, Becher and Thenen. (Heran, the founder of the Heranites, was Suthala's son.) Ephraim counted thirty-two thousand five hundred. All these were the descendants of Joseph. The clans of Benjamin were named after his sons, Bela, Asbel, Ahiram, Supham and Hupham. (Bela's sons gave their names to the Heredites and the Noemanites.) Benjamin counted forty-five thousand six hundred.

Dan had no sons but Suham, the founder of the Suhamites; all the clans descended from Dan were Suhamites, counting sixty-four thousand four hundred. The clans of Aser were named after his sons, Jemna, Jessui and Brie. (Brie had two sons, who gave their names to the Heberites and the Melchielites. Aser had also a daughter called Sara.) Aser counted fifty-three thousand four hundred. And the clans of Nephthali were called after his sons, Jessiel, Guni, Jeser and Sellem. Nephthali counted forty-five thousand four hundred. Thus the whole muster-roll of the Israelites contained six hundred and one thousand, seven hundred and thirty names.

And the Lord told Moses, The land must be divided up under these names, one portion for each.¹ A large portion where they are many, a small portion where they are few; their inheritance is to be assigned to them according to this present register; but always lots must be used to decide between tribe and tribe, between clan and clan. Great or small, they must be content with what the lot gives them.

The Levites, too, were divided into clans, named after Levi's sons, Gerson, Caath and Merari. (These are subdivided into the Levite clans named after Lobni, Hebroni, Moholi, Musi and Core.²) Caath was father of Amram, who married Jochabed, a daughter of Levi, born to him in Egypt; the children she bore to Amram were Aaron and Moses and their sister Mary. Aaron's sons were called Nadab, Abiu, Eleazar and Ithamar; but of these, Nadab and Abiu were punished with death for offering the Lord unhallowed fire. Of the Levites altogether, twenty-three thousand were registered; males all of them, but counting all those who were more than a month old. They were not reckoned in the muster-roll of Israel, nor did they receive lands like the rest.

Such was the register of the Israelites made by Moses and the high priest Eleazar, when they reached the plains of Moab, by the Jordan opposite Jericho. Of these, not one had been among those registered by Moses and Aaron in the desert of Sinai, and afterwards doomed by the Lord to die in the wilderness; none of those now remained, except Caleb, son of Jephone, and Josue, son of Nun.

27 Salphaad, then, was descended from Joseph through Hopher, Galaad, Machir and Manasses. And now his daughters, Maala, Noa, Hegla, Melcha and Thersa came forward, preferring a suit before Moses and the high priest Eleazar and all the chieftains, at the tabernacle door. This was their plea: Our father died in the desert, not that he took any part in Core's rebellion against the Lord; he died accountable for no sins but his own; and he died without male issue. Why must his name be lost to his clan, only because he had no son? Why may we not inherit side by side with our father's kinsmen? So Moses submitted their plea to the Lord's arbitrament, and the Lord said to him, This is a just plea the daughters of Salphaad are making. Grant them the right to inherit side by side with their father's kinsmen, and succeed to his property. And make this announcement to the sons of Israel: When a man dies without sons, his property shall pass to a daughter; if he has no daughter, to his brothers; if he has no brothers, to his uncles; if he has no uncles either, to those who are next of kin to him. This right holds good at all times by law unalterable; it was the Lord's command to Moses.

After this, the Lord bade Moses climb the mountain of Abarim, that was near by, and view the land he was giving to the sons of Israel as their home. When thou hast viewed it, said he, thou too, like thy brother Aaron, shalt become a part of thy people. Both of you earned my displeasure when the people challenged my power in the wilderness of Sin, by not vindicating my holiness before their eyes. (This was by the Waters of Rebellion, at Cades in the desert of Sin.) To this Moses made answer, O God, art not thou Lord of every spirit that breathes? And wilt thou not find this people a ruler, who shall lead them to and fro, marching at their head? Must the people of the Lord go untended, like sheep without a shepherd? And the Lord said to him, Make choice of Josue, the son of Nun, a man endowed with high gifts; lay thy hand upon him, and bid him stand forth before the high priest Eleazar, and the whole assembly. There, in the sight of all, give him thy last charge, and share with him that dignity which is thine, so that all Israel may learn to obey him. But whenever some action is planned, the high priest Eleazar will consult the Lord concerning it; at his word both Josue himself and all Israel, and all the company that goes with them, shall move this way and that. So Moses did as the Lord had bidden him, presenting Josue before the high priest Eleazar and the whole assembly, and there laying his hands on Josue's head, and repeating all the charge which the Lord had given him.

¹ 'The land must be divided up under these names'; it is not clear whether the names of tribes or of clans are meant. Nor is it clear how the two principles of apportionment by numbers and apportionment by lot were reconciled; presumably, lots were drawn between units whose numbers were approximately equal (as Benjamin and Nephthali). ² The words 'subdivided into' are not found in the original but may be inferred from Ex. 6. 16 sqq.

- 28 This, too, was a message the Lord gave to Moses: Bid the sons of Israel bring offerings to regale me, burnt-sacrifices to delight me with the smell of their burning, at the times appointed.
- 3 Daily, all the year round, they must offer two yearling lambs, without blemish, in burnt-sacrifice to me, one in the morning, one in the evening, with the tenth of a bushel of flour, kneaded in three pints of pure oil. The burnt-sacrifice you offered at mount Sinai, to delight the Lord with the smell of its burning, must continue for all time. For each lamb, too, you will make a libation in the Lord's sanctuary, of three pints of wine. The second lamb will be offered in the evening, repeating all the morning's ceremonies and its libation, and the Lord will accept the smell of its burning.
- 9 On the sabbath day you will bring two yearling lambs without blemish, and the fifth of a bushel of flour kneaded with oil as a bread-offering, with due libations poured out sabbath after sabbath; the sacrifice must never be omitted. At the new moon, by way of burnt-sacrifice, you will offer to the Lord two bull-calves and a ram, and seven yearling lambs without blemish, and three tenths of a bushel of flour kneaded with oil by way of bread-offering for each calf, and a fifth for the ram, and a hundredth for each lamb,¹ to delight the Lord with the smell of their burning. And libations of wine will go with each victim, six pints for a bullock, four for a ram, and three for a lamb. Each month, as the year goes round, this shall be your burnt-sacrifice. And together with this repeated sacrifice you will offer the Lord a goat, to atone for faults.
- 16 On the fourteenth day of the first month, the Lord's paschal feast begins. The fifteenth day is a feast, and for a whole week bread must be eaten unleavened. Its first day will be a day of solemn observance, on which no servile work may be done. The burnt-sacrifice made to the Lord will be the same as that of the new moon. And one goat must be offered in amends for your faults; all this, over and above the morning sacrifice which is to be made that day as always. Thus you will do on each of the seven days, feeding the fire and delighting the Lord with the smell of your burnt-sacrifice, and the libations that you will bring with it. The seventh day too must be a day of solemn observance, on which no servile work may be done.

Another day of solemn observance, on which no servile work must be done, is the day of first-fruits, when you bring the Lord a bread-offering out of the new crops. You must bring the Lord a burnt-sacrifice, to delight him with the smell of its burning, as at the new moon. There must be a goat, too, offered in amends for fault; all this, over and above the daily sacrifice and its libations. Sacrifice or libation, all that you offer the Lord must be without blemish.

29 So, too, you will make the first day of the seventh month a day of solemn observance, and a holiday from servile work; it is to be marked by a blast of trumpets. It will have its fragrant burnt-sacrifice, of a bull, a ram, and seven yearling lambs without blemish; and the bread-offering to go with them, three-tenths of a bushel of flour kneaded with oil for the bull, a fifth for the ram, a tenth for each of the seven lambs. And a goat will be offered to make amends for the people's faults. All this, over and above the monthly sacrifice and its offerings, over and above the daily sacrifice and its libations; a third offering that day, with the same ceremonies, will delight the Lord with the smell of its burning.

The tenth day of this seventh month is to be solemnly observed as a day of fasting, and also of rest from work. You will sacrifice bull and ram and lambs as before, bread-offerings as before for bull and ram, a hundredth of a bushel of flour for each of the seven lambs, and a goat for your faults. That day, too, will have its special ceremonies of atonement for wrong done, and the daily sacrifice will be made, with its bread-offering and libations, in the customary way.

On the fifteenth day of this seventh month, which is also to be solemnly observed as a holiday, you will begin a week of observance in the Lord's honour, offering him a fragrant burnt-sacrifice of thirteen bull-calves, two rams, and fourteen lambs, with the usual bread-offering for each bull, each ram, each of the fourteen lambs, and a goat for your faults, over and above the daily sacrifice and what goes with it. The next day you will offer the same number of rams and lambs, but only twelve calves, all with their customary bread-offerings and libations; a goat, too, for faults, over and above the daily ceremonies. On the third day eleven calves, and the rest as before; on the fourth day ten calves, and the rest as before; on the fifth day nine calves, and the rest as before; on the sixth day eight calves and the rest as before; on the seventh day seven calves and the rest as before. The eighth day, too, is to be held in all honour as a holiday; and this day too you will offer fragrant burnt-sacrifice, but only one bull, one ram, and seven yearling lambs without blemish, with their customary bread-offerings and libations, and a goat for your faults, over and above the daily sacrifice and what goes with it. Such are the offerings you must make to God at your public festivals, over and above those you bring in payment of a vow, or out of devotion, burnt-sacrifice and bloodless sacrifice and libation and welcome-offering.

30 So Moses told the Israelites what charge the Lord had given him. He also gave the chief men of Israel's tribes this command from the Lord: It may be, man or woman will take a vow, or an oath. If it be a man, he must in any case carry out what he promised, and not be false to his word. But if a woman has made a vow, or bound herself by an oath, it may be she is only a girl, living in her father's house still. Did her father know that she had vowed or sworn, and make no protest? Then she is bound by her vow; she must fulfil what she bound herself by oath to fulfil. Did her father, as soon as he heard of it, refuse his consent? Then vow or oath are null and void; she cannot be held to her promise if her father did not consent to it. It may be such a girl will marry, still under her vow, still bound by her youthful undertaking; does her husband hear of it without protest? She must be held to her vow thenceforward; she must carry out what she promised. Or does he refuse his consent upon hearing of it? Then he annuls this promise, this youthful undertaking of hers, and the Lord will not hold her guilty. Or the woman may be a widow, or a wife divorced; she must then fulfil her promise. Or a wife already living under her husband's roof, may take vow or oath; is she bound to fulfil her promise? Yes, if he hears of it and makes no protest. But if he immediately refuses his consent, she cannot be held to her undertaking; the Lord will not hold her guilty if her husband's consent is refused.

It may be a wife will bind herself by an oath, vowing to mortify herself by fasting or some other kind of abstinence; it is for her husband to decide whether she is to keep it or not. If he makes no protest on hearing of it, but waits till afterwards before making his decision, she must pay her vow, keep the promise she made; there was no protest from him when he heard of it. If, after hearing of it, he refuses his consent, then it is he that will be held to account for her fault.¹

Such are the rules the Lord gave Moses, to govern the conduct of husband and wife, or of a father and his daughter when she is a girl still living at home.

31 And now the Lord said to Moses, Soon thou art to become a part of thy people; but first take vengeance, in Israel's name, on the sons of Midian. So Moses ordered a muster of men sufficient to wreak the Lord's vengeance on the Midianites, a thousand picked warriors from each tribe. Thus a force of twelve thousand, a thousand from each tribe, was put under arms; and he appointed Phinees, son of the high priest Eleazar, to command them, entrusting him with the sacred emblems and the trumpets that must sound for battle. So they fought against the Midianites and defeated them. All the men-folk they killed, the chiefs of the tribe, Evi, Recem, Sur, Hur and Rebe among them; Balaam, too, the son of Beor, they put to the sword; and took possession of their women-folk and children, their cattle and all their goods. Nothing that belonged to Madian but was ravaged; cities, villages and strongholds were burnt down, and all the booty, all the captives, all the beasts they had taken they brought with them to Moses and Eleazar; whatever was of use must be brought back to the camp in the plains of Moab opposite Jericho.

Moses went out to meet them, as they drew near the camp, with the high priest Eleazar and all the rulers of Israel. And it was an angry welcome they had from him, chiefs and commanders and captains that had gone out to fight; What means it, he asked, that you have spared the women-folk? Was it not these that beguiled the sons of Israel, at the prompting of Balaam, and led you to play the Lord false by worshipping Phogor, so that a plague fell on the whole people? All the males must be killed, even the children, and all the women that have had commerce with man; the young girls and all the women that are still virgins you may keep for yourselves.

For seven days you must not enter the camp; whoever has killed a man or touched a man that lay killed must be purified on the third day of the seven, and on the last. Of all the spoil you have taken, every garment, every pot and pan, that is made of goats' skins and goats' hair, or of wood, you must purify too. (This was how the high priest Eleazar expounded the law to the men who had come back after the victory: The Lord has warned Moses that gold, silver, bronze, iron, lead and tin, and all else that can stand the fire's heat, may be purified by fire, but everything else must be cleansed with lustral water.) On the seventh day you will wash your clothes, and so you will be able to come into the camp, purified men.

This, too, the Lord said to Moses, Thou and the high priest Eleazar and the rulers of the people must reckon up the sum of the booty taken, and divide it up into equal shares, giving half to the men who went out to war, and half to the rest of the people. Out of the fighting men's share, set apart one human creature, one ox, one ass, one sheep, in every five hundred; these must be given to the high priest Eleazar, as the Lord's first-fruits. Out of the share that goes to the rest of Israel, set apart one out of every fifty living things, whether human creatures, oxen, asses or sheep, and give them to the Levites, that have the Lord's tabernacle in their charge.

Moses and Eleazar did as the Lord had bidden them. And this was the booty which the army had taken, six hundred and seventy-five thousand sheep, seventy-two thousand oxen, sixty-one thousand asses, and thirty-two thousand human creatures, all of them of woman's sex, and such as had never had commerce with man. Half of all was given to the men who had been in battle; and of this they set apart as the Lord's share six hundred and seventy-five sheep, seventy-two oxen, sixty-one asses; and thirty-two human creatures were dedicated to the Lord out of the half-share of sixteen thousand. All these, the full toll of the Lord's first-fruits, Moses gave over to the high priest Eleazar, as the Lord had bidden him; taking them from that half of the public spoils that fell to the warriors. And out of the half that fell to the rest of the people, the three hundred and thirty-seven thousand five hundred sheep, the thirty-six thousand oxen, the thirty thousand five hundred asses, and the sixteen thousand human creatures, Moses took one in every fifty, and gave them, as the Lord had bidden him, to the Levites that had the Lord's tabernacle in their charge.

And now the chiefs and commanders and captains of the army came and told Moses, My lord, we have been calling the roll of the men we had serving under us, and every one answered his name. In thanksgiving for this, we would offer as a gift to the Lord the spoils we have taken severally, such as are of gold; anklet and armband, ring and bracelet and necklace; and do thou make intercession for us to the Lord. So Moses and the high priest Eleazar accepted all this gold in all its varied shapes; sixteen thousand seven hundred and fifty sicles in weight, as a gift from the commanders and captains, each of them giving the spoils he had seized for himself; and they took it into the tabernacle that bore witness of the covenant, to put the Lord in mind of the Israelites continually.

32 The tribes of Ruben and Gad were rich in flocks, and their herds were past all reckoning. And now, seeing how well fitted were the lands of Jazer and Galaad to feed beasts, they brought a petition to Moses, and the high priest Eleazar, and the rulers of the people. Here is Ataroth, they said, here are Dibon, and Jazer, and Nemra, and Hesebon, and Eleale, and Saban, and Nebo, and Beon, all given over by the Lord into the hands of Israel at the first onslaught; and all of this is good grazing land. My lord, we have many beasts to feed, and we would ask a favour of thee; grant us this land for our portion, instead of making us cross the Jordan to win it.

What, answered Moses, are your brethren to go and fight while you sit idle here? Would you daunt the spirits of the Israelites, so that they have not the courage to cross over into the land which the Lord means to give them? Why, this was what your fathers did, when I sent them from Cades-Barne to bring back a report of the land; they passed through the whole extent of it, until they reached the Valley of Grapes, and came back to daunt the spirits of their fellow-Israelites, so that none of them ever entered the territory which the Lord had assigned to them. So angry was he that he bound himself by an oath, None of the men who made their way out of Egypt and then would not follow me, men of twenty years and more, shall ever see the land which was my promised gift to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. None of them, except Caleb the son of Jephone and Josue the son of Nun, the men who carried out my will. Still angry, he led us this way and that through the desert, till the generation that had offended him died out. And now you come forward in the spirit of your fathers, the heirs and scions of their guilt, to make the Lord more angry with Israel than ever. Refuse to follow him, and he will leave his people here in the desert so you will be the death of us all.

But still they came closer, and would have their say; We mean only to build folds for our sheep, byres for our cattle, and cities where our children can dwell in safety; then we will go forward, armed and girded for battle, in the van of Israel, until we have won them their territory. We must have walled cities to protect our children and our possessions from sudden attack by our neighbours; but we will not go back to these homes of ours till the other Israelites have won their inheritance; and we will not demand any lands on the further side of Jordan, our portion once secured to us on the east of it. Be as good as your word, then, Moses said; arm yourselves to do battle under the Lord's eye, and cross over Jordan in battle array, all of you that are fighting men, till the Lord has overthrown his enemies and won the whole land for himself. So neither the Lord nor Israel will have any fault to find with you, and you shall hold, under the eye of the Lord's favour, the territory of your choice. If you do not make good your word, you will be sinning openly against God; and be sure that your sin will not go unpunished. Build cities for your families, byres and folds for your sheep and cattle, and then fulfil your promise. We are thy servants, the men of Gad and Ruben said to Moses, and will do as our master bids; leave children and wives, sheep and cattle in the cities of Galaad, and go out ourselves, armed for battle, as servants at their master's command.

So Moses gave the word to the high priest Eleazar, and Josue the son of Nun, and the heads of all the clans in Israel, that the tribes of Ruben and Gad were to receive Galaad as their portion once the whole land was conquered, if they would consent to let all their armed men cross the Jordan and do battle under the Lord's eye with the rest. If they would not undertake to help carry the war into Chanaan on those terms, then they must wait and win their portion among the other tribes.¹ But Ruben and Gad protested that they were willing to yield the Lord the service he asked of them; to invade Chanaan under his eye, and still be content with the portion granted them on the further side of Jordan. So Moses gave the dominions of

Sehon, that had been king of the Amorrites, and Og, the king of Basan, with all the cities that were contained in the whole region, to Gad and to Ruben and to half the tribe of Manasses, that were descended from Joseph's son. And the men of Gad rebuilt Dibon, Ataroth, Aroer, Ebroth, Sophan, Jazer, Jegbaa, Bethnemra and Betharan, all fortified cities, and folds, too, for their sheep. The men of Ruben rebuilt Hesebon, Eleale, Cariathaim, Nabo and Baalmeon, under other names,¹ and Sabama too; they gave names of their own to these cities when they rebuilt them. Meanwhile the descendants of Machir, that was Manasses' son, had made their way into Galaad and plundered it, slaughtering the Amorrites who dwelt there; so Moses gave Galaad to the clan of Manasses' son Machir, and there they took up their abode. Other Amorrite towns were taken by Jair, a tribesman of Manasses, who called them Havoth-Jair, that is, Jair's villages; and Nobe, who invaded and captured Chanath with its daughter-towns, called this after his own name, Nobe.

33 Here is a list of the stages through which the Israelites journeyed, when Moses and Aaron had led their armies out of Egypt. It was Moses that kept a record of the places where they encamped, now here, now there, at the Lord's bidding. They set out from Ramesses on the fifteenth day of the first month, the second day of the paschal feast, in full sight of the Egyptians, who must perforce let them go. And indeed these had enough to do burying their first-born, whom the Lord had smitten when he took vengeance on the powers of Egypt.

Their first encampment was at Socoth, and from Socoth they marched to Etham, on the verge of the desert; and from there they marched along past Phihahiroth, which is opposite Beelsephon, and encamped by Magdalu. From Phihahiroth they went across through the heart of the sea into the wilderness, and after three days' march in the desert of Etham, halted at Mara. From Mara they came to Elim, where there were twelve springs and seventy palm-trees, and pitched their tents there. When they left it, they encamped by the Red Sea, and from the Red Sea they moved their camp to the desert of Sin, from the desert of Sin to Daphca, thence to Alus, thence to Raphidim, where the people could not find enough water to drink. Then from Raphidim to the desert of Sinai, thence to the Graves of Greed, thence to Haseroth, thence to Rethma, thence to Remmonphares, thence to Debna, thence to Ressa, thence to Ceelatha, thence to mount Sepher. Then from mount Sepher to Arada, thence to Maceloth, thence to Thahath, thence to Thare, thence to Methca, thence to Hesmona, thence to Moseroth, thence to Benejaacan, thence to mount Gadgad. Then from mount Gadgad to Jetebatha, thence to Hebrona, thence to Asiongaber, thence to the desert of Sin, that is, to Cades. It was after they had left Cades that they encamped on mount Hor, at the verge of the Edomite territory; and now, at the Lord's command, the high priest Aaron went up to the top of mount Hor and died there. This was on the first day of the fifth month of the fortieth year since the Israelites left Egypt, and Aaron had now reached the age of a hundred and twenty-three. Now, too, the Chanaanite king who had his capital, Arad, in the south country, heard that Israel was marching against Chanaan.²

From mount Hor they moved their camp to Salmona, thence to Phunon, thence to Oboth, thence to Ijeabarim, within the frontiers of Moab, thence to Dibongad, thence to Helmondeblathaim, thence to the hill country of Abarim, by mount Nabo. When they left the hill country of Abarim, they removed to the plains of Moab, facing Jericho on the other side of Jordan, their camp stretching across the whole Moabite plain from Bethsimoth to Abelsatim.

And here the Lord spoke to Moses giving him a message for the Israelites: When you have crossed Jordan, and find yourselves in the land of Chanaan, you must destroy all its inhabitants, break down their pillars, shatter their idols, devastate their mountain shrines. The land must be swept clean before you settle in it. Here it is that I mean to give you your home, which you will divide up by lot, wide lands for the many, a narrow strip for the few, each clan and each household receiving such portion as the lot has assigned to it. If you refuse to root out the nations that now live there, those who are left will be eyesores to you, barbs in your side, to dispute with you the land that is yours;¹ and meanwhile, I will plague you with the plagues that should have been theirs.

34 And the Lord bade Moses give this message too to the Israelites: When you have entered Chanaan and duly taken possession of it, these shall be the frontiers that bound it. The southern end of your territory will begin at the desert of Sin, by Edom, bordered on the east by the Sea of Salt. Its border on the south shall curve along the Scorpion Pass till it crosses over to Senna, and reaches southward as far as Cades-Barne; then it will go to the town called Adar, and pass on to Asemona. From Asemona it will curve round to the Brook of Egypt, ending at the shore of the Great Sea. On the western side, your territories shall begin at the Great Sea; they shall have no other frontier than this. Your northern border will stretch from the Great Sea to Summit mountain, and so by Emath to the edge of Sedada, and on to Zephrona and the village of Enan; all this on the north. From this village of Enan you will mark out your eastern border till it reaches Sephama, passing from Sephama to Rebla, close to the well of Daphnis, and from there to the eastern shore of Lake Cenereth. So it will fall into the Jordan valley and end at last with the Sea of Salt. These shall be the frontiers that bound your land.²

So Moses passed on word to the Israelites that this was the territory they were to divide up by lot; the Lord's destined gift to nine and a half out of the twelve tribes. (All the clans of Ruben's tribe and of the tribe of Gad, with half the tribe of Manasses, two and a half tribes in all, had received their portion on the eastern bank of Jordan opposite Jericho.)

And now the Lord said to Moses, These are the names of the men who will divide up the land for you. First, the high priest Eleazar and Josue the son of Nun, and then the chieftains of the several tribes, as follows. For Juda, Caleb the son of Jephone, for Simeon, Samuel the son of Ammiud, for Benjamin, Elidad the son of Chaselon, for Dan, Bocci the son of Jogli. And among Joseph's descendants, for Manasses, Hanniel the son of Ephod, for Ephraim, Camuel the son of Sephthan. For Zabulon, Elisaphan the son of Pharnach, for Issachar, Phaltiel the son of Ozan, for Aser, Ahiud the son of Salomi, for Nephthali, Phedael the son of Ammiud. These were the men the Lord appointed to divide up Chanaan between the Israelites.

35 This was another message the Lord gave to Moses on the eastern bank of Jordan opposite Jericho; he was to bid the Israelites make provision for the Levites out of these lands of theirs. The Levites were to have cities with precincts about them; cities for the Levites themselves to live in, and precincts for their flocks and cattle,³ stretching a thousand yards beyond the city walls. Two thousand cubits to the east, as many to the south, as many towards the western sea, as many to the north;⁴ the city was to lie in the middle with precincts all round it. Six of the towns granted to the Levites would be sanctuaries for the outlaw, offering a refuge to homicides, and there would be forty-two more, making forty-eight cities in all, with precincts attached to them. All these cities were to be a toll levied from the lands of the Israelites, in greater number from those who held more, in less number from those who held less; they would make their grant to the Levites according to their several capacities.

him this message for the Israelites: When you have crossed Jordan and reached Chanaan, you must decide which of your cities are to be sanctuaries for men who have shed blood unwittingly. Such a man, if he takes refuge there, will be beyond the reach of avenging clansmen, until such time as he can appear and have his cause decided by the people. Of the cities appointed as sanctuaries, three must lie beyond the Jordan, three in Chanaan itself; and they shall be open not only to Israelites but to the aliens that lodge or dwell among you, as a refuge for all who have shed blood unwittingly.

In such causes, anyone who struck a deadly blow with a weapon of iron must be reckoned a murderer, and put to death; and the penalty is all the same if the deadly blow was struck with a stone, or with a piece of wood. Any kinsman of the dead man may strike the murderer down, strike him down without more ado as soon as he meets him. Anyone, that is, who thrusts at a man out of malice, or lies in wait for him and discharges a weapon at him, or makes a deadly assault on him because they are enemies, is a murderer, to be struck down by the kinsmen of the dead man as soon as they meet him. But if it was by chance, without any malice or feud between them, and this is proved in the hearing of the people, after due consideration of the pleas brought by the slayer and by the dead man's kin, then he is innocent, and must be rescued from the avenger's power. He must be taken back, by award of the court, to his city of refuge, and make his abode there until the death of the high priest then anointed. Once the slayer leaves the confines of the sanctuary town, anyone who has a feud against him may strike him down wherever he meets him, without incurring guilt; he should have remained in his city of refuge until the high priest died. On the high priest's death, the slayer is free to return home. These laws shall hold good among you everywhere and always.

Witnesses are needed before the murderer can be punished; the word of a single witness does not suffice for his condemnation. You are not to accept blood-money from the murderer; he is to be put to death there and then. Nor, upon any condition, must you allow the outlaw who has taken sanctuary to return home until the high priest's death; this would bring pollution on the land that is yours. The blood of an innocent man involves the whole land in such guilt as can only be expiated by the murderer's own blood; and you must keep your territory clean of such defilement if I am to dwell among you; the Lord himself is the guest of Israel.

36 And now a plea was brought to Moses, before all the rulers of Israel, by the chiefs of the clan descended from Galaad, son of Machir, son of Manasses, that came of Joseph's stock. Thou art our master, they said, and the Lord has commanded thee, in dividing the land between the sons of Israel, to give a portion to the daughters of Salphaad, the portion which should have gone to their father. If these marry into another tribe, their land will go with them, and it will be lost to our tribe, transferred to the possession of another. The fiftieth year, the year of jubilee, will come round, but still the division of holdings will remain disturbed, and the land belonging to one tribe will be held by another.

And Moses, at the Lord's bidding, made this declaration to the Israelites, The sons of Joseph are in the right, and this is the ruling which the Lord gives concerning the daughters of Salphaad, Let them marry whom they will, so long as it is within their own tribe. The portions assigned to the sons of Israel must not pass from tribe to tribe; all men must take wives from their own tribe and clan, and all women must marry within their own tribes, so that property may remain within the clan. The tribes must not intermingle, but remain separate according to the Lord's plan for them. So the daughters of Salphaad carried out the Lord's bidding, and all of them, Maala, Thersa, Hegla, Melcha and Noa married their own cousins, men sprung from Manasses, that was son of Joseph. So the portion granted to them remained within their father's tribe and clan.

Such were the decrees and awards which the Lord delivered to the Israelites through Moses on the eastern bank of Jordan opposite Jericho.

THE BOOK OF DEUTERONOMY

IT was thus Moses spoke to the people of Israel while they were still on the other side of Jordan, in the desert plain that looks towards the Red Sea, with Pharan and Thophel and Laban and Haseroth, a country where gold abounds, for its frontiers; the plain that is spanned by a journey of eleven days from Horeb to Cades-Barne, by way of mount Seir.¹ It was the first day of the eleventh month of the fortieth year, when Moses handed on to the Israelites the commands which the Lord had entrusted to him. He had now given them victory over Sehon, king of the Amorrhites, that lived at Hesebon, and Og, king of Basan, that lived at Astaroth and Edrai, still beyond the Jordan, in the Moabite country.

Moses, then, began to expound the law, with these words: We were still at Horeb when the Lord our God said to us, This mountain has been your home long enough; it is time for you to turn back, and make your way to the hill country of the Amorrhites and its neighbourhood. Low ground and high ground, southern plain and sea-coast, all Chanaan including mount Lebanon, right up to the great river Euphrates, I have given it all (said he) into your hands; go in and take possession of it; it is the home the Lord promised to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and their posterity after them.

It was at this time, too, that I said to you, The charge of you is too heavy for my own strength, such increase has the Lord your God given you. To-day, you are countless as the stars in heaven; may the Lord, the God of your fathers, add many thousands yet to your number, and grant you the blessing he has promised! But I have not strength to bear, alone, the weight of all your affairs, all your quarrels; you must give me men of ripe wisdom and quick minds, high in repute among their fellow-tribesmen, to be appointed your rulers. And when I had your answer, approving¹⁴ my design, I chose out of all your tribes¹⁵ men of wisdom and repute, and I appointed them to be your rulers, with powers over a thousand men, or a hundred, or fifty, or ten together, issuing commands to you as need arose. And this was the¹⁷ charge I gave them: Listen to the pleadings of each man, and give a just award to citizen and to stranger alike. Listen impartially to great and small, without undue regard for any man; it is God's justice you are administering. If any quarrel seems hard to decide, refer it to me, and I will take cognisance of it myself.² At this time,¹⁸ too, I gave you all the commandments you were to follow.

So we left Horeb, and traversed that¹⁹ wide desert whose terrible aspect is well known to you, on the way to the hill country of the Amorrhites, as the Lord bade us. And when we reached Cades-Barne I told you, Now you have made your²⁰ way to these mountains of the Amorrhites, which the Lord means to give you for your own. The land you see before you is the Lord's gift to you, a divine gift; march in and take possession of it, in fulfilment of the promises he made to your fathers; let there be no cowardice, no shrinking here. Whereupon you all preferred a request to²² me that men should be sent out to view the land, and bring back word how best to approach it, what cities you should first assail; and I, listening to your words with²³ approval, chose out twelve such men, one from each tribe. These set out, and traversed the hill country as far as the Valley of Grapes; viewed the whole land, and²⁵ brought back with them such sample of its fruits as would show us how fertile it was; This is a fair land, they said, that the Lord means to give us.³

But you had no heart for the enterprise,²⁶

¹ It is not certain whether the first words of the sentence refer to what went before, or to what follows. The geographical indications here given seem to be very vague, and have occasioned much controversy. ² A country where gold abounds' should perhaps be a fresh proper name, Dizahab. ³ See Ex. 18. ⁴ See Num. 13 and 14. In that passage, the demand of the people for a reconnaissance is not mentioned.

put no trust in the promises of the Lord 27 your God. The whisper went round in your tents, The Lord wishes us ill; that is why he has brought us away from Egypt, to leave us at the mercy of the Amorrhites, 28 and so make an end of us. What enterprise is this? The messengers we sent have taken the heart out of us, with their tales of a great multitude of men, taller in stature 29 than we are, of cities walled up to the skies, of the sons of Enac they saw there. And I reasoned with you, Do not be afraid, do 30 not shrink before them; will not the Lord God who is your leader fight on your side, 31 as he did in Egypt for all to see? Your own eyes have witnessed how the Lord your God carried you through the desert as a man carries his little son, all the long road 32 you have travelled to reach this spot. But even so you had no confidence in the Lord 33 your God, that had led you on the march and marked out your encampments for you, guiding you on your journey in fire by night, in cloud by day.

34 Listening to this talk of yours, the Lord was angry with you, and he took an oath 35 that none of that worthless generation should live to see the fair land that was his 36 promised gift to your fathers, except Caleb the son of Jephone. He was to see it, he and his sons should have the gift of the ground his feet had trodden, because he 37 had carried out the Lord's will. And what marvel that the people should feel his displeasure, when the Lord was angry with me too for your sakes? There is no enter-38 ing there, he told me, for thee either. Josue the son of Nun, thy servant, shall go in instead of thee; bid him take heart and play the man; it shall be for him to appor-39 tion Israel its lands. These little ones of yours, that were to pass, you thought, into captivity, these sons of yours, that cannot yet discern right from wrong, shall have leave to enter; theirs the land shall be, my 40 promised gift. As for you, turn your steps back towards the Red Sea again, back into the desert.

41 Ah no, you answered me, we confess our fault against the Lord; we ourselves are ready to set forth and do battle, as the Lord our God would have us. And even as you were on your way to the hill country, all armed, the Lord gave me a message for you, Do not march to the attack, or you will be overthrown by your enemies; I am at your side no longer. My warning went unheeded; puffed up with pride, you disobeyed the Lord's word and marched on into the hill country, till the Amorrhite mountain-dwellers came out to meet you, and chased you away, thick as a swarm of bees, cut you down all the way from Seir to Horma. Many were the complaints you uttered in the Lord's presence when you came back, but he would not listen to you, and long you waited in idleness, there at Cades-Barne.

2 So we went back towards the Red Sea, back into the desert, as the Lord had bidden me, and for a long time the centre of our wanderings was the hill country of Seir. Then the Lord said to me, You have spent long enough roaming about these hills, you must go northwards now. And give the people this message, Your way lies by the frontiers of your own brethren, the sons of Edom. They will be alarmed at your coming, and you must take good care not to assail them. These mountains of Seir are the portion I have given to Esau, and you are not to have a foot of ground there for your own. Food you may have, but it must be bought at a fair price; you may draw and drink their water, but not without payment. Do you grudge that, when the Lord has so prospered all your enterprises, watched over your journey through this wild wilderness, secured you from want by forty years of his companionship?

So we passed beyond these brethren of ours, the Edomites of Seir, taking the road that leads over the level plain, from Elath and Asiongaber.¹ And when we reached the path that leads into the desert of Moab, the Lord said to me, Do not levy war against the Moabites, or attack them; I do not mean to give thee any of their lands.
 Ar is the territory I have given to the sons of Lot for their home. The earliest inhabitants of the country were the Emim, a great race of warriors, so tall in stature

that they might have come of Enac's family; and indeed men held them to be giants of Enac's breed, but the Moabite name for them is Emim. (So, too, Seir had its earlier inhabitants, the Horites, but they were dispossessed and destroyed by the sons of Esau, who took possession of the land just as Israel took possession of the land which the Lord gave him.)

So we moved forward, and reached the brook Zared, minded to cross it. Between our departure from Cades-Barne and the crossing of the brook Zared lay thirty-eight years of wandering, till all the fighting men of that generation had passed away from this camp of ours, as the Lord swore they should; on all of them his hand fell, and they were lost to our ranks. And when all those warriors were dead the Lord had a command to give me: To-day thou shalt pass beyond the frontiers of Moab, at the city called Ar, and reach the neighbourhood of the Ammonites. Do not levy war against them or threaten battle; I do not mean to give thee any of the Ammonites' land; here too the children of Lot must dwell. (This, too, was reckoned a land of giants; it was a giant race that lived there once, the Zomzommim, as they are called by the Ammonites, a people great and powerful, tall in stature as the Enacim themselves. But the Lord dispossessed them to make room for the Ammonites, and these made their dwelling there instead. Just so he had destroyed the Horites, that once lived in Seir, and given their land to the Edomites, who enjoy it to this day: the Hevites, too, that dwelt in Haserim, right up to Gaza, were dispossessed by the Caphtorim; these left their home and settled in the land of the Hevites, whom they destroyed.)¹ March on, then, and cross the ravine of Arnon; here is the prey I have given thee, Sehon, the Amorrhite king who reigns at Hesebon. Join battle with him, and set about the conquest of his land. To-day I will begin making thy name a name of terror, so that every nation on earth, hearing it, shall be overcome with fear, sudden as the throes of a woman in travail.

So, from the desert of Cademoth, I sent an embassy to Sehon king of Hesebon, with peaceful overtures. We will pass ²⁷ through thy land, I said, by the common highway, not turning aside to right or left. Sell us food to eat, and we will pay for it; ²⁸ allow us water to drink, and we will pay for it. Only grant us leave to pass through, like the Edomites in Seir and the Moabites ²⁹ in Ar, so that we can reach the Jordan, and cross over it into the land which the Lord our God is giving us to be our home. But ³⁰ Sehon, king of Hesebon, would not let us pass; the Lord your God gave him a hard heart, a stubborn will, so as to put him at your mercy; and it has happened under your eyes. I am ready, the Lord told me, ³¹ to deliver him into thy power, and his land with him; set about the conquest of it; and ³² when Sehon offered battle at Jasa, coming out to meet us with all his forces, the Lord ³³ our God gave us the victory over him. We made an end of him and of his sons and of all his people, took all his cities there and ³⁴ then, putting all that dwelt there, men, women, and children, to the sword, and spared nothing except the beasts we drove ³⁵ off for our use, and such plunder as captured cities yield. From Aroer on the bank ³⁶ of Arnon, where it lies in its valley, right up to Galaad, there was no town or city but came into our hands; the Lord our God put all in our possession except the ³⁷ Ammonite country we might not enter, and all that lies in the ravine of Jeboc, and the mountain cities, and those other lands from which he bade us turn away.²

3 Then we marched on by the road that leads to Basan, and Og, that was king of Basan, came out to meet us with all his forces, and offered battle at Edrai. Do not be afraid of him, the Lord said to ² me; both he and his people and his country are at your mercy, and you must treat him as you treated the Amorrhite king Sehon, who reigned at Hesebon. So the Lord our ³ God gave us a fresh victory over Og, king of Basan, and all his people, and we exterminated them, there and then laying waste ⁴ all his cities, all the sixty cities of Argob in Basan, where Og reigned; not a town escaped us. All sixty were fortified with ⁵

6 We made an end of them, as we had made an end of Sehon, that reigned in Hesebon, destroying all the inhabitants of their cities, men, women and children, plundering their cattle and all the plunder their cities yielded.¹ The territory we wrested at this time from the power of the two Amorrhite kings was the land beyond Jordan, from the Arnon ravine up to mount Hermon (which the Sidonians call Sarion, and the Amorrhites Sanir); all the lowland cities, and the whole of Galaad and Basan up to Selcha and Edrai, where Og, king of Basan, reigned. (This Og, king of Basan, was the only one left of the old giant breed; at Rabbath, in the Ammonite country, they still shew his iron bedstead, nine cubits long and four cubits broad, as we lesser men reckon the size of a cubit.)

12 The land thus conquered, from Aroer on the Arnon to the middle of the hill country of Galaad, I gave, with its cities, to Ruben and Gad. There was room, too, for half the tribe of Manasses in the rest of Galaad and in Basan, that is, the country of Argob; (Basan is also called the Land of Giants. It was Jair, a descendant of Manasses, that won possession of Argob, right up to the borders of Gessuri and Machati, and called Basan after his own name, Havoth-Jair, that is, Jair's villages, which is the name they bear still.)² The Machirite clan of Manasses found their home in Galaad as well as in Basan; but the rest of Galaad I gave to Ruben and Gad, reaching half-way up the Arnon ravine, with the border-lands that run up to the river Jeboc, where the Ammonites have their frontier, the wild plains, too, and the eastern bank of Jordan from Cene-reth as far as the desert sea called the Sea of Salt, and the spurs of Phasga. At the same time I charged you of the three tribes, The Lord your God is giving you this territory for your home, but all of you that are fighting men must march in the van with the other tribes of Israel, your brethren, leaving your wives and children and cattle behind you; I know well that you are rich in cattle. These must be left in the cities I have assigned to you, until the Lord grants to your brethren, as to you, peaceful possession of their lands, the lands he means to give them across the Jordan. Then you can go back, and each shall enjoy the portion I have assigned to him.

Then, too, I said to Josue, Thy own eyes have witnessed what light work the Lord your God made of these two kings; it will fare no better with the kingdoms thou wilt find beyond the river. Do not be afraid of them; the Lord your God means to do battle for you.

Then, too, I pleaded with the Lord, and this was my prayer: Lord God, thou hast given thy servant proof already of thy greatness, of the strength thy arm can wield; what other god in heaven or on earth can rival thy deeds, can match his power with thine? Let me go across, then, and have sight of this fair land beyond the Jordan, of its noble hills, and of Lebanon itself! But the Lord, through your fault, was angry with me, and would not listen to me. Enough, he said, speak to me of this no more. Go up if thou wilt to the top of Phasga, and turn thy eyes west, north, south and east; the sight of it thou mayest have, but thou shalt not cross yonder stream of Jordan. Give charge to Josue, bid him take heart and play the man; he it is that shall march at the head of this people of mine, and distribute to them the land thou must be content with seeing. So we lay encamped, there in the valley, opposite the shrine of Phogor.

4 And now, Israel, pay good heed to the laws and the decrees I am making known to you. It is yours to observe them, if you would have life; if you would find your way into the land promised you by the Lord God of your fathers, and take possession of it. There must be no adding to this message of mine, no retrenching it; the commands I lay upon you are the commands of the Lord your God; keep them well. Your own eyes have witnessed what sentence the Lord passed against Beelphegor, purging out from among you all that worshipped at his shrine, while you, who remain faithful to the Lord, have lived to remember it. Be well assured that the laws and decrees I have given you come from the Lord himself, and must still be observed when you have taken possession of the land that is to be yours. Keep them in honour and live by them; these are to be the arts, this the wisdom, that you teach the world, as men come to hear of these laws, and say to themselves, Surely they must be wise, surely they must be discerning folk, that belong to so great a nation as this! And indeed no other nation is so great; no other nation has gods that draw near to it, as our God draws near to us whenever we pray to him. What other nation can boast that it has observances and decrees so rightly ordered as we have in this law of ours, this law which I am setting before your eyes to-day?

Keep anxious guard, then, Israel, as thou lovest thy own life. Never let the memory of what thy own eyes have seen fade from thy heart, as long as thou livest; hand it on to thy sons, and thy sons' sons, the memory of that day when thou didst stand in the Lord's presence at mount Horeb. Summon the whole people, the Lord said to me, so that they may hear these words of mine, and learn, and teach their children after them, to fear me all their life long. And you, as you came close to the spurs of the mountain, found it sending up flames high as heaven, all wreathed in darkness and cloud and mist. From the heart of those flames the Lord spoke to you, so that you could hear his voice, but had no vision of his form. He told you of his covenant, that you were to keep; uttered ten warnings, which he wrote down on two stone tablets; bade me, at that same time, hand on to you the observances and decrees you were to follow in the land that should one day be your home.

Be watchful, then, at the peril of your lives. When the Lord spoke to you from the heart of the flame on mount Horeb, there was no outward shape you saw. And will you be deluded into carving some outward image or likeness, of man or woman, of beasts that roam on the earth or birds that fly in the air, of creeping things on land or fish that dwell in the waters, down at the roots of earth? Wilt thou be led astray as thou lookest up at the sky, at sun and moon and all the host of stars, into making gods of them, worshipping those creatures which the Lord thy God has made, to be the common drudges of every nation under heaven?¹ Why else did the Lord choose you out, deliver you from Egypt's furnace of iron, but to make you a people all his own, as you are this day?

What though I, through your fault, have incurred the Lord's anger, so that he has sworn never to let me cross Jordan, and see the fair land he means to give you? What though I must die here, still on Jordan's further bank? You will cross over it; that fair land will be yours. Never forget, then, the covenant the Lord thy God has made with thee; never fashion thyself those images the Lord has forbidden thee to fashion; the Lord thy God is a fire that burns all before it, loves thee with a jealous love. Sons will spring from you, and beget sons in their turn; what if you should go astray, when you have been long settled in the land, fashion yourselves some idol, and rouse the Lord your God to indignation at the sight of your evil-doing? I call heaven and earth to witness this day; the land which now lies within your grasp, beyond Jordan, will soon be yours no longer. Your enjoyment of it will be cut short, and the Lord will make an end of you, scattering you over the world and leaving but a few of you to live in a land of exile, where you must needs worship the gods which men's hands have made, things of wood and stone that cannot see or hear, cannot taste or smell. There, if thou wilt have recourse to the Lord thy God, if thou wilt but have recourse to him with all thy heart, in the bitterness of thy tribulation, thou wilt find him again. Yes, when all these threats have come home to thee, thou wilt turn back to the Lord thy God at last, and listen to his voice. The Lord thy God is a God of mercy; he will not forsake thee, will not utterly destroy thee, and will not forget the sworn covenant he made with thy fathers.

Search the history of the days that went before thee, far back as the time when God made man on the earth, wide as earth's end from earth's end; is there any other record

¹ 'The common drudges'; this is the sense of the Latin, but the Hebrew text has 'which the Lord thy God has assigned to all the nations under heaven'. Some would interpret this as a paradoxical expression, the sense of which is only made clear if we add the words 'for their worship'.

33 of such happenings? That a people should hear the voice of God speaking out of the heart of the flames, as thou didst, and live 34 to tell of it? That God should intervene, and single out for himself one nation above all the rest; that he should try men's hearts with portent and with marvel, fight against them with constraining force, with open display of his strength, with plagues terrible to see? All this the Lord your God 35 did for you in Egypt, and your own eyes have witnessed it; proof to you that this Lord is God, that no other can compare 36 with him. From heaven he uttered his warnings, and on earth his voice came to thee from the heart of that dread fire he 37 shewed thee; and all because he loved thy fathers, and had chosen out their posterity.
He rescued thee from Egypt, and marched on before thee with the great power that 38 is his, ready to dispossess proud nations that were more than a match for thee at thy coming, and make their lands thine; it has 39 happened here under thy eyes. Be sure, then, of this henceforward, and keep it before thy mind, that the Lord is the God who reigns in heaven above and on earth 40 beneath; there is no other. His laws and decrees thou must observe, as I have proclaimed them to thee, if thou and thy sons after thee are to prosper, and have long enjoyment of the land the Lord thy God means to give thee.

41 Then Moses set apart three cities on the 42 east of Jordan, as a place of refuge, if he could but escape to one of them, for the man that had killed his neighbour unwill-ingly, without having any feud against 43 him in times past. These were Bosor, out in the desert, in the plain that belongs to Ruben, Ramoth in Galaad, for Gad, and Golan in Basan, for Manasses.

44 Here follows the law which Moses pro-45 claimed to the sons of Israel; these are the commandments and decrees and awards he gave to the Israelites that had marched 46 with him out of Egypt. It was beyond Jordan that he gave them, opposite the shrine of Phogor, in the country that once belonged to the Amorrite king Sehon, who reigned in Hesebon. But now Moses had defeated him, and the sons of Israel, coming back from Egypt, had overrun 47 both his territory and the territory of Og, king of Basan. These were the two Amorrhite kings that reigned east of the Jordan, from Aroer, on the banks of Ar- 48 non, to the hill of Sion, that is, of Hermon;¹ ruled all over the plain that lies east of 49 Jordan, down to the Desert Sea and the spurs of mount Phasga.

5 Here, then, Moses called the whole of Israel together, and said to them, Listen, Israel, to the observances and the decrees I now proclaim in your hearing; learn them well, and live by them. When 2 we were at Horeb, the Lord our God made a covenant with us, such a covenant as he 3 never made with our fathers, but kept it for us, who stand here, living men, to-day.² Face to face he spoke with us on the 4 mountain, out of the flames; and yet I 5 must be your representative all the while, a mediator between the Lord and you to tell you what his commands were, such dread of those fires kept you back from the hill-side.

And thus he spoke: I am the Lord thy 6 God, it was I who rescued thee from the land of Egypt, where thou didst dwell in slavery. Thou shalt not defy me by making 7 other gods thy own. Thou shalt not carve 8 thyself images, or fashion the likeness of anything in heaven above, or on earth beneath, or in the waters at the roots of earth, to bow down and worship it. I, thy God, 9 the Lord Almighty, am jealous in my love; be my enemy, and thy children, to the third and fourth generation, shall make amends; love me, keep my commandments, and 10 mercy shall be thine a thousand-fold.

Thou shalt not take the name of the 11 Lord thy God lightly on thy lips; if a man uses that name lightly, he will not go unpunished.

Observe the sabbath day and keep it 12 holy, as the Lord thy God has bidden thee.
Six days for drudgery, for doing all the 13 work thou hast to do; when the seventh 14 day comes, it is a sabbath, a day of rest, consecrated to the Lord thy God. That day, all work shall be at an end, for thee and for every son and daughter of thine,

¹ In the Hebrew, this hill of Sion in the Hermon range is distinguished from mount Sion at Jerusalem by a different initial letter. ² The sense would seem to be that God's covenant was made for the benefit of Moses' immediate hearers, not for that of their fathers, who were now dead in the wilderness.

thy servants and serving-women, thy ass, too, and thy ox, and all thy beasts, and the aliens that live within thy city walls. It must bring rest to thy men-servants and thy maid-servants, as to thyself. Remember that thou too wast a slave in Egypt; what constraining force the Lord used, what a display he made of his power, to rescue thee; and now he will have thee keep this day of rest.

Honour thy father and thy mother, as the Lord God has bidden thee; so shalt thou live long to enjoy the land which the Lord thy God means to give thee.

Thou shalt do no murder.

Thou shalt not commit adultery.

Thou shalt not steal.

Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour.

Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife.

Thou shalt not set thy heart upon thy neighbour's house or lands, his servants or handmaids, an ox or ass or anything that is his.¹

All this the Lord proclaimed to the whole multitude of you, there on the mountain, speaking aloud from the heart of the flames, the cloud, and the darkness; this and no more. And he wrote it down on two tablets of stone which he entrusted to me. And you, what thoughts were yours, when you listened to this voice that came out of the darkness, saw the mountain all aflame? You came to me, elders and chieftains of the tribes, and pleaded with me; The Lord our God has given us sight, now, of the splendour and the greatness that is his, we have been able to listen to his voice coming out of the heart of the flames; to-day has proved to us that a man may see God and live to tell of it. Must we court death, with this raging fire ever ready to devour us? Die we surely must, if we hear the voice of the Lord God again. Frail mortality cannot listen, as we have listened, to the voice of the living God speaking from the heart of the flames, without incurring death at last. Do thou go near, and listen to all the commands the Lord thy God has for thee; thou shalt proclaim it to us, and we will obey.

Hearing this, the Lord said to me, I have listened to the plea this people of mine has made to thee, and all they have said is well said. Ah, had they but hearts so true that they would always fear me, always keep my commandments! Then it should go well with them, and with their sons for all time. Go and bid them return to their tents; and do thou remain here at my side while I make known to thee the laws and observances and decrees I would have taught, the laws of that country which I am giving them for their home.

It is for you, then, to observe the commands which the Lord has given you, never swerving to right or left, but still treading the path which the Lord your God has marked out for you; so that you may enjoy, in long prosperity, the land which shall be yours.

6 To me, then, the Lord your God entrusted the proclaiming of those laws, and observances, and decrees, so that you would have a rule to live by, yonder in the land that is to be your home. Go in fear of the Lord thy God; here is a lifelong task for thee, and thy sons and thy grandsons after thee, to observe all the laws and decrees I here make known to thee; so thou wilt keep what thou hast won. The Lord thy God, Israel, has promised thee a land that is all milk and honey; but if thou art to prosper and multiply there, thou must needs listen to his commands, and mark them well, and live by them.

Listen then, Israel; there is no Lord but the Lord our God, and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with the love of thy whole heart, and thy whole soul, and thy whole strength. The commands I give thee this day must be written on thy heart, so that thou canst teach them to thy sons, and keep them in mind continually, at home and on thy travels, sleeping and waking; bound close to thy hand for a remembrancer, ever moving up and down before thy eyes; the legend thou dost inscribe on door and gate-post.

A time will come when the Lord has granted thee entrance into the land which he promised to thy fathers, Abraham,

¹ See Ex. 20. 2-17. The commandment which forbids a man to covet his neighbour's wife here precedes all the other regulations about covetousness, and is divided off from them in the Hebrew text as a separate commandment.

Isaac and Jacob; when he has given thee possession of cities great and fair, not of thy building, houses that abound in wealth, not of thy making, wells not of thy digging, vineyards and oliveyards not of thy planting; when thou hast eaten of these and taken thy fill. Then beware; then thou wilt be in danger of forgetting that it was the Lord brought thee out of the land of Egypt, where thou hadst dwelt in slavery. Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, to him only shalt thou do service, and swear by no other name than this. All the neighbouring peoples have their own gods; do not fall away into worship of them; the Lord thy God, who dwells so close to thee, is jealous in his divine love, and if he is roused to anger with thee, he will sweep thee off the face of the earth. Thou shalt not put the Lord thy God to the proof, as thou didst at the Place of Challenge; it is for thee to live by his commandments, by the decrees and observances he has enjoined on thee, to obey the Lord's good pleasure. So shalt thou prosper, and the fair land which the Lord promised to thy fathers shall be thine to have and to hold; he will be true to his word, and dispossess all those enemies of thine at thy onslaught.

And so, in time to come, when one of thy sons asks thee what is the meaning of all the decrees and observances and awards which the Lord your God has given you, this shall be thy answer: We dwelt in Egypt once, as Pharaoh's slaves, and the Lord our God rescued us from Egypt by his constraining power, subduing Pharaoh and his court with portents and marvels, great and grievous, under our eyes. So rescued, he brought us here, and gave us entrance into this fair land which he had promised to our fathers; warning us that we must observe all these laws of his, and go in fear of the Lord our God. Then the prosperity that is ours to-day will be ours all our life long; he will have mercy on us, if he sees us ever faithful to his commandments, ever obedient to his will.

7 Here then, is the land thou art to invade and conquer. To make room for thee in this land, the Lord thy God means to dispossess a multitude of nations at thy onslaught, Hethite, Gergesite, Amorrhite, Chanaanite, Pherezite, Hevite and Jebusite; seven nations thou art no match for, in number or in strength, but the Lord thy God will give thee victory over them. Thy part is, to exterminate them, never parleying with them, never pitying them. There must be no bonds of marriage between you; as thou wouldst deny thy daughter to any son of theirs, so thou must deny thy son to any daughter of theirs, or she will tempt him away from his allegiance into the service of alien gods, rousing the Lord's anger, to thy speedy destruction.

This, rather, you must do; overthrow their altars, break their idols, cut down their sacred groves, set fire to their carved figures, to shew that yours is a people set apart for its own God, chosen by its own God, out of all the nations on earth, as his own people. If the Lord has held you closely to him and shewed you special favour, it was not that you overshadowed other peoples in greatness; of all nations you are the smallest. No, it was because the Lord loved you, because he was true to the oath which he had sworn to your fathers, that he delivered you by force, reclaimed you from the slave's life you were living in the power of Pharaoh, king of Egypt. And thou wilt find it ever the same; the Lord thy God is God almighty, is God ever faithful; if men will love him and keep his commandments, he is true to his word, and shews mercy to them while a thousand generations pass; if they make him their enemy, his speedy retribution overwhelms them, brings them, without more ado, the reward they have deserved.

Remember, then, all the laws and observances and decrees I proclaim to thee this day, and live by them. Listen to those decrees, be true to them, and live by them, and the Lord thy God will be true to his covenant with thee, to the merciful promise which he made to thy fathers. He will prove his love by granting thee increase, blessing womb and soil alike with fertility, corn and wine and oil, herd and flock, in the land which that promise has made thine. Thou shalt be blessed as no other people is blessed; man and woman, sire and dam shall breed, and the Lord will keep every kind of sickness far from thee; the fierce afflictions of Egypt, thou knowest them well, he will send not on thee but on thy enemies. All the nations the Lord means thee to conquer shall fall an easy prey to thee; and for these thou shalt have no glance of pity; beware of worshipping their gods, to thy sure destruction.

But it may be the thought will come into thy mind, These nations outnumber me; shall I have the strength to dispossess them? Away with these fears; remember what the Lord thy God did to Pharaoh and to the rest of the Egyptians, the great plagues which thy eyes witnessed, the portents and the marvels, the constraining force the Lord thy God used, the display he made of his power, to rescue thee. It is thus he will deal with all these nations thou darest; nay, the Lord thy God will send hornets among them, to destroy the very fugitives that are in hiding from thee. No, do not be afraid of them; the Lord thy God fights in thy company. Little by little, now here, now there, he will dispossess these nations; thou couldst not destroy them all at once without letting the wild beasts breed, to thy hurt. But deliver them over he will at thy coming, beating them down till he makes an end of them, leaving all their kings at thy mercy, till at last the very names of them are forgotten on earth; none shall be able to resist thy victorious onset.

All their images thou shalt commit to the flames, with no eye for the gold and silver they are made of; keep nothing for thyself, or it will lead thee into sin; the curse of the Lord thy God rests upon it. Never must thou bring any relic of an idol into thy house; it is a forfeited thing, and thy life too shall be forfeit. Shun it with loathing, turn away from the corruption of its touch; it is a forfeited thing.

8 Life, increase, entrance into the land the Lord promised to thy fathers, secure possession of it, all shall be thine if thou wilt take good heed to follow the commandments I am giving thee this day. Do not forget the long journeying by which, for forty years, the Lord thy God led thee through the desert, testing thee by hard discipline, to know the dispositions of thy heart, whether thou wouldst keep his commandments or not. He disciplined thee with hunger, and then sent down manna, food unknown to thee and to thy fathers; he would teach thee that man cannot live by bread only, there is life for him in all the words that proceed from the mouth of God. Never did the garments that covered thee wear out with age, never wast thou footsore, these forty years. And dost thou doubt that the Lord was chastening thee, as a man chastens his own son, training thee to keep the commandments of the Lord thy God, and follow the path he chooses, and live in fear of him?

And now the Lord thy God means to settle thee in a fair land, a land that has water coursing down in streams, and deep wells that break out from plain and hill; a land of wheat and barley, of vine and fig-tree and pomegranate and olive, a land where oil flows, and honey. Here without fear of want thou mayest win thy livelihood; all shall be thine in abundance; the very stones of that land yield iron, and there is copper to be mined from its hill-sides; here thou mayest eat thy fill and bless the name of the Lord thy God for the fair land he has given thee. Thou wilt be in danger, then, of forgetting the Lord thy God, of neglecting the laws and decrees and observances thou hast learned this day. Thou wilt eat thy fill, thou wilt build thyself fair houses to dwell in, thou wilt have herds and flocks, gold and silver and all good things shall be thine; oh beware lest thy heart should swell with pride, and forget the Lord thy God! He it was that rescued thee from thy bondage in Egypt, and led thee through a wide wilderness full of terrors, where there were serpents with fiery breath, and scorpions, and vipers, and no water to drink. He it was that brought out streams from the solid rock, and fed thee, in that desert, with manna, the food unknown to thy fathers. So he disciplined and tested thee, and then at last shewed mercy to thee. Never wert thou to flatter thyself that valour of thy own, strength of thy own, had won thee wealth; rather to bethink thyself of the Lord thy God, and the strength he gives thee. How faithful he is to the promise he made thy fathers, thou canst see this day. Forget the Lord thy God, betake thyself to other gods as their slave and worshipper, and I warn thee, here and now, that it shall be thy utter ruin. If you pay no heed to the voice of the Lord your God, you shall be swept away no less surely than these nations the Lord means to sweep away at your coming.

- 9 Listen, Israel; this day thou art to cross the Jordan, and beyond it there are great nations to be dispossessed, more than a match for thee, with huge cities walled as high as heaven; a strong folk and tall, the breed of Enac, that thou hast seen or heard tell of; none can withstand them.
- 3 And this day will prove that it is the Lord thy God that passes on before thee, like fire that swallows up and consumes all before it, beating them down and making an end of them, scattering them before thee all in a moment, in fulfilment of the
- 4 promise he gave thee. But do not flatter thyself, when the Lord thy God destroys them thus at thy onslaught, do not flatter thyself it was for any merit of thine he gave thee possession of this land thou hast invaded, when in truth it was the wickedness of those other nations that brought them
- 5 to ruin. No, if thou dost invade and conquer their lands, it is for no merit of thine, no right dispositions of thine; they are to perish at thy onslaught in punishment of their own ill-deeds, and because the Lord must needs fulfil the promise which he made on oath to thy fathers, Abraham,
- 6 Isaac and Jacob. Be well assured thou hadst no claim to the possession of this fair land the Lord thy God is bestowing on thee, a stiff-necked nation as thou art.
- 7 What, has memory failed thee? Remember what provocation thou didst give the Lord thy God, out in the desert. From the very day of thy leaving Egypt, all the way to the place where thou standest, there has been nothing but rebellion against the
- 8 Lord. At Horeb itself thou didst challenge him, and in his anger he would have destroyed thee. I went up to the mountain where I was to receive the two stone tablets that recorded the covenant the Lord was making with you and on the mountain, without food and drink, I spent forty days
- 9 and forty nights. There I received two stone tablets, inscribed by his own divine fingers with all those commandments he gave you on the mountain, from the heart of the flames, when the people met there
- 10 in full assembly. Forty days and as many nights had passed when he gave me the two stone tablets that recorded the covenant, and said, Bestir thyself, go back down the mountain with all speed; they have been quick to leave the paths thou didst shew them, this people thou didst bring out of Egypt with thee, and have made themselves a molten image. This, too, the Lord said to me, Here is a race that will not bear the yoke; let me have my way, and efface their very memory on earth, and thou thyself shalt be at the head of a greater people, a stronger people than this.

So I went down the mountain, that was all aflame, with one stone tablet in either hand; and when I saw what sin you had committed against the Lord your God, forsaking all at once the path he had shewn you, and making yourselves a molten calf, I flung down the two tablets from my hands and broke them, there in your presence. And now for another forty days and forty nights I lay at the Lord's feet, without food or drink, in amends for the sin you had committed against the Lord, your defiance of his displeasure; so great was my fear of that vengeful anger of his, roused now and ready to destroy you. And once again the Lord listened to me. Aaron, too, he would have destroyed in his grievous anger, and for him, too, I must offer entreaty. As for this abomination of yours, this calf you had made, I took it up and gave it to the flames; then I cut it in pieces and ground it all to dust, which I threw into the stream that flows down the mountain side.¹

At the Place of Burning, too, and at the Place of Challenge, and at the Graves of Greed, you roused the Lord's anger; and when he sent you out to battle from Cades-Barne, bidding you go and take possession of the land he had given you for your home, you defied the will of the Lord your God, and refused to trust him or listen to his commands; always you have been rebels since the day when I first knew you. And I spent forty days and forty nights lying at the Lord's feet, praying him not to carry out his threat of destroying you. Lord God, I said in my prayer, do not make an end of this people of thine, this dear possession thou didst claim for thyself so signally, when thou didst rescue them from Egypt in the Egyptians' despite. Remember thy servants Abraham, Isaac and Jacob; turn away thy eyes from the sin they have committed, this stubborn, rebellious people of thine. Wilt thou let it be said in the land from which we escaped, The Lord was their enemy; he promised them a home, but had no power to win it for them, and only led them out so as to make an end of them in the desert? They are thy people, thy dear possession, rescued by thee so signally, with such display of thy power!

10 Then it was the Lord said to me, Carve two tablets of stone, like those others, and come to meet me at the top of Horeb.¹ Make an ark of wood, and put these tablets in it, when I have inscribed them with all the contents of those other tablets thou didst break.² So I made an ark of acacia wood, and carved two fresh tablets like the old; these I bore in my hands as I went up the mountain, and on these the Lord wrote down, as he had written down before, the ten commandments he gave you out of the heart of the flames, when the people were assembled there. These, when I had come back from the mountain top, I laid up in the ark which I had made, as the Lord had bidden me, and there they remain. (It was when the Israelites had moved their camp from Beeroth in the Jacan country to Mosera that Aaron died, and his son Eleazar became high priest instead; then they went on to Gadgad and to the well-watered valley of Jetebaatha.)³ And now the Lord set apart the tribe of Levi, to carry the ark that bears record of his covenant, and to minister in his presence, and to impart blessing in his name, as they still do; that is why the Levites have no lands assigned to them like their brethren, the Lord thy God has promised them that he himself will be their portion. Forty days and nights, then, as before, I remained there on the mountain top, and once more the Lord listened to me, and spared you from destruction. March on, he said, put thyself at the head of my people; they shall enter and take possession of the land which was my promised gift to their fathers.

What return, then, Israel, does the Lord thy God ask of thee? This, that thou shouldst fear the Lord thy God, and follow the path he chooses for thee, and love him, and serve the Lord thy God with all thy heart and soul, and keep those divine commandments and observances I enjoin on thee this day, as the conditions of thy happiness. This Lord God, that is master of the heavens, and the heaven above the heavens, of earth, too, and of all that they contain, would yet knit thy fathers closely to him in his great love, and make choice of you, their sons, above all other nations in the world; the proof of it is before you. It is for you, then, to rid your hearts of defilement,⁴ a stiff-necked people no longer; the Lord your God is God of all gods, Lord of all lords, how great a God, how strong, how terrible! He will not flatter the great, or take bribes from the rich; he gives redress to the orphan and the widow; he is a friend of the wanderer, and gives him food and clothing. You too must befriend the wanderer; were not you strangers yourselves in the land of Egypt?

Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God, and serve none but him, hold close to him, and make thy vows in his name; he is all thy renown, this God of thine whose marvels and whose judgements thy own eyes have witnessed. When thy fathers made their way into Egypt, they were but seventy souls, and now see what increase the Lord has given thee, so that thou canst vie with the stars in heaven for number.

11 Yours, then, to love the Lord your God, and be true at all times to every decree and observance, every award and command of his; yours to remember those past things which do not lie within the memory of your children. They were never warned by the sight of those marvellous things the Lord your God did, that constraining force of his, that display of his power. What portents were done in Egypt,

¹ Literally 'the mountain', but it is evident from the context that the narrative is now resumed where it was left off in 9. 21.

² It is not clear whether we are to understand that Moses put the stone tablets in a chest specially made to contain them until the tabernacle should be built, or whether (as verse 5 seems to imply) the Ark itself is here meant. If so, the historical order of events is given somewhat confusedly. Cf. Ex. 34. 1; 37. 1.

³ vv. 6-7 seem to be a note, taken from some record of the wanderings, which is perhaps put in here to illustrate 9. 20 above.

⁴ Literally, 'circumcise your hearts'.

to humble king Pharaoh and all his subjects, 4 the army, too, of the Egyptians with their horses and chariots, all drowned in the Red Sea when they went in pursuit of you, and 5 never heard of again to this day! In the 6 desert, on your way to this place, you saw strange things, when the earth opened its mouth, and swallowed up Dathan and Abiron, the sons of Eliab, that was son of Ruben, with their households and their tents, and all that belonged to them, alone 7 among the sons of Israel. If your eyes have witnessed all these great acts the Lord 8 did, it was so that you might learn to keep all those laws of his which I now proclaim to you. So you will take possession of the 9 land that awaits you yonder, a land all milk and honey, a gift which the Lord promised on oath to your fathers and their sons after them; so will you live long to enjoy it.

10 You must know that the land which lies before you is not like Egypt, where you lived formerly, a garden watered by sluices 11 wherever the seed is sown; it is a country of hill and dale, that waits for rain from heaven to water it, so that the Lord your 12 God himself must be at pains to tend it, watching over it from year's end to year's 13 end. And if you obey the commands I am giving you now, by loving the Lord and 14 serving him, heart and soul, then he will send your land rain in autumn, rain in spring, to give you a harvest of wheat, and 15 wine, and oil; your beasts will have grass to graze on in the countryside, and you 16 food to your hearts' content. But do not let your hearts be led away into forsaking the Lord your God, and enslaving your-17 selves to alien worship; or the Lord, in his anger, will shut the doors of heaven; no rain will fall, earth will yield no crops, and soon the fair land the Lord means to make yours will know you no longer.

18 Keep these words of mine in memory, treasure them up in your hearts, let them be bound close to your hands as a remembrancer, let them hang before your eyes.
 19 Teach them to your sons, thoughts to be pondered well, at home and abroad, sleep-20 ing and waking, the legend you inscribe on 21 door and gate-post. So this land which the Lord promised to your fathers, to be their own as long as there is a sky above us, shall be held by you and your sons in long possession. Remember the commandments I am giving you, live by them, love the Lord your God, be true to him, follow all the paths he has chosen for you, and the Lord will scatter all these nations at your coming, and you shall dispossess them, though you be no match for them in number or in strength. All shall be yours, wherever your feet shall tread; the desert, and Lebanon, and the western sea, and the great river Euphrates shall be your frontiers. None shall be able to withstand you; such fear of you, such dread of your coming will the Lord, in his faithfulness, spread abroad wherever you go.

Such is the choice I set before you this day, blessing or curse. A blessing, if you will obey the commands I now give you from the Lord your God; a curse, if you disobey those commands, and forsake the path I am shewing to you, and follow the worship of other gods, untried till now.
 When the Lord has given you entrance into the land which is to be your home, you will proclaim the blessing from mount Garizim, and the curse from mount He-bal.¹ (These lie beyond Jordan, on its western side, in the territory of those Chanaanites who hold the plain near Gal-gal, where a long valley stretches up into the hills.) Cross Jordan you will, to conquer the land which the Lord your God means you to have and to hold; and look well to it that all the observances and decrees I proclaim before you to-day are carried out faithfully.

12 Here follow the laws and decrees you must observe in the land which the Lord God of your fathers means to give you, if you are to have lifelong enjoyment of it. The nations you will dispossess have gods of their own, and build shrines for these on some high mountain, some hill, under the first green tree they can find. All these shrines you must overthrow, demolish their altars, break their monuments, burn their sacred pillars, hew down their idols, and abolish the very memory of them from the places where they stood. It is not such worship as this that you will offer to the Lord your God;
 the Lord your God will choose out one tribe among you, and one place in that

¹ Literally, 'you will set the blessing on mount Garizim, and the curse on mount Hebal'.

tribe, to be the sanctuary of his name, the shrine of his presence; to that place you will go, when you would bring burnt-sacrifice and offering, tithe and first-fruits of your labour, vowed gifts and unwowed, first-born of cattle or of sheep. There, in the presence of the Lord your God, you and your households shall eat, glad at heart, what your own hands have reaped with his blessing to aid them.

No, it will not be for every man, there as here, to worship when and where he pleases. So far, you have not reached your resting-place, that secure way of living which the Lord your God will then grant you. But when you have crossed Jordan, and are living in the land he has destined for your home, looking round you with fearless eyes, no enemy to molest you, then the Lord your God will choose a place to be the sanctuary of his name. There you will present before him all that I now enjoin, burnt-sacrifice and offering, tithe and first-fruit and choice things vowed to his honour. There you shall regale yourselves in the Lord's presence, with sons and daughters, men-servants and maid-servants, and the Levites, too, that dwell in your cities, with no part and lot of their own such as you have.

No, do not present thy burnt-sacrifice in the first place that offers; bring thy victims to one place, in one tribe, of the Lord's own choosing, and there carry out all that I enjoin upon thee. Wouldst thou eat meat? Slay, then, and eat, there in thy own city, whatever the bounty of the Lord thy God has given thee. Marred by blemish or by wound, whole, unblemished, and fit for sacrifice, it is all one; eat boldly as thou wouldst eat the flesh of red deer or roe,¹ so long as thou dost not eat it with the blood; that must be poured out like water on the ground. But where tithes of corn or wine or oil are in question, or the first-born of herd and flock, gifts to the Lord vowed or unwowed, or the first-fruits of thy crops, these thou mayest not eat in thy own city. Take them to the place the Lord thy God has chosen and eat them there in his presence; make good cheer and regale thyself, there before the Lord thy God, with all the good things thy labour has earned; let son and daughter, man-servant and maid-servant, share it, and the Levite, too, that has his dwelling in thy city; never neglect the Levite, all thy days on earth.

Wide hands the Lord thy God means to give thee, as he has promised; and often thou wilt be fain to indulge appetite, and eat flesh-meat, when the place the Lord has chosen for his name's sanctuary is far away. Slay, then, and eat what beasts thou wilt, out of thy herd or thy flock, there in thy own city as I bid thee. Have no scruple; eat such meat as if it were the flesh of red deer or roe, let the undefiled and the defiled alike be thy guests; only do not eat it with the blood, it is the blood that animates living things, and this life of theirs must not be eaten with the flesh, but poured out like water on the ground. So shall it be well with thee and with thy sons after thee; thou hast done all the Lord requires of thee. But all that thou hast consecrated or vowed to the Lord thou must take with thee to the place the Lord has chosen, and make due offering, of flesh and blood both, on the altar of the Lord thy God; all the blood of thy victims thou must pour away on the altar, and be content with the flesh for thy food.² All these commands of mine thou shalt remember and obey; well for thee and for thy sons in perpetuity, if thou dost ever what is the Lord thy God's good pleasure.

When the Lord thy God has routed the nations thou art to dispossess, and they give way before thee, and thou art dwelling in the land that once was theirs, do not imitate the folk thou hast conquered; do not hanker after their observances, and say, Why may I not worship as these worshipped before me? Not so shalt thou approach the Lord thy God; all that the Lord hates most, these did, very abomin-

² In the desert, where flesh food was scarce and the Israelites lived at close quarters, it seems that every slaughtering of cattle was accompanied by sacrifice. The law here laid down makes it clear that in Chanaan more liberty would be allowed: an Israelite might slaughter for food without sacrificing, without selecting beasts that came up to sacrificial standards, without demanding of his company the ceremonial purity which sacrifice demanded. An ox or a sheep might be killed as freely as wild game. But, even in such private meals, the meat must be eaten without blood; and all beasts or produce that had been consecrated to God must be taken to the national place of worship.

ably, sacrificing their own sons and daughters by fire to these gods of theirs. In worshipping the Lord, thou shalt do only what I bid thee, neither more nor less.

13 Prophet or dreamer may arise, of thy own race, and foretell some signal event which afterwards comes about; even so he must not persuade thee to follow the worship of alien gods, untried till now. Do not listen to such words from prophet or dreamer; it means that the Lord thy God is putting thee to the proof, to see whether he has the love of thy whole heart and thy whole soul or not. Follow and fear the Lord your God, obey no commands, listen to no voice but his; serve him and be true to him. The punishment of such a prophet or dreamer shall be death; he has counselled rebellion against the Lord God, who delivered your race from its slavery in Egypt; he would tempt thee away from the path the Lord thy God has marked out for thee; rid thy company of such plague as this.

Suffer none to whisper that counsel in thy ears, brother nor son nor daughter, nor the wife thou dost cherish in thy bosom, nor the friend thou lovest as thy own self. Whoever bids thee follow the worship of alien gods, unknown to thee and to thy fathers, gods of any other nation in the wide world, near or far, do not consent, do not listen. Have no glance of pity for them, throw no merciful cloak over their guilt; put them to death without parley.

The hand of every Israelite must be lifted against them, but thine first of all. One who would so tempt thee away from the worship of the Lord thy God, that rescued thee from slavery in Egypt, must die by stoning; so that all Israel may be apprised of it, and take warning, and none dare to do the like thenceforward.

Or it may be, when the Lord thy God has given all of you cities to dwell in, word will reach thee of such happenings, not in thy own city but in some other. Somewhere, unworthy sons of Israel are seducing their fellow-citizens, bidding them follow the worship of alien gods untried. Careful and anxious be thy search, to find out the truth of the matter; and if it proves that the report was true, and the foul deed has been done, then, without delay, put all the inhabitants of that city to the sword, and destroy it, with all that is in it, even the cattle in its byres. Make a pile in the streets of all its household store, and burn that with the city itself, as forfeit to the Lord thy God. Let it be a ruin for all time, never to be rebuilt. It is all forfeit, be sure thou dost not treasure any relic of it. So the anger of the Lord thy God will relent, and he will have mercy on thee, and make a great nation of thee, as he swore to thy fathers; let him find thee attentive to his voice, observant of all these commands of his, ready to do his will.

14 Learn to carry yourselves as the children of the Lord your God. Do not disfigure yourselves or shave your heads bare when a man dies, you, a people set apart for the Lord, chosen out of all nations on earth to be his very own. Do not eat any food which brings defilement. You may eat such beasts as the ox, the sheep, and the goat, red deer and roe, gazelle and wild goat, addax and oryx and zemer;¹ any creature which has cloven hoofs and chews the cud. You must not eat those which have the hoofs single, even though they chew the cud; the camel and the hare and the rock-rabbit, and all other ruminants that do not divide the hoof, you must count unclean. And the sow, which has cloven hoofs but does not chew the cud, is also unclean; you must not eat the flesh of such beasts, or touch their carcasses.

Among the creatures that live in water, you may eat those that have fins and scales; whatever lacks fins and scales is unclean, not for your eating. There are birds you may eat without fear of defilement; others which you must avoid as unclean, eagle and griffon and osprey, kite and falcon and vulture and all else of their kind, anything that belongs to the raven tribe, ostrich, night-owl, sea-mew, and hawks of every kind, stork, swan, ibis, cormorant, coot, night-jar and pelican, with curlews of every kind; the hoopoe, besides, and the bat. Creeping things that have wings are unclean, and must not be eaten. Any meat that is not unclean may be used for food, except what has fallen dead; make a present of this to some neighbour, not of Israel's race, or sell it to an alien, it is not for your eating, a people set apart for the Lord your God.

Seething a kid in its dam's milk is a rite forbidden thee.

Every year, thou wilt set apart a tenth of all the crops thy land yields, and come to the place the Lord thy God has chosen for the sanctuary of his name, to feast on it there in his presence; a tenth part of thy corn and wine and oil, and the first-fruits of thy herds and flocks; so thou wilt learn to fear the Lord thy God continually. But perhaps the journey will be too long, the place which he has chosen too far distant, and the load too great, so bountiful has the Lord thy God been to thee. Why then, sell all this tith of thine, and bring the proceeds of the sale with thee to the place he has chosen. With this money thou mayst buy all thou wilt, oxen and sheep, wine and mead, to thy heart's content; and on these thou shalt feast in the presence of the Lord, thou and all thy household making good cheer together, and the Levite, too, that dwells in thy city; do not neglect the Levite, that has no part or lot such as thou hast. Every third year, thou wilt set apart a fresh tith of all the revenue thou then hast, and lay it by at home, so that the Levite, who has no part or lot such as thou hast, and the wanderer and the orphan and the widow that are thy fellow-citizens, may eat and have their fill. So, to whatever employment thou dost turn thy hand, the blessing of the Lord thy God shall be with thee.

15 As each seventh year comes round, there shall be a cancelling of debts, and thus it shall be ordered; now that the Lord has granted discharge, no one shall demand repayment of money lent to his fellow-citizen, his fellow-Israelite. From an alien that has come to dwell in the land thou mayst exact it, but thy own fellow-countryman must be granted discharge. No one among you must be destitute, begging his bread, if the Lord is to grant thee his blessing in the land he means to give thee for thy own.¹ Bless thee he will, as he has promised, if only thou wilt listen to his voice and observe all the commandments I enjoin upon thee this day; so that many nations shall be thy debtors, and none thy creditor, many thy servants, and none thy master.

It may be that one of thy brethren, thy fellow-citizen in the land the Lord thy God means to give thee, will fall on evil days. Do not steel thy heart and shut thy purse against him: be generous to his poverty, and lend him what thou seest he stands in need of. And here a base thought may come into thy mind, which thou must put away from thee; that the seventh year, the year of discharge, is too close at hand. Do not, at such a time, turn thy back on this brother of thine, and refuse to lend him what he would fain borrow; his plea will come before the Lord, and thou wilt be held guilty. Lend freely, and use no craft in relieving his necessities; so at all times, to whatever employment thou dost turn thy hand, the blessing of the Lord thy God will be with thee. For indeed there will be no lack of poor men in the land that is to be thy home;² I must needs warn thee, then, to be open-handed towards thy brother, thy fellow-countryman, when he is poor and in want.

When any of thy own race, Hebrew men and women, are sold to thee as slaves and have worked for thee six years, in the seventh year thou shalt set them at liberty. And the freed slave must not be allowed to go away empty-handed; make provision for him out of flock and threshing-floor and wine-press the Lord has blessed for thee. Do not forget that thou too wast a slave in the land of Egypt, and the Lord thy God ransomed thee; there is good cause for the command I now lay upon thee. But it may be he will refuse to leave thee, for the love he bears to thee and to thy household, and for the happiness he finds in thy service. Take an awl, then, and bore through his ear with it into the door of thy house, in token that he is thy slave in perpetuity; and for a maid-servant do the

¹ The Hebrew text here seems to have a slightly different turn of sense: 'Although indeed there will be no one destitute among you . . . if thou wilt but listen . . .', etc. ² This verse is in apparent contradiction to verse 4; there the ideal, here the actual state of things is foreshadowed.

- 18 like. But if thou dost let them go free, do not turn thy back on them; for six years they have been earning a workman's hire. So the Lord thy God shall bless all thy enterprises.
- 19 Thou shalt set apart for the Lord thy God all the first-born of thy cattle and sheep; the calf must never feel the yoke, the lamb never be shorn; year by year thou wilt come to the place the Lord has chosen, with all thy household, and feast upon such offerings in the presence of the Lord thy
- 20 God. But if any beast has a blemish, or is lame or blind or misshapen or maimed in any way, it cannot be offered to the Lord thy God; eat it, then, within thy own city gates, and bid whom thou wilt, defiled or undefiled, to share it with thee, as if it were
- 21 the flesh of red deer or roe, being careful only not to eat the blood with it; that must be poured out like water on the ground.

16 Mark well that first spring month when the crops are yet green; it is time to celebrate the pasch in the Lord's honour. In that month, at dead of night, the Lord thy God rescued thee from

2 Egypt. In the place which the Lord thy God has chosen for the sanctuary of his name, flock and herd alike must provide

3 their paschal victims. At this feast, no bread must be eaten that has leaven in it; for seven days thou shalt eat unleavened bread, the food of perilous times, when thou didst escape from Egypt in fear; never as long as thou livest shall the manner of thy departure from Egypt be forgotten. No leaven, then, must be found in

4 all thy domain during those seven days; and of the victim slain on that first evening nothing must remain till the morrow. This paschal victim is not to be immolated in a city here, a city there, among all the cities

5 the Lord thy God means to give thee; no, the Lord thy God will choose out one place to be the sanctuary of his name, and there thou wilt immolate the paschal victim at set of sun, the time of thy escape

6 from Egypt. In this place of the Lord's choice it must be cooked and eaten; then, when morning comes, thou wilt make thy

7 way back to thy own dwelling-place. For six days thou wilt eat unleavened bread; on the seventh thou wilt keep holiday in the Lord's honour, and rest from work.

From the day when the sickle is first put to thy crops, count seven whole weeks, and then keep the Feast of Weeks, honouring the Lord thy God with an offering freely made out of the fruits thy labour has earned, in that measure in which the Lord has prospered thee. Make good cheer in the presence of the Lord thy God, with son and daughter, serving-man and serving-maid, with the Levite who dwells in thy city, wanderer and orphan and widow that are thy neighbours, in the place the Lord thy God has chosen for his name's sanctuary. Never forget that thou too wast a slave once in Egypt; the more reason why thou shouldst obey this order I give thee.

The Feast of Tent-dwelling thou shalt observe for seven days, at the time when corn and wine are all gathered in, keeping holiday again and making good cheer, with son and daughter, serving-man and serving-maid, Levite and wanderer, orphan and widow that are thy neighbours. For seven days, in the place he has chosen, thou shalt keep holiday in honour of the Lord thy God; so greatly will he prosper thy harvest and all the enterprises thou dost set thy hand to, that thou wilt have good reason to rejoice. Three times a year, then, all thy men folk shall present themselves before the Lord thy God in the place of his choice; at the three feasts of the Pasch, of Weeks, and of Tent-dwelling. No one shall present himself before the Lord empty-handed; each will have a gift to bring, in that measure in which the Lord his God has prospered him.

In all the cities the Lord thy God gives thee, thou shalt appoint judges and magistrates among thy fellow-tribesmen. And these are to settle their neighbours' quarrels by just award, and listen to both parties, not moved by influence or bribery; such power a bribe has to rob even the wise of clear vision, to alter the sentence even of the just. Right is right, and ever thou must keep it in view, if thou wouldst live long in the enjoyment of the land which the Lord thy God means to give thee.

There must be no sacred wood around the Lord's altar, no tree of any kind, nor must thou make thyself an image and set it up there; all such worship is hateful to the Lord thy God.

17 Never shalt thou offer in sacrifice sheep or ox that has any blemish or defect; such impiety is hateful to the Lord thy God.

It may be that, in one of the cities the Lord thy God gives thee, men and women of thy race will be found so defiant, so false to his covenant, that they will forsake him, and enslave themselves to the worship of other gods, the sun and the moon and all the host of heaven, in contempt of my commandment. If this news is brought to thee, make careful enquiry into what thou hast heard; and if it proves that the report was true, and the foul deed was done among thy fellow-Israelites, away with such recreant men or women to the city gate; there let them be killed by stoning. But there must be two witnesses or more if the death penalty is inflicted; one witness will not suffice when a man's life is in question. First the witnesses, then the rest of the people must put a hand to the deed, and so thou wilt rid thyself of the plague that infects thy company.

It may be that some matter of law will be too hard for thy unravelling; was it killing or murder? Is this claim just or that? Was the infection leprous or not? There is no agreement between the judges at thy own city gate. Up, then, make thy way to the place the Lord thy God has chosen, and have recourse to the priests of Levi's race, to the judge who then holds office; thou hast but to ask them, and they will make the right decision known to thee. Thou must needs give effect to the sentence they pronounce, these officers of the Lord's chosen sanctuary; when they have told thee what the divine law prescribes, thou shalt abide by their award, without swerving to right or left. If anyone is contumacious, rejecting the authority of the priest who then ministers to the Lord thy God, and the judge's sentence, his life must pay for it. Rid Israel of this plague, so that all the people may take warning when they hear it, and there may be no contumacy thenceforward.

When you reach the land the Lord your God is giving you, and make it your own, and settle in it, you will resolve to have a king of your own, like the nations about you. The king you appoint must be the man the Lord your God chooses, one of your own race; you must not let an alien, who is not of your blood, bear rule over you. Once appointed, he must not raise troop after troop of horsemen, and turn his people's eyes back towards Egypt, flushed with the pride of horsemanship;¹ the Lord strictly enjoins you never to tread that way again. He is not to wed a multitude of wives, that will seduce his heart from its loyalty; he is not to amass great treasures of silver and gold.² And now he sits enthroned in his kingdom; let his first act be to borrow this schedule of the law from the priests of Levi's race, and have a second copy made of it.³ And that scroll he will keep by him, studying it all his life long, so that he may learn to serve the Lord his God, and follow all the rules and observances which the law enjoins. Never let his heart, puffed up with pride, disdain his brethren; never let him swerve from these commandments to right or left, if he and his sons are to enjoy long dominion over the race of Israel.

18 The priests that are of Levi's race, having no part or lot of their own such as the rest of Israel have, will share the burnt-sacrifices and offerings that are brought to the Lord, that is all the claim they have upon the revenues of their fellow-Israelites; has not the Lord told them that he is to be all their portion? When the whole people or some one Israelite offers sacrifice, be the victim ox or sheep, the priests can claim the gift of shoulder and maw;⁴ they can claim the the first-fruits, too, of corn, and wine, and oil, and part of the wool that is brought in at sheep-shearing. Out of all thy tribes, the Lord has chosen Levi and his children to stand up and minister in the Lord's name for ever. If a Levite gives up his home in any city of Israel, for love of the place the Lord has chosen, and comes to dwell there instead, he shall have a right to minister in the name of the Lord his

¹ Literally, 'lead his people any more into Egypt, being elated with the number of his horsemen' (in the Hebrew text, 'so as to multiply his horsemen'). What is here discouraged is not, probably, an attempt to invade Egypt, but an attempt to secure an alliance with Egypt which would enable Israel to put cavalry into the field. Cf. III Kg. 4. 26, 10, 28; Is. 31. 1.

² Cf. III Kg. 11. 1-8.

 to receive the same portion of food as the others, the sale of his patrimony notwithstanding.¹

9 When thou reachest the land which the Lord thy God means to give thee, take good care not to imitate the abominable 10 ways of the men who dwell there. None must be found among you to consecrate son or daughter by making them pass through the fire, to consult soothsayers, or keep watch for dream-revelations and omens; 11 there must be no wizard, or enchanter, none who consults familiar spirits and divinations, and would receive warnings 12 from the dead. All such things are hateful to the Lord; it is to punish them for such evil doings that he means to destroy these 13 nations at thy onslaught. Thine to stand before the Lord thy God perfect and un-14 reproved; let them listen to soothsayer and diviner, these other nations thou wilt dispossess; not such is the schooling thou 15 hast received from the Lord thy God. No, the Lord thy God will raise up for thee a prophet like myself, of thy own race, a brother of thy own; it is to him thou must 16 listen.² Was it not thy own plea, that day when all were publicly assembled at mount Horeb, that thou mightest hear the voice of the Lord thy God no longer, have sight of that raging fire no longer, lest it 17 should be thy death? And the Lord told me, All that they have said is well said.
 18 I will raise up for them a prophet like thyself, one of their own race, entrusting my own message to his lips, so that he may 19 instruct them at my bidding. Whoever refuses obedience to these commands which he gives in my name, shall feel my 20 vengeance. If anyone is so presumptuous as to prophesy in my name when I have given him no message to deliver, or prophesy in the name of alien gods, his life must pay for it.

21 Perhaps thy unspoken thought would ask, how thou shouldst recognize those messages which do not come from the 22 Lord? I will give thee a test; If the prophet foretells something in the Lord's name, and it does not come about, this was no message from the Lord; it was the prophet's vain conceit that imagined it; let no word of his strike terror into thee.

19 When the Lord thy God has dispossessed those other nations, and thou hast overspread their country, and all its cities and houses are thine, set apart three cities in the midst of the territory he has granted thee; cities that may be reached by well paved roads, and so placed as to divide up the whole of thy land into three districts. One of these must be near at hand, when blood has been shed and the slayer would take sanctuary. Such a man must be granted his life, on these conditions; the blow must have been struck unwittingly, and there must be no proof of a feud between the two men in time past. A man, for instance, may have gone out with a friend of his, in all innocence, to cut wood; and as he is cutting the axe may fly out of his hand, or the iron come loose from the handle, striking the other and killing him. The author of such mis-chance will fly for his life to one of the cities aforesaid. It may be the dead man's next of kin will set out in pursuit, to take revenge; and if the distance is great, he may overtake and kill this innocent man, who cannot be shewn to have borne ill-will to the dead kinsman. That is why I bid thee set apart three cities each at an equal distance from the next. In years to come, the Lord will enlarge thy domain, as he swore to thy fathers he would, and give thee the whole of this land where he has promised thee a home; provided always that thou dost keep his commandments, and do all that I bid thee this day, loving the Lord thy God, and following continually the path he has chosen for thee.
 Then it will be time to double the number of the cities aforesaid, adding three others, to prevent the blood of innocent men being shed, here in this land the Lord is giving thee for thy own, and the guilt of that blood defiling thee.

But it may be that someone who has a grudge against his neighbour will plot against his life, starting up out of an ambush and inflicting on him a mortal hurt,

¹ It is not clear what the Levite's patrimony consisted in; presumably he had some rights in his original city which he sold away, and it is here laid down that he may keep the price of this sale, although sharing with the other Levites the offerings made by the worshipper.

² See Jn. 1. 45; Ac. 3. 22.

and then flee to one of these cities for refuge. Then let the elders of that city send and dislodge him from his place of retreat, and so hand him over to the dead man's next of kin, to die. Have no mercy on him; it shall go ill with thee, if thou dost not rid Israel of that defilement which the blood of an innocent man has brought on it.

If thy neighbour's domain is bounded by some landmark, set up by men of old time, where thy home is in the land the Lord has granted thee, do not take it up and remove it elsewhere.

Whatever be the offence or crime a man is charged with, it shall not suffice for one witness to appear against him; every question must be settled by the voice of two witnesses or more. It may be that a false witness will appear, accusing a man of this or that misdeed. When such a claim is made, the two parties will be brought forward in the Lord's presence, before the priests and judges then in office; and if these, after careful examination, find that the witness gave false evidence against his fellow-Israelite, they must inflict on him the same punishment he would have brought on this brother of his. Thou must rid thyself of the plague, so that others may be warned by hearing of it, and none dare to do the like again. No pity must be shewn him; life must answer for the life he would have sworn away, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot.

20 When thou dost go out to war against thy enemies, never be daunted by the sight of horsemen and chariots, and a host greater than thy own arrayed against thee; the Lord thy God, who rescued thee from Egypt, fights on thy side. When the hour of battle draws near, the high priest will take his stand there in front of the ranks, and say to the people, Listen, Israel; as you join battle to-day with your enemies, there must be no faint hearts among you, no flinching, no yielding, no trembling here. The Lord your God is here in the midst of you, and will fight on your side against your adversaries, to deliver you in the hour of peril. And then, in the hearing of the whole army, each chieftain will make this proclamation to the men of his own company: Is there anyone here who has built a new house, and not yet handselled it? Let him go back home; shall he be slain in battle, and leave another to handsel it?¹ Is there anyone here who has planted a vineyard, and not shared the first vintage of it with his neighbours?² Let him go back home; shall he be slain in battle, and another take his place? Is there anyone here that is betrothed to a maid, and has not taken her to himself? Let him go back home; shall he be slain in battle, and leave her to wed another? And when so much is said, let them add this further proclamation: Is there anyone here whose spirits are daunted by terror? Let him go back home, or he will daunt the spirits of his brethren, and make them cowards too. And now, having said their say, let the chieftains keep silent, and let each of them set about marshalling his company for battle.

When thou dost lay siege to a city, first of all thou shalt offer terms of peace. If these are accepted, and the gates opened to thee, the lives of all the citizens shall be spared, and they shall become thy subjects, paying thee tribute. But if they refuse to listen, and offer battle, go forward to the assault; and when the Lord makes thee master of it, put only the men folk to the sword, not the women and children, not the cattle or anything else that the city contains. Divide the spoil among the host, and enjoy as thou wilt all the plunder the Lord thy God has allowed thee to take from thy enemies. All this, when thou art concerned with some city far away from thee, not one of those in which thou art to find a dwelling. But in the cities that are to be thy own, no living thing must be left. All of them must be put to the sword, Hethite and Amorrhite and Chanaanite and Perezite and Hevite and Jebusite, as the Lord thy God has bidden thee; or they will teach your race to perform such detestable worship as they perform in honour of their own gods, and be false to the Lord.

19 When a city must be taken by force of arms, and thou hast been a long time besieging it, do not lay waste the whole countryside with thy axe, and destroy the trees that yield food. Trees are not men, to increase the number of the city's defenders. Spare the fruit-trees, and be content to cut down such wild trees as are fit for other use; and so build engines to reduce the city that defies thee.¹

21 When, in this land of thine, a dead man's body is found and there is no knowing who slew him, elders and judges must betake themselves to the spot where he lies, and find by measurement which of the neighbouring cities is nearest at hand. It is for the elders of the nearest city to do what must be done. They will choose out from the herd a heifer that has never borne yoke or ploughed furrow, and in some wild and rugged glen, that was never ploughed or sown, this heifer must have its neck broken. Priests must be there, of Levi's race; these are the men whom the Lord thy God has chosen to minister to him, and give their blessing in his name, and also to decide between right and wrong, clean and unclean. And the elders of this neighbouring city, close to the dead man,² will wash their hands over the heifer that lies slain in the glen, protesting, Not ours the hand that shed this blood; our eyes never witnessed the deed; be merciful, Lord, to Israel, the people thou hast claimed for thyself; do not charge Israel, thy own people, with guilt because it is stained with an innocent man's blood. So shall they be quit of all blame for the murder. Do my bidding, and the guilt of blood wrongfully shed shall never rest upon thee.

When the Lord gives thee victory over thy enemies in battle, and thou bringest back prisoners, dost thou see among them a woman so fair that she wins thy heart, and thou wouldst marry her? Take her, then, into thy house; and there she must shave her head and pare her nails close, and lay aside the garb of a captive, that she wore till now. Let her have a month, dwelling in thy house, to bewail the loss of her father and mother; then thou mayest take her to thy bed and make her thy wife. But if afterwards, she does not answer thy mood, she must go free; thou hast no power to sell her or exercise lordship over her, when once thou hast robbed her of maidenhood.

If a man twice married loves one wife and is weary of the other, and has children by both, but his first-born by the wife he spurns, how shall he divide up his possessions between them? He shall have no power to make the son of the loved wife his heir, in preference to that other. Recognize the first-born he must, though of the mother he be weary; a double share of all his goods belongs to the son that was engendered first; the birthright is his.

Is there a son so rebellious and unmanageable that he defies his parents' bidding, and will not brook restraint? Such a son they must bring by force to the city gate, where the elders are assembled, and make complaint to them, This son of ours is rebellious and unmanageable; he pays no heed to our remonstrances, but must ever be carousing, ever at his wantonness and his cups. Thereupon the citizens shall stone him to death, so that you may be rid of this plague, and every Israelite that hears of it may be afraid to do the like.

When a man is guilty of a capital crime, and his sentence is to hang on a gallows, his body must not be left to hang there on the gibbet, it must be buried the same day. God's curse lies on the man who hangs on a gibbet, and the land which the Lord thy God gives thee for thy own must not suffer pollution.

22 If thou seest ox or sheep that belongs to thy fellow-Israelite going astray, do not hurry past; take it back to its owner, if he is a neighbour of thine, and known to thee. If not, shelter it thyself till he enquires, and restore it. And so with an ass or with a garment or any other lost thing that belongs to thy fellow-Israelite; do not leave them where thou

¹ In verses 19-20 the meaning of the Hebrew text is not quite clear, and it has perhaps suffered from a slight corruption; the sense given to it in the Latin seems the most probable. ² 'Close to'; literally, in the Latin, 'coming close to', but it does not appear from the context that the dead body was present when the heifer was slaughtered.

findest them, as if it did not concern thee.

4 If his ox or his ass falls down by the way-side, do not hurry past; help him to lift it up again.

5 A woman must not wear man's clothes, or a man go clad like a woman; all such doings are hateful to God.

6 If thou findest in thy path, in a tree or on the ground, a mother bird sitting on her nestlings or her eggs, do not carry her off with her young; let her go, and be content with her brood; so shalt thou prosper and live long.

8 When thou buildest a new house, make a parapet about its roof; if anyone should lose his footing and fall to the ground, thy house is polluted with blood, and the guilt is thine.

9 Do not sow thy vineyard with a second kind of seed, or both the crop thou hast sown and the fruit of thy vineyard are forfeit. Do not plough with an ox and an ass together; or wear garments woven of linen and wool together.¹

2 Thou shalt wear tasselled strings at the four corners of the garment thou wearest.

3 It may be that a husband will grow weary of the wife he has taken, and look about him for pretexts to put her away. Such a man will perhaps fasten an ill name on her, by complaining that when he bedded her she was found to be no maid.

5 Thereupon her father and mother must bring her before the elders at the city gate, and the proofs of her maidenhood with her; and the father will say, I gave this man my daughter in marriage, and now he is weary of her; that is why he would fasten an ill name upon her by telling me he found my daughter no maid. And here are the proofs of my daughter's maidenhood. With that, he will spread the cloth out in sight of the elders; and these will lay hold of the man and beat him, fining him, moreover, a hundred sicles of silver, for fastening an ill name on a maid of Israel. He must pay them to the woman's father, and must keep her as his wife; as long as he lives he may not put her away. If the charge he made was true, and the woman was found indeed to be no maid, then the citizens must cast her out of her father's door and stone her to death; this was a foul deed done in a woman of Israel, to play the wanton in her own father's house; rid thy company of such a plague as that.

If a man beds with another's wife, both must die, adulterer and adulteress, and so Israel is rid of a plague.

A man has fallen in with a maid betrothed to some other, and mated with her. Was it done in the city? Then both must be taken to the city gate and stoned to death; she, because she made no outcry, with all the city close at hand, he, because he robbed his neighbour's wife of her maidenhood. Or did the man fall in with this betrothed maid in the countryside, and force her to grant his will? Then he alone must die; no harm shall befall the woman. She has not deserved death; she was defenceless as a man suddenly attacked and killed by a brigand; cry as she might, far out in the countryside, no one could come to her aid.

If a man falls in with a maid still unbetrothed, and forces her to do his will, and the matter is brought to judgement, the man who mated with her must pay her fifty sicles of silver, and keep her as his wife, now that he has robbed her of her maidenhood; as long as he lives he may not put her away.

A man must not take his father's wife, and come between his own father's sheets.

23 The emasculate, the mutilated, are not to be admitted into the Lord's assembly. Nor is there any place in the Lord's assembly for a bastard, born out of wedlock, or for any of his descent, though ten generations have passed. Nor, though ten generations have passed, may one of Ammonite or Moabite descent be admitted to the Lord's assembly; this disability they have incurred for all time, by refusing to provide food and drink, when Israel came on their way from Egypt. Nay, they hired Balaam the son of Beor to come from Mesopotamia of the Syrians and curse thee; only the Lord would not listen to Balaam, and transformed that curse of his into a blessing, so well he loved thee. No peace with these, no friendly dealings with these at any time, while thy life lasts; but for the Edomites thou shalt have no repugnance, they are thy brethren, nor for the Egyptians, in whose land thou didst

8 formerly dwell; their descendants in the third generation may be admitted to the Lord's assembly.

9 When thou goest out to war against thy 10 enemies, keep clear of all offence. Should any of you incur defilement at night in his sleep, he must leave the camp, and not return to it all day; at sunset, when he has washed, he may enter the camp again. If thou wouldst ease thyself, thou must have 13 a place to go to away from the camp, and carry a scoop at thy girdle, so that when thou art eased thou canst dig about thee 14 and heap loose earth over thy excrement. In this camp of thine the Lord thy God goes to and fro, waiting to deliver thee and give thee victory over thy enemies; all must be holiness there, no defilement be seen in it, lest his presence should be withdrawn.

15 If a man escapes from bondage and takes refuge with thee, thou shalt not give 16 him back into the hands of his lord; let him settle where he pleases, and live at peace in some city of thine; leave him unmolested.¹

17 No Israelite, man or woman, shall be devoted to a life of shame; wouldst thou bring into the temple of the Lord thy God the wages of a harlot, or the price of nameless sin? Either of these is hateful to the Lord thy God.

19 Do not charge interest to thy fellow-Israelite when thou lendest him money or grain or anything else of thine. Keep that for the alien; to thy brother thou shalt lend without interest all that he needs; so the Lord God will bless every enterprise of thine in the land which is to be thy home.

21 If thou makest a vow to the Lord thy God, do not defer payment of it. The Lord thy God will hold thee to thy promise; thou delayest at thy peril. Hadst thou refrained from making the vow, it would 23 have been no sin in thee, but once the word has been spoken, it must be made good; thy own lips pronounced it, and thy will was under no compulsion, the promise must be kept.

24 When thou art passing through thy neighbour's vineyard, eat the grapes to thy heart's content, but take none away with thee. And when thou art passing through 25 a neighbour's corn-field, thou mayst break off ears and rub them in thy hands; but sickle put none to thy neighbour's corn.

24 Does a man take a wife, and then, after making her his own, find some taint of defilement in her, so that he loves her no longer? He must draw up a writ of separation and hand it to her before he sends her away from his house. Does 2 she, after parting from him, marry a second husband, who also wearies of her and sends 3 her away with a writ, or perhaps is lost to her by death? Her first husband may not 4 take her back again, now that she is contaminated, a thing detestable in the Lord's eyes.² Do not bring guilt on the land which the Lord gives thee for thy home.

A man newly married will not serve in 5 the wars, or have any other public duty enjoined upon him; he is free to abide at home and cheer his wife for a year's space.

Thou shalt not accept mill or mill-stone 6 as a debtor's pledge; that is to let a man pledge his whole livelihood.

If anyone is found leading his fellow-Israelite into a trap,³ and selling him as a slave for profit, he must die; rid thyself of such a plague as that.

Be on thy guard against the visitation 8 of leprosy. Do as the priests of Levi's race instruct thee at my bidding, and be exact in the performance of it; never forget how 9 the Lord thy God punished Mary, on thy way here out of Egypt.

When thou wouldst enforce a claim for 10 debt against thy neighbour, do not go into his house to wrest his pledge from him; stand without, and let him bring thee what 11 he can. A poor man's pledge must not spend the night with thee; give it back to 12 him before set of sun. When he calls down a blessing on thee, glad to have his own 13 cloak to sleep in, it will win thee favour from the Lord thy God. And if thou hast 14 a hired servant that lives from hand to mouth, be he thy fellow-Israelite, or some

¹ From the reference to 'some city of thine', it is clear that foreigners are in question; and the law may be meant to protect, not so much slaves who have run away from their owners, as refugees who have escaped from their oppressors in some neighbouring country.

² 'A thing detestable'; the Latin translates here as if the wife herself was meant, but the sense of the Hebrew text is more probably that the act mentioned is detestable to the Lord. In any case, it is clear that divorce was permitted to the Hebrews, 'to suit their hard hearts'; cf. Mt. 19. 8.

³ In the Hebrew text, 'stealing'; in the Latin, 'seducing'.

alien that shares thy land and city, do not withhold his wages; pay him his day's wages before set of sun. It is all he has, in his poverty, to support life with; cries he to the Lord, thou art a sinner manifest.

A father must not die for his son's guilt, or a son for his father's; no guilt but his own shall bring a man to death.

Do not refuse alien or orphan his rights at law; do not make the widow give thee her cloak as a pledge; remember that thou wast once a slave in Egypt, and the Lord thy God rescued thee; with good right I enjoin so much upon thee.

If thou art harvesting the corn in one of thy fields, and a sheaf lies there forgotten, do not go back for it; leave it for the alien, the orphan and the widow; so the Lord thy God will prosper all thy undertakings. Do not go over thy olive-trees again, the fruit once picked, leave the rest to alien, orphan and widow; leave to alien, orphan and widow the clusters that hang on thy vines when the vintage is over, still ungathered. Do not forget that thou wast once a slave in Egypt; not without reason I enjoin this upon thee.

25 Not always will the judges be content, in settling a dispute, with giving the rightful claimant his due, and dismissing the other; it may be this other deserves a beating. If so, they will have him laid on the ground and beaten in their presence, and his punishment will be greater or less according to his guilt; provided always that the number of lashes must not exceed forty. Wouldst thou see thy brother go away all mangled?

Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treads out the corn on thy threshing-floor.

When two brethren share the same house, and one dies childless, his widow must not take a husband elsewhere; the survivor must wed her, and beget children in his dead brother's name. And the first son she bears him he must account as the dead man's heir, so that his line shall not be lost to Israel. It may be he will refuse to take his brother's wife, although the law binds her to him. Then the woman will make her way to the city gate, and protest to the elders there, This brother-in-law of mine refuses to wed me and beget children in his brother's name. Thereupon they will summon and question him, and if he persists in refusing to take her, the woman will go up to him, there in the presence of the elders, and take off one of his shoes, and spit in his face. This, she will say, is for the man who would not continue his brother's line, and Barefoot Breed is the name by which he will be known in Israel.¹

If two men fall out and come to blows, it may be that the wife of the weaker man will come up to his rescue, and lay hands upon the other, taking shameful hold of him. That hand of hers must be struck off, and no mercy be shewn to her.

Thou shalt not carry two different weights in thy wallet, one heavy and one light, or keep two bushel-measures in thy house, one great and one small. A just weight and a true, a full bushel-measure and a true thou shalt use always, if thou wouldst have long enjoyment of the land the Lord thy God means to give thee. All such knavery is hateful to the Lord thy God; he is the enemy of wrong-doing.

Do not forget how Amalec treated thee on thy way here from Egypt. Reckless of the divine vengeance, he crossed thy path and cut off the stragglers from thy ranks, as they halted for weariness, faint with hunger and toil. When the Lord thy God allows thee to rest secure, master of all the nations that dwell in the land he has promised thee, thou shalt blot out Amalec from human remembrance; keep this in mind constantly.

26 When thou hast reached the land which the Lord is to make thy home and taken possession of it, and settled there, thou wilt set apart first-fruits out of all thy crops. These thou wilt put in a basket, and then carry them to the place the Lord thy God has chosen as the sanctuary of his name. And thus shalt thou address thyself to the priest who bears office at the time: I make acknowledgment this day before the Lord thy God, that the land he promised to us in our fathers' days is now my home. Thereupon the priest will take the basket from thy hand, and set it down before the altar of the Lord thy God. In that divine presence, thou wilt continue thy protestation:

My fathers were wanderers, hunted to and fro in Syria, when they made their way into Egypt and began to dwell there, only a handful of them; but they grew to be a great people, hardy and numerous. Whereupon the Egyptians treated us ill and persecuted us, and the burden we must bear was insupportable; so we cried out to the Lord God of our fathers, and he listened to our plea, and took pity on our affliction, the toil and oppression we suffered; rescued us from Egypt by force, with his arm high uplifted to strike great terror, and perform great wonders and portents, and brought us here, where he has given us a land that is all milk and honey. That is why I am offering first-fruits, now, out of the land which the Lord has given me. So leave them there, in the presence of the Lord thy God, and when thou hast paid worship to this Lord and God of thine, go home to feast on all the good things he has given thee, with all thy household, with Levite and wanderer that are thy neighbours.

And when thou hast finished taking tithes of all thy harvest, every third year, when tithe is due; when thou hast given them to Levite and stranger, to orphan and widow, in thy own city, so that they can feast and have their fill, what prayer wilt thou make before the Lord thy God? I have stripped my house, thou wilt tell him, of all that I had vowed away, given it to Levite or to wanderer, to orphan or to widow, as thou badest me; I have not neglected thy will, or forgotten thy commands. None of it has been eaten when I was in mourning, or set apart when I was defiled, or devoted to the dead; no, I have obeyed the Lord my God, and done all thy bidding.¹ Look down, then, from that sanctuary of thine, that dwelling-place high in heaven, and bless thy people Israel; bless the land thou hast given us, that land, all milk and honey, which thou didst promise to our fathers before us.

Here and now the Lord thy God gives thee these commands, these decrees, bidding thee observe them and fulfil them, heart and soul. Here and now thou art choosing the Lord to be thy God, whose guidance thou wilt follow, whose prescriptions, laws and commandments thou wilt observe, whose rule thou wilt obey. Here and now the Lord is choosing thee to be his own people, as he promised thee, living by his precepts; his will is to exalt thee high above all other nations he has made, for his own praise and glory and renown, a people consecrated to the Lord thy God, claiming his promise.

27 And now Moses, with the elders of Israel, gave the people this charge: Hold fast all the commandments I have been enjoining on you this day. When you cross the Jordan and reach the land which the Lord means to give you, raise up great stones, and smooth them over with plaster; on these, now that Jordan is passed, and the land I promised, all milk and honey, is yours, the whole tenour of this law must be written down. These plastered slabs, of which I am now speaking, must be set up on mount Hebal, on the further bank of Jordan; and there an altar must be built to the Lord your God, out of stones which no iron has ever touched, stones still rough and unpolished. On this, offer the Lord burnt-sacrifice, and slay victims for a welcome-offering; eat and make good cheer in the Lord's presence; and then write on the slabs, clearly and distinctly, the whole tenour of this law.

Then Moses, with the priests of Levi's race, said to the whole of Israel: Give heed, Israel, and listen; this day the Lord thy God has made thee his people. Obey his word, and live by all the commandments and decrees I am giving thee.

And at the same time Moses gave the people this message: Jordan once crossed, six tribes must stand on mount Garizim for the blessing of the people, Simeon, Levi, Juda, Issachar, Joseph and Benjamin, and six tribes must stand opposite, on mount Ebal, for the cursing, Ruben, Gad, Aser, Zabulon, Dan and Nephthali. And now the Levites shall cry this proclamation aloud to the whole of Israel, Cursed be the man who makes graven or molten image, a thing detestable to the

Lord, however skilled its workmanship, however secret its hiding-place. And here all the people shall answer, Amen. Cursed be the man who refuses to honour father or mother, Amen. Cursed be the man who moves his neighbour's land-mark, Amen. Cursed be the man who guides the blind amiss, Amen. Cursed be the man who denies justice to alien, orphan and widow, Amen. Cursed be the man who mates with his father's wife, and comes between his own father's sheets, Amen. Cursed be the man who mates with any beast, Amen. Cursed be the man who mates with his sister, born of the same father or the same mother, Amen. Cursed be the man who mates with his wife's mother, Amen. Cursed be the man who wounds his neighbour secretly, Amen. Cursed be the man who accepts a bribe, to swear away an innocent life, Amen. Cursed be the man who does not hold fast to every word of this law, and live by it; and all will say, Amen.

28 And now, if thou wilt listen to the Lord thy God, carrying out faithfully all those commandments of his which I enjoin upon thee, the Lord thy God will make thee greater than any other nation on earth; and all these blessings which follow shall come to meet thee, if only thou wilt obey his will. Blessed shalt thou be in town and country, blessed with fertility of womb and of soil, with increase of thy stock in byre and sheep-fold, with rich store in barn and granary, blessed in thy journey and blessed in thy coming home. When thy enemies raise war against thee, the Lord will make them cower before thy onslaught; the host that came out against thee in one company shall flee away in seven. Upon all thy store-houses, upon every enterprise of thine, the Lord will send down his blessing; a land of blessing shall be thine.

If only thou wilt be true to the commandments of the Lord thy God, and follow the paths he has chosen, he will fulfil his promise, and make thee a people set apart for himself; so that all the nations of the world will go in fear of thee, the people that is named by such a name as his. The Lord will make thee rich in all good things; fruitful thy own race, fruitful thy cattle, fruitful this land, his promised gift to thy fathers. The Lord will open to thee the rich stores of heaven, and grant thy land rain when the season comes for it; he will prosper all thy enterprises, making thee the creditor of many nations, the debtor of none; for thee to lead, for others to follow; for thee the heights, for them the lower place. All this, if thou wilt obey the commandments of the Lord that I enjoin on thee this day, holding fast to them and living by them, not swerving to right or left, not following the worship of other gods than thine.

But if thou dost refuse to listen to him, and carry out faithfully all the commandments and observances I now enjoin on thee, all these curses that follow shall come to meet thee instead. Cursed shalt thou be in town and country, cursed with empty barn and bare granary, with barrenness of womb and of soil, with leanness of thy stock in byre and sheep-fold, cursed in thy journey and cursed in thy coming home. Want and distress the Lord will send thee, and failure in all thy enterprises, to crush thee down and make a quick end of thee, still faithless, still following thy own devices. The Lord will infect thee with plague, till the land thou hast won knows thee no more; the Lord will smite thee with wasting, and fever, and ague, with burning heat, with blight and mildew, hunting thee to the death. Heaven above thee shall be bronze, and earth iron under thy feet; dust will be all the rain he gives thee, and ashes shall fall from the skies to overwhelm thee. The Lord will make thee cower before the onslaught of thy enemies; the host that went out against them in one company shall flee away in seven, till thy race is scattered over all the kingdoms of the world, and the carcase that is left of thee will be left for every bird in heaven and every beast on earth to prey upon, with none to drive them away.

The Lord will smite thee with the Egyptian scab, and swelling in the groin, and the itch; there shall be no curing thee. The Lord will drive thee distracted, all benighted and crazed in thy wits, till thou wilt grope thy way at noon like a blind man in the dark, and lose thyself; never a day when thou art not wronged and oppressed, and there shall be none to deliver thee.

30 Wed a wife, and another shall bed her, build a house, and thou shalt not dwell in it, plant a vineyard, and the vintage shall not be thine. Thou wilt see thy own ox slain, and never a morsel for thee, thy ass carried off, and never restored, thy sheep given to thy enemies, and no help for it.

32 Nay, thy sons and daughters will be enslaved to alien masters, and thy own eyes shall see it, and ache continually at the sight; no power left thee to resist it. Thy crops, too, the fruit of thy own toil, will be carried off by a people till now unknown to thee; always thou wilt be suffering some 34 wrong, always oppressed, till thou art numb with terror at the sights thy own eyes have witnessed.

35 The Lord will smite knee and calf of thine with the foul scab, till it covers thee from head to foot, past all remedy.¹ Exile awaits thee, awaits the king thou hast chosen to rule over thee; the Lord will carry thee away into a land thou and thy fathers never heard of, where thou must needs worship alien gods, of wood and stone; and to all the nations among whom the Lord bids thee dwell, thy name shall

37 be a proverb and a by-word. Much sown and little reaped, where the locust has eaten; vines planted and dressed, and no vintage gathered, no wine drunk, because

40 the weevil has ravaged them; olives everywhere, and no oil to anoint thee, because they drooped and withered away; sons and daughters born, and no comfort to thee,

42 all carried away into exile. No tree of thine, no crop of thine, but the mildew shall spoil it. The aliens that dwell in thy land will outpass and over-shadow thee, humbled now and no match for them; they shall be the creditors now, and thou the debtor; it is for them to lead, for thee to follow.

45 And other curses shall befall thee, hunting thee down until they overtake thee, for thy utter ruin; and all because thou wouldst not listen to the Lord thy God, and hold fast to the commandments and observances he enjoined upon thee. It shall be a warning and a prodigy, the fate that shall come upon thee, and upon thy not obey the Lord thy God in happiness and content, when thou hadst enough and to spare, thou must learn, now, to obey those enemies the Lord will send out to conquer thee; obey them in hunger, and thirst, and nakedness, and every kind of want; a yoke of iron shall be fastened on thy neck, and shall crush thee down. From far away, from the very ends of the earth, the Lord will send a nation to sweep down on thee like a bird of prey; a nation whose very speech is unknown to thee; hard-hearted, with no respect for age, no pity for helpless children. All that thy herds, all that thy lands yield, they will take for food, careless of thy ruin; neither wheat nor wine nor soil nor herd nor flock shall be left to thee; all will be laid waste. In thy cities, too, they will press hard on thee, battering down everywhere those high walls, those strong walls; all over this land, which the Lord thy God is now giving thee, there shall be siege at thy gates. Thou wilt be fain to eat thy own offspring, the flesh of thy own sons and daughters, the Lord's gift to thee; so bitter the stress and the want these enemies of thine shall bring upon thee. The man that lived softly hitherto, in all comfort, will grudge food to his own brother, to the wife that lay in his bosom, and that food the flesh of his own sons; nothing else is left him, so hard the siege is pressed against all thy cities. The woman, so tender, so dainty, that would not put her foot to the ground, would not walk a single step, too delicately nurtured for that, will grudge the flesh of her own sons and daughters to the husband that lay in her bosom. She will eat what comes out from her own body, eat her own son that is newly born, there in secret; what else has she, hard pressed by the siege that is brought against these cities of thine?

If thou dost not carry out faithfully every word of the law this book contains, going in fear of the great name, the terrible name, the Lord thy God, then the Lord will send worse plagues still on thee and on thy posterity, heavy plagues and of long continuance, grievous and lasting visitations. The fierce afflictions of Egypt (thou

¹ The Latin in verses 21-35, but not in the rest of the chapter, uses the language of imprecation rather than of prophecy: 'May the Lord infect thee', etc., but it has seemed better to give a uniform value to the expressions used, throughout the chapter.

hast dreaded them ere now) shall be thine 61 instead. And all the sicknesses and plagues of which this book makes no mention the Lord will bring thee, till he has crushed 62 thee down; only a few will be left out of a number that was countless once as the stars in heaven, because thou wouldst not listen to the Lord thy God.

63 Hitherto the Lord had taken delight in blessing thy race and increasing it; now he will take delight in destroying and overwhelming it, dispossessing it of the land he 64 has given thee for thy home. This way and that, among all the nations from earth's end to earth's end, the Lord will scatter it;
 and in exile thou wilt worship such alien gods as thou and thy fathers never heard 65 of, gods of wood and stone. And even there thou wilt find no rest, no sure ground under thy feet. Nought will the Lord leave thee but cowed spirits, and eyes that fail, 66 and a heart eaten up with sorrow. Thou wilt see thy life hanging on a thread; day and night thou wilt go in fear, not counting 67 life itself thy own. In the morning thou wilt say? Will it never be evening? and in the evening, Will it never be morning?
 such will be the terrors that daunt thee, so 68 cruel the sights that meet thy eyes. The Lord will carry thee back over the sea to Egypt, the Lord who once told thee thou shouldst never see that road again. There the men and women of your race shall be slaves, on sale to their enemies, and find no master to buy them.

29 These are the terms of that covenant which the Lord would have Moses make with the sons of Israel, there in the country of Moab, in addition to the covenant he made with them on mount 2 Horeb. Moses gathered all Israel round him, and said to them, Your own eyes have witnessed, in the land of Egypt, the Lord's dealings with Pharaoh and his court and all 3 his kingdom; the challenge of all those wonders and portents, plain to your view.
 4 But to this day the Lord has not enlightened your hearts; yours are blind eyes, 5 yours are deaf ears still. Has he not been your guide all through those forty years in the desert? And all that time the garments that covered you did not wear out, the shoes on your feet did not perish with age; you had no bread with you, no wine or 6 strong drink, but you ate and drank your fill; and can you doubt that you have the Lord your God to protect you? ¹ And here, 7 at our journey's end, it is still the same; Sehon King of Hesebon and Og king of Basan came out to give us battle, but we 8 conquered them, and divided up their territory between Ruben and Gad and half the tribe of Manasses. Hold fast, then, ⁹ to the terms of this covenant, and fulfil them if you would order your lives as wise men do.

You stand here, all of you, in the pre-10 sence of the Lord your God, for a single purpose, leaders of tribes with their tribes around them, elders, counsellors, the whole assembly of Israel; your children, ¹¹ your wives, and the aliens that share your camp; servants, too, that hew wood and draw water at your bidding. It is to enter ¹² into a covenant with the Lord your God, a sworn covenant he would make with you this day; he would make you his people, ¹³ and be himself your God; such is the promise he has made to you, such was the oath he took to your fathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. And it is not only with ¹⁴ you that I ratify this covenant, this oath; it is with others, too, that are not here to ¹⁵ make it.

Ours is a race, as you know, that has ¹⁶ dwelt in Egypt; since then, we have made our way through the midst of many peo-17 ples, and as we passed you saw detestable and shameful sights, saw how they worshipped idols of wood and stone, of silver and gold. Pray God there may be no man ¹⁸ or woman here, no household or tribe, that is false at heart to the Lord our God, ready to forsake him and serve those other, alien gods. From such a root as that, gall and wormwood must needs spring. Does such ¹⁹ a man, listening to the terms of this oath, flatter himself with the thought that all will be well with him, and that he can go on in his perverse ways, till the damp ground imparts its moisture to the dry? ²⁰ Then the Lord will not spare him. The divine anger will burn high in indignation

¹ Literally, 'that you may know that I, the Lord, am your God'.

² This seems to be a proverb, which reads in the Hebrew text, 'to carry off the well-watered with the thirsty'. The idolater forcees that the whole people will suffer for his guilt, having probably in the mean time imitated his bad example.

against such a man, and all the curses of which this book makes mention will fall upon him, till the Lord has effaced his memory among living men, singled him out among the whole people of Israel for a miserable end, for every curse that gives this law and covenant its sanction.

21 A warning that land will be, which the Lord so visits with plague and affliction; a warning to the next generation, and their children after them, and to strangers who come from far off to see it.¹ Here is a land he has burnt up with brimstone and salty fumes, till it is sown no more and no green thing grows there, overwhelmed as he overwhelmed Sodom and Gomorrah, Adama and Seboim, when his anger raged fierce against them. And all will ask, Why has the Lord treated this land so? What means this anger, this terrible vengeance of his? And the answer will come, It was because they forsook the covenant which the Lord had made with their fathers when he rescued them out of the land of Egypt; because they enslaved themselves to the worship of alien gods unknown to them, gods that were no gods of theirs. That is why the Lord's vengeance fell heavy on this land, and he brought on them all the curses which the book of his law contained, so hot his anger burned, so fierce his indignation; dispossessing them of their own land and banishing them into a country of strangers, for all to see.

29 The Lord our God keeps his own secrets; what he will reveal, he has revealed to us, and to our children in perpetuity; ours to live by this law and by all the terms of it.

30 And perhaps when thou hast had experience of all this, and hast met first the blessing and then the curse I have here pronounced before thee, thou wilt feel compunction of heart, there in thy exile among the countries where the Lord has scattered thee, and wilt turn back to him again. Once more thou and thy children will be true, heart and soul, to those commandments of his which I have enjoined upon thee. And the Lord, in pity, will restore thee from banishment, will gather in those sons of thine from the lands in which he has dispersed them. Yes, though they should be sundered far apart as pole from pole, the Lord thy God will bring them back again, summoning them to return and take possession of the land where their fathers dwelt; granting them his blessing, till they are more in number than ever their fathers were. He will rid thy heart, and the hearts of thy children, of all defilement, and thou wilt find life in loving the Lord thy God, heart and soul; the curse he laid upon thee he will lay upon thy enemies instead, upon the men who would hate and persecute thee. So thou shalt return to thy obedience, listening to the Lord thy God and carrying out all the commandments I am giving thee this day; and the Lord thy God will prosper thee in all thy enterprises, children born to thee, thy cattle and thy lands fruitful, all things thine in abundance. Once more the Lord will take delight in blessing his people, as he did in their fathers' days; but only if thou wilt obey him, and hold fast to the commandments and observances this law contains, returning heart and soul to him, thy Lord and thy God.

It is not above thy reach, it is not beyond thy compass, this duty which I am now enjoining upon thee. It is not a secret laid up in heaven, that thou must needs find someone to scale heaven and bring it down to thee before thou canst hear what it is, and obey it. It is not an art, practised far overseas, that thou must wait for some one to go voyaging and bring it back to thee before thou canst learn to live by it. No, this message of mine is close to thy side; it rises to thy lips, it is printed on thy memory; thou hast only to fulfil it.

See, I have set before thee this day a choice between life and death, between good fortune and ill. Thou art to love the Lord thy God and follow the path he has chosen for thee, to hold fast by all his commandments and observances and decrees, if thou wouldst live and thrive and prosper through him in the land that is to be thy home. If thy heart becomes estranged from him, so that thou dost no longer obey him, but art tempted away into worshipping other gods and doing them service, then I warn thee here and now that it will be thy ruin; the land thou art winning for thyself on the other side of Jordan will be thine only for a little.

19 I call heaven and earth to witness this day that I have set such a choice before thee, life or death, a blessing or a curse. Wilt thou not choose life, long life for thyself

20 and for those that come after thee? Wilt thou not learn to love the Lord thy God, and obey him, and keep close to his side? Thou hast no life, no hope of long continuance, but in him; shall not the land which he promised as a gift to thy fathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, be thine to dwell in?

31 All this Moses obediently proclaimed to the people of Israel; and then he said to them, Here am I, a man of a hundred and twenty years of age, no longer fit to lead you on your expeditions; and besides, the Lord has told me that I am not destined to cross yonder stream of Jordan. It is the Lord your God that will lead you across, it is he that will dispossess all these nations to make room for you; and he has chosen Josue here to march at your

4 head. These nations are to fare no better than the Amorrhite kings, Schon and Og; the Lord means to overthrow them, and you, when he gives you the victory over them, must remember what I told you, and make an end of them. Play the man, and keep your courage high; there must be no cowardice, no flinching before them. The Lord your God is himself your leader now; he will not play you false and forsake

7 you. Then Moses summoned Josue, and said to him in the presence of all Israel, Play the man, and keep thy courage high; it is thy task to lead this nation into the land which the Lord promised to their fathers, and divide it up between them.

8 The Lord goes with thee to lead this army of thine; he will not play thee false and forsake thee; there must be no cowardice, no flinching here.

9 And now Moses committed this law to writing, and gave it to the priests of Levi's race, bearers of the ark that attested the Lord's covenant, and to the elders of Israel. Every seven years, he told them, when the year of discharge comes round, and with it the feast of Tent-dwelling, at the time when all Israel meets in the place the Lord has chosen, to present themselves before him, their Lord and God, the terms of this law must be read out in the presence and in the hearing of the whole people. All alike will be assembled there, not only men but women and children, and the aliens too that dwell among you; all alike must listen, and learn to fear the Lord your God, and carry out faithfully all the terms of this law. The very children, still all untaught, must listen now, and learn to fear the Lord their God, as long as this land you are winning for yourselves beyond Jordan is their home.

After this the Lord said to Moses, Thou hast not long to live; summon Josue, and take him with thee to meet me at the tabernacle; I have a charge to give him. So Moses and Josue took their stand together beneath the tabernacle that attested the covenant, and there the Lord appeared in a pillar of cloud that rose above them at the tabernacle door. And the Lord said to Moses, Thou wilt be laid to rest among thy fathers, and before long this people of mine, settled now in the land they have invaded, will begin to play the wanton, and to worship alien gods; will forsake me, and cancel their covenant with me. Then my anger will burn fiercely indeed; I will forsake them in my turn, and deny them my favour, and they will fall a prey to woes and afflictions of every sort, until at last they begin to say, It is because the Lord is no longer with us that we are encountering afflictions such as these. And still I will hide myself, and turn no glance towards them, to punish them for their wickedness in betaking themselves to alien gods. I would have you, then, set down a song in writing, and teach the people to know it by heart and sing it; a song that will vindicate me against the sons of Israel. I mean to settle them in this land that is all milk and honey, my promised gift to their fathers; and they will no sooner have eaten their fill and grown fat on it, than they will turn to alien gods and worship them; they will defy me, and annul their covenant with me. Woes and afflictions will come upon them, and it is then that this song, still remembered by their posterity, will vindicate me against them. So Moses put the song in writing, and taught it to the men of Israel.

23 The Lord also gave a charge to Josue, the son of Nun, Play the man, and keep thy courage high; it is thy task to settle the sons of Israel in the land I have promised to give them, and I will be with thee in the doing of it.

24 And now, when Moses had finished his work of setting forth the terms of this law in a book, he gave orders to the Levites, that carried the ark of the Lord, what they should do with it. Take this book, he said, and lay it up by the side of the ark that bears witness of the Lord's covenant, to vindicate him against you. I know well how rebellious you are, how stiff-necked; even in my life-time, and in spite of my presence among you, you have always been rebelling against the Lord, and when I am dead, worse must follow. Summon the elders and counsellors among all the tribes, and let me say my say in their hearing; let me call upon heaven and earth to bear witness against them. I know well enough that when I am dead you will ruin all, and it will not be long before you stray from the path I have shewed you; and I know that when the Lord sees you living amiss, and provoking his anger by your doings, calamity will fall upon you in the end.

30 And so Moses, with the whole assembly of Israel listening to him, pronounced the words of the song which follows, never pausing until it was all finished.

32 Listen, you heavens, while I have my say; earth, be attentive to the words I utter; here is teaching big with import as the rain, here are warnings that must soak in like the dew, wholesome as showers are to the grass, as moisture to the growing crops. The renown of the Lord shall be my theme; to our God belongs majesty; the God who shelters us, how perfect is all he does, how right are all his dealings! God, faithful and unerring, God, holy and just! And these, his sons, are lost to him, his sons no longer in their defilement; a generation of false aims and rebellious will. What, reckless still, inconsiderate still! Is this the return thou wouldst make to that father who calls thee his own, that creator who fashioned thee? Cast thy mind back to old days; nay, trace the record of each succeeding generation; ask thy father what news he has to tell, thy forefathers, what word they have for thee. The Ruler of all has divided the nations apart, sundering Adam's children and giving to each people its own home, peoples as numerous as the sons that sprang from Israel;¹ but one was the Lord's treasured possession, his own people; it was Jacob he had marked out for his own domain.

He sought them out in the wilderness, there in the fearful desert spaces, gave them the guidance, taught them the lessons they needed, guarded them as if they had been the apple of his eye. (So the eagle that would incite its young to venture in the air now hovers above them, now spreads its wings and takes them up to rest on its own shoulders.) None but the Lord was their guide on that journey, there was no alien god to be found then in their company. And afterwards he settled them in a country of high hills, where they could eat the food their own lands yielded. Honey oozed from its rocks, on its barren uplands the olive could flourish; cheese from the herd, milk was theirs from the flock, the flesh of well-fed lamb and ram, cattle of Basan's breed, and he-goats; they ate the choicest wheat, drank the heady juice of the grape.

A people so well loved! And now, pampered, they would throw off the yoke. Pampered, full-fed, swollen with pride, they forsook that divine creator, revolted against their deliverer. He must endure the rivalry of alien worship, must look on indignantly at their detestable doings. Not to their God they offered sacrifice, but to devils, to gods yet untried, upstart gods of yesterday, whom their fathers never held in awe. What, forsake the sheltering Power that gave thee birth, forget the very Lord who created thee? The Lord was roused to anger when he saw it, saw his own sons and daughters defying him. I will turn away from them, he said, and see what comes of it; here is a rebellious race, a thankless brood. They have deserted me for a god that was no god, phantoms have been my rivals; now I will desert them in my turn, for a people that is no people of mine; their rivals shall be men as impious as themselves.

My anger shall be like a raging fire that burns down to the depths of the abyss, that consumes earth and all that earth yields, scorches the very roots of the hills. I mean to heap all my plagues upon them, exhaust all the arrows of my vengeance. What famine shall gnaw them, what winged terrors eat them up with destructive fangs! I will send wild beasts, too, to prey on them, poisonous serpents shall creep upon them through the dust. Havoc without, terror within doors; for man and maid, for infancy and old age, the same doom! Indeed, I had thought to make away with them altogether, blot out their very name from all human remembrance; but no, I held my hand; were these enemies of theirs to provoke me with taunts? Should the victors boast it was their own power, not mine, that had won the day?

How lost they are to right judgement, this people of Israel, how slow of discernment! Ah, if they would only take thought, and read their lesson, and foresee what is still far away! When they see their thousands put to rout by one man, ten thousand fleeing with two men in pursuit, can they doubt what is the cause of it? It means their own God has relinquished them; that the Lord's decree has given their enemy the mastery; that enemy himself will bear witness that his gods are no match for our God. Does he enjoy my favour? No, says the Lord,¹ he is but a wild vine, such as grows in Sodom, or in the purlieus of Gomorrhah, yielding grapes like gall, clusters of bitterness, yielding wine like the adder's venom, the rankling poison of the viper. Be sure that I keep the record of his wickedness stored away under seal in my treasure house; vengeance is for me; I will repay when the time comes. A slip of the foot, and ruin is upon them; little waiting now before the appointed day comes.

Never doubt it, the Lord will give his people redress, will take pity on his servants, when he sees their strength so spent, the number of them so dwindled, whether bond or free. He will ask, What has become of those gods of yours, once so well trusted, that shared, once, the fat of your victims, the wine you poured in libation? Will they not bestir themselves, and come to your aid, protect you in your hour of need? Now you shall learn that I alone am God; there are no others to rival me; it is mine to kill and to quicken, mine to smite and to heal; from my power there is no deliverance. See, I lift up my hand, and swear by my own eternal being that I am whetting this bright sword of mine, to execute speedy judgement; I mean to take vengeance, now, on my enemies, requite them for all their malice. Now to glut my arrows with their blood, now to flesh this sword of mine with the slaughter of my enemies, warriors slain in battle and unhelmeted captives! Do honour, you nations, to the Lord's people; he means to avenge the blood of his servants, to punish their enemies, to be reconciled once again with the land of Israel.

So when Moses had performed his errand, reciting the whole of this song in the hearing of the assembled people, with Josue the son of Nun at his side, he made an end of all his long discourse to the Israelites, in these words, Pay good heed to the appeal I have made to you this day, and hand it on to your children, bidding them hold fast to all the terms of this law and carry them out faithfully. These duties are not lightly enjoined on you; to every man of you they are life itself. Only by performing them can you hope for long enjoyment of this land across Jordan which is to be your home.

It was on the same day that the Lord said to Moses, Climb this mountain of Abarim (that is, of the Further Side; it is the same as mount Nebo, in the Moabite country opposite Jericho), and view the land of Chanaan, which I mean to give the sons of Israel for their own. On that mountain thou art to die. This height climbed, thou must needs become a part of thy people, as thy brother Aaron died and became a part of his people on Mount Hor. You disobeyed me, in full sight of the whole people, at the Water of Rebellion in the desert of Sin, when you did not vindicate my holiness before the sons of Israel.

¹ These words are not expressed in the original, but have to be understood if we are to follow the train of thought.

 52 Thou shalt have sight, nevertheless, of this land which is my gift to the Israelites, the land it shall not be thine to enter.

33 And this is the blessing which God's servant Moses gave to the sons of Israel before he died.¹ See where the Lord comes forth, he said, from Sinai, where he rises high above the hills of Edom before us, dawns on us from mount Pharan; thousands of his holy ones were about him, and on his right hand his law shone to them like fire. How he loves those tribes of his! All his holy ones dwell in his protecting care, can gather at his feet, and partake of his instruction. We had a law given to us by Moses, the heirloom of Jacob's posterity, and our king dwelt among us, his favoured people, with the chieftains and all the tribes of Israel assembled about him.
 6 Let Ruben live on, never wasting away yet never growing populous.
 7 And this was Judah's blessing. Listen, Lord, to Judah's plea, and restore him to his place among the people, so that he may fight for it and defend it against its enemies.
 8 And of Levi he said, The touchstones of Wisdom and Truth are for the man thou hast set apart, testing him at the place of Challenge, proving his worth at the Water of Rebellion.² This is one who said to his father and mother, You are no acquaintance of mine, and to his brethren, I do not recognize you. Here are men that treated their own children as strangers, paying heed rather to thy warnings, keeping true to thy covenant; Here, they said to Jacob, are the decrees thou must obey, here, Israel, is the law that governs thee. When thou art angry, Lord, it is theirs to offer incense, and burn sacrifice upon thy altar.
 11 Bless all he has, Lord, and prosper all he does; smite his enemies and put them to rout, never let them rise up again to plot against him.

¹ There is much disagreement about the interpretation of the Hebrew text in this chapter, and it may even be defective (the tribe of Simeon, for instance, is not mentioned). In many places the Latin version differs considerably. ² It is not clear why the tribe of Levi is here described as having distinguished itself on the occasion recorded in Ex. 17; cp. Ex. 32. 26-28. ³ Literally 'on his shoulders', but the Hebrew word used also applies to slopes of ground, and it is pointed out that Jerusalem stood actually on the frontier between Juda and Benjamin. ⁴ It is not clear what ruler (literally 'teacher') is referred to; some think there is an allusion to Moses' own grave, which, however, must have been in the territory of Ruben.

Moses blesses the twelve Tribes severally

Of Benjamin he said, First in the Lord's love, he shall dwell secure in that companionship. God will spread his pavilion over him at all times, rest on those hills.³

Of Joseph he said, His is a land rich in blessing from the Lord, enriched with dew by the heavens above us, with springs by the depth beneath, enriched by ripening suns and engendering moons, enriched by every influence of ancient mountains and immemorial hills, enriched by earth and all the foison earth yields. Let the blessing of that God who once appeared in the bush light upon the head of Joseph, light on his brow who is separated like a Nazirite from his brethren. What is the pride of the first-born bull-calf, or of the wild ox, but his two horns? Such horns has Joseph, that can toss nations to the ends of the earth; the hordes of Ephraim, the legions of Manasses!

Of Zabulon he said, Happy art thou, Zabulon, and thou too, Issachar, at home and abroad. Peoples shall be their guests on the mountain height, where their solemn sacrifice is offered. The wealth of the sea shall foster them, the treasures that lie hidden in the sands.

Of Gad he said, Blessed is Gad in the breadth of his lands; he lies there like a lion, ready to take head and arm for his prey. He too has achieved eminence; did not those lands of his enshrine such a ruler as took his part among the chiefs of the people, executing the Lord's justice, his decrees concerning Israel?⁴

Of Dan he said, Dan is a lion's whelp; a torrent that comes down in full flood from Basan.

Of Nephthali he said, Nephthali shall enjoy great plenty, be rich in the Lord's blessings; seaward and southward he shall extend his frontiers.

Of Aser he said, Aser is a son highly favoured; let him stand well with his brethren; let him have oil to wash his feet in, iron and bronze to make shoes for him. Let thy age be peaceful as thy youth.

The beloved people has a God great as no other; he rides in heaven to deliver thee, the clouds making way for his majestic coming; there, on high, is his dwelling, and yet the eternal arms reach down to uphold thee. He will dispossess the enemy at thy onslaught, and doom him to destruction; Israel shall live unmolested, Jacob shall see no rival near him, in a land full of corn and wine, under skies curtained with dewy mist. Blessed, Israel, thou art, a people like no other, finding in the Lord thy deliverance, the shield that protects thee, the sword that wins thee renown! Thy enemies shall forswear their enmity, and thou shalt tread their pride in the dust.¹

34 And so Moses went up from the Moabite plain on to mount Nebo, the peak of Phasga that rises opposite Jericho. And the Lord shewed him all the territory of Gad right up to Dan, and all Nephthali, and the country Ephraim and Manasses were to hold, and the whole land of Juda, with the sea coast for its frontier; the south, too, and the plain that stretches from Jericho, among its palm trees, up to Segor. This, the Lord told him, is the land of which I spoke to Abraham, Isaac and

Jacob, promising to give it to their race. I have granted thee the sight of it; enter it thou mayst not.

There, then, in the land of Moab, 5 Moses died, the Lord's servant, still true 6 to the Lord's bidding. And there the 6 Lord buried him, in a valley belonging to 7 the Moabite country that looks towards 7 Phogor; but where his tomb is, remains to 7 this day unknown. He was a hundred and 7 twenty years old when he died, and still his 7 eyes had not grown dim, and his teeth 8 stood firm.² And the sons of Israel 8 mourned for him thirty days, there in the 8 plains of Moab.

And now the days of mourning for 9
Moses had come to an end, and Josue the 9 son of Nun, full of the gift of wisdom since 9 Moses laid hands on him, took command 9 of the Israelites; and they obeyed him, as 9 the Lord through Moses had bidden them. 10
There was never such another prophet in 10 Israel as Moses; what other man was the 10 Lord's familiar, meeting him face to face? 11
Were ever such wonders and portents as 11 the Lord empowered this man to perform 11 in Egypt, till Pharaoh and all his court and 11 kingdom obeyed the Lord's will perforce? 12 Were ever such great miracles done as 12
Moses did, for all Israel to see?

¹ Literally, according to the Hebrew text, the last sentence reads 'Thy enemies shall cringe before thee, and thou shalt trample on their high places'; in the Latin version, 'Thy enemies shall deny thee, and thou shalt trample on their necks'.
² 'His teeth', so the Latin version; the Hebrew word used probably means 'his vigour'.

THE BOOK OF JOSUE

HIS servant Moses dead, the Lord gave a charge to Josue, son of Nun, that till now had waited on Moses' needs. Now that my servant Moses is dead, he told him, it is for thee to cross yonder stream of Jordan, taking the Israelites with thee into the land I am giving them for their own. My promise to Moses holds good; there is no piece of ground your feet shall tread but I will make it yours, all the Hethite country, that has the desert, and Lebanon, and the great river Euphrates, and the open sea on the west for its frontiers. While thou yet livest, there shall be no withstanding Israel's onset; I will be with thee as with Moses, never leave nor let thee. Courage, then, play the man; thy task is to divide up this land between the tribes, my promised gift to their fathers. Play the man thou must, and keep thy courage high, carrying out faithfully the law my servant Moses enjoined on thee; never swerve to right or left, and thou shalt order thy life truly. The law thou hast in writing must govern every utterance of thine; night and day thou must ponder over it, so as to carry out all the terms of it faithfully; so wilt thou guide thy steps truly and prosper. Courage and a man's part, that is what I ask of thee; no room for fear and shrinking back, when the Lord thy God is at thy side wherever thou goest. And now Josue bade the chieftains make their way through the midst of the camp, giving the people orders to prepare themselves food; in two days' time they were to cross the Jordan and set about conquering the land which the Lord would make their home. And he warned Ruben and Gad, and the separate half of Manasses, Do not forget the message that was given you by Moses, the Lord's own servant. The Lord your God, he told you, has granted you secure possession of all that is yours. In that land which Moses assigned to you beyond Jordan your wives and children and cattle shall await you, while you that are warriors go over in the van of your brethren, and fight in their cause. A day will come when the Lord your God will give them, too, undisturbed possession of their appointed home; then you shall go back and settle in your own lands, where the Lord's servant Moses assigned them to you, east of Jordan. And they answered, We will do all thy bidding, go out upon all thy errands, obey thee as we obeyed Moses in all things. And may the Lord thy God be with thee, as he was with Moses. Whoever thwarts thy will or refuses to obey any order of thine shall die for it; courage, then, play the man.

2 Josue was at Setim; and from Setim he despatched two of his men on a secret errand, bidding them survey the country opposite, and the city of Jericho. These had made their way into the house of a harlot, called Rahab, and were lodging there, when news came to the king of Jericho that spies from the camp of Israel had crept in under cover of darkness; and he sent word to Rahab, bidding her bring out the men she was harbouring; they were spies, come to search out every corner of the land. Her first act was to hide the two men away; then she made answer, True enough, they were here; I had no means of knowing whence they came. But when darkness fell, and the gates were a-shutting, they crept out, both of them. I cannot tell what way they took, but if you give chase at once you will catch them. Meanwhile, she had taken them up to the roof of her house, and covered them over with the stems of flax that lay there. Men were sent out in pursuit along the road that leads to the Jordan ford; and as soon as these had gone out, the gates were shut behind them.

The two men had not yet fallen asleep in their hiding-place when the woman came up on to the roof and spoke to them. Past all doubt, she said, the Lord means to give you the mastery; your coming has spread terror amongst us, and there are faint hearts everywhere in the land. The story has reached us, how the Lord dried up the waters of the Red Sea, when you marched through it out of Egypt, how you conquered Sehon and Og, the two Amorrite kings that reigned beyond Jordan, and made an end of them. You see daunted men, cowards with no heart left in them to withstand your onslaught. This Lord who is your God must be the God that rules in heaven above us, and in the world that lies beneath it. And now I have done you a kindness; swear to me by this Lord of yours that you will repay it to me and mine. Pledge yourselves faithfully to grant me the safety of my father and mother, my brethren and my sisters, with all that is theirs; that our lives shall be spared in the slaughter. Keep our secret, said they, and our lives shall answer for yours. When the Lord makes us masters of thy country, we will remember and spare. So she let them down by a rope from the window of her house, which was built into the city wall. Take refuge in the hills, she told them, or you may meet the pursuers returning. Hide there for three days, until they are back again; then you may go safely on your way.

And they said to her, The oath we have given thee shall be binding only on one condition. When we march in, the signal we shall look for will be this red rope of thine; tie it to the same window from which thou hast let us down. Father and mother, brethren and sisters, and all thy kindred, must be gathered together in thy house; any of them that leaves thy door brings death on his own head; we are not answerable. Only if harm should befall those who are with thee in the house shall our lives be forfeit. And if thou shouldst betray us, by making known the news thou hast of us, then the oath we have given thee binds us no longer. Be it as you say, Rahab answered; and so she left them to go on their way, and hung the scarlet rope in the window.

The men walked on till they reached the hill country, and waited there till their pursuers came back, that had searched all along the road without finding them. When these were safely in the city again, the spies came down again from the hills, and crossed the Jordan to find Josue the son of Nun. And when they had told him how it had fared with them, this was the report they gave; The Lord has put all this country at our mercy; every heart in it is faint with fear.

3 When the morrow dawned, Josue and the men of Israel moved camp, from Setim to the banks of the Jordan. Here they waited three days, and then the heralds went out through the midst of the camp, and made this proclamation: When you see the priests of Levi's race on the march, carrying the ark of the Lord your God, you yourselves must follow behind them, keeping it in distant view; so you shall know what path to take, a path you have not trodden before. But leave a space of two thousand cubits between the ark and yourselves; not for you the neighbourhood of the ark. And Josue bade the people keep themselves free from defilement; the Lord was preparing to do a miracle next day in their midst. Then he bade the priests take up the ark that bore record of the covenant, and march on; and they, at his bidding, took it up and began leading the way. This day, the Lord said to Josue, I mean to win thee renown for all Israel to see; they shall learn that he who went with Moses goes now with thee. Bid the priests who are bearing the ark wade out a little into the waters of Jordan, and halt there.

So Josue said to the Israelites, Come close, and listen to the message the Lord your God sends you. And then, Here is proof that the living presence of the Lord God is among you; proof that he means to dispossess Chanaanite and Hethite, Hevite and Pherezite, Gergesite and Jebusite and Amorrite at your coming. Here is the ark ready to cross the Jordan at your head, that ark which bears record of your covenant with the Lord of all the earth; you must choose out twelve men, one from each tribe of Israel, to witness it.¹ And when the priests set foot in the waters of Jordan, bearing his ark who is Lord of the whole earth, the stream below them will pass on and be lost to sight; the stream above will check its flow, heaped up in a single mass of water.

¹ 'To witness it'; these words are not expressed in the original, but may perhaps be inferred from the context.

14 So the people left their encampment to go across Jordan, the priests who carried 15 the ark marching at their head. And when these began wading out, as soon as their feet were under water (it was harvest time, and the Jordan had risen to the full height 16 of its banks), the stream above them halted in its course. Far up, all the way from the city of Adom to the place called Sarthan, these upper waters looked like a swelling mound; and the waters below flowed on into the Desert Sea, that is now called the Dead Sea, till they disappeared altogether.
 17 And so the people marched on to the assault of Jericho; the priests, carrying the Lord's ark, stood there with loins girt in the middle of the Jordan on dry ground, while the whole people went past over the dry bed of the stream.

4 And when they had crossed over, the 2 Lord bade Josue choose out twelve 3 men, one from each tribe; each was to pick out a solid stone from the river-bed, where the feet of the priests had stood, and these must be set up to mark the place where they encamped that night. So Josue summoned twelve men, whom he had chosen out to represent the twelve tribes of Israel;
 4 Go half-way across Jordan, he told them, to where the ark of the Lord your God stands, and bring me thence on your shoulders one stone each of you, one for each of the 5 tribes of Israel. They are to serve you for a monument; your children, before long, will be asking you, What is the meaning of 6 these stones? And you will be able to answer, When the ark that bears record of the Lord's covenant went across the Jordan, the waters dried up at its coming; that is why these stones have been set up here, to remind Israel of that crossing for 7 all time. The Israelites did as Josue bade them; carried the twelve stones from the river-bed, one for each tribe, as the Lord had commanded, and set them down in the 8 camp. Josue also marked the place, full in the bed of Jordan, where the priests and the ark had halted; here, too, he set up twelve stones, which are there to this day.
 10 Meanwhile, such was the divine command Josue had received through Moses, the priests must stand there in the river-bed till all was over.¹ So the people marched on speedily enough; not till all had reached the other side could the ark of the Lord cross, and the priests take their place at the head of the people. Ruben and Gad and half Manasses must send their warriors in the van of Israel, as Moses bade them; company after company, file after file, these in their turn went past, forty thousand fighting men, into the level plain that lies before the city of Jericho. That day, the Lord would win renown for Josue for all Israel to see; he was to be feared as Moses was feared in life. And now the Lord had a fresh command for him, Bid the priests that are carrying the ark come out of the Jordan. The word was given, and they came up, carrying the ark with them; and no sooner had they set foot on dry ground than the stream filled its bed again, flowing past as before.

On the tenth day of the first month the people left Jordan behind them, and encamped at Galgal, east of the city of Jericho. Here, at Galgal, Josue set up the twelve stones they had taken out of the river-bed. And he said to the Israelites, It will not be long before sons are asking their fathers the question, What is the meaning of these stones? And you will hand on the lesson to them: Israel once crossed over Jordan yonder dry-shod. The Lord your God dried up its waters in full view of Israel, to let them pass over, just as in earlier times he dried up the Red Sea, when it lay in our path. So all the nations of the world were to learn how strong the power of the Lord is, and you too should fear the Lord your God continually.

5 So the news went abroad among the kings of the Amorrites, who dwelt on the west of Jordan, and the Chanaanite kings by the coast of the great sea, that the Lord had dried up the stream of Jordan to let the Israelites go across. And now their hearts failed them, and their spirits were altogether daunted, such terror was theirs at the coming of Israel.

It was at this time the Lord said to Josue, Have knives made of flint, and restore the rite of circumcision among the sons of Israel. So he did as the Lord bade him, and restored circumcision to Israel at the Hill of the Foreskins. There was need to renew this rite, because the men of the older generation, who were of age to bear arms at the time of the escape from Egypt, had died in the course of their desert wanderings. These had all been circumcised, but the generation which had been born during those forty years in the waste wilderness, remained uncircumcised still. Those rebels, the Lord had sworn it, must never reach the land that was all milk and honey; now they lay dead, and their sons had taken their places. For these Josue must renew the rite, men who had grown up uncircumcised through the neglect that came with days of wandering. So all were circumcised, and they lay encamped there till their wounds healed; This day, the Lord said to Josue, I have reversed the lot that made you slaves in Egypt; and so the place came to be called Galgal, Turning Round, the name it still bears.¹

In Galgal, then, the Israelites remained encamped, and there they celebrated the pasch on the plains of Jericho, beginning at evening on the fourteenth day of the month. And when they ate unleavened bread on the morrow, they were eating corn that was grown on the ground where they stood; their flour was made of that year's harvest. Once they had begun to enjoy their own harvest, the supply of manna ceased, nor did the sons of Israel ever taste that food again; they ate the crops which the land of Chanaan yielded that year.

There, in the plain by Jericho, Josue looked up and saw a man who stood with drawn sword in his path. Coming close to him, he asked, Art thou of our camp, or of the enemy's? Nay, said he, it is the captain of the Lord's army that has come to thy side. And with that, Josue cast himself down, face to ground; What message hast thou, my Lord, for thy servant? he asked. But first he was commanded to take the shoes off his feet, as one that stood on holy ground; so he did as he was bidden.

6 Already Jericho was bolted and barred against the approach of Israel, so that there was no entering or leaving it, and now the Lord promised to make Josue master of it, with its king and all its defenders. Once a day, he said, you will march round the city walls, every man of you that bears arms, for six days together. And on the seventh day do as follows. The priests will be carrying seven trumpets, such as are used at jubilee time, and marching with these in front of the ark that bears witness of my covenant. On this day you will go round the city seven times, to the sound of the trumpets the priests are carrying.² And when the trumpets blow a long blast that rises and falls, the whole people, on hearing it, must raise a loud cry; at that cry, the walls of the city will fall down flat, and each man will go in to the assault at the place where he is posted.

So Josue the son of Nun summoned the priests and gave them their orders; how some were to carry the ark of the Lord, and seven others march before it with the trumpets of jubilee; then he bade the people march round the city, fully armed, in front of the ark. When Josue had finished speaking, the seven priests blew their seven trumpets before the ark, and all the fighting men went fully armed in front of it, while the rest of the people followed; and the blast of the trumpets echoed all around. Josue had warned the people not to cry out or utter any sound until the day came when he should bid them cry aloud. So that day the ark of the Lord went round the city once, and was brought back to the camp, where it rested. And when the next day dawned, Josue was astir, and the priests took up the ark, seven of them carrying the seven jubilee trumpets and blowing them before the ark as they went, with the fighting men in the van and the rest of the people behind, marching to the noise of

² The Latin version seems to imply that the trumpets were to be carried only on the seventh day; but see verse 8 below. The Hebrew text has 'seven priests will carry seven trumpets'.

15 Thus the six days passed, and on the seventh day they rose at dawn and went round the city seven times, as they were bidden. And when the priests were ready to blow their trumpets on the seventh journey, Josue gave word to the whole of Israel, Now you are to shout; the Lord has put the city in your power. This city and all it contains is forfeit to the Lord; none must be spared except the harlot Rahab and those in her house. She it was that harboured the spies we sent out. Beware of touching anything that lies under the ban; that were sin in you, and trouble would come upon the whole camp of Israel through your guilt. All the gold and silver, all that is made of bronze or iron, must be consecrated to the Lord and laid up in his treasure-house.

20 Then the people cried aloud, and still the trumpets blew, till every ear was deafened by the shouting and the clangour; and all at once the walls fell down flat. Thereupon each man went to the assault where he was posted, and they took the city. All that was in it they slew, sparing neither man nor woman, neither youth nor age; even cattle and sheep and asses were put to the sword. But now Josue said to the two men who had been sent out as spies, Make your way into the house of the harlot yonder, and bring her out, with all that is hers; such was the sworn promise you gave her. So the two men went in, and brought Rahab out with her parents and her kindred and all that belonged to her, giving this family of hers lodging, but not in the camp of Israel. Then they burned the city and all that was in it, except the silver and gold and what was made of bronze or iron; these they laid up as consecrated in the Lord's treasury. But Josue spared the harlot Rahab, with all her father's household and all that was hers; and to this day her posterity finds a home in Israel. So well was she rewarded for hiding away those two spies of his in Jericho.

26 At this time Josue laid the place under a ban; May the Lord's curse, he said, light on the man that restores the city of Jericho and builds it up again. The foundations will cost him his first-born, and the gates of it his youngest son.

And the Lord stood at Josue's side, till his fame spread abroad all over the land.

7 But now Israel broke its faith by turning the forfeited plunder to their own use. Achan, a man of Juda, descended from Zare through Charmi and Zabdi, took some of the plunder for himself, and God was angry with the people of Israel. From Jericho, Josue sent a party of men over to Hai (which is close by Bethaven, eastwards from Bethel), bidding them survey its territory; and they, when they had finished their task at Hai, gave a confident report: There is no need for the whole people to take part in the attack. Send two or three thousand men to overthrow the city; it were idle to set a whole army toiling over a handful of enemies. So three thousand men went up to the assault and were soon put to rout. The men of Hai killed thirty-six of them, pursued them all the way to Sabarim, and fell upon them as they fled down the slopes.

Small wonder if the people lost heart and their courage ebbed away like water. Josue himself rent his garments, and fell down, face to earth, before the ark of God. There he lay till nightfall, and all the elders of Israel with him, defiling their heads with dust. Ah, Lord God, cried Josue, was it for this thou didst make the passage of Jordan so easy for us, to put us at the mercy of the Amorrites, and compass our ruin? Better had we remained at our old post beyond the Jordan. O Lord my God, that I should see Israel turn their backs before their enemies! Here are tidings will rally the Chanaanites and their neighbours to overwhelm us, so that our very name will be forgotten among men; and thy name, Lord? That great renown of thine?

But the Lord said to Josue, Rise up; why dost thou lie there, face to ground? Guilt rests on Israel; they have transgressed my covenant, by taking forfeited plunder for their own use; it has been stolen away secretly, and hidden among private goods. How should Israel withstand the enemy? Turn their backs they must so long as the curse lies on them; until you make an end of the guilty man, I will fight on your side no longer. Rise up, and bid the people cleanse themselves; tell them that to-morrow they must come into my presence undefiled. And give them this message from the Lord God of Israel: Israelites, you are harbouring forbidden spoil among you, and the guilty man must be destroyed before you can stand against your enemies. In the morning you will come before me tribe by tribe; and the tribe on which the lot falls will come before me clan by clan, until one household of that clan, and one man of that household is convicted. When he is convicted of such a crime, he and all that belongs to him must be given to the flames; he has transgressed the Lord's covenant, and brought a curse on Israel.

So, when the next day dawned, Josue brought forward the tribes of Israel one by one, and when Juda was chosen, the clans of Juda; and when Zare was chosen, the families of Zare; and when Zabdi was chosen, the household of Zabdi man by man. So at last the choice fell upon Achan, son of Charmi, son of Zabdi, son of Zare, of the tribe of Juda. And now Josue said to Achan, My son, accept the arbitrament of the Lord God of Israel; own thy fault and tell me, without concealment, what thou hast done. And Achan, in answer, told how he had sinned against the Lord God of Israel, told every circumstance of his fault. I saw among the plunder, said he, a fine scarlet cloak, and two hundred pieces of silver, and a bar of gold that weighed fifty sicles; and, coveting the possession of them, I buried them in the ground in the middle of my tent, hiding the money with the rest.

So Josue sent couriers to his tent, and there they found all he had hidden, the money with the rest; they brought it back from the tent to Josue and the whole assembly of Israel, and cast it down there in the Lord's presence. So Josue and the Israelites took Achan son of Zare to the valley of Achor, with the money and the cloak and the bar of gold, and his sons and daughters, his oxen, asses and sheep, his tent too with all that was in it. And there Josue said, Thou hast brought trouble on us, and now it is the Lord's turn to bring trouble on thee. And all the Israelites stoned him to death, and the flames burned all that was his. They raised a great heap 26 of stones over him, which stands there yet, to mark the place where the Lord's anger was appeased; and it is called the Valley of Achor, Trouble, to this day.

8 And now the Lord said to Josue, No need for terror and shrinking back. Take thy whole strength of fighting men with thee, and set about the conquest of Hai; king and people, city and territory, I mean to put them all in thy power. City 2 and king must be treated as thou didst treat city and king of Jericho; but here you may take the spoil and the cattle for yourselves. Lay an ambush on the further side of the city, and it is thine.

So Josue and all the fighting men set 3 about the conquest of Hai. At nightfall, he sent out thirty thousand, picked men all of them, with these orders: Lie in am- 4 bush on the further side of the city, no long distance away, ready for battle. I my- 5 self, commanding the rest of the army, will make a direct assault on it; and when they come out to engage us, we will turn our backs in flight, as we did before, so as to 6 draw them further and further away from the city in pursuit of us, routed (they will think) a second time. Our flight, and their 7 pursuit, is the signal for you to rise from your ambush and storm the city; the Lord your God will make you masters of it. 8 Once in possession, you will set fire to it. Be sure that you carry out these orders faithfully.

So he sent them on their way, and they 9 reached the place where they were to lie in wait, halting to the west of Hai, between it and Bethel. Josue himself spent that night with the main body of his army, and 10 when day dawned he called the muster-roll; then he went to the attack, he and the elders marching in the van, with their body-guard about them. They climbed the 11 heights opposite the city, and halted there to the north of it, with a valley in between. (Josue had now chosen out five thousand 12 of his men for the ambush west of Hai, towards Bethel, and all the rest of them 13 marched to the north, so that only the rearguard of that great host were near the western part of the city. That night Josue moved away, and took up his station half-way across the valley.)¹

14 The king of Hai, upon seeing this, hastened to the attack while the day was young, marching out with all his forces towards the desert, with no suspicion that 15 there was an ambush in the rear. Josue and the Israelites, in feigned alarm, left their ground and took to flight along the 16 road that leads to the desert. And the enemy, raising a great hue and cry, went in pursuit of them a long distance away 17 from the city. At last there was not a man left either in Hai itself or in Bethel who had not joined in the pursuit of the Israelites; and in sallying out they had left 18 the gates of both towns open. With that, the Lord said to Josue, Lift up the shield on thy arm, pointing towards the city of 19 Hai; it lies in thy power. And when he lifted his shield towards it, the men who lay there in ambush rose up all at once and made for the city, captured it and set it on fire.

20 And now the defenders looked back from their pursuit of Josue, and saw the smoke rising up to heaven. Refuge was none before or behind; at an end, now, the feigned flight and the retreat towards the desert; everywhere the pursuers met with 21 resistance. Josue and the main army had turned back to engage the men of Hai when they saw the city captured and the 22 smoke going up, and now the troops that had taken the city and burnt it came out to meet them, enclosing the enemy in between and cutting him down. Thus, attacking from both sides, they did not let a single man out of all that multitude 23 escape; the king of Hai himself was captured alive and brought to Josue. So died 24 all those who had pursued Israel on the desert road, slain on the field of battle; then the Israelites went back and made an 25 end of the city. In that one day all the citizens of Hai perished, men and women, 26 to the number of twelve thousand; Josue did not lower that arm of his which held up the shield till there were no more left dwelling at Hai. The Israelites divided up the cattle and the spoil, in pursuance of the command Josue had received; the city itself he left to burn, and become a ruin for ever, and the king he left hanging on a gibbet until evening came and the sun set. At Josue's bidding, they took his body down and laid it at the entrance of the city, covering it with a great heap of stones, which remains there to this day.

Then Josue built an altar to the Lord God of Israel on mount Hebal, in pursuance of the command given to Israel by God's servant Moses, when he wrote down the law; an altar of unpolished stones, that no iron tool had touched. On this he offered the Lord burnt-sacrifice, and slew victims by way of welcome-offering. He also inscribed on stone tablets that copy of the law which Moses wrote down in the presence of the people. And now all the people, with their elders, chieftains and judges, stood up in the presence of the priests that bore the ark, with its record of the Lord's covenant, some on this side, some on that, native Israelites and alien-born alike. In obedience to Moses' command half of them were on the side of mount Hebal, half on the side of mount Garizim. First Josue blessed the people of Israel,² and then he read aloud all the terms of the blessing and the curse, and all else that the book of the law contains. No command Moses gave was passed over, he repeated them all in the presence of Israel there assembled, with their wives and the children and the aliens who dwelt among them.

9 News of this was brought to all the other kings that lived west of Jordan, some in the hill country, some down on the plains, some on the coast by the shores of the open sea, or on the spurs of Lebanon. And all of them, Hethite and Amorrhite, Chanaanite and Pherezite, Hevite and Jebusite, made common cause against Josue and the people of Israel; all were minded to offer a common resistance, except the people of Gabaon. These, when they learned how Josue had destroyed Jericho and Hai, devised a policy of their own, and a crafty one. They provided themselves with food as if for a long journey, and this they put into old sacks, and their wine into skins that were tattered and patched, and loaded up their beasts with such things. Their shoes were worn out, and cobbled as old shoes would be, their clothes threadbare, the very bread they took with them for the journey dry and crumbling. In such guise, they made their way into the presence of Josue, who was then in camp at Galgal.

To him, and to the assembly of Israel, they gave out that they had come from far away, to make an alliance. The Israelites were in doubt of them; Neighbours more like, they said, dwelling in this land which is our home; we can have no alliance with you. So they turned to Josue and said, We await thy commands. And when he asked who they were and whence they had come, they answered, My Lord, we have come from a land far away, to do honour to the name of the Lord thy God. How strong a God, we learned from the story of all he did in Egypt, of all that befell the two Amorrhite kings beyond Jordan, Sehon king of Hesebon, and Og king of Basan, who reigned once at Astaroth. So the elders and the rest of our fellow-citizens bade us take provisions to last us through our travels, and come to meet you, assuring you of our humble duty and begging for an alliance. Only look at the bread we took with us, hot from the oven at home, when we set out to find you, how dry it is, how it crumbles after being kept so long! The new wine-skins we filled are all torn and leaking; the very clothes we wear, the very shoes on our feet, have worn out in our travels, and all but worn away.

The victuals passed from hand to hand, and the Lord was never asked for guidance. Josue gave them terms of peace, and made an alliance with them, promising that their lives should be spared; the chieftains, too, bound themselves to it by an oath, and it was not till the treaty had been three days in force, that they learned these men were close neighbours, and would share the land with them. The Israelites moved camp, and reached, two days later, the cities where these men dwelt, Gabaon and Caphira and Beroth and Cariathiarim. Shed blood they might not; had not the chieftains pledged themselves by an oath in the name of the Lord God of Israel? When the common folk assailed them with reproaches, the chieftains could only answer, We have taken an oath in the name of the Lord God of Israel; how can we touch them? Only one way is left; we must keep them alive, so as not to provoke the Lord's anger by forswearing ourselves, but they must live to hew wood and draw water for the needs of our company.

Such was the voice they gave; and thereupon Josue summoned the Gabaonites into his presence. What means this trick you have played on us, he asked, telling us you lived far away, when you are in truth our near neighbours? You shall lie under a ban; it shall ever be men of your race that hew wood and draw water for the house of the God whom I serve. And they answered, My Lord, we had heard of the promise made by the Lord thy God to his servant Moses, that he would give you all these lands for your own, and dispossess the inhabitants. In terror of our lives at your approach, we devised this stratagem. Now we are at thy mercy; do what seems best, do what seems right to thee. So Josue made good his word; he would not let Israel slay them, but there and then he decreed that they should undertake the service of the Lord's altar on behalf of the whole people, in the place of his choice, hewing wood and drawing water as they do to this day.

10 The king of Jerusalem, Adonisedec, was told of what had befallen; how Josue had taken Hai and overthrown it, making an end of city and king, there as at Jericho; how the Gabaonites had gone over to Israel and become their allies. And he was overcome with fear; this Gabaon was a great city, a royal capital, of more importance than Hai, and with brave warriors to defend it. So, from his palace at Jerusalem, Adonisedec sent envoys to Oham king of Hebron, Pharam king of Jerimoth, Japhia king of Lachis, and Dabir king of Eglon; Come and help me crush the Gabaonites, he said; they have made an alliance with Josue and the people of

- 5 Israel. So it was that these five Amorrhite kings, from Jerusalem, Hebron, Jerimoth, Lachis and Eglon, joined their forces and encamped before Gabaon, offering battle.
- 6 And a message came from the besieged city to Josue, who was still in his camp at Galgal: We are thy loyal servants, lose no time in coming to our aid. Hasten to our rescue and relief; all the Amorrhite kings of the hill country are banded together against us.
- 7 So Josue came up from Galgal with all his fighting men, that were tried warriors;
- 8 Have no fear, the Lord said to him, I am giving thee the mastery of them; none of them will have strength to withstand thy onslaught. So Josue made a night march
- 9 from Galgal, and fell upon the enemy un-10 awares. And the Lord threw them into confusion at the onslaught of Israel; great havoc Josue made of them there at Gabaon; then, going in pursuit along the road that leads up to Bethoron, he cut them
- 11 down all the way to Azeca and Maceda. As they fled in rout from the Israelites, down the slope from Bethoron, all the way to Azeca, the Lord sent great hail-stones down on them, so that more of them were killed by hail than by the weapons of Israel.
- 12 It was on this day, when the Lord left the Amorrhites powerless before Israel's attack, that Josue made that prayer of his to the Lord, crying out in the hearing of the people, Sun, that art setting over Gabaon, moon, that art rising in Aialon
- 13 valley, stand stricken with awe. Sun and moon stood awe-struck, while the people took vengeance on its enemies. (So the words can be found written in the Book of the Upright.) The sun stood in mid-heaven, and for a whole day long did not
- 14 haste to its setting. Never was so long a day before or since, as that day when the Lord listened to a human prayer, and
- 15 fought openly on the side of Israel.¹ (Then Josue and all the Israelites returned to their camp at Galgal.)²
- 16 Meanwhile, the five kings had fled, and hidden in a cave by the city of Maceda.
- 17 And Josue, when it was reported to him that the five kings were in hiding there,
- 18 bade his companions roll great stones up to the mouth of the cave, and set a close watch to see that the men imprisoned there did not escape. For yourselves, said he, do not linger here; pursue the enemy, cutting down every straggler you meet; do not let them reach the safety of their city walls, now that the Lord God has put them in your power. At last, when the enemy had suffered disastrous loss, and were all but exterminated, the survivors took refuge within their city ramparts, and the whole Israelite army returned to Maceda, where Josue had encamped, all safe and sound; none dared lift a hand against them as they went. And now Josue bade them clear the entrance of the cave and bring out the five kings from their hiding-place; and his command was obeyed; out they must come, the kings of Jerusalem, Hebron, Jerimoth, Lachis and Eglon, and be brought into his presence. Hereupon he gathered all Israel about him, and bade all the chieftains of his army go and set foot on the necks of these kings. And when they had come forward, and trampled on the necks of the kings as they lay there, he said to them, Who is afraid now? Who shrinks back now? Keep your courage high and play the man; such is the fate the Lord has decreed for all the enemies you are fighting against. Then Josue slew them with his own hand, and set their bodies up on five gibbets, to hang there till evening. At sunset he had them taken down from their gibbets and thrown into the cave which had been their hiding-place; and the great stones that were used to block the entrance may be seen there still.

The same day, Josue took Maceda and put its garrison to the sword; he slew its king, too, and all its citizens; not even a remnant was left alive; Maceda's king must fare like Jericho's. From Maceda he went on with all his forces to attack Lebna; of this, with its king, the Lord gave Israel mastery, so they put all its inhabitants to the sword, sparing none; Lebna's king, too, must go the way of Jericho's. From Lebna he marched in full strength to Lachis, which he invested and attacked; here, too, the Lord gave Israel the victory, so that they captured it next day; here, too, they put every living thing in it to the sword. At the same time Josue defeated Horam, king of Gazer, who had come to the aid of Lachis, and exterminated his whole people with him. From Lachis he marched to the siege of Eglon, and took it in a single day; and here, as at Lachis, he destroyed every living thing. Thence he led the whole of his forces on to attack Hebron; took it, gave it up to destruction; made an end of its king, and its subject towns, and all that dwelt there, leaving none alive; at Hebron, as at Eglon, all must be put to the sword. Then he turned back to Dabir, which he took and sacked; here too he made an end of its king and all its dependencies; none was spared in the general slaughter, and the king of Dabir fared no better than the kings of Hebron and Lebna.

¹ It is not clear where Josue's own words end, nor how much of verses 12-14 is a quotation from the book of Jasher, 'the Upright'; cf. II Kg. I. 18.

² Some think these words, identical with those of verse 43 below, have been inserted here by accident; cf. verse 21.

So Josue conquered all the hill-country of the south, and the plains, and the foothills, and overthrew the kings that reigned there; with the Lord God of Israel for his warrant, he left no trace of the folk who dwelt there, but killed every living thing that was to be found between Cades-Barne and Gaza. All the land of Gosen right up to Gabaon, the domain of so many kings, he took and laid waste with a single onslaught, so well did the Lord God of Israel fight in his cause. Then Josue and all the Israelites returned to their camp at Galgal.

11 At the news of all this, a summons went out from Jabin, king of Asor, to the king of Madon, Jobab, and the kings of Semeron and Achsaph, and all the kings of the north country, on the heights, and in the valley south of Ceneroth, in the plains, too, and the territories of Dor by the sea coast. Chanaanites from east and west, Amorrites and Hethites and Phezites and Jebusites from the hills, Hevites from the land of Maspha, close to the spurs of Hermon, all alike went out to battle with their armies, an array of men countless as is the sand by the sea shore, with horses too and chariots beyond all reckoning. The meeting-place for all these kings in their march against Israel was at the waters of Merom.

But the Lord said to Josue, Do not be afraid of them; by this time to-morrow they are all doomed to die at Israel's onslaught. Then thou wilt be able to hamstring those horses of theirs, give those chariots to the flames. So Josue with all his army made a sudden march to the waters of Merom, and there fell upon them; and the Lord gave Israel the mastery, so that they defeated the enemy and pursued them all the way to the famous town of Sidon, and the waters of Maserephoth, and eastwards to Masphe. So hard did Josue press them that none were left surviving; and then he did as the Lord had bidden him, hamstringing their horses and setting fire to their chariots. Then he turned back to Asor, which in old days was paramount among all these kingdoms; he put Jabin to the sword, and destroyed every living thing that dwelt there; no trace of them was left, all must be exterminated, and the city itself burned down. He conquered, too, the capitals of all the neighbouring kings, and destroyed them, as Moses, the Lord's servant, had bidden him, except those which stood among the mountains, or on steep hills;¹ Asor itself was the only well-defended city the Israelites burned down. The spoil and the cattle belonging to these cities they divided among themselves, but left no human creature alive. The Lord's bidding to Josue through Moses was carried out in full; no word of what the Lord had enjoined on Moses but Josue obeyed it.

It was Josue that conquered all the hill-country and the land south of it, the Gosen country and the low valleys, and the region west of them, the hill-country of Israel,² too, and the plain before it. These conquests of his extended from the slopes of the Edomite hills right up to Baalgad, on the Lebanon plain under mount Hermon; the kings, everywhere, were captured, and crushed, and slain. Long time must Josue spend campaigning against them; there was no city that surrendered to the Israelites, except the Hevite city of Gabaon, all the rest were reduced by force of arms. For indeed the Lord's purpose was that they should be stubborn-hearted, and be defeated by Israel in battle, with no claim to mercy; so that all might be destroyed, in pursuance of the command the Lord gave to Moses.

At this time, too, Josue made his way up into the mountain country, Hebron, Dabir, Anab, and all the mountain country both of Juda and Israel, to make an end of the Enacim and their cities. He left no trace of the breed of Enac in Israelite territory; they survived only at Gaza, Geth and Azotus. Thus, in fulfilment of the Lord's promise to Moses, Josue occupied the whole country, and gave the several tribes enjoyment of their several portions; and the land was at peace.

12 East of Jordan, then, the Israelites defeated two kings and occupied their territory, reaching from the river Arnon up to mount Hermon; all that eastern land that confronts the desert.¹

Sehon, the Amorrite king that reigned at Hesebon, had a domain that stretched from Aroer, on the banks of the Arnon, half-way up its course (that is, half-way along the frontier of Galaad), to the river Jaboc, which is the Ammonite frontier. Its width was from the desert to the eastern coast of Lake Ceneroth, and the eastern coast of the Desert or Salt Sea (where the road leads to Bethsimoth, just north of the spurs of Phasga). And Og, king of Basan, the last of the Raphaim, who dwelt at Astaroth and Edrai, ruled over Mount Hermon and Salecha and Basan in general, right up to the marches of Gessuri and Machati, and up to the middle point of Galaad, where his domains marched with those of Sehon, the king of Hesebon. It was the Lord's servant Moses that led Israel to the conquest of these two kings, and assigned their lands to Ruben, Gad, and half Manasses.

West of Jordan, it was Josue that led Israel to the conquest of all the kings between Baalgad, in the Lebanon plain, and the hill-country whose upper slopes are part of Edom; and it was Josue who assigned their territory to the tribes of Israel, giving each its own share to enjoy. Kings of the hill-country and the plain and the valley, kings of the foot-hills and of the desert and of the southern land; Hethite and Amorrite, Chanaanite and Pherezite, Hevite and Jebusite. The kings of Jericho, and Hai that is next to Bethel, Jerusalem, Hebron, Jerimoth, Lachis, Eglon, Gazer, Dabir, Gader, Herma, Hered, Lebna, Odullam, Maceda, Bethel, Taphua, Opher, Aphec, Saron, Madon, Asor, Semeron, Achsaph, Thenac, Mageddo, Cades, Jachanan by Carmel, Dor and the region about Dor, and the Galgal tribes, and Thersa, thirty-one kings in all.

13 Afterwards, when Josue was old and near his end, the Lord bade him bethink himself of his great age; here were wide tracts of land still waiting to be apportioned. Here was the pale of the Philistines,² with all the Gessurite land, reaching northwards to Accaron from the dark river that flows along the border of Egypt. This was Chanaanite country, in which five princes of the Philistine race had their capitals, at Gaza, Azotus, Ascalon, Geth and Accaron. Here, too in the south, were the Hevites. Here was all the Chanaanite territory, including Maara (that belonged to the Sidonians), reaching up to Apeca and the Amorrite frontier, and the adjoining territory of the Giblites. East of that came the Lebanon region, from Baalgad, under mount Hermon, right up to the approaches of Emath. So many mountain peoples, from Lebanon down to the waters of Maserephoth; and all these were to be dispossessed at Israel's coming. These lands, in pursuance of the Lord's command, must be reckoned in among the possessions of Israel.

It was time, then, that he should make a full division of the land among the nine tribes, and that half of Manasses which was attached to them.

The other half of Manasses had already had their lands apportioned to them by ¹ As in Deut. 3, the exact meaning of the geographical indications in verses 1-6 is obscure in the Hebrew text, and still more so in the Latin. ² The pale or enclave of heathen inhabitants still left after the conquest. The Latin version confusingly describes it as 'a galilee', by transiteration from the Hebrew; in verse 5, on the contrary, it translates a proper name, the Giblites, as if it were a common noun, 'the environs'.

Moses east of the Jordan, with Ruben and Gad, northwards from Aroer on the Arnon, half-way along its course; the whole plain between Medaba and Dibon, and all the cities as far as the Ammonite frontier that belonged once to Sehon, the Amorrite king of Hesebon. Galaad, too, and the border country of Gessuri and Machati, and mount Hermon, and the whole of Basan right up to Salecha; this kingdom of Basan had formerly belonged to Og, the last of the Raphaim, who dwelt at Astaroth and Edrai. These two kings Moses defeated and destroyed, but Israel never dispossessed the people of Gessuri and Machati; they dwell there as their neighbours to this day.

(The tribe of Levi had no lands apportioned to them; the Lord God of Israel had bidden them be content with the victims offered to him in sacrifice as their portion.) The tribe of Ruben, with all its several clans, received its portion from Moses. Their territory began at Aroer, on the Arnon, half-way up its course, and took in all the valley that lies before Medaba, and Hesebon, and the villages on the plain round about. They had Dibon, too, and Bamothbaal, and the town called Baal-maon, Jassa, Cedemoth, and Mephaath, Cariathaim, and Sabama, and Sarathasar, where the hills rise out of the Jordan valley; Bethphogor and the spurs of Phasga and Bethjesimoth. Theirs were all the cities in the plain, all the domains that once were Sehon's. (It was Moses that defeated Sehon, as he defeated also the Madianite chiefs that held their lands from him, Hevi, Recem, Sur, Hur and Rebe, and bade the Israelites put all their army to the sword, the prophet Balaam among them.) Such were the towns and villages that passed into the possession of Ruben's descendants, and they had the river Jordan for their boundary.

It was Moses, too, who gave the tribe of Gad their portion, dividing it up among the several clans of it. Jazer belonged to them, and all the cities of Galaad, and half the Ammonite territory, reaching as far as Aroer, near Rabba. It stretched all the way from Hesebon to Ramoth, Masphe and Betonim, from Manaim to the country round Dabir; and on the low ground it contained Betharam, Bethnemra, Socoth and Saphon, all the rest of what Sehon had ruled from Hesebon; this tribe, too, had Jordan for its boundary, up to where the further, eastern shore of Lake Cenereth begins. Such were the cities and towns allotted to the several clans of Gad as their portion.

And he also allotted lands to the separated clans of Manasses; the whole of Basan northwards from Manaim, all the domain over which Og, king of Basan, had ruled. This included the sixty townships in Basan which are called Jair's villages, and half of Galaad, and the two cities from which Og ruled over Basan, Astaroth and Edrai. All this now belonged to the descendants of Machir, son of Manasses, Machir's clans being thus separated from the rest. Such was the distribution made by Moses himself, on the plains of Moab, east of Jordan, opposite Jericho. He gave no lands to the sons of Levi, who held the Lord's promise that he himself would be their portion.

14 And now it was left to the high priest Eleazar and Josue the son of Nun to divide up Chanaan itself between the clan chieftains of Israel. The division was made by lot, in pursuance of the command the Lord gave through Moses, among the nine and a half tribes that remained. (Two and a half had been allotted their portions by Moses, on the further side of Jordan; the nine and a half did not include the Levites, since these were not to own territory like their brethren, but must be content with cities to live in and pasture for their beasts around them. Meanwhile, the division of Joseph's posterity into two tribes, Ephraim and Manasses, made up the full number.) The Israelites, then, set about the task of dividing up the land, as the Lord through Moses had bidden them.

So it was that the descendants of Juda appeared before Josue in Galgala. And now Caleb, son of Jephone, the Cenezite, spoke thus to him: Thou hast not forgotten the divine promise that was made to God's servant Moses at Cades-Barne, concerning us two. I was then forty years old, and he had sent me from Cades-Barne to view the land; I brought back with me an honest report, and although my fellow-spies tried to daunt the spirits of the people, I took, none the less, the part of the Lord my God. And Moses promised me that day, Thou, who hast taken the part of the Lord my God, shalt live to have a portion in the very land thou hast traversed, and leave it to thy race in perpetuity. The Lord has made good his promise, and life is still mine. That word was spoken to Moses forty-five years since, when Israel began its wanderings up and down the desert, and now, a man eighty-five years old, I am as vigorous as I was when I went on that errand; in battle or on the march, the strength of old days is still with me. Give me, now, that hill-country which the Lord promised me in thy own hearing; there are Enacim living on it,¹ in strong, walled cities, and I would fain see if I cannot drive them out, with the Lord at my side, and claim his promise. So Josue blessed him, and gave him Hebron for his portion; ever since then, Hebron has belonged to the family of Caleb, son of Jephone, the Cenezite, the man who took the Lord's part. (Hebron, in earlier days, was called Cariath-Arbe, after the great father of the race.²) And once more the land was at peace.

15 Meanwhile the clans descended from Juda had their territory marked out thus. It marched with Edom, with the desert of Sin that stretches out towards the midday sun, at the southernmost point of all. Beginning at the end of the Salt Sea, that is, at its southern bay, the frontier followed the Scorpion Pass till it crossed over to Sina, then climbed up to Cades-Barne, and so reached Ebron. Then it climbed up to Addar, and curved round Carcaa; from which point it crossed over to Asemona, and so reached the brook of Egypt, coming to an end at the open sea. These were to be the limits of the southern frontier; on the east, Juda was bounded by the Salt Sea, right up to the mouth of Jordan. From the extreme bay of the Salt Sea up to Jordan the frontier went northwards; then it climbed up to Beth-Hagla, turned north to Beth-Araba, and went up to the Stone of Boen, son of Ruben. From the Valley of Achor it stretched to the borders of Debera, leaving Galgala on the north so as to climb up to Adommim on the south side of the valley; it crossed the water-course that is called the Spring of the Sun, and made its way on to the Spring of Rogel. Then it went up the valley of the Son of Ennom by its southern or Jebusite side, that is by Jerusalem; and thence stretched across to the mountain summit which faces Geennom from the west, and stands at the southern end of the Valley of Raphaim. From that summit it crossed to the well of Nephtoa, and reached as far as the villages on mount Ephron; then it curved round to Baala, which is also called Cariathiarim, the City of the Woods; and from Baala it went westwards as far as mount Seir, northwards to Cheslon along the side of mount Jarim, and so down to Bethsames and across to Thamma. Then northward along the slopes in the direction of Accaron, and round to Sechrona, and across mount Baala, and at last it reached Jebneel, and found its western end at the open sea. Such were the bounds within which the clans of Juda were to dwell.

(Hebron, then called Cariath-Arbe after the father of Enac, which was assigned at the Lord's command to Caleb, son of Jephone, was in the very heart of Juda. Three of the Enacim he rooted out of it, Sesai and Ahiman and Tholmai, of Enac's true breed; then he attacked Dabir, which in old days was called Cariath-Sepher, the city of Writings. He had promised that whoever defeated and took Cariath-Sepher should have the hand of his daughter Axa in marriage; and it was taken by his own younger brother, Othoniel, son of Cenez, to whom he wedded his daughter Axa accordingly. One day he heard her sighing as she rode on her ass in his company, and asked what ailed her. She had been urged by her husband to win him a grant of land from her father. So her answer was, Grant me a favour; the portion thou hast given me is southern land and dry, give me well-watered land too. So he gave her the High Springs and the Low Springs both together.¹)

The clans of Juda, then, had their lands assigned to them; and these are the names of the cities they had. On the south, where Juda marched with Edom, Cabseel, Eder, Jagur, Cina, Dimona, Adada, Cades, Asor, Jethnam, Ziph, Telem, Baloth, New Asor (or Cariath-Hesron, which is the same as Asor), Amam, Sama, Molada, Asergadda, Hassemon, Bethphelet, Hasersual, Bersabes, Baziothia, Baala, Jim, Esem, Eltholad, Cesil, Harma, Siceleg, Medemena, Sensenna, Lebaoth, Selim, Aen, and Remmon, twenty-nine cities in all.²

In the lowlands, Estaol, Sarea, Asena, Zanoë, Aengannim, Taphua, Enaim, Jerimoth, Adullam, Socho, Azeca, Saraim, Adithaim, Gedera and Gederothaim, fourteen in all. West of these, Sanan, Hadassa, Magdalgad, Delean, Masepha, Jecthel, Lachis, Bascath, Eglon, Chebbon, Leheman, Cethlis, Gideroth, Bethdagon, Nabama and Maceda, sixteen in all. North of these, Labana, Ether, Asan, Jephtha, Esna, Nesib, Ceila, Achzib and Maresa, nine in all. And below these, Accaron with its townships and villages, the part between Accaron and the sea, and the approaches to the region of Azotus; Azotus with its townships and villages, Gaza with its townships and villages, and so down to the brook of Egypt, with the open sea for frontier.

In the hill-country, Samir, Jether, Sochoth, Danna, Cariath-Senna (or Dabir), Anab, Istemo, Anim, Gosen, Olon and Gilo, eleven in all. Arab, Ruma, Esaan, Janum, Beththaphua, Apheca, Athmatha, Cariath-Arbe (or Hebron) and Sior, nine in all. Maon, Carmel, Ziph, Jota, Jezrael, Jucadam, Zanoë, Accain, Gabaa and Thamna, ten in all. Halhul, Bessur, Gedor, Mareth, Bethanoth, Eltecon, six in all. And two cities besides, Cariath-Baal (or Cariathiarim), the City of the Woods, and Arebba.

And in the desert by the Salt Sea, Betharaba, Meddin, Sachacha, Nebsan, and the City of Salt, and Engaddi, six in all. And with each city went the villages that surrounded it.

But the Jebusites that dwelt in Jerusalem the sons of Juda could never exterminate, so there are Jebusites living in Jerusalem side by side with the men of Juda to this day.

16 The territory which was allotted to the descendants of Joseph reached up to Jericho and the waters of Jordan by Jericho on the east, taking in the waste land that climbs up from Jericho to the hill-country of Bethel. From Bethel it went to Luzza, and past the confines of Archi to Ataroth; then it sloped down westwards along the borders of Jephleti to the neighbourhood of Lower Bethoron and Gazer, and came out at last to the sea. It was divided between the two tribes that sprang from Joseph, those of Manasses and Ephraim. The clans of Ephraim had a frontier which went along from the east as far as Ataroth-Addar and Upper Bethoron;³ thence it extended to the sea; its northern point was Machmethath, and thence the boundary was drawn eastwards as far as Thanathselo. Then it passed to the east of Janoë, and came down from Janoë to Ataroth and Naaratha, and so down towards Jericho, where it reached the Jordan again. From Taphua it jutted out westwards as far as the Valley of Reeds, and so reached the sea.⁴ Such were the possessions of the Ephraimite clans, whose cities and townships were a separate enclosure in the middle of the territory which belonged to Manasses. The tribe of Ephraim did not exterminate the Chanaanites who lived at Gazer, so that there are Chanaanites living to this day within the confines of Ephraim, but as tributaries.

17 Lands, too, must be allotted to Manasses, Joseph's first-born. The first-born of Manasses was Machir, that was father to Galaad, and he, by feat of arms, made Galaad and Basan his possession. But there were six other lines descended from Manasses through Abiezer, Helec, Esriel, Sechem, Hegher, and Semida; all these were heirs male to Manasses, and so to Joseph. But Hephher (who was descended from Manasses through Galaad and Machir) had a son, Salphaad, that died without male issue;¹ there were five daughters, Maala, Noa, Hegla, Melcha, and Thersa. These appeared before the high priest Eleazar, and Josue the son of Nun, and the chieftains, to claim the right the Lord had granted them through Moses, of inheriting side by side with their father's kinsmen. So the Lord's command was obeyed, and they were allowed to inherit; and now, apart from Galaad and Basan, beyond Jordan, ten portions of territory must be allowed to Manasses. His other sons were provided for in Galaad, but five remained, and the five heiresses must have their portion too.

The frontier of Manasses, from where it marched with Aser, came down to Machmethath, opposite Sichem, and then turned to the right so as to include the neighbourhood of the Springs of Taphua. (Taphua itself, close to the border of Manasses, belonged to Ephraim, but Manasses held the adjoining lands.) Then it went down to the southern side of the stream which flows through the Valley of Reeds, through cities belonging to Ephraim, which are here confused with those of Manasses. Thenceforward Manasses has a true frontier, on the north side of the stream, reaching down to the sea; Ephraim lies to the south, Manasses to the north, both of them bounded by the sea coast; their joint territory marches with Aser on the north, and Issachar on the east. Manasses also had lands in Issachar and in Aser, Bethsan, Jeblaam, Dor, Endor, Thenac and Mageddo, with the villages dependent on them, and a third part of Nopheth; but they could not get the mastery of these cities; the Chanaanites made bold to live on in their own country. When the Israelites had grown stronger, they subdued the Chanaanites and forced them to pay tribute, but did not exterminate them.

complained to Josue that he had allotted to them only a single division of the country, although the Lord's blessing had made them so populous, Josue replied, If there are so many of you, and the hill-country of Ephraim does not suffice you, make your way into the forest-country, and clear room for yourselves there, where the Pherezites and the Raphaim live. We cannot go across to the hill-country, answered the sons of Joseph; there is a valley in between, where Bethsan lies, with its townships, and Jezrael; and on that low ground there are Chanaanites who have chariots made of iron. But Josue still told the sons of Joseph, the men of Ephraim and Manasses, So great, so powerful a people as you are must not be content with one lot. Cross over to the hill-country and fell the trees, to make yourselves room to dwell in; drive out these Chanaanites, for all their iron chariots, for all their great strength, and you will spread your frontiers further yet.

18 And now all the Israelites gathered in Silo, and set up the tabernacle that bore witness of the covenant, there in their own domain. But there were seven tribes of Israel which had not yet had their lands allotted to them; and to these Josue said, What, still hanging back, when the land promised by the Lord God of your fathers waits for you to occupy it? Choose out three men from each tribe, and let me send them to make a circuit of the country; they shall report to me what territory best suits the numbers of this tribe or that. The land must needs be divided up into seven portions, now that Juda is provided for in the south, and the descendants of Joseph further north. Come here to me, and let me cast lots between you in the Lord's presence, when you have plotted the land that is left over;² it must be in seven divisions, no allowance made for the Levites, whose portion is the Lord's priestly office, none for Gad, Ruben, and the separate half of Manasses, since the Lord's servant Moses has already assigned them lands east of the Jordan. So the men appointed set out on their journey to make a survey of the land; at the end of it, they were to return with their report to

Josue, and there, at Silo, in the Lord's presence, the lots should be cast. To the camp at Silo, then, they returned, when they had made their survey and written down particulars of the sevenfold division in a book; and at Silo lots were cast in the Lord's presence, and the seven tribes had their portions assigned to them.

It was the clans of Benjamin whose lot was drawn first; and the territory that fell to them lay between Juda and Joseph. Their frontier began at the Jordan, and went northwards till it was north of Jericho, then climbed up westwards into the hills, till it reached the desert of Bethaven. It passed south of Luza (now Bethel), and so reached Ataroth-Addar, on the hill south of Lower Bethoron; here it altered its westward course and turned towards the mid-day sun, passing south along the ridge that faces Bethoron and so reaching Cariath-Baal, (or Cariathiarim), which belongs to Juda. This formed the western side of the territory, facing the sea. Then, along its southern edge the frontier began its seaward course,¹ reaching the Spring of Nephtoa; and so it went across to the side of the hill looking down on the Valley of the Sons of Ennom, at the southern end of the Valley of Raphaim. Thence it crossed to Geennom (the Valley of Ennom) on its southern or Jebusite side, and reached the Spring of Rogel. Now it bore northwards, through Ensemes, the Spring of the Sun, to the mounds near the Adommim slope; thence it passed on to Aben-Boen (the stone of Boen, son of Ruben), reaching lower ground there and at last coming down into the Jordan Valley. It went northwards again to Beth-Hagla, and finished at the northern bay of the Salt Sea, south of Jordan, so reaching its eastern limit.

Such was the compass of the territory granted to the clans of Benjamin. The cities it contained were Jericho, Beth-Hagla, Vale of Casis, Betharaba, Samaraim, Bethel, Avim, Aphara, Ophera, the Town of the Ammonites, Ophni, and Gabee, twelve cities in all; also Gabaon, Rama, Beroth, Mesphe, Caphara, Amosa, Recem, Jarephel, Tharella, Sela, Eleph, Jebus (or Jerusalem), Gabaath and Cariath, fourteen cities in all; with their dependent villages. All these belonged to the clans of Benjamin.

19 The next lot which was drawn was that of Simeon; and the lands assigned to them were interspersed among those of Juda; namely Bersabee, Sabe, Molada, Hasersual, Bala, Asem, Eltholad, Bethul, Harma, Siceleg, Bethmarchaboth, Hasersusa, Bethlebaoth and Sarohen, thirteen cities in all; also Ain, Remmon, Athar, and Asan, four cities in all with their dependent villages. All the villages round about these cities, down to Baalath-Beer-Ramath in the south, belonged to the clans of Simeon, being part of the territory allotted to Juda, which was too large for them, so that they must needs share it with Simeon.

The third lot drawn was that of Zabulon; their territory began at Sarid, and went out in the direction of the sea through Merala and Debbaseth to the stream that flows past Jeconam. From Sarid eastward it passed through the confines of Ceseleth-Thabor to Dabereth, climbing up into the hill-country at Japhie; thence it made its way east by Gath-Hepher and Thacasin to Remmon, Amthar, and Noa. It took in Hanathon in the north, and went out as far as the valley of Jephthael, Cateth, Naalol, Semeron, Jedala, and Bethlehem; thus twelve cities with their dependent villages made up the portion granted to Zabulon; both town and village were theirs.

The fourth was the lot of Issachar; it included Jezrael, Casaloth, Sunem, Hapharaim, Seon, Anaharath, Rabboth, Cesion, Abes, Rameth, Engannim, Enhadda, and Bethpheses, and reached as far as Thabor, Sehesima, and Bethsames, so as to make Jordan its boundary; sixteen cities in all, with their dependent villages made up the portion granted to Issachar; both town and village were theirs.

The fifth was the lot of Aser; their territory was round about Halcath, Chali, Beten, Axaph, Elmelech, Amaad and Mesal; it reached along the sea as far as Carmel and Sihor-Labanath, and eastwards it went through Bethdagon to the frontier of Zabulon and the valley of Jephthael.

¹ This ought to mean westwards, towards the Mediterranean, but it seems quite clear at this point the boundary of Benjamin turned eastwards; and the sea is presumably the Dead Sea, its eastward limit.

28 Then it went northwards to Bethemec and Nehiel, with Cabul on the left, to 29 Abran, Rohob, Hamon, and Cana, where it marches with greater Sidon. Thence it turned back through Horma towards the great fortress of Tyre, reaching as far as Hosa, and coming down to the sea again 30 where it touches Achziba. It also took in Amma, Aphec, and Rohob; twenty-two 31 cities with their dependant villages made up the portion granted to Aser; both town and village were theirs.

32 The sixth was the lot of Nephthali; it stretched all the way from Heleph to Elon in Saananim, Adami, Neceb, Jebnael, and Lecum, with Jordan for its boundary.
 34 Then the frontier turned westwards, at Azanoth-Thabor, and went out to Hucuca to meet the frontier of Zabulon on the south; on the west it marched with Aser, and on the east with Juda-beyond-Jordan.¹ 35 The fortified cities of Nephthali were Assedim, Ser, Emath, Reccath, Cenereth, 36 Edema, Arama, Asor, Cedec, Edrai, Enhasor, Jeron, Magdalel, Horem, Bethanath and Bethsames; nineteen cities with their 37 dependant villages made up the portion granted to Nephthali; both town and village were theirs.

40 And the seventh lot was that of Dan; 41 their territory included Sara and Esthaol, Hir-Semes (that is, the City of the Sun), 42 Selebin, Aialon, Jethela, Elon, Themna, 44 Acron, Elthece, Gebbethon, Balaath, Jud, 46 Bane, Barach, Gethremmon, Mejarcon and Arecon; its frontiers reached Joppe, 47 and went no further. But the Danites made an expedition against Lesem, and captured it; they exterminated the inhabitants, and occupied it as a colony of their own, calling it Lesem-Dan after the 48 name of their ancestor. These cities, with their dependant villages, made up the portion granted to the Danite clans.

49 When he had finished dividing up the land by lot among the tribes, the Israelites gave Josue the son of Nun lands of his own 50 among the rest, as the Lord had bidden them. He asked for the city of Thamnath-Saraa, in the hill-country of Ephraim, and 51 built up its walls, and so dwelt there. Such was the division of the land made by the high priest Eleazar, and Josue the son of Nun, and the chief men of Israel's clans and tribes, there in Silo, in the Lord's presence, at the door of the tabernacle that bore witness to his covenant.

20 And now the Lord gave Josue this message for the sons of Israel; You must choose out sanctuary 2 towns, as Moses in my name commanded you. These will offer refuge to anyone who 3 has slain a man by misadventure, and escaped from the vengeance of his kinsmen. Taking flight to one of these cities, 4 he will stand before the gates and call upon the city elders to declare him innocent; whereupon they must admit him, and 5 grant him a dwelling-place. When the avenger comes in pursuit, demanding blood for blood, they will not give up the fugitive. He has slain his neighbour unwittingly, and cannot be shewn to have 6 borne malice against him beforehand. In that city he will live, until he has been put on trial for his offence, and again until the death of the high priest who then holds office.² After that, the man who has shed blood may return to his own city and home, taking sanctuary no longer.

Their choice fell on Cedec, in the pale 7 of the Nephthali hill-country,³ Sicheim among the hills of Ephraim, and Cariath-Arbe (or Hebron) among the hills of Juda.
 Across the Jordan, east of Jericho, they 8 agreed on Bosor, on the desert lowlands, for Ruben; Ramoth, in Galaad, for Gad; 9 and Gaulon, in Basan, for Manasses. Israelite or alien who had shed blood unwittingly, and would escape from the vengeance of the next of kin, must make his way to one of the cities thus set apart, until he could stand his trial before the people.

21 Meanwhile the heads of the Levite households approached the high priest Eleazar, and Josue the son of Nun, and the clan chiefs of Israel, all 2 gathered there at Silo now that Chanaan was won. It was the Lord's command to Moses, they said, that we should have cities to live in, with lands round them on 3 which we could pasture our beasts. And ¹ If the text is sound, Juda-beyond-Jordan must be a district not elsewhere mentioned.

² It is no doubt implied that the trial has gone in favour of the accused.

³ 'The pale'; see note on 13. 2. The galilee or enclave here mentioned was the country which came to be called 'Galilee' in later times.

so, in pursuance of the Lord's command, cities and lands were granted to them by the sons of Israel.

The lot fell first on the line of Caath. Among these, the family of the high priest Aaron were to receive thirteen cities from Juda, Simeon, and Benjamin; the rest of the Caathites, Levites that were not of the priestly family, ten cities from Ephraim, Dan, and the western half of Manasses. Issachar, Aser, Nephthali, and the eastern half of Manasses, in Basan, were to give the line of Gerson thirteen cities; Ruben, Gad, and Zabulon to give the line of Merari twelve cities. Thus was the command the Lord had given through Moses carried out, and the Israelites handed over to the Levites the cities and lands allotted to them.

These are the names of the cities which Josue handed over in Juda and Simeon to the family of Aaron, whose lot came first among the descendants of Caath. One was Cariath-Arbe, called after the father of Fnac; Hebron, that is, in the hill-country of Juda, with lands round it. (He had given the countryside, with the villages in it, to Caleb the son of Jephone as his portion; but Hebron itself, the city of refuge, with the lands close to it, he gave to the family of Aaron.) The others were Lobna, and the lands round Lobna, Jether, Esthemo, Holon, Dabir, Ain, Jeta, and Bethsames, with the lands round them; nine cities out of the two tribes aforesaid. From the lands of Benjamin he handed over Gabao, Gabae, Anathoth and Almon, four city-enclosures. Thus Aaron's family had thirteen city-enclosures in all; the Levites of Caath's line received from Ephraim, one city of refuge, Sichem, and besides this, Gazer, Cibsaim and Bethoron, four city-enclosures. From Dan, Eltheco, Gabathon, Aialon, and Gethremmon, four city-enclosures. From western Manasses, Thanach and their own town of Gethremmon,¹ two city-enclosures. Thus there were ten city-enclosures to the Caathites of lower rank.

The Levites of Gerson's line received from eastern Manasses one city of refuge, Gaulon in Basan; and also Bosram; two city-enclosures. From Issachar, Cesion and Dabereth, Jaramoth and Engannim; 28 four city-enclosures. From Aser, Masal, 29 Abdon, Helcath and Rohob; four city- 30 enclosures. From Nephthali, one city of 31 refuge, Cedès in the pale of Nephthali; 32 also Hammoth-Dor and Carthan; three 33 city-enclosures. Thus there were thirteen 34 city-enclosures granted to the Gersonites.

The Merarites' families, all Levites of 34 lower rank, received from Zabulon Jec- 35 nam, Cartha, Damma and Naalol; four 36 city-enclosures. From Ruben on the east 37 side of Jordan, there was one city of refuge, 38 Bosor out in the wilderness; and four other 39 city-enclosures were also taken out, Misor, 40 Jaser, Jethson and Mephaath.² From Gad, 41 one city of refuge, Ramoth in Galaad; also 42 Manaim, Hesebon and Jaser, four city- 43 enclosures; thus there were twelve city- 44 enclosures granted to the families of 45 Merari.

Altogether, then, the Levites had forty- 39 eight cities, distributed among the various 40 possessions of Israel, and lands attached to 41 them; each family among them had its own 42 domain.

Thus the Lord God made over to Israel 41 the whole of the territory he had promised 42 to their fathers; they had a home of their 43 own to settle in, secure from attack by any 44 of the nations which surrounded them, 45 since these no longer ventured to offer 46 resistance, but submitted to their rule. No 47 word of the promises which the Lord had 48 made to them remained unfulfilled.

22 It was at this time that Josue 2 summoned the men of Ruben and 3 Gad, and the eastern half of Manasses, and 4 spoke to them thus: You have done as the 5 Lord's servant Moses commanded you, 6 and given me, too, full obedience. All this 7 while you have kept true to the bidding of 8 the Lord your God, and stood by your 9 brethren, waiting for this day. Now the 10 Lord your God has granted to your bre- 11 thren the security and rest he promised 12

¹ Both the Hebrew text and the Latin version seem to imply that there were two separate cities called Gethremmon; but this may be due to an oversight in copying. The Septuagint Greek has a different name in this verse, Jebatha (or perhaps Bethsa); a different name again, Baalam, is found in 1 Par. 6. 70.

them. Return, then, to your own tents, and enjoy the possessions which the Lord's servant Moses allotted to you on the further side of Jordan; yet always keeping carefully in mind, and carrying out in act, the terms of that law which the Lord's servant Moses enjoined upon you. You must still love the Lord your God, and follow the paths he has chosen, obeying his commandments, keeping close to him, and offering him the service of your heart and soul.

Then Josue blessed them, and sent them back to their dwelling-place. (With Ruben and Gad went those tribesmen of Manasses to whom Moses had allotted territory in Basan; Josue had given the rest a portion with their brethren west of the Jordan.) And as he sent them back, after giving them his blessing, he said, You will have rich store of wealth to take home with you, silver and gold, bronze and iron, and garments in abundance; in all the spoils taken from the enemy you, too, must have your share. So Ruben and Gad and half Manasses left Silo, left Chanaan behind them, and returned to the home Moses had granted them at the Lord's bidding, in Galaad. And when they reached the Chanaanite bank of Jordan, they built there, near the river, an altar of commanding height.

When the rest of the Israelites learned beyond doubt, that the three tribes had built an altar on the banks of Jordan, there in Chanaan itself, in full view of Israel, they all mustered at Silo, ready to make an expedition against them. Meanwhile, Phinees, son of the high priest Eleazar, was sent into Galaad, and with him ten chieftains, one from each tribe; and there, in Galaad, they remonstrated with the men of Ruben, Gad, and Manasses. With this message the general assembly of the Lord's people had entrusted them: What means this impiety? Would you forsake the Lord God of Israel, withdraw from his worship, and raise an unhallowed altar? Have we not suffered enough for our sin in Beelphegor, that cost us so many lives, and has left its mark upon us still? Your revolt against the Lord to-day will bring his vengeance on the whole of Israel to-morrow. If there is some defilement in this land of yours that must be atoned for, cross over into our land, where the Lord's tabernacle is, and dwell with us; do not forsake the Lord, and your fellowship with us, by building a fresh altar, to rival the altar of the Lord our God. Think how the Lord's vengeance fell on the whole people, when Achan son of Zare transgressed his commands; that was but one man's sin, and alas, how many died for it!

But the three tribes had their answer ready for the chieftains of Israel: The Lord God is our witness, the Almighty Lord God is our witness; let Israel ask proof from him! Let him be our protector no longer, let him smite us with his punishments here and now, if he sees that this altar of ours was built in any spirit of rebellion against him. Let him condemn and punish us, if we have built it with any thought of offering sacrifice or victim or welcome-offering there. This rather was our thought, this was our design; it may be that in time to come your children will turn upon ours and ask them, What have you to do with the God of Israel? Has he not put Jordan there as a barrier between us and you? Men of Ruben and Gad, the Lord will have none of you! Should we allow them such an opportunity of stealing our children away from the worship of the Lord? No, we were better advised than that. We determined to build an altar, that should never know burnt-sacrifice or offering; it was to be a monument of our claims upon you, of our children's claims upon yours. We would safeguard our right of bringing the Lord burnt-sacrifice and victim and welcome-offering; your children should never say to ours, The Lord will have none of you! Let them say it, and our children will reply, And the altar? The altar which our fathers raised, not for burnt-sacrifice or offering, but for a monument of our claim on you? Far be such treachery from our thoughts, as to rebel against the Lord, and forsake the paths he has traced for us, never will we present burnt-sacrifice or offering or victim save at the altar raised to the Lord our God, before his tabernacle!

Such answer they made, the men of Ruben and Gad and half Manasses; whereupon Phinees and the envoys who accompanied him were well content, and accepted their plea willingly enough.

Phinees himself, son of the high priest Eleazar, was their spokesman. Now we are sure, he said, that the Lord God dwells among us. By clearing yourselves of this charge, you have freed Israel from the dread of the Lord's vengeance. So they bade farewell to Galaad, to Ruben and to Gad, and went back with their news to the other Israelites in Chanaan. These were well content, and praised God for it; no more was heard of making an expedition against the three tribes and ravaging their possessions. And the name given by the men of Ruben and Gad to the altar they had built was Ed, the Record; Here we have put it on record, they said of it, that the Lord is God.

23 The Lord had granted Israel long years of peace, with all their neighbours subject to them, when Josue, now grown to be a very old man, summoned all Israel, with their elders, judges, chieftains and magistrates, and spoke thus to them. I am an old man now, and near my end, and you can see for yourselves how the Lord God has fought on your side against the nations that surround you; how he has divided up the land between you, from Jordan on the east to the shores of the open sea. Many nations are still left; and these, too, the Lord your God will dispossess, making room for you to occupy their lands, in fulfilment of his promise.

But you must be resolute, and observe jealously all the terms of that law which Moses committed to writing, never swerve from them to right or to left. You must not consort with these nations that survive, and learn to swear by the names of their gods, or enslave yourselves to their worship; you must keep true to the Lord your God, as you have till now. If you will do that, the Lord God will dispossess great nations, powerful nations, to make room for you; none will be able to withstand your onslaught. A thousand enemies will take flight before a single man of your company, so well the Lord will keep his promise to fight on your side. On peril of your lives, then, keep your hearts true to the Lord your God. If you consent to follow closely in the false ways of neighbouring peoples, allying yourselves with them by marriage and making friends of them, I warn you here and now that the Lord will never dispossess them to make room for you. Evermore they will be at your side, ready to snare and entrap you and catch your feet unawares, eyesores to blind you; and at last he will dispossess you instead, banish you utterly from this fair land he has given you for your home.

The time has come when I must go the way all mortal things go at last; and I would have you cherish this message deep in your hearts. Of all the promises the Lord made you, not one has missed fulfilment; and as he has made good his promises by granting you the prosperity you now enjoy, so he will make good his threats, by dispossessing you and banishing you from this fair land of yours, if you do not keep true to the covenant the Lord your God has made with you. Enslave yourselves to the worship of other gods, and the Lord's vengeance will come upon you swiftly and suddenly, till the fair land he has given you knows you no more.

24 And once more Josue gathered all the tribes of Israel at Sichern, with their elders, judges, chieftains and magistrates. They stood there in the Lord's presence, and he spoke thus to the people; Here is a message from the Lord your God. Long ago, these ancestors of yours, Thare and his sons Abraham and Nachor, had a home beyond the Euphrates, and there worshipped alien gods. It was I that bade your father Abraham leave Mesopotamia, and brought him here, to Chanaan, instead. It was I that gave him heirs to succeed him, Isaac, and Isaac's sons, Jacob and Esau. For Esau, I found a home in the hill-country of Seir, while Jacob and his sons made their way into Egypt. Then I sent Moses and Aaron to smite Egypt down with wonders and prodigies, and so rescued you and your fathers from it. When your fathers reached the Red Sea, they found that the Egyptians had come in pursuit of them with chariots and horses, to the sea's very brink. It was to me, the Lord, that Israel cried out for aid; and I put a curtain of darkness between you and the Egyptians, and brought the sea back to overwhelm them. What was done in Egypt was done under your eyes.

8 For a long while you dwelt in the desert. Then I led you forward into the country of the Amorrites, beyond Jordan; and when these offered battle, I gave you the victory over them, so that you could exterminate them, and take possession of their lands. Balac, too, son of Sephor, the king of Moab, became your enemy, and sent for Balaam, son of Beor, to put you under a curse; but I would not let him have his way; it was still my blessing he pronounced; and so I gave you the victory.

11 You crossed Jordan, and made your way to Jericho. And the men of Jericho withstood you, Amorrite and Pherezite, Chanaanite and Hethite, Gergesite and Hevite and Jebusite, but I gave you the mastery over them. I sent hornets in your path, and drove two kings of the Amorrites out of their countries, before they could suffer from bow or sword of yours. I have given you lands that others had tilled, cities to dwell in, not of your building, vineyards and oliveyards, not of your planting.

14 And now, will you fear the Lord, giving him full and loyal service, will you banish the gods your fathers obeyed in Egypt, or in Mesopotamia, and serve the Lord only?

15 If the Lord's service mislikes you, choose some other way. Shall it be the gods your fathers worshipped in Mesopotamia, or the gods of the Amorrites, in whose land you dwell? I and mine will worship the Lord.

16 And with that, the whole people cried in answer, Never will we forsake the Lord, and yield ourselves to alien gods! Never will we forsake the Lord our God, who rescued us and our fathers from slavery in Egypt, who did signal miracles under our very eyes, who protected us on our long journey, so beset by enemies, who dispossessed all these tribes, of native Amorrite stock, to make room for us here. Serve we the Lord; he is our own God. You? said Josue. You are not fit to serve the Lord; he is a God set apart, fiercely jealous in his love, not one to overlook such sinful rebellions as yours; if you should forsake him in time to come, and worship other gods, he would repent of all his goodness to you, and you would be involved in misery and ruin. That shall never be, cried the people; the Lord, we will serve the Lord! I call you to witness, said Josue, that you have chosen the Lord's service; and they answered, We are thy witnesses. Why then, said he, banish all alien gods from your company, and turn your hearts to the Lord God of Israel. And the people told Josue, We will worship the Lord our God, and obey his commandments. So Josue, that day, made a covenant with them, there in Sichem, and set before them the laws and decrees they were to follow; and he wrote down in the book which contained the divine law, all that had passed. He took a great stone, too, and set it up under the oak that stood there in the Lord's precincts; This stone, he said to the people, shall bear witness that it has heard all these warnings the Lord has given you; so that you will never be able to deny it, and cheat the Lord your God of his due. And with that he sent them home to the lands assigned to them.

After this, the Lord's servant Josue died, a hundred and ten years old, and they buried him within his own domain at Thamnath-Sare, in the hill-country of Ephraim, on the northern side of mount Gaas. And Israel remained true to the worship of the Lord as long as Josue lived, and during the life-time of men already growing old who long survived him; men who had witnessed the great things the Lord had done for Israel.

And now the bones of Joseph, which the Israelites had brought with them from Egypt, were buried at Sichem, in the piece of land Jacob bought for a hundred lambs from Hemor, that was father to Sichem; a piece of land that belonged to Joseph's descendants.

And when Aaron's son Eleazar died, he too was buried in the hill-country of Ephraim, where his son Phinees had received a grant of land at Gabaath.

THE BOOK OF JUDGES

NOW that Josue was dead, the sons of Israel asked counsel of the Lord, to know who should be their champion against the Chanaanites, and bear the brunt of the attack. And the Lord's bidding was, Juda shall be your champion; I have marked it down for his conquest. Upon this, the men of Juda said to their brethren, the Simeonites, Come and help us win these lands of ours, and we, in our turn, will help to win your lands. So the men of Simeon marched at Juda's side, and when they went to the attack, the Lord gave them mastery over Chanaanite and Pherézite at Bezeq, where they overcame an army of ten thousand men. They encountered the king, Adonibezec, there in his capital; and when Chanaanite and Pherézite were routed, and Adonibezec fled, they pursued and caught him, and mutilated him, cutting off his thumbs and his great toes. There were seventy kings, Adonibezec said, that used to eat the crumbs left under my table, mutilated hand and foot, every one. God has served me as I served others. And they took him to Jerusalem, where he died. This city of Jerusalem was attacked and taken by the sons of Juda, who put the inhabitants to the sword, and burnt it all down.

They went down, too, and routed Chanaan on hill, desert and plain. They even attacked the Chanaanites who lived at Hebron (which in old days was called Cariath Arbe), defeating Sesai, Ahiman, and Tholmai; then they marched against Dabir, that was once called Cariath-Sepher, the City of Writings. (Caleb had promised that whoever defeated and took Cariath-Sepher should have the hand of his daughter Axa in marriage; and it was taken by his own younger brother, Othoniel son of Cenez, to whom he wedded his daughter Axa accordingly. One day he heard her sighing as she rode on her ass in his company, and asked what ailed her. She had been urged by her husband to win him a grant of land from her father. So her answer was, Grant me yet one present; the portion thou hast given me is parched land; give me well-watered land too. So he gave her the High Springs and the Low Springs both together.¹) When the men of Juda made their expedition from the city of Palm-trees, to conquer the waste land that was to be theirs south of Arad, they were accompanied by the Cinites, into whose clan Moses had married; and these shared the land with them.² Together, Juda and Simeon defeated and destroyed the Chanaanites in Sephaath; which city was afterwards called Horma, that is, Forfeited. Gaza, too, and Ascalon, and Accaron, with the regions around them fell into Juda's power; and still the Lord was on their side; so that they occupied all the hill-country, although they could not overcome the plain-dwellers, that had scythed chariots in plenty. So Caleb had his portion, as Moses promised that he should; the city of Hebron, where he defeated the three sons of Enac. As for Jerusalem, Benjamin could never exterminate the Jebusites that lived there, and they share it with the sons of Benjamin to this day.

Meanwhile the men of Joseph made an expedition against Bethel, where the Lord gave them good speed. They were laying siege to the city (which in former times was called Luza) when they found a man escaping from it, and promised him his life if he would shew them how to enter it; this he did, and they put the inhabitants to the sword, except this one man and his family. And he, after this escape, made his way into the Hethite country, where he built a city that is still called Luza. In Manasses, Bethsan, Thanac, Dor, Jebblaam and Mageddo, with the villages around them, were never cleared of their inhabitants; the Chanaanites made bold to live on there. When the Israelites had grown stronger, they subdued them and forced them to pay tribute, but did not

² 'With them'; or, according to other authorities, 'with the Amalecites'.

29 exterminate them. Ephraim, too, spared the Chanaanites in Gazer, and shared it 30 with them; nor did Zabulon exterminate the inhabitants of Cetron and Naalol; the Chanaanites lived on among them as tribu-31 butaries. In Aser, Accho, Sidon, Ahalab, Achazib, Helba, Aphec and Rohob were 32 spared; the Chanaanite inhabitants of 33 those parts lived on there. Nephthali shared Bethsames and Bethanath with the old Chanaanite inhabitants, who paid 34 tribute to them. And as for the men of Dan, the Amorrhites kept them cooped up in the hills, and would not let them find any 35 footing in the level plains; they still made bold to live on in mount Hares (the Mount of Pottery) and Aialon and Salebim, until at last the rising power of Joseph forced them to become tributaries. The territory of these Amorrhites once reached as far as the Scorpion Pass, and Petra, and beyond them still.

2 And now the Lord's angel¹ removed from Galgal to the place that is called Lamentation. And his message was, I have taken you away from Egypt, and brought you to this land in fulfilment of the prom-2 ise I made to your fathers, an oath irrevocable. But you, too, had your part to play; you were to make no terms with the men who dwelt in it, you were to overthrow every altar of theirs. How is it that you 3 have disobeyed my command? With good reason I have spared them utter destruction, so that there may be enemies at your side, and gods of the enemy, ready to 4 compass your downfall.² And all the sons of Israel wept aloud at the angel's message;
 that is why the place was called Lamenta-5 tion. In this place of tears they offered the Lord sacrifice.

6 Josue, then, had sent the Israelites home, to enjoy the lands assigned to them.
 7 While he lived, and indeed long after, while those others lived who were old enough to remember the signal mercies shown to them, Israel remained true to the 8 Lord. But Josue the son of Nun died, after a hundred and ten years spent in the Lord's 9 service, and was buried within his own domain at Thamnath-Sare, in the hill-country of Ephraim, on the north side of mount Gaas. And when all the men of his generation had become a part of their people, a new generation arose, to whom the Lord's power was still untried, his dealings with Israel still unknown. And now the sons of Israel defied the Lord to his face, and began to worship the gods of the country-side. Not for them the Lord God of their fathers, who had rescued them from Egypt; they must have new gods to worship, gods of the nations that dwelt around them; they must challenge the Lord's anger by paying court to Baal and Astaroth instead.

Thus angered, the Lord left Israel at the mercy of invaders who plundered them, betrayed them to those enemies of theirs who lived round about. No longer could they make head against their adversaries; march where they would, the Lord still fought against them, true to his threat, true to the oath he had taken, and it fared ill indeed with them. Sometimes he would send them chieftains of their own, to rescue them from the invader's power, but even to these they would not listen; still they would play the wanton, and worship alien gods; so quick were they to forsake their father's ways, and disobey the Lord's known will. First a chieftain would arise, and the Lord, in his days, would relent;
 would listen to the plaint of a people in distress, and save them from the threat of destruction; then, once he was dead, the sons would prove worse than their fathers before them; would pay court to alien gods, and enslave themselves to alien worship; still they would not leave their false imaginings, the rebellious path they trod. So that the Lord complained in high displeasure, This people of mine have annulled the covenant I made with their fathers, and refuse me obedience; and I, in return, will spare the nations which Josue left unconquered at his death, to make proof of Israel still; will they remember and follow the divine commands like their fathers, or not?

At the time, then, the Lord spared all these nations, instead of overthrowing them all at once, and Josue never had the mastery of them.¹

3 Spared they must be, so that a new generation of Israelites, who had not fought against Chanaan, might learn a soldierly tradition, and skill in the use of arms; the five princes of the Philistines, the Chanaanites in general, the men of Sidon, and the Hevites of mount Lebanon, between Baal-hermon hill and the path that leads to Emath. Spared they must be, so as to have a test of Israel's loyalty; would the Israelites obey the commands which the Lord had given to their fathers through Moses, or not?

Thus the men of Israel lived surrounded by Chanaanite and Hethite, by Amorrhite and Pherezite, by Hevite and Jebusite, mated with their daughters, and gave Israelite wives to their sons, and so came to worship their gods. They defied the Lord's will, forsook him, their own God, and paid court instead to the gods of the countryside, and to Astaroth; and the Lord, in high displeasure against Israel, left them at the mercy of Chusan-Rasathaim, king of the Mesopotamian land, who for eight years became their master. Then they cried out to the Lord, and he sent a champion to their rescue, Othniel son of Cenez, the younger brother of Caleb. On him the Lord's spirit fell, and he became the ruler of Israel; he fought, and the Lord gave him victory over the Syrian king Chusan-Rasathaim, whose power he crushed. So, for forty years, the land was at peace, till Othniel son of Cenez died.

Then, once again, Israel defied the Lord's will, and he, thus defied, gave them a rival in Eglon king of Moab, that had Ammon and Amelec fighting at his side. This Eglon made an expedition against the Israelites in which he defeated them, and took possession of the city of Palm-trees. And for eighteen years the king of Moab was master of Israel.

And now they cried out to the Lord, and he sent them a fresh champion, a Benjamite called Aod, son of Gera. He was left-handed, and when the Israelites sent him to pay King Eglon their tribute, he wore at his right side, under his cloak, a hilted dagger, two-edged, nine inches long.² Gift in hand he came before Eglon, who sat there gross and pampered of body. So, letting his companions go on before him, when the tribute had been paid, he himself went back all the way from the carved rocks of Galgal, and told the king he had a secret to make known to him. Eglon bade him keep his counsel, and sent all the courtiers out; alone he sat in his summer parlour, when Aod found him. I have a message for thee from the Lord, said Aod, and, as Eglon rose from his seat, the dagger hidden at Aod's right side was plunged into his belly. Such was the force of the blow, that hilt followed blade into the wound, stuck deep in the fat; and thereupon the bowels discharged their load. Good care Aod took to secure lock and bolt behind him; then he made his escape by a postern door.

When the king's servants came and found locked doors they thought he was easing himself, like enough, there in his summer retreat. But at last, ashamed of waiting, they brought a key to open it, and there was their master stretched on the ground dead. In the confusion, Aod escaped; he made his way back to the Carved Rocks, and thence to Seirath. There, on the slopes of Ephraim, he blew his horn, and the men of Israel came down from the hills with Aod at their head crying out, Follow me, the Lord has granted us victory over the Moabite invader. Down they went at his heels, and seized the ford across Jordan that leads to Moab. Not a man did they allow to cross, but slew, that day, some ten thousand Moabite warriors, cut off from all hope of escape. Thus Israel brought Moab to the dust, and for eighty years the land was at peace.

Aod was followed by Samgar, the son of Anath; he it was that slew six hundred ¹ In verses 22-23 the words 'still' and 'at the time' are not expressed in the original; they are here introduced to explain the somewhat confused order of the narrative. Verse 22 apparently refers to a time late in the period of the Judges, when God decrees that the Gentiles shall survive indefinitely, partly as a punishment and partly as a test. Verse 23, like verse 6 above, recalls us to an earlier time, that of Josue's death, when they are spared only as a test. Verse 23 really belongs to chapter 3. ² The Hebrew text probably implies that the dagger was a cubit, that is, eighteen inches long. It is not clear what the Latin version means by saying that this weapon had a hilt in the middle of it; nor whether we are meant to understand that it was the weapon itself or the hilt that was 'a span' long.

Philistines with a ploughshare;¹ he, too, was a champion of Israel.

4 When Aod was dead, Israel would defy the Lord yet again; and the Lord put them at the mercy of Jabin, the Chanaanite king who ruled in Asor. The chieftain that commanded his army for him was called Sisara, and lived at Haroseth, in the pale of the Gentiles. Small wonder if the Israelites cried out to the Lord against this king that had nine hundred scythed chariots, and for twenty years had grievously oppressed them.

4 At this time Israel was ruled by a prophetess called Debbora, the wife of Lapidoth, that dwell in the hill-country of Ephraim, between Rama and Bethel, by that palm-tree which long bore her name; here the people of Israel had recourse to her for the settlement of all their disputes.

6 And now she summoned Barac, son of Abinoem, from Cedes in Nephthali, and gave him a message from the Lord God of Israel: Go and muster an army on mount Thabor, of ten thousand warriors from Nephthali and Zabulon. Then I will lure Sisara, the chieftain of Jabin's army, out into the valley of Cison to meet thee, with his chariots and all his forces, and give thee the mastery over them.

8 If thou wilt go with me, I will go, Barac said, but not without thee. Go with thee I will, she answered; and yet this part of thine is to win thee no renown. A woman's hand is to vanquish Sisara. Then she set out with Barac on the journey to Cedes, where he, with her aid, rallied Zabulon and Nephthali, and took the field with ten thousand fighting men. (It was near Cedes that Haber the Cinite dwelt; he had separated from his fellow-Cinities, that sprang from Hobab, Moses' kin by marriage, and lay encamped now at the foot of the valley called Sennim.)

12 Sisara, then, hearing that Barac, son of Abinoem, had occupied mount Thabor, mustered his nine hundred chariots and all his men at the valley of Cison. Bestir thyself, Debbora said to Barac; now it is that the Lord means to put Sisara in thy power; thou hast the Lord himself for thy leader. So Barac with his ten thousand men swept down from mount Thabor, and when they came to close quarters, the Lord threw Sisara's chariots and all his force into confusion at their onslaught. Sisara himself dismounted and fled away on foot; and Barac pursued the routed chariots and troops all the way to Haroseth, till the enemy were slaughtered to the last man.

Sisara, in his flight, made for the tent of Jahel, wife of Haber the Cinite, whose tribe was then at peace with king Jabin of Asor. And Jahel, going out to meet Sisara, bade him Turn in, my lord, turn in here in safety. So he came into the tent, where she covered him up with a cloak; and when he asked for a drop of water, to relieve his great thirst, she opened a bottle of milk and gave him some to drink, then covered him up again. And now Sisara bade her stand there at the tent door; if she were asked by passers-by whether any man was there within, she was to answer, Never a soul. But Jahel, Haber's wife, taking one of the tent-pegs and a mallet, too, with her, crept quietly in, put the peg close to his forehead and struck with the mallet, driving it right through his brain into the ground beneath. So he passed from the numbness of sleep into the numbness of death.

It was Barac who came up in pursuit of Sisara; and Jahel went out to meet him. Come in, was her greeting, and I will show thee the man thou art looking for; and he went in to find Sisara lying there dead, with the peg through his temple. So the Lord, that day, crushed the pride of the Chanaanite king Jabin before the sons of Israel; and their strength ever increased, till they beat him down and at last made an end of him.

5 Joyfully sang Debbora that day, and Barac the son of Abinoem with her; and this was her song. Here are Israelites that freely put their lives in peril; bless we the Lord! A word to you, kings; princes, this is for your hearing; the Lord is my theme, it is of the Lord God of Israel that I sing. Lord, when thou didst come forth from mount Seir, and pass on thy way over Edom, how the earth shook, how fast the rain fell from skies wrapped in cloud! How the hills, how Sinai itself melted away as the Lord came, the Lord God of Israel!

In the time of Samgar son of Anath, in the time of Jahel, all the roads lay unfrequented; those that used them once must now travel by bridle-paths. Gone was the warrior breed, lost to the country-side, until Debbora came, Debbora, that played a mother's part in Israel. Strange warfare this, of God's own choosing, when he himself must overthrow the enemy's ramparts; among the sons of Israel, not one in forty thousand carried shield or spear.

My heart goes out to you, chieftains of Israel; it is for you, who freely put your lives in peril, to bless the Lord; for you to speak, you that hold the judge's office, and have white asses to ride when you go on your travels. There, where the chariots broke, there, where the enemy's host was drowned, let the story of the Lord's mercies be told, the favour he shewed to the warriors of Israel. Down to the city gates they went, the people of the Lord, and won the mastery.

Up, up, bestir thyself, Debbora; bestir thyself, and chant the battle-hymn! Rouse thee, Barac, son of Abinoem, thy prey awaits thee! It was but the remnant of a people that won the day, but the Lord himself fought among their warriors. All the remnant of Ephraim had Amalec to detain them;¹ against Amalec's tribes Benjamin, too, was matched. But chieftains came from Manasses, marshallers of the host from Zabulon; the leaders of Issachar, too, were at Debbora's side, and followed Barac into danger, as he rushed headlong down from the steep. But what of Ruben? Here there was division of counsel among brave hearts. What, wouldst thou sit there between fold and fold, and listen to the shepherds piping to their flocks? Alas, for hearts so brave, and counsels so divided! Galaad took his ease on the further bank of Jordan, and Dan was busy with his merchant ventures; Aser, too, lingered by the sea-shore, safe in his harbour-towns. Meanwhile, Zabulon and Nephthali were putting their lives in peril, there on the uplands of Merome.

So the kings came down to battle, the kings of Chanaan, there at Taanach by the waters of Mageddo, but spoil had they none. Heaven itself was their adversary; the stars in their ordered course did battle against Sisara. Cison river bore away the corpses of them, river of the Cadumim, Cison river; trample on them, Debbora, warriors so valiant till now! The horses' hoofs lost their footing, so swiftly they fled, thundering down the slopes with the flower of the enemy's host behind them.

Curse the land of Meroz, the angel of the Lord says, a curse on all that dwell in it! Here were men that would not rally in the Lord's cause, would not come to aid his champions in their peril. But Jahel, wife of Haber the Cinite, blessed may she be above all women; a blessing on the tent she dwells in! One came by and asked her for water; but no, she would give him milk; why should be brought out for him in such a cup as kings use. A nail is in her left hand, a carpenter's mallet in her right; now to smite Sisara, now to find the place for a mortal blow! See with what strength she pierces his forehead through! There he lies at her feet, helpless in death, rolls there at her feet lifeless, a thing of pity to see! Long may his mother look down from that parlour window of hers, crying out on the chariot that never returns, the sound of horses' hoofs that still does not come.

Long may some princess try to comfort her, with wiser counsel than the rest: Even now, like enough, he is dividing up the spoil, of the captive women choosing out the fairest; Sisara shall have embroidered garments for his share; see the pile of necklaces that lies there, so intricate in design!

So perish all thy enemies, Lord; and may all those who love thee shine out glorious as the sun's rising!²

And so for forty years the land was at peace.

6 After this, the sons of Israel defied the Lord again, and for seven years he left them at the mercy of the Madianites, who crushed them down unsparingly; so that they were fain to take refuge in caverns and shafts and mountain fastnesses. The men of Israel would sow their lands, and then Madian and Amalec and the tribes east of them would invade the country; encamping there, they destroyed all the growing crops right up to Gaza, till there was no food left in the land of Israel for ox or sheep or ass. Carrying their tents and driving their cattle before them, they came in and spread over the country-side, hordes of men everywhere and trains of camels, like a swarm of locusts, destroying all that lay in their path. Thus Madian brought the Israelites into great need, and they cried out to the Lord for redress. But he, through a prophet, sent them this message from the Lord God of Israel: I recalled you from Egypt, rescued you from your prison there, defended you, not only against the Egyptians, but against all the hostile nations that were dispossessed of their lands to make room for you. And I told you, I am the Lord your God; you must pay no reverence to the gods of the Amorrhites, in whose land you dwell; but my command went unheeded.

11 And now an angel of the Lord came and waited by the oak-tree at Ephra, which then belonged to Joas, of the family of Abiezer. His son Gedeon had gone out to the wine-press, so as to thresh his wheat there unobserved by the Madianites, and suddenly the Lord's angel appeared to him, and said, The Lord Be with thee, courageous heart! Ah, Sir, replied Gedeon, but tell me this; if the Lord is with us, how is it that such ill fortune has overtaken us? Not for us, now, those miracles of his that were on our fathers' lips, when they told us how he rescued them from Egypt. The Lord has forsaken us now, and lets the Madianites have their will with us. Then the Lord looked at him, and said, Thou hast strength; go and set Israel free from the power of Madian.¹ Such is the mission I have for thee. What, Lord! said he, I deliver Israel? Why, my clan is the poorest in all Manasses, and in all my father's house none counts for so little as I. I will be at thy side, the Lord told him, and thou shalt smite Madian down as though but one man stood in thy path.

Hereupon Gedeon answered, As thou lovest me, give me some proof this is thy word that comes to me. And first, do not leave this spot till I come back here with a sacrifice to offer thee. I will await thy coming, he said. So Gedeon went in and cooked a goat, took a bushel of flour and made unleavened bread, put the meat in a basket and the broth from the meat into a pot, and brought them all out, there beneath the oak, to make his offering. Take the meat and the loaves, the angel of the Lord said, and lay them down on yonder rock, and pour out the broth over them. So he obeyed, and with that the angel of the Lord held out the staff he carried, and touched meat and unleavened bread with the tip of it; whereupon fire blazed out from the rock, and all was consumed. And he looked, and the angel of the Lord was there no longer. Then Gedeon knew that this was an angel of the Lord, and he cried out, An ill day for me, O Lord my God; I have seen the Lord's angel face to face. But the Lord's word came to him, Be at peace, and have no fear; thou shalt not die. So Gedeon built an altar there and called it the Peace of the Lord; it stands there to this day.

This, then, was Gedeon's home, in Ephra, that belongs to the clan of Abiezer. And that night the Lord said to him, Take with thee two bulls, the one that belongs to thy father, and another of seven years old, and overthrow Baal's altar that stands on thy father's land, cutting down the sacred wood around it.² Then, on the top of this rock on which thou didst lay thy sacrifice to me, build an altar to the Lord thy God; and there offer the second bull in burnt sacrifice, over a fire made from the wood thou hast cut down. So Gedeon did as the Lord bade him, with ten servants of his father's to help him, at dead of night; he would not do it by day for fear of his kindred and his fellow-citizens. And when these citizens awoke next day, there was Baal's altar destroyed, and the wood about it cut down, and a second altar built, with the dead bull lying on it. Who had done it? They made enquiry, and were told that it was Gedeon son of Joas. Whereupon they would have Joas bring out his son to pay the death-penalty for overthrowing Baal's altar, and cutting down his sacred wood; but his answer was, What, does Baal need champions such as you to vindicate him? Nay, let the man who is his adversary be struck dead before to-morrow's light, if he is indeed a god; let him take his own vengeance on the man who destroyed his altar.¹ And from this saying of Joas, that Baal ought to punish the destroyer of his own altar, Gedeon from that day onwards was called Jerobaal, Let Baal defend his own cause.

When next Madian and Amalec and the peoples of the east crossed the Jordan together, and encamped in the plain of Jezrael, the Spirit of the Lord wrapped Gedeon round. One blast of his horn rallied Abiezer's clan behind him; then he sent messengers out all through Manasses, and Manasses, too, were of his company; then other messengers to Aser, Zabulon and Nephthali, and these came out to meet him. And Gedeon asked for a sign from God: If thou meanest to fulfil thy promise, and make use of me to deliver Israel, let me have proof of it. This fleece shall lie on the threshing-floor; fall the dew on the fleece only, and let the ground be dry, I shall know that thy promise holds good; I am to be the means of Israel's deliverance. And so it was; when he awoke next morning, he wrung it out, and filled a tankard with the dew. But he pleaded once again, Do not be angry with me if I put thee to one more test, still with the fleece for my proof. This time, let the fleece remain dry, while the rest of the ground is wet with dew. And that night, God granted his prayer; dew lay all over the ground about it, and the fleece alone was dry.

7 Jerobaal, then, (or Gedeon) rose at break of day and led his army to the spring called the Spring of Harad. The camp of Madian lay there in the valley, with a high hill to the south of it. This is a great army thou hast with thee, the Lord told Gedeon. I must not grant victory over Madian to an army like this, or the Israelites would boast that they had no need of me; that their own strength had brought them deliverance. Make it known publicly, for all to hear, that any man who shrinks back or is afraid is free to go home. So twenty-two thousand of his men, from the hill-country of Galaad, went back home, and left him with only ten thousand. But the Lord said to Gedeon, Thy army is still too great. Take them down the water-side, and I will test them there. I will tell thee which of them are to march in thy company, and which are to return home instead. And when they reached the water, the Lord's command to Gedeon was, Separate those who lap the water like dogs, and those who go down on their knees to drink. There were only three hundred that took up water in their hands and lapped it, all the rest knelt as they drank; but the Lord said to Gedeon, These three hundred men who lapped the water shall win you deliverance; I will put the Madianites in their power. Send all the rest of thy companions home. So he would have food left, and a trumpet for each man; then he sent the others back to their own dwelling-places, and with three hundred men prepared to give battle.

The camp of Madian lay there in the valley below him, and that night the Lord said to him, Bestir thyself, and go down into their camp; I have left them at thy mercy. If thou art afraid to go alone, thy servant Phara shall go with thee. Listen to what they are saying, and it will give thee courage, bid thee go down more confidently to the attack. So Gedeon and his servant Phara made their way down to a part of the camp where sentries were on guard. There were Madian and Amalec, and all the tribes of the east, scattered through the valley, like a swarm of locusts; countless as the sea sand, their camels lay beside them. As Gedeon approached, one of the men was telling his neighbour of a dream that had come to him, and this was the way of it: It looked, in my dream, as if a barley griddle-cake went rolling along and tumbled into the Madianite camp, where it struck the first tent it reached and overturned it, so that it lay flat on the ground. Why, said the other, what should this be but the sword of that Israelite, Gedeon the son of Joas? The Lord means to put Madian and all Madian's host into his power.

15 Gedeon fell on his knees when he heard what the dream was, and how it was interpreted. Back he went to the camp of Israel, and cried out, Bestir yourselves, the Lord has left the Madianite camp at our mercy. Then he divided his men into three companies, and bade each man carry a trumpet, and an empty jar, and in the jar, 16 a lighted torch. Mark what I do, and do the same, he told them; when once I have reached the edge of the camp, follow, all 17 of you, my example. I shall hold up my trumpet and blow a blast, and you too must blow a blast, on different sides of the camp; then you will cry aloud, For the 18 Lord and for Gedeon! So Gedeon and his three hundred men reached the edge of the camp, just as the midnight watch began, when the newly posted guards were wide awake. Every trumpet blew, and every jar was shattered against its neighbour; and on three sides of the camp, after 20 the crashing of the jars, men stood there with torches in their left hands, and ringing trumpets in their right; and now the cry came, Your swords, now! For the Lord and for Gedeon!

21 Thus posted on different sides of the enemy's camp, they threw all into confusion; and the Madianites fled, crying aloud for terror, while the three hundred men still pressed on, and still the trumpets blew. And all through the camp the Lord spread destruction, friend turning his sword against friend; till at last in their flight they reached as far as Bethsetta, and the river-bank at Abelmehula in Tebbath. Here the Israelites from Nephthali and Aser and the whole of Manasses gave chase; Gedeon sent messengers, too, all 24 through the hill-country of Ephraim, bidding them come down and confront Madian, seizing the water-courses that go down to Bethbera and the Jordan; so Ephraim raised the hue and cry, and intercepted both the water-courses and Jordan itself as far as Bethbera. And they caught two Madianite chiefs, Oreb and Zeb, whom they put to death, Oreb at the Rock of Oreb and Zeb at Zeb's Wine-press; then they went on with the pursuit of Madian. They were carrying the heads of Oreb and Zeb with them when they met Gedeon on the further side of Jordan.

8 What means it, they asked, that thou didst not summon us to thy aid when thou wert setting out to do battle with Madian? And they were loud in their complaints, these men of Ephraim, almost ready to come to blows with him. Nay, answered he, what has my task been in comparison with yours? Abiezer's whole vintage cannot match the gleanings Ephraim has gathered up. See how the Lord would have Oreb and Zeb fall into your hands, not mine; what is my achievement beside yours? With such words he calmed the restless spirits that assailed him.

Gedeon had now reached and crossed the Jordan, with his three hundred followers. They were too weary to keep up with the fugitives, so he had recourse to the people of Socoth. I beseech you, he said, to provide food for these companions of mine, who are faint with hunger; we must needs overtake the Madianite kings, Zebee and Salmana. Why, answered the chieftains of Socoth, you would think he came to us carrying the severed hands of Zebee and Salmana with him,¹ to hear the way he talks of providing food for this army of his. So be it, said Gedeon; when the Lord has given me the mastery of Zebee and Salmana, I will come back and flay you with every thorn and brier that grows in the desert. Then he went on to Phanuel, and made the same request there, and received there the same answer as at Socoth. And he had a threat for these too: When I come back, safe and a conqueror, I will throw this tower of yours to the ground.

Zebee and Salmana had halted their men for a rest; only fifteen thousand of them were left, out of all those hordes from the east; the rest had perished, a hundred and twenty thousand fighting men. Gedeon came up along the track used by the wandering tribes east of Nobe and Jegbaa; he caught them off their guard, when they were not expecting an attack, and fell upon the camp; whereupon the whole army was thrown into confusion, and Zeeb and Salmana were overtaken by Gedeon in their flight. And now, coming back from his campaigning before the sun was up, he captured a young man that came from Socoth, and asked him the names of all the chief men and elders in the place; of these he made a list, seventy-seven of them in all. And when he reached Socoth, he told them, Here are Zeeb and Salmana, the kings whose severed hands you would have had me bring you, before you provided food to faint and weary men. So he had the chief men of Socoth brought out, and thorns and briars brought in from the desert to flay them with, and went a-threshing with the men of Socoth. Then he threw the tower of Phaniel to the ground, and killed all who dwelt in it.

After this, he asked Zeeb and Salmana about the men they had killed on mount Thabor;¹ What was the look of them? he said. None other, they answered, than thy own; not one of them but might have had such a royal father as thyself. Why, said he, these were my own brothers, sons of my own mother. As the Lord is a living God, if you had spared these, I would grant you your lives. Then he said to his eldest son, Jether, Up with thee, and put them to the sword; but Jether would not draw on them; he was a boy still, and had no heart for it. So Zeeb and Salmana said, Up, and deal the blow thyself; a man has but the strength that matches his age. So Gedeon rose up and slew them both. And for spoil, he carried off the embossed trappings that kings' camels wear about their necks.

And now all the Israelites would have Gedeon, the man who delivered them from Madian, become their ruler, and his descendants after him. Neither I, he said, nor any son of mine shall bear rule over you; the Lord shall be your ruler.

This is all the reward I ask for, that you should give me all the ear-rings you have taken as spoil. (Among the desert tribes, it was the custom to wear ear-rings.) They consented willingly enough, spreading a cloak out on the ground and throwing all their spoil of ear-rings down on it; and these ear-rings they gave him, all of gold, weighed seventeen hundred sicles. (There was much besides; collars and necklaces, and purple robes such as the kings of Madian wore, and the gold trappings of their camels.) Gedeon made of this a golden mantle,² which he set up in the city of Ephra; and faithless Israel fell to worshipping it, to the ruin of Gedeon and his race. As for the Madianites, they were bowed to the dust before Israel, and could raise their heads no longer; for a full generation, while Gedeon was there to protect it, the land was at peace.

So this Jerobaal, son of Joas, went back to his home and lived on there. By his many wives, he had seventy sons, all begotten of his own body, and in Sichem there was a concubine of his, that bore him a son, Abimelech. So Gedeon the son of Joas died, content in late old age, and was buried in the tomb of his father Joas, in Ephra, that belongs to the clan of Abiezer. It was only after the death of Gedeon that the Israelites went back to their old ways, and played the wanton with gods of the country-side. They had a covenant now with Baal, that he should be their god, and thought no more of the Lord, their own God, that had rescued them from the power of the enemies who lived round about them. And it was little gratitude they shewed to the race of Gedeon, surnamed Jerobaal, that had fought so well for Israel.

9 This Abimelech, son of Jerobaal, now betook himself to Sichem, and there conspired with his mother's brethren, and the whole clan from which his mother was descended. They were to send the word round in Sichem, Which is best, to have seventy masters over you, all Jerobaal's sons, or one? He was, after all, their own flesh and blood.

3 So his mother's brethren, by raising these whispers among the citizens of Sichern, won Abimelech their good-will; they remembered that he was their own 4 kin, and gave him seventy silver pieces, from the temple treasure of Baal-berith. With these, he hired a bodyguard of pen-5 niless rogues; then went back to his father's house at Ephra and his own brothers, the sons of Jerobaal. He murdered these at one blow,¹ all seventy of them except Joatham, the youngest, who 6 hid away and escaped. And with that all the citizens of Sichern and all those who dwelt at Mello met together, and there, by the oak at Sichern, they made Abimelech their king.

7 When this came to Joatham's ears, he went and stood at the top of mount Garizim, and raised his voice there in a loud 8 cry. Listen to me, he said, men of Sichern, as you would have God himself listen to you. There was a time when the trees went about to anoint a king who should rule 9 over them, and said to the olive-tree, Come and be our king. What, said the olive, would you have me forgo this rich influence of mine, for the service of God 10 and man, to win promotion among the trees? So they asked the fig-tree to be their 11 ruler, but the fig-tree answered, What, should I cease to yield this pleasant fruit of mine, and win promotion among the 12 trees instead? Then the trees would have the vine reign over them, but the vine said, 13 What, would you have me cease to yield wine, wine that both God and man delight in, to be the foremost of the trees?
14 So at last all the trees went to the bramble, and would have the bramble reign over 15 them. And the bramble said, If you have chosen me for your king in all honesty, why then, come and rest in my shadow. If your hearts are false, then burn bramble, and set light to all the cedars of Lebanon!

16 And you, have you kept faith and honour in making Abimelech your king? Have you dealt kindly with Jerobaal and his race, shewn gratitude for the good service he did you? Here was a man that fought in 17 your cause, that put his life in peril, to deliver you from the power of Madian. And now you have risen in arms against my father's house, you have murdered at one blow seventy men that were his sons, and you have made Abimelech, the son of his serving-wench, king of all Sichern; one that is your own kin. Was this honourably done? Have you kept faith with the race of Jerobaal? Why then, I wish you joy of your king, and Abimelech of his subjects. But if it was done amiss, then burn Abimelech, and set light to Sichern and Mello; burn Sichern and Mello, and set light to Abimelech! And with that Joatham fled, and took refuge in Bara, where he could dwell safe from his brother Abimelech's vengeance.

So, for three years, Abimelech was king in Israel; but now the Lord stirred up ill-will between Abimelech and the men of Sichern, who came to hold him in abhorrence; the foul deed done when the seventy sons of Jerobaal were slain, the guilt of the blood so spilt, was held now against Abimelech, their brother, and against the chief men of Sichern, that had been in league with him. So they laid an ambush to catch him at the head of the mountain-pass, and spent their time, while they awaited his coming, in open robbery, plundering all that went by; but Abimelech had warning of it. It was now that Gaal son of Obed appeared, and led his clansmen into Sichern. All that dwelt in Sichern were elated at his coming; out they went into the country-side, to strip the vineyards and tread the grapes. Amid the chanting of choirs, they went into the temple of their god to feast and drink deep, and curse the name of Abimelech. What, cried Gaal son of Obed, should Sichern, being the city she is, obey such a man as Abimelech? Shall this son of Jerobaal send his servant Zebul to rule over men that come down from Hamor, the father of Sichern? And must we all be his slaves? Ah, if I had but command of a people like this, I would soon clear Abimelech out of my path.

Hereupon, Abimelech was bidden muster a great force, and come with all speed. Gaal's words had come to the ears of ¹ Literally, 'over one stone', which may imply a kind of judicial or even sacrificial proceeding. But the emphasis is clearly laid upon the wholesale nature of the massacre, and some think that the expression 'over one stone' is only proverbial.

Zebul, who was in command of the city, and in high displeasure he sent Abimelech a secret message: Here is Gaal, son of Obed, come to Sichem with his clan, and means to wrest the city from thee. March out under cover of night with all the following thou hast, and lie hidden in the country round about; then, when tomorrow's sun rises, fall upon the city, and when he and his men come out to meet thee, engage them as best thou canst. So Abimelech set out on a night march with all his forces, and posted men in ambush about Sichem in four several places.

Gaal, son of Obed, had gone out to take up his stand before the entrance of the city, when suddenly Abimelech and his men rose from their ambush. And when he caught sight of them, Gaal said to Zebul, Why, what is this throng of folk coming down from the hill-top? It is the shadows on the mountain-side, said he, thou art mistaking for human forms. But Gaal repeated, There is a throng of men coming down from the uplands, and another body is moving down the road that leads to the oak-tree. And at that Zebul said, Now we shall see what becomes of that boasting of thine, Shall we obey such a man as Abimelech? See, here are the men thou didst hold in such contempt; go out and fight with them. So Gaal must needs take the field against Abimelech, with all the citizens of Sichem to watch him; whereupon Abimelech routed him, and drove him back into the city, and not a few of his clansmen fell before they could reach the city gate. So Abimelech encamped at Ruma, while Zebul drove Gaal and his clan out of the city, saying he would harbour them no more.

Next day, the citizens themselves went out on a foray;¹ when this news reached Abimelech, he led his men to the attack. He had divided them into three companies, hiding them in ambush in the country round about; and finding that the men of Sichem were at a distance from the city, he moved swiftly against them. He, with his own company, surrounded and attacked the city, while the other two companies fell on the enemy as they straggled across the plain. All that day Abimelech⁴⁵ assaulted the city; and when he took it he slaughtered the inhabitants and destroyed it utterly, and strewed salt over the ground to put a ban on it.

When this news reached the men who dwelt in Sichem Watch-tower, they took refuge in the temple of their god, whom they called Berith because they had made a covenant with him there. It gave its name to the ground on which it stood, which was strongly fortified. And Abimelech,⁴⁷ when he was told that all the inhabitants of Sichem Watch-tower were so cooped up together, led his whole force to mount Selmon. Here, with an axe, he cut down a branch from a tree and threw it across his shoulder, bidding all that were with him straightway do the like. So,⁴⁹ eagerly enough, they followed their leader's example, and when they reached the stronghold they surrounded it and set fire to it. Thus smoke and fire brought death to a thousand souls, all the men and women that dwelt in Sichem Watch-tower.

From there, Abimelech went on to the town of Thebes, and made an assault on it.⁵⁰ There was a high tower in the middle of the city, in which men and women alike had taken refuge, all the chief magistrates of the city among them. Its doors were stoutly barred, and there were battlements on its roof behind which the defenders stood. Abimelech came up and assailed it vigorously,⁵² and was standing there close by the door trying to set fire to it, when a woman threw down from the roof part of a mill-stone, which struck him on the head and pierced to the brain. Quickly he called out to his armour-bearer; ⁵⁴ Draw thy sword, he said, and make an end of me; it must not be said that Abimelech died by a woman's hand. So the armour-bearer obeyed, and made an end of him; and, once he was dead,⁵⁵ all the Israelites who marched with him went back to their homes. Thus God punished Abimelech for the wrong he did to his father's name by slaughtering those seventy brethren of his, and punished⁵⁷ the men of Sichem, too, for their misdeeds; and the curse of Joatham, son of Jerobaal, came upon them all.

¹ In the original simply 'went out', but we are probably meant to refer back to verse 25. Unless, indeed, they went out to get in the vintage.

10 The next champion of Israel after Abimelech was the son of his uncle Phua,¹ a man of Issachar named Thola. He lived at Samir in the hill-country of Ephraim, and at Samir he died and was buried, after ruling Israel for twenty-three years. He was followed by Jair, a man of Galaad, who ruled Israel for twenty-two years. He had thirty sons, each of whom rode in state on an ass's colt of his own, and ruled a township of his own; these townships in Galaad are still called Havoth Jair, Jair's Villages. And when Jair died, he was buried at a place called Camon.

6 And now the Israelites matched their old sins with new, defying the Lord and worshipping idols of Baal and Astaroth, gods of Syria, Sidon, Moab, Ammon and Philistia, forsaking the Lord and no longer paying him reverence. And the Lord, in his anger, left them at the mercy of Philistine and Ammonite, who for eighteen years wore them down and grievously harassed them. Nor was it only the old land of the Amorrites beyond Jordan, in Galaad, that suffered; these Ammonites crossed the Jordan and laid waste Juda, Benjamin and Ephraim, so that Israel was in sore distress. Thereupon they cried out to the Lord, and confessed that they had sinned against him, in worshipping the gods of the country-side; but the Lord would not listen to them. So it was, he said, when Egyptian and Amorrhite, Ammonite and Philistine, Sidonian, Amalecite and Chanaanite harassed you. You cried out to me, and I delivered you from the power of all these, and still you forsook me, still you paid reverence to alien gods; I will no longer be your deliverer. Go and ask help from the gods of your own choosing; it is they who ought to befriend you in your hour of need. We have sinned, the men of Israel answered, punish us as thou wilt, only bring us deliverance now; and with that they banished the idols of every alien god from their dominions, and went back to the service of the Lord; till at last he took pity on their distress.

17 The Ammonites had raised their warry, and were encamped now in Galaad, with the forces Israel had mustered encamped opposite them at Maspha. And the word went round among the chiefs of Galaad, Let but a champion come forward to lead us against the Ammonites, and all Galaad will make him its ruler.

11 There was a Galaadite at this time called Jephthe, who was brave and a skilful warrior; his mother was a harlot, his father bore the name of Galaad. Galaad had other sons by his lawful wife; and these, when they came of age, thrust Jephthe out of doors, telling him he was born out of wedlock, and could not inherit. So he sought refuge from their ill-will in the country of Tob, where he gathered about him a company of penniless robbers, that followed him as their chieftain. These were the days when Israel was being attacked by the Ammonites; and when they found themselves hard pressed, some of the elders of Galaad went to the country of Tob to bring Jephthe to their aid; Come and be our leader, they said, fighting as our champion against the sons of Ammon. Why, said he, are you not the very men that have used me ill, and thrust me out of my father's house? You must be hard driven by your need, that you should come to me now.

So the elders of Galaad told him what was the meaning of their errand; if he would go with them and fight against the Ammonites, he should become ruler of all that dwelt in Galaad. And you have come here, answered Jephthe, meaning in all honesty to make me your ruler, if I fight against Ammon for you and the Lord grants me victory? The Lord, said they, is listening to us as we speak, let him be the arbiter between us; let him be the witness of our pledged word. So Jephthe accompanied the elders, and the whole people acclaimed him as their leader; there at Maspha in the Lord's presence, he came to terms with them.² And next, he sent messengers to ask the king of Ammon, in his name, What interfering ways are these, that thou comest here to plunder my land? His answer was, Why, when the Israelites removed from Egypt, they robbed me of the land that was once mine, the land that is bounded by Arnon, Jaboc and Jordan; give it back to me now, and all shall be well between us.

By the same messengers, Jephthe sent back word to the king of Ammon: Jephthe thus answers thee. Neither Moab nor Ammon did Israel rob of any lands that belonged to them. When they left Egypt, and had crossed the desert that reaches down to the Red Sea, the Israelites found themselves in Cades. Here they sent out envoys to ask the king of Edom for passage through his land, but he would not listen to them; and also to the king of Moab, but he too refused. So they halted on their journey at Cades, and then passed round Edom and Moab, keeping to the east of them and encamping on the further side of Arnon, which was its frontier, so as not to trespass on Moabite territory. And now they must needs send envoys to Sehon, the Amorrhite king that ruled in Hesebon, and ask leave to pass through his land on their way to the Jordan. He too refused their request, and would not let them cross his frontier; he mustered a great army and met them at Jasa to bar their passage.

Over this king, over this army, the Lord granted Israel victory; and it was through that victory that they occupied the lands which the Amorrhites had occupied before them, the whole territory that is bounded by Arnon and Jaboc, by the desert and Jordan. It was the Amorrhites the God of Israel overthrew, in battle against his chosen people; it is Amorrhite land thou art now claiming for thy own.

For thee, all the lands thy god Chamos has won for himself; the conquests of the Lord who is our God become ours by right. What, dost thou rate thyself higher than Balac son of Sephor, the king of Moab? Prove, if thou canst, that Balac came to an issue with our people, or fought against them, although for three hundred years they occupied Hesebon and Aroer with all their townships, and all the cities this side of Jordan. And all these long years you have not lifted a hand to claim them. No, I am not doing thee a wrong, it is I that have a complaint against thee, for levying war against me unjustly. May the Lord defend the right this day between Israel's claim and Ammon's.

But to the king of Ammon the word of Jephthe's messengers brought no content. And now the spirit of the Lord was with Jephthe wherever he went, as he journeyed through Galaad and Manasses, and came to Maspha of Galaad, and marched thence against the Ammonites. And this was a vow of his, that he made to the Lord, If thou wilt grant me victory over Ammon, what living creature first leaves my doors, to greet my safe returning, shall be offered up in burnt-sacrifice.¹

Thus Jephthe offered battle to the sons of Ammon, and the Lord gave him the mastery over them, so that he drove them out of twenty cities, from Aroer to Mennith, and as far as Abel, out among the vineyards. A great victory was this, that brought Ammon down to the dust.

Then Jephthe went back to his house at Maspha. He had no children except one daughter, and she it was who came out, with music and dance, to welcome him. And at the sight he tore his garments; Alas, daughter, he said, thou hast undone me, and art thyself undone; the vow that hast once left my lips I must needs fulfil. Why, father, she answered, if thou hast uttered a vow to the Lord, carry out thy promise; I am well content, now that thou hast won redress, and victory over thy enemies. But, father, grant me this one request. Let me go away and spend two months with my fellow-maidens, out among the hills, bewailing my ill fortune, that I must die unwed. So he bade her begone for two months; and she went out among the hills with the maids that were her friends and fellows, to weep a maiden's tears. And when the two months were over, she came back to her father; and he fulfilled his promise, and she died unwed. That is why the custom grew up in Israel which has been kept ever afterwards, that for four days in every year the maidens of Israel should gather, and make lament for the daughter of Jephthe the Galaadite.

12 But now Ephraim raised the banners of civil war, crossing the river and marching northwards. The complaint they made to Jephthe was, Why didst thou not summon us to thy aid when thou didst go to war with the Ammonites? We mean to take vengeance by burning thy house down about thy ears. Why, said he, this was a bitter quarrel I and my people had with the sons of Ammon, and I did call upon you for aid, but you would do nothing; so I must needs put my life in peril, and march against the Ammonites. And now the Lord has given me victory over them; what is there in all this to make you levy war on me? So he mustered all his Galaadites, and fought against the men of Ephraim, and the Galaadites defeated them. They had taunted the men of Galaad with being fugitives from Ephraim, living in territory that belonged to Ephraim and Manasses. So now these men of Galaad seized the fords of Jordan, by which the Ephraimites must needs pass on their way home; and when any of Ephraim's men came up asking for passage, they would ask him, Art thou from Ephraim? Not I, would be his answer. Then they would bid him say the word Scibboleth, which means an ear of corn; and he would answer, Sibboleth, pronouncing the word amiss. So then, without more ado, they would take him down to Jordan ford and slay him; there were forty-two thousand men of Ephraim who then perished.

Jephte died when he had ruled Israel six years, and was buried in his own Galaadite city. After him, Israel was ruled by Abesan of Bethlehem; thirty daughters left his house to wed, and his thirty sons brought thirty brides into it. For seven years he ruled Israel, and died and was buried at Bethlehem. He was followed by Ahialon the Zabulonite, who ruled Israel ten years, and died and was buried in the country of Zabulon; and he was followed by Abdon son of Illel, a Pharathonite. Abdon had forty sons and thirty grandsons that rode upon an ass's colt each of them; and when he had ruled Israel for eight years, he too died, and they buried him at Pharathon that belongs to Ephraim, on the hill called Amalec.

13 Then, once again, the sons of Israel defied the Lord, and for forty years he left them at the mercy of the Philistines. There was a certain tribesman of Dan called Manue, who lived at Saraa, and had a wife that bore him no children. To her the Lord's angel appeared, and said, Poor barren one, poor childless one, thou art to conceive, and bear a son. See to it that no wine or strong drink, no unclean food passes thy lips, for this son whom thou art to conceive and bear is to be a Nazirite from his birth; even when he is a child, no razor must come near his head. And he shall strike the first blow to deliver Israel from the power of the Philistines. So when she met her husband she told him, I have been speaking with a messenger from God, who might have been an angel, such awe his look inspired in me. Who he was, his home, his name, he would not tell, but the message he gave me was that I should conceive, and have a son. And I must abstain from wine and all strong drink, and from all unclean food, because this son of mine was to be a Nazirite from his childhood up, bound to the Lord by his vow from the day of his birth to the day of his death.

Thereupon Manue entreated the Lord to send his messenger again, and tell them how this child, once born, should be nurtured. And the Lord granted his prayer; once more the angel of God appeared to his wife, as she sat resting in a field. Her husband was not with her, and she, upon sight of the angel, ran off to fetch him; He has come back, she told him, the man I saw a few days since. So he rose and followed her, and asked the angel whether it was he that had brought the message to his wife; Yes, he said, it was I. Tell me, then, said Manue, when thy promise is fulfilled, what life is the boy to lead, what things are they he must shun? But the angel of the Lord answered, Enough that thy wife should observe the warnings I gave her,¹ eating nothing that grows in the vineyard, drinking no wine or strong drink, abstaining from all unclean food; these commands of mine she must carry out faithfully. And now Manue said to the angel of the Lord, Pray do me one favour; allow us to cook a kid for thy eating. Detain me if thou wilt, said the angel, but of thy food I must not eat; offer burnt-sacrifice, if thou wilt, to the Lord. And still Manue did not recognize that it was the Lord's angel; What is thy name? he asked. If thy words come true, we would fain give thee some token of gratitude. My name? said he. Do not ask my name; it is a high mystery. So Manue brought the kid, and a bread-offering with it, and laid it on the rock, presenting it before the Lord; and mystery indeed there was, before the eyes of Manue and his wife; ¹ as flames went up to heaven from the altar, the angel of the Lord went up too, there amid the flames. At the sight, Manue and his wife fell down face to earth. Now that he had disappeared from their view, Manue knew him for what he was, and said to his wife, This is certain death; we have seen the Lord. Nay, answered his wife, if the Lord meant us harm, he would not have accepted our sacrifice and our bread-offering; he would not have shewn us this marvellous sight, nor told us what is to befall. And so she bore a son, and called him Samson. As the lad grew, the Lord's blessing was on him. It was at the Encampment of Dan, between Saraa and Esthaol, that the spirit of the Lord first visited him.

14 Samson paid a visit to Thamnatha, and there was a woman there, a Philistine, that took his eye; and when he went home he told his father and mother, I have seen a Philistine woman in Thamnatha I would fain have you choose out for my bride. What, said his parents, canst thou find no bride amongst the women of thy own tribe, nay, of all Israel, that thou must wed the daughter of some uncircumcised Philistine? She must be thy choice for me, Samson told his father; I like her well. How could they know that this was the Lord's will; that this was to be the occasion of a quarrel between Samson and the Philistines, who then held Israel under their dominion? So, with his father and mother, Samson went to Thamnatha again. And now they had reached the vineyards belonging to the town, when, of a sudden, he met a young lion, that roared upon him savagely. Thereupon the spirit of the Lord came down upon Samson, and although he had no weapon, he tore it to pieces as easily as if it had been a kid. He told his father and mother nothing of it, but hastened on to have speech with the woman he loved. 7

Some days afterwards, he came there again to make her his wife. He turned aside on his way to find the lion's carcass; and what should he find in its mouth but a swarm of bees, and a comb of honey? So he carried off the comb, and fell to eating it as he went along; gave some, too, to his father and mother to eat, but still did not tell them that the honey came from a lion's body. And now that Samson's father had reached the home of his daughter-in-law, he gave a feast in Samson's honour; for still the young men would be at their feasting; and thirty of these had been appointed by their fellow-citizens, when he came, to be his companions for the wedding. To these, Samson proposed that he should ask them a riddle; if they could answer it within seven days, while the feasting lasted, he would give each of them a linen shirt and a new garment; if they could not, each of them should do the same by him. Tell us the riddle, they said; let us hear it. And he said, Out of the eater came food, and out of strength, sweetness. The third day came, and still they had not found the answer. And at last, on the eve of the seventh day, they went to Samson's wife; Use all thy arts, they said, with thy husband, and make him tell thee what the riddle means; or we will burn thy father's house down, and thyself with it; didst thou bid us to the wedding only to strip us bare? Already, when she was alone with Samson, she was ever weeping and bemoaning herself, Thou art weary of me, thou dost not love me any longer; thou hast asked these neighbours of mine a riddle, and thou wilt not tell me the answer. Nay, said he, why should I tell thee? Have I not kept it secret from my own father and mother? Such were the complaints she had made all through the week of the banquet; and now, this seventh day, she plied him hard, and at last he told her. At once she betrayed it to her fellow-towns-

¹ The Latin version is probably meant to read 'presenting it before the Lord, who does marvels; meanwhile Manue and his wife looked on'. But it is possibly meant to be rendered as above, which would be more in keeping with the sense given by the Hebrew text.

18 folk, and they, before the sun of the seventh day had set, asked Samson, What is sweeter than honey, what is stronger than a lion? You have been yoking my heifer, said he, to your plough, or my riddle would 19 be unanswered still. Then the spirit of the Lord came upon him, and he went down to Ascalon and there slew thirty men, whose clothes he stripped off and gave to the answerers of his riddle. So, in high displeasure, he went back to his father's 20 house, and his wife mated with one of these friends of his, that had been his guests at the wedding.

15 Some time had passed, and they were cutting the wheat already, when Samson went to visit his wife, bringing a kid from his herd as a present to her. But now her father would not let him pass into her inner room, as his wont had been;
 2 Why, he said, I thought past all doubt thou hadst grown weary of her, so I gave her in marriage to one of thy friends. But there is a younger sister of hers, and a fairer still;
 3 she shall be thy wife instead. From this day onward, Samson answered, the Philistines are to blame, not I, if I do them 4 despite. Away he went, and caught three hundred foxes; roped them, tail to tail, 5 with fire-brands between, and so turned them loose, with the fire-brands alight. Soon they were among the crops of the Philistines, which caught fire, stooks and standing corn alike, and set fire in their 6 turn to olive-yard and vineyard. When the Philistines enquired about the author of this, they were told how Samson's wife had been taken from him and given to one of his friends, and this was his revenge on his father-in-law. Whereupon they made their way to Thamnatha, and burned both 7 the woman and her father alive. Well, said Samson, you have had your way, but I will make you suffer for it before I have done
 8 with you; and with that he made such a massacre that all sat huddled in fear of him.¹

Then he left them, and went to live in a cave on the Rock of Etam. And now the Philistines invaded Juda, encamping, with little order, about the place afterwards called Lechi, the Jaw-bone; and when the men of Juda asked on what errand they came, they said they had come to make Samson prisoner, and take vengeance on him for all the ill he had done them. So three thousand men of Juda went to the cave on the Rock of Etam; What are these wild doings of thine? they asked Samson. Dost thou not know that the Philistines have the upper hand of us? Nay, said he, I did but serve them as they served me first. Our purpose, they said, is to hand thee over bound to the Philistines. Swear to me then, answered Samson, that you will not kill me yourselves. Kill thee? said they. No, we will not kill thee; we will hand thee over as a prisoner. So bound he was, with two new ropes, and carried away from the Rock of Etam.

Loud was the Philistines' cry of triumph that went up to meet him at Lechi; but suddenly the spirit of the Lord came upon him, and his bonds parted and snapped like scorched tow. No weapon had he, but he found a bone lying there, an ass's jaw-bone; took that instead, and killed a thousand men with it. With the bone of an ass, he cried, I have made bones of them; with the bone of an ass a thousand men lie slain.² This song sung, he threw the jaw-bone away; and the name he gave to the place was Ramath-Lechi, the Brandishing of the Jaw-bone. But now he was thirsty, and made his complaint to the Lord, Here is a servant of thine, whom thou hast used to win a great victory, a great deliverance, and dying of thirst! Wilt thou leave me, after all, at the mercy of men uncircumcised? And at that, the Lord made the hollow cleft which is called the Tooth of the Jaw-bone, and water came out of it;³ so he drank, and his spirits revived, and his strength returned to him. The place has been called the Praying Well of Lechi ever since.

For twenty years after that, while the Philistine troubles lasted, Samson was ruler of Israel.

16 At another time he went to Gaza, and would pass the night with a harlot he had seen there. The news came to the ears of the Philistines that Samson was in the town, and they cut him off from escape by posting guards at the city gate; no need to do anything while night lasted, they could kill him next morning on his way out. Samson slept on till midnight; then he rose up to go. Finding the gates locked, he took them up, bar, gate-posts and all, put them on his shoulder, and carried them to the top of the hill which looks down towards Hebron.

His next love was a woman called Dalila, who lived in the valley of Sorec. To her the chiefs of the Philistines had recourse; Use all thy arts, they said, and find out from him what it is that makes him so strong; how we can get the better of him, make him a prisoner and have him at our mercy. Do this for us, and each of us will give thee eleven hundred pieces of silver. So Dalila asked Samson, Tell me, what makes thee so strong? What bonds should a man use to bind thee, if he would have thee at his mercy? Bind me with seven strands of gut, still fresh and undried, Samson told her, and I shall be no stronger than other men. Such a cord the Philistine chiefs brought her, and she bound Samson with it; meanwhile they lay concealed in her house, waiting in an inner room to see what came of it. Samson, she cried, the Philistines! Whereupon he broke through his bonds, as if they had been made of the refuse of cow, and scorched besides. And about that strength of his, none was the wiser.

It was but a jest, then, said Dalila; thou wert tricking me? Tell me the truth this time; what bonds can bind thee? New ropes, he answered, that have never yet been used; bind me with those, and never a man so weak as I. So once more Dalila bound him, once more she cried, Samson, the Philistines! And the men hidden in the inner room saw him break his bonds like a thread. What, cried Dalila, still mocking me, still at thy lying? Tell me what the right bonds are. Why, answered Samson, if thou shouldst weave seven of the hairs on my head into that web of thine, and tie them to the peg of the loom, and make it fast in the ground, then I should be weak enough. This, too, Dalila did; but when she awoke him by crying Samson, the Philistines! he rose to his feet carrying away peg and web and all.

Come, said Dalila, thou dost pretend to love me; wilt thou not let me share thy thoughts? Three times thou hast put me off with lies, instead of telling me the secret of thy great strength. Thus did she torment him, plying him with questions day after day, and giving him no peace, till at last she crushed his spirit altogether, and made life a burden to him; and at last he told her the truth. I am a Nazirite, he said; that is to say, I am consecrated to God from birth, and this hair of mine has never felt the touch of steel. If my hair were cut, my strength would leave me; I should lose it all, and become like other men. She could tell, now, that he was keeping nothing back from her, and she sent a message to the Philistine chiefs, Come to my house this once more; he has told me everything. So they came, and brought with them the money they had promised her. And now she made him lie down to sleep at her knees, with his head in her lap, and called her manservant.¹ And she cut off the seven locks of Samson's hair, resolved now to cast him off and spurn his love.² All at once his strength left him; and when she awoke him with her cry, Samson, the Philistines! it was in vain that he sought to escape by shaking off his bonds as of old. The Lord was at his side no longer, and the Philistines held him fast. First they blinded him, and then carried him off bound to Gaza, where they made him work as a prisoner at the mill.

But now the hair began to grow again on the shorn head. After a while, the chiefs of the Philistines met to offer their god Dagon high sacrifice, and to hold a banquet. What an enemy, they said, was

¹ 'Her manservant'; literally, in the Latin text, 'a barber'; but it was Dalila herself who cut the hair, and the man would only be needed to bring her the razor. ² The Hebrew text has, 'And she began to afflict him', perhaps meaning 'she thus became the author of all his subsequent ill-fortune'.

24 this Samson! And our god has given us the mastery of him. Thereupon the common folk took up the same cry of praise; Our god has given us the mastery, they said, over this enemy of ours, that so 25 ruined our lands, that slew so many. And in their mirth, as they drank together after the banquet was eaten, they had Samson brought in to provide sport for them. Provide sport for them he did, set free for a while from his prison, standing between two pillars, where they had made place for 26 him. Then he said to the boy who was leading him about, Now guide my hands to the two pillars that support the building; I would lean my weight on them and rest a little.

27 The building was thronged with men and women both; all the chiefs of the Philistines were there, and from the roof, with its balcony, some three thousand men and women looked on while Samson provided them with sport. And now he called 28 the Lord to his aid; Lord God, he said, bethink thyself of me, and give me back, for this once, the strength I had of old. One stroke of vengeance, my God, on the enemies who have robbed me of both my 29 eyes! And with that, he caught the two pillars the building rested on, one in his 30 right hand and one in his left, crying out, Now, Samson, die with the Philistines! And he shook the pillars with such force that the whole building fell and crushed the chiefs of the Philistines, crushed all the throng that was there about him. Great toll Samson took of them in his life-time, but greater as he died.

31 And all his brethren and kindred went down to carry off his body, which they buried in the tomb of his father Manue, between Saraa and Esthaol. His rule over Israel had lasted twenty years.

17 Now turn we to a man called Michas, who lived at this same 2 time in the hill-country of Ephraim. His mother had lost eleven hundred silver pieces, which she had set aside; and when,

in his presence, she pronounced a curse on the thief, he told her, I have the money, I took it for myself.¹ No curse, then, said she, but a blessing from the Lord on this son of mine. And she told him, as he gave it back to her, I solemnly dedicate this sum of money to the Lord, promising him that my son shall have it from me, to make himself a graven image, with a sheath of cast metal. So now after all it is thine. Then she took out two hundred of the pieces so restored, and gave them to a silversmith, to be melted down into the sheath of a carved image; and there the image stood, in the house of Michas.² He set apart a shrine for the worship of God,³ furnished it with vestments and household deities and installed one of his sons as the priest of it. (This was in the old days of Israel before the monarchy, when men lived by the best light they had.)

But the lad was to have a rival, a young man from Bethlehem-Juda, ranking as one of Juda's clan, but himself a Levite, come from other parts. And now he would leave Bethlehem and go on his travels to find a home that suited him. His journey took him to the hill-country of Ephraim, and there, for a while, he lodged at Michas' house. When he was asked whence he came, and told them he was a Levite from Bethlehem-Juda, looking for a home that suited him, Why, said Michas, live here with me, and I will honour thee like a father and a priest. Ten silver pieces thou shalt have each year, and a fresh suit of clothes, and thy livelihood. To this he agreed, and dwelt there with him, as well cared for as if he had been one of his sons; and Michas, when he installed the young man as priest in his household, flattered himself that God's blessing would be with him, now that he had a priest by him of the Levite family.

18 These were days when no king yet ruled in Israel. And the men of Dan were still trying to find a home to live in; the portion allotted to them among the other tribes had not yet fallen into their hands. So, from their quarters at Saraa and Esthaol, they sent out five champions of theirs to make a careful survey of the land. Setting out with these orders, they reached the hill-country of Ephraim, and there found a lodging at Michas' house. Here, among strangers, they recognized the tones of the young Levite's voice; Why, they said, who persuaded thee to come into these parts? What errand brought thee here? So he told them what Michas had promised to do for him, and what payment was made him for living there as priest of the shrine. They asked him, too, to consult the Lord, and tell them whether their journey should prosper, and its end be achieved; Go on undismayed, said he, the Lord looks favourably on your journey, and its errand.

¹ That the money had been stolen, is not made clear in the Latin version. ² The literal sense of this verse is that two images were made, one carved and one cast in metal. But if there was a carved image, with a detachable metal casing, we can more readily understand why the whole is treated as one thing in this verse, as two things in 18. 17 below. ³ The Hebrew text might also be rendered 'a shrine of gods'; it seems clear that Michas combined the worship of the true God with that of idols (cf. 18. 24 below); a fact for which the next verse in some sort apologises. The word used for 'vestments' in the Hebrew text is of somewhat doubtful significance; cf. note on 8. 27.

So these men went on their way, and when they reached Lais, they found a city where men dwelt free from all alarms. This was the way of the Sidonian folk, to live tranquilly and at ease; no civil power restrained them, and they had great wealth. Lais, too, was at a distance from Sidon, and remote from all the world. So, when they came home, and their fellow-tribesmen at Saraa and Esthaol asked them how they had sped, they answered, Up, friends, to the attack! We have found lands both rich and fertile; we must not miss our opportunity by dallying here. March in and take possession; the task is light. We can fall on them unawares, and the Lord will make us masters of their territory, broad lands, with no lack of anything earth yields.

So six hundred men of Dan, from Saraa and Esthaol, marched out fully armed, and made their first halt at Cariathiarim, in Juda, on the spot which has been called the Camp of Dan ever since, just west of Cariathiarim. Thence they made their way into the hill-country of Ephraim; and when they reached the house of Michas, the five men who had been sent on the mission to Lais said to their fellow-tribesmen, Do you know what we found in that house? A sacred mantle, and household deities, and a carved image with a sheath of metal. Look well to it what course you will take. So they turned aside a little to visit the lodging of the young Levite that was priest in Michas' household, and gave him friendly greeting. Six hundred armed men stood at the door, while those who had made their way into the young man's lodging set about carrying off carved image, and mantle, and household deities, and metal sheath all together; and all the while the priest was in the doorway, with six hundred fighting men close by. As they brought out these treasures one after another, the priest asked them what they would be at, but they bade him keep his lips tight shut, and come with them. We will honour thee, they said, as father and priest. Wouldst thou rather be priest to one man's household than to a whole tribe, a whole clan of Israel? For the Levite, it was pleasant hearing enough; he took up mantle and household deities and image, and went off in their company.

So on they went, with children and pack animals and stores travelling in front, and were a long way from Michas' house when they heard his men coming up behind them with a great hue and cry, calling on them to halt. At that, they looked round and asked Michas what ailed him, what all the shouting meant. You have robbed me, he answered, robbed me of the gods I made for myself, of my own priest, of all that I had, and you ask what ails me! It were well, the children of Dan said, that we should hear no more of thy complaints. There might be some hot-heads among us would turn back to meet thee, and thou and thine would rue it! With that, they went on their way, and Michas, who saw they were too strong for him, must betake himself home.

Taking the priest, then, with them, and the rest of their plunder aforesaid, the six hundred men reached Lais. There they found all the citizens living at ease, free from alarms, and they put them to the sword, burning down their city. There was none to bring aid; they were far from Sidon, and with all the rest of the world fellowship and commerce they had none. It was in Rohob their city lay, and the men of Dan rebuilt it to make their home in it, calling it Dan, after their ancestor that was Israel's son, and Lais no longer. And there they set up the image; the tribe of Dan had its own priests down to the day when it went into exile, descended from Moses' son Gersam, and his son Jonathan. All the time God's house was at Silo, there in Dan stood Michas' image. So it was in the old days, before a king ruled in Israel.

19 There was another Levite, living in the hill-country of Ephraim, that took a woman from Bethlehem-Juda for his mate; but she played him false, and went back to her father's house at Bethlehem, and stayed there four months. Then her lord went after her, with one of his servants and two asses, to end the quarrel with soft words and win her back again; and as for her, she made him welcome in her father's house. Her father, too, was glad at the news, and rejoiced to see him; he was entertained as a friend, and lodged for three days with his father-in-law, eating and drinking at ease in his company. On the fourth day, he would have set out early; but his father-in-law would still detain him; A mouthful of bread, to stay thy appetite, and then take the road. As they sat down together to eat and drink, the father would have him wait till the morrow, and spend the day in good cheer; in vain he rose up to go, his father-in-law would take no denial; he must spend the night there. Even when the fifth day dawned, and the Levite was for setting out, the other would have him take a little food while the day was young, to refresh him for his journey. So they sat at table together; and now the young man must take the girl with him, and summon his servant, and begone. Why, said his father-in-law, there is little day-light left now; evening draws on. Better wait one more day, and spend it in good cheer, and take thy way home to-morrow. But this time his son-in-law would not listen to him; there and then he set out on his journey.

So the asses were saddled, and man and woman made their way to Jebus (which is the same as Jerusalem); but even as they approached Jebus, night-fall was not far off. Master, the servant said, let us turn aside and find a lodging in this city of the Jebusites. What, said his master, betake ourselves to an alien town, that is no part of Israel? No, I am for pressing on to Gabaa, to find a night's lodging there, or perhaps to Rama. So they passed by Jebus and held on their way; but the sun had set before they reached Gabaa, which is a town belonging to Benjamin. To it they turned aside, hoping to lodge there, but, once within, they could only sit down to rest in the main street of the town; no one would give them shelter. At last an old man came by, returning late from working on his farm; he lived in Gabaa, but he, too, came from the hills of Ephraim; he was not a Benjamite like his neighbours. And when he looked round and saw a traveller sitting there in the open street, he asked, Whence comest thou? And whither bound? So the other told him how they were returning to their home on the slopes of the Ephraim, after a visit to Bethlehem-Juda; the House of the Lord¹ was their next halting-place. But no one will give us shelter here, said he, although we have straw with us and fodder for our beasts, food enough for myself and the woman thou seest, and the servant who is with me; it is only of lodging that we stand in need. Have no fear, the old man said, I will provide all thy wants; thou canst not pass the night here in the open street. So he took them home, and fed their beasts for them; and now the travellers must wash their feet, and sit at table with him.

There, then, they sat, refreshing themselves after their journey, when suddenly wanton townsfolk beset the old man's house and fell to beating on the door, crying aloud to the owner of the house that he must bring out his guest, to satisfy their evil pleasure. So the old man went out and reasoned with them: Nay, brethren, why would you do such wrong to one who is my guest? Put away these reckless thoughts of yours. I have a daughter that is a maid, and this man too has a woman with him; let me bring these out, for your lust to feed on their shame, and let us hear no more of this unnatural purpose. But still they would not be satisfied; so at last the Levite brought out his own concubine, and gave her up to their pleasure. All night long they treated her with outrage, and in the morning let her go. And now, as the shadows lifted, she came back to the door of the house where her lord was lodging, and there fell down; so that when he opened the door next day, ready to go forward on his journey, he found his concubine there in the gate-way, with her hands spread out wide on the threshold. He thought she slept; Rise up, he said, we must be on our way; then, when no answer came, he knew that she was dead. He put her body on one of the asses, and made his way home.

His home once reached, he took a sword, and cut up her body, bones and all, into twelve pieces, which he sent round, this way and that, all through the land of Israel. None that saw it but cried aloud, Such a deed was never done in Israel, from the day when our fathers left Egypt to this! Let every man speak his mind; resolve we in common what we mean to do.

20 So the whole of Israel, all that dwelt between Dan and Bersabee, and the men of Galaad too, assembled with a common purpose before the Lord at Maspha; no chief, no clan but took part in this general muster of the Lord's people. Four hundred thousand foot, the sons of Benjamin heard, had been sent to Maspha by their fellow-Israelites. And now the Levite, the dead woman's husband, was asked how such a wrong came to be done, and told them how he had gone with his wife to lodge at Gabaa, in Benjamin; how the townfolk beset the house where he was spending the night, ready to make an attempt on his life, and how their mad lust had indeed brought about his wife's death. So I carried off the body, he told them, and cut it in pieces, which I sent round to every quarter of your dominions, to bear witness of such a wrongful and shameful deed as was never yet done in Israel. Men of Israel, you are met in council; see to it where your duty lies. And all that stood by answered with one voice, Never will we return to our dwelling-places, our homes shall see us no more, until we have inflicted a common punishment on Gabaa. We must set apart ten Israelites in every hundred, a hundred in every thousand, a thousand in every ten thousand, to supply the army with food; then we will go to the attack against Gabaa in Benjamin, and exact retribution for the wrong done.

So, with one mind and one intent, all Israel made common cause against this city. An embassy was sent to the Benjaminites to reproach them with harbouring the guilt of a foul crime, bidding them hand over the wanton folk at Gabaa that had been the authors of it, so that their death might rid Israel of a disgrace. But the sons of Benjamin would take no orders from their fellow-Israelites; all the cities which belonged to their domain sent men to Gabaa's rescue, defying the whole commonwealth of Israel. Benjamin then counted twenty-five thousand warriors, apart from the citizens of Gabaa; and these could provide seven hundred champions of their own, men who could fight as well with the left hand as with the right, and could sling a stone without missing their aim by a hair's breadth.

But Israel, without Benjamin, had four hundred thousand warriors under arms, and these now mustered at Silo,¹ where they asked divine counsel to know who should lead them into battle against Benjamin; Juda, the Lord told them, is to be your leader. So next day without more ado, they encamped close to Gabaa, and offered Benjamin battle, making an assault on the city. Hereupon the men of Benjamin made a sally, and slew, that day, twenty-two thousand Israelites. Even then, the Israelites did not alter their plan of attack, such confidence had they in their numbers and their valour. But first they went up to the Lord's sanctuary and offered, all the long day, their tearful supplications; were they to fight on against their brethren of Benjamin? Go out to meet them, the Lord said, and offer battle. This second day, when Israel marched against them, the Benjaminites made a fresh sally from the gates of Gabaa, with such a murderous onslaught that eighteen thousand warriors were left dead on the field. And now all Israel went into God's house and sat there in tears; they kept a fast till night-fall, and brought him burnt-sacrifice and welcome-offerings, consulting him about the plight they were in. At this time, the ark of God rested there, and there, too, was Phinees, son to Eleazar that was son of Aaron, in charge of God's house. And now when they asked the Lord whether they should take the field once more against their brethren of Benjamin, the answer was, Go to the attack; I mean to give you the mastery of them to-morrow.

29 This time, the Israelites hid men in am-30 bush round the city of Gabaa, and when, once again, they made a frontal attack, 31 such as they had made twice before, the men of Benjamin sallied out more boldly than ever, ready to pursue their adversaries to any distance. Just as on the two earlier days, they began cutting the Is-32 raelites down as they ran, some on the road to Bethel, some on the road to Gabaa itself, and about thirty of them fell. A fresh rout it seemed, but in truth the men of Israel did but feign flight, so as to lure their pursuers down these roads, far away from the 33 city. Meanwhile the main body of Israelites had withdrawn from the ground they held, and taken up their stand at a place called Baal-Thamar, but leaving bodies of men in ambush round the city;¹
 and these now began to disclose themselves 34 one by one, and march on the city from the west. The defenders of the city had been lured out of it by the ten thousand Israelites who came to the attack; so that now things went ill with the army of Benjamin; they were surrounded on all 35 sides unawares. So it was that the Lord struck down Benjamin at the onslaught of the Israelites, who slew that day twenty-five thousand one hundred fighting men, all of them trained to war.

36 This, then, was the way of it.² On ran the men of Benjamin, finding the conflict so uneven, and still the Israelites gave ground to them, so that they should fall into the trap which had been set for them 37 round the city. Now, on a sudden, while the men of Benjamin thus exposed their rear to attack, the men in ambush rose from their hiding-places, made their way into the city, and put everyone they found 38 there to the sword. A signal had been agreed upon between them and the rest of the Israelites; when they had taken the city, they were to make a great fire, whose smoke rolling upwards would announce 39 the capture. And this sight now met the eyes of the Israelites who had been entrusted with the fighting. They were being fiercely pressed by the Benjamites, who thought them routed and had already slain some thirty of them; but now they saw a 40 column of smoke rising up from the city.

 The Benjamites, too, looked back and saw it; saw that their city had been taken, and the flames of it were mounting up to heaven. So now the men who had been 41 feigning flight faced about, and offered fiercer resistance; while the Benjamites, when they saw what was befalling them, turned their backs and made for the road 42 that leads out into the desert. But, go where they would, the men who were matched against them were at their heels;
 and by now the men who had been burning down the city came out to meet them as well. Thus the enemy attacked them from 43 both sides, cutting them down without respite; all over the country-side east of Gabaa men were falling, and lying where they fell.

Eighteen thousand men, all their picked 44 warriors, were killed there and then; the rest of Benjamin, after witnessing their 45 defeat, escaped into the desert, and made for the rock that is ca led Remmon. Even in that flight, straggling and scattered, five thousand met their death; and another two thousand were killed by the pursuers as they tried to go further afield. Thus 46 twenty-five thousand sons of Benjamin perished, some here, some there, all of them warriors trained to battle. The whole 47 number of Benjamites that made good their escape into the desert was no more than six hundred men; and these spent four whole months on the rock of Rem-mon. Meanwhile the Israelites went back 48 and put all that was left in the city, man and beast, to the sword; and busy flames devoured every city and township in the lands of Benjamin.

21 This, too, was part of the oath which the Israelites took at Mas-pha, that none of them would wed his daughter to a man of Benjamin's race. And 2

¹ The narrative here is not clear, but it seems likely the Israelites practised a feigned withdrawal, like Abimelech in 9. 43. ² These words have been inserted to warn the reader that verses 36-46 are a more detailed account of what has already been described in verses 29-35. The Latin translator, not understanding this, here represents the Benjamites as running away, conscious of defeat; but it is clear from the context that the rout of the Benjamites does not begin till verse 41.

now they betook themselves to God's house in Silo, and sat there all day in his presence, weeping and making loud lament; Lord God of Israel, they cried, what curse is this that has fallen on thy people, that a whole tribe of us should disappear? And when day dawned they built an altar, upon which they presented burnt-sacrifice and welcome-offerings. And now the thought came to them, Was there any clan among all the tribes of Israel that did not go out to fight in the Lord's army? At Maspha, they had bound themselves by a solemn oath that anyone who failed them should be exterminated. But when, in remorse over their Benjamite brethren, they fell to lamenting over the loss of a whole tribe to Israel, and asking where wives could be found for the race to which they had all sworn they would wed no daughter of theirs, the thought came afresh, Were there any of Israel's tribesmen who did not answer the Lord's summons to Maspha? Then they remembered that the men of Jabes-Galaad had sent no aid; nor were any of them to be found now, among the muster at Silo.

So ten thousand fighting men were sent out with orders to put the citizens of Jabes-Galaad to the sword. Wives and children were to perish with the rest; but while they slew all the men-folk, and all the women who had had commerce with man, they must be careful to spare the unwedded maids. Four hundred was the toll of unwedded maids they took at Jabes-Galaad, and when these had been brought across the river to the encampment at Silo, they sent to the Benjamites at the rock of Remmon under safe-conduct,¹ bidding them come and take their wives there and then, daughters of Jabes-Galaad.

But where could any more be found, to suffice them? Still the whole of Israel was full of remorse, grieving over a tribe lost to Israel; still the elders were at a loss what to do for the rest of the Benjamites; Here are all their women-folk slain, they said, and Israel must not lose a tribe, if care or thought of ours can prevent it. Yet how should we find brides for them, pledged as we are by oath and ban not to give our daughters to Benjamin? At last they bethought themselves of a feast that is held every year in the Lord's honour near Silo, at a place north of Bethel, south of Lebona, and east of the road from Bethel to Sichem. Go and hide in these vineyards, they told the Benjamites, and before long you will see the maids of Silo come out to perform their customary dances. Then spring out upon them from the vineyards on a sudden, each of you carrying off a wife for himself, and so return to the lands of Benjamin. When their fathers and brethren come to make angry complaints of you, we will say, Forgive them; they did not claim to carry the maids off by right of conquest. You provoked them to this by refusing your consent.²

So the men of Benjamin did as they were bidden, each of them carrying off a wife for himself when the maids came out dancing; and when they were back in their own domain they built new cities to dwell in. And each son of Israel went back to the dwelling-place of his own clan, his own family. This was in the days before any king ruled in Israel, when men lived by the best light they had.

¹ The Hebrew text probably means, not 'under safe-conduct', but 'proposing terms of peace'.

THE BOOK OF RUTH

IN the old days, when Israel was ruled by judges, there was a man of Bethlehem-Juda that took his wife and his two sons to live in the Moabite country, to escape from a famine. There, in Moab, these Ephrathites from Bethlehem-Juda continued to dwell, Elimelech, and his wife Noemi, and his two sons Mahalon and Chelion; there Elimelech died, and Noemi was left a widow. But still she would be with her sons, who had now married wives of Moabite race, one called Orpha and the other Ruth. So ten years passed, and then Mahalon and Chelion both died. And now, both widowed and childless, she bade farewell to Moab and set out, with her two daughters-in-law, on the journey home; the Lord had been merciful to his people, she was told, and there was food to be had once more.

Thus Noemi left her dwelling-place; and when she set foot on the road that led to the domain of Juda, she turned to her companions, and bade either go back to her own mother's house; May the Lord shew kindness to you, she said, as you have shewn kindness to the memory of the dead, and to me; may you live at ease with new husbands. And with that she gave them a parting kiss. But no, they wept aloud, and declared they would go on in her company, to the home of her own people. Come with me, my daughters? she answered. Nay, you must go back. I have no more sons in my womb to wed you; go back, daughters, and leave me; I am an old woman, past the age for marrying. Though I should conceive this very night, and bear sons, it would be weary waiting for you till they should be grown to manhood; you would be old women too, long before your wedding day. Enough of this, daughters; it is your hard lot that makes it weigh heavy on me, this burden the Lord has given me to bear. At this, they wept louder than ever; but Orpha kissed her mother-in-law and went back; Ruth would not leave her side.

Here is thy sister-in-law gone back, Noemi said, back to her own people and the gods they worship; do thou, too, go with her. Nay, said Ruth, do not press me to go back and leave thee. I mean to go where thou goest, and dwell where thou dwellest; thy people shall be my people, thy God my God; whatever earth closes over thee when thou diest shall be my place of death and burial. Due meed of punishment the Lord give me, and more than due, if aught but death part thee and me.

When she found Ruth so resolved to bear her company, Noemi would cross her no longer, nor bid her return home; together they went on, and at last reached Bethlehem. They had scarce entered the city gate before the tale went round, and all the gossips were saying, Why, it is Noemi. Call me no longer, she said, by that name of delight; call me Mara, the unhappy one. Has not an almighty hand filled my cup with bitterness? Rich in blessings I left my home, and the Lord has brought me back destitute. So humbled by the Lord's hand, visited by the Almighty with such calamity, and will you call me Noemi still?

Thus it was that Noemi returned from the land of her adoption, with her daughter-in-law Ruth, that was Moabite born. They were just beginning to cut the barley in the fields, when she came back to her home at Bethlehem.

2 Elimelech had a kinsman called Booz, a man of great influence and wealth. And now Ruth, the Moabitess, asked leave of her mother-in-law to go out and glean after the reapers, by some rich man's favour. Go then, daughter, said she; and it so chanced that the field in which Ruth went to glean after the reapers belonged to no other than Booz, Elimelech's kinsman. After a while, he himself came out from Bethlehem, and when he had greeted the reapers, The Lord be with you, and they had wished him God's blessing in return, he asked the man in charge of them, a servant of his own, whose daughter this maid might be? It is Ruth, said he, the Moabitess, that came here

7 from Moab with Noemi; she asked leave to glean after the reapers, and here she has been, ever since morning, without once going home to rest.

8 Listen, my daughter, Booz said to Ruth; do not look for any other field to glean in; stay here and keep my maidens company, 9 following ever where they reap. My servants have orders not to interfere with thee; if thou art thirsty, go to the buckets 10 yonder and share the water they drink. At this, Ruth bowed low, face to ground; How have I deserved any favour of thine? she asked. Why wouldst thou take notice 11 of an alien woman such as I am? I have had word, he answered, of thy goodness to thy mother-in-law since thy husband's death; how thou didst leave kindred and 12 country, to dwell among strangers. May the Lord reward thee for what thou hast done; may the Lord God of Israel, in whose shelter thou hast learned to trust, 13 make thee full return for it! Then she said, This is great kindness in thee, my lord, so to comfort and encourage me, thy poor servant that cannot compare with these handmaids of thine.

4 He bade her come back when it was time for a meal, to eat bread there and dip her crust in the vinegar. So there she sat with the reapers, and still at her side the heap of parched corn grew, till she had eaten her fill, and had more to carry away.¹ 5 By the time she had risen up to go on with her gleaning, Booz had given orders to his servants that they were to put no hindrance in her way, though she were to go reaping 6 in their company; and of set purpose they were to drop some of the handfuls they gathered, and leave them there for her to glean, never shaming her by a rebuke. So it was that when she had worked till evening, and took her rod to beat out what she had gathered, she found it was a whole ephi, that is a bushel.

8 Such were the earnings she brought back with her to the city, and shewed to her mother-in-law; offering her besides some of the food that was left over when she had 9 finished her meal. Why, said Noemi, where hast thou been gleaning to-day? Where didst thou find so much work to do? Blessed be the man that has so befriended thee! And Ruth told her whose field it was she had worked in, It was a man called Booz, she said. May the Lord bless him, 20 answered Noemi; here is a man that is generous to his own, living as well as dead. And she told Ruth that Booz was their near kinsman. This too, said Ruth, was his 21 bidding, that I should keep close to his men till all the reaping is done. That is best, 22 daughter, said her mother-in-law, that thou shouldst go out to glean with those maidens of his; in some other field they might say thee nay. And with the maid- 23 servants of Booz she still kept company, till barley and wheat were both carried.

3 Now that she had come back home, her mother-in-law said to her, Daughter, I mean to win thee an easy life, and bring thee happiness. This Booz, 2 whose maidens were thy companions in harvest-time, Booz, our kinsman, will be at the threshing-floor to-night, winnowing his barley. Wash thee, and anoint thee, and 3 put on thy best array, and so go down to the threshing-floor. He will not have finished eating and drinking; do not let him see thee, but wait till he goes to bed, and mark 4 where it is that he is sleeping. Then come close, and turn back the end of his mantle where it covers his feet, and lie down there. After that, it is for him to counsel thee.

So Ruth promised to do all her bidding; 5 down to the threshing-floor she went, and carried out all her mother-in-law's plan. She waited till Booz came, his heart 7 cheered with food and drink, to take his rest by a pile of sheaves that lay there; then she crept near, turned back the end of his mantle, and lay down. At midnight, Booz 8 was startled from his sleep, and looked about him in bewilderment to find a woman lying there at his feet. Who art thou? he asked. It is Ruth, she said, Ruth, thy handmaid, that bids thee cast thy mantle over her, as one that is near of kin. The Lord bless thee, daughter, he an- 10 swered; now, more than ever, thou hast shewn the goodness of thy heart; to have no eyes for younger men, rich or poor! Be 11 comforted, thou shalt have all thou wilt of me; all the city knows thee for a bride worth the winning. True enough, we are 12

near of kin, but thou hast another kinsman 13 nearer yet. Wait till night is past; at daybreak, if he will claim thee by right of kinship, well and good; if not, as the Lord is a living God, thou shalt be mine without more ado. Sleep, then, till day comes.
 14 So there, at his feet, she slept till the night passed; and he rose while it was still too early for men to recognize one another.
 He warned her not to let anyone know that 15 she had been there; then he said, Spread out the fold of that mantle thou wearest, and hold it with either hand. So she held it spread out, and he measured out two bushels of barley for her to carry. When 16 she reached the city with her load, she found Noemi eager to know how she had fared; and she told the story of how Booz had treated her. Look, she said, he has 17 given me two bushels of barley; he protested that he must not send me home to 18 my mother-in-law empty-handed. Wait, then, daughter, said Noemi, till we see what will come of it. Here is a man that will not rest till he has made good his promise.

4 So Booz went up to the city gate, and sat waiting there. When the man he was looking for passed by, the kinsman of whom he had spoken, he called him by name, bidding him stay his journey and 2 sit there for a little; and so he did. Then Booz chose out ten of the city elders, and would have these, too, sit beside him.
 3 When they were seated, he told the rival claimant, Here is Noemi, that lately came back out of Moab, offering to sell part of the land which belonged to our kinsman 4 Elimelech. Of this, I thought it well to give thee notice, and challenge thee before the neighbours who are sitting by, and these, the elders of my people. Hast thou a mind to play a kinsman's part, and claim it for thy own? Then thou must buy it, and so enter into possession. If not, tell me, so that I may know what to do; thy right comes first, and mine second; there is no other kinsman. Yes, said he, I will 5 buy it. Why then, said Booz, if thou dost buy the land from Noemi, thou must needs take with it a dead man's widow, Ruth the Moabitess, to perpetuate the name of the kinsman whose lands thou dost enjoy.
 6 Nay, then, said the other, I forgo my right of kinship; I would not disinherit the heirs of my own body. I yield thee my rights, willing enough to forgo them.

It was the custom of Israel in old times 7 that if one kinsman yielded his right to another, he must untie his shoe and hand it over to this kinsman of his, or else the gift was not valid; thus did the Israelites put the grant on record.¹ So now Booz 8 said to the rival claimant, Untie thy shoe;
 and as soon as he had done so, made appeal 9 to the elders and to all that were present.
 You are witnesses, he said, this day, that I have reclaimed all the possessions of Elimelech, Chelion and Mahalon by purchase from Noemi: and moreover, that I have taken Mahalon's widow, Ruth the Moabitess, to wife. I mean to hand on the dead man's property to heirs of his own, so that his name may never be lost to his family, his kindred and his people. Of all this, you are witnesses. So the elders made 10 answer, and all that were present made answer, We bear witness of it. Take thy bride home, and may the Lord make her as fruitful as Rachel and Lia, that gave a posterity to Israel. May Ephrata know her worth, and Bethlehem tell her praises; may thy house be famous as the house of 12 Phares, that Tamar bore to Juda, through the sons the Lord will give thee by this wife of thine.

So Booz claimed Ruth, and wedded and 13 bedded her, and the Lord made her conceive and give birth to a son. Blessed be 14 the Lord, all the women said to Noemi, for not leaving thy family without an heir, to perpetuate its name in Israel. Here is one 15 that shall bring comfort to thy heart, and support to thy old age; such a mother is his, such a daughter-in-law is thine, whose love is worth more to thee than seven sons of thy own. And so Noemi took the child to her bosom, and still it must be she that nursed him, she that carried him, till the neigh-17 bours, congratulating her, said It is Noemi that has a son. And they called him Obed.

This Obed had a son called Jesse, that was father to David. Thus, then, runs the pedigree of Phares; Phares was the father of Esron, Esron of Aram, Aram of Amina-19 dab, Aminadab of Nahasson, Nahasson of Salmon, Salmon of Booz, Booz of Obed, 20 Obed of Jesse, and Jesse of David. 21

THE FIRST BOOK OF KINGS

SOMETIMES CALLED THE FIRST BOOK OF SAMUEL

THERE was a man once called Elcana, that lived at Ramathaim-Sophim, in the hill-country of Ephraim; he was an Ephraimite born, descended from Suph through Jeroham, Eliu and Thohu. He had two wives, one called Anna, the other Phenenna, and this Phenenna had borne him sons, whereas Annaw was childless. Never a feast-day would he keep in his own city; he must be at Silo, worshipping the Lord of hosts, and offering him sacrifice; there dwelt the Lord's priests, Ophni and Phinees, the two sons of Heli. When the time came for Elcana's sacrifice, Phenenna must have many portions, for a son here, a daughter there, and he was sad at heart as he gave Anna her single portion, for Anna he loved dearly. Why had the Lord denied her motherhood? And still she must endure bitter persecution from her rival, that did not scruple to make her childlessness a matter of reproach; year after year, when they went up to the Lord's temple for the feast, it was ever the same. In tears she sat, with no heart for eating, while her husband Elcana tried to comfort her. Anna, he said, what need to weep, what need to deny thyself food? What sorrow weighs on thy heart? Is it not worth the love of ten sons, the love I bear thee?

Once, on such a visit to Silo, when eating and drinking was done, Anna rose up from her place and went to the temple door, where the priest Heli was sitting. Sad at heart, she prayed to the Lord with many tears, and made a vow: Lord of hosts, if thou wilt take good heed of this sorrow I bear, if thou wilt keep this handmaid of thine ever in remembrance, and grant her a son, then he shall be my gift to the Lord all his life long, a Nazirite unshorn. Such was the prayer she went on repeating, there in the Lord's presence; and Heli saw her lips moving as she did so; her lips pronounced the secret petition, but with no sound. Heli thought her besotted with wine; Come, he said, wilt thou always be at thy cups? Give thy stomach a rest from the wine that so bemuses thee. Nay, my lord, said Anna, thou seest an unhappy woman, unburdening her heart in the Lord's presence; there was no wine or strong drink here. Do not think of thy handmaid as a light woman; only sorrow and bitter anguish have wrung speech from me all this while. Go then, answered Heli, and peace go with thee; may the Lord grant the prayer thou hast made. I am thy handmaid, she said; thy favour is all I ask. Then she went back, and took food, sad-faced no longer; and next morning, when they had paid their devotions in the Lord's presence, they went back home to Ramatha.

And the Lord bethought him of Anna, when next Elcana took her to his bed; so, in due time, she conceived and bore him a son. The name she gave him was Samuel, in token that he was a gift she had won from the Lord. When her husband Elcana went to offer the Lord due sacrifice, and pay his vow, taking all his household with him, Anna stayed at home. She would not go, she told her husband, until the boy was weaned; then she would herself bring him into the Lord's presence, and leave him there for ever. Do as thou wilt, Elcana said; wait here till he is weaned, and may the Lord bring his own will to accomplishment.

So she waited at home, and nursed her child till he was weaned. And now that he needed her no longer, she took him with her to the Lord's house in Silo, still so young. Three bulls, and a bushel of flour, and a skin of wine, were the offerings she made. When they brought the boy to Heli, to offer a bull-calf for him, Anna cried out, Listen, my lord! As thou art a living man, my lord, this is the same woman that stood here in thy presence, praying so eagerly!

27 And my prayer was for a son, the boy whom thou seest. I prayed to the Lord, and the Lord granted my request; and now, in my turn, I make a grant of him to the Lord, a grant that shall be long as his life. Then they offered the Lord worship, and Anna made this prayer which follows.

2 My heart thrills with joy in the Lord; pride in the God I worship lifts high my head; now can I flout my enemies, happy in thy gift of redress! Who so holy as the Lord? None, there is none else; there is no stronghold can compare with our God. Boast no more, boast no more; those lips must talk in another strain; the Lord is God all-knowing, and overrules the devices of men. See how he breaks the great warrior's bow, girds the feeble with strength; how the rich, for very need, must work as hirelings, while the hungry eat to their heart's content! See how at last the barren womb bears many, and the fruitful mother is left to languish! Lord of death and life, he brings men to the grave and back from the grave; Lord of poverty and of wealth, he alone humbles, alone exalts, raising up the poor man out of the dust, the beggar from his dung-hill, to sit among princes and reach the honours of a throne. It is the Lord that poised the round world on its foundations, and holds them in his keeping; safely his friends journey, dumb sit his enemies in the darkness; there is no protection for man in man's strength. The Lord will strike terror into his adversaries; hark, how his thunders roll above them in heaven! The Lord will sit in judgement on the remotest people of earth, the Lord will grant dominion and a sceptre of majesty to the king he has anointed. And so Elcana went back to his home at Ramatha, while Samuel remained to minister, at the bidding of the priest Heli, in the Lord's presence.

12 This Heli had two sons that were men of little worth, recked nothing of the Lord's honour or the duty of his priests to the people. When a man was sacrificing some victim, the priest's servant used to come up, with a three-pronged fork in his hand, while the meat was still cooking; and this he thrust into pot or pan, great or small, carrying off all that came up with it for the priest's eating; not an Israelite came to

Silo but went away so treated. The priest's servant, too, would come up before the fat was offered, and bid the worshipper give him some meat to cook for the priest; he would take it raw, not stewed already. In vain the worshipper protested, It is the custom for the fat to be burned at once; that done, thou shalt take meat to thy heart's content. No, give it me now, the servant would answer, or I will take it by force. This was heinous sin the young men committed under the Lord's eye; must they turn away men's hearts from honouring him with sacrifice?

Meanwhile, Samuel had begun to minister in the Lord's presence, girded, though still a boy, with the linen mantle. Every year, his mother made him a little tunic, and brought it with her when she came up with her husband on feast-days for the yearly sacrifice. And Heli gave a blessing to Elcana and his wife, May the Lord grant thee children by this woman, in return for what thou hast lent him! When they had gone home, the Lord shewed mercy to Anna, so that she conceived and bore three sons and two daughters. And evermore, boy though he was, Samuel rose higher in the Lord's favour.

Heli was now a man of great age, but tales reached him of the exactions his sons made from the Israelites; how they mated, too, with the women that kept watch at the tabernacle door. What wickedness is this of yours, he said to them, that brings me the complaints of a whole people! Amend your ways; it is ill hearing, that you should lead the Lord's people into transgression. If man does wrong to man, God's justice may yet be satisfied; if man sins against the Lord, who shall plead his cause for him? But they paid no heed to their father's warning; the Lord was resolved to make an end of them. And Samuel's boyhood went on; still as he grew he advanced in favour both with God and with men.

And now a messenger from the Lord came to Heli, and this was the Lord's warning to him: It was to men of thy clan that I revealed myself openly, when they still dwelt in Egypt as Pharaoh's servants; and I chose Levi among all the tribes of Israel to hold the priestly office, mounting up to my altar and burning incense before me, and wearing the sacred mantle in my presence; to this clan of thine I gave a part in every sacrifice Israel should offer. And now you spurn the due ordering of sacrifice and oblation in my sanctuary; the sons of Heli must have a privilege higher than my own; yours must be the first taste of every sacrifice my people Israel bring to me! Listen, then, to the Lord's decree. My purpose was that thou and thy clan should be my ministers for ever; but now never speak of that (the Lord says); honour is for those that honour me, for those that make light of me, only contempt. Behold, a time is coming when I mean to cripple thee, cripple that clan of thine; no kinsman of thine shall reach old age. Thou shalt see a rival in my sanctuary, and Israel all prosperity; but in thy kindred no old man shall be left living.¹ My altar shall still have descendants of thine to minister at it; but it shall be a sight to make thy eyes fail and thy heart faint, when so many of thy race die in their early manhood.² And for a token of this, thy two sons, Ophni and Phinees, are destined to fall, both of them, in a single day. Afterwards, I will find myself a priest that shall be a faithful interpreter of my mind and will; I will endow him, too, with a faithful posterity, to enjoy the favour of the king I have anointed.³ To him thy descendants, if any such are left, will come cringing for a silver piece and a crust of bread; Only the common portion of a priest, they will say; only a mouthful of bread, and I am content!⁴

3 In those days, when Samuel was ministering to the Lord under Heli's care, a message from the Lord was a rare treasure; he would not openly reveal himself. One night, Heli lay down to rest where he was wont to lie, his eyes dim now with age and sightless, and Samuel was asleep, there in the divine presence, where God's ark was, with the sacred lamp still burning. And the Lord's call came to Samuel. I am coming, he answered; then ran to find Heli, and said, I am here at thy summons. Nay, said he, I never summoned thee; go back and lie down again. So back he went, and fell asleep. Then the Lord called Samuel again, and again he rose up and went to Heli, to answer his summons. But still no summons had been given, and he must go back to sleep again. Till then, Samuel was a stranger to the divine voice; the Lord had not made any revelation to him. But when a third time the persistent call came, and Samuel went to Heli, still ready at his command, Heli recognized at last whose voice it was the boy had heard. Go back to sleep, he told Samuel; and if the voice comes again, do thou answer, Speak on, Lord; thy servant is listening. And Samuel went back to his bed and fell asleep.

And the Lord came to his side, and stood there waiting. Then, as before, he called him twice by name; and Samuel answered, Speak on, Lord, thy servant is listening. And this was the Lord's message to Samuel: Here is doom I mean to bring on Israel that shall ring in the ears of all that hear of it. For Heli it shall bring fulfilment of all the threats I have uttered against his clan; from first to last, they shall be accomplished. Warning enough I gave him, I would pass eternal sentence on that clan of his, for his sons' wickedness that went ever unchecked; and now I have taken an oath against all his line, sacrifice nor offering shall ever atone for their sin.

Samuel slept on till morning, when it was time for him to open the doors of the Lord's house; and fear withheld him from telling Heli of his vision. Then he heard the voice of Heli calling, Samuel, my son Samuel! I am ready at thy command, said he. And Heli asked him, What message is it the Lord has sent thee? May the Lord give thee thy due of punishment, and more than thy due, if thou hidest from me any word of the message that was given thee. Thereupon Samuel told him all that was said, keeping nothing back from him. It is the Lord, answered he, that has spoken; let him do his will.

Samuel grew up, still enjoying the

³ For the literal fulfilment of this prophecy, see III Kg. 2. 27. ⁴ The sense of the Latin version is obscure; it would most naturally be understood as meaning that Heli's descendant would come asking to be prayed for, and offering a silver piece and a crust of bread by way of a bribe, to secure his readmission to the priesthood. But the Hebrew text evidently means that he will come asking for money and bread, not offering it.

 over Israel, from Dan to Bersabee, as the

 made to Samuel in Silo, the Lord continued to reveal himself there, as he had promised; and when Samuel spoke, all Israel listened.

4 The Philistines, at this time, had mustered their forces for battle, and the Israelites went out to meet them in arms, encamping at the Rock of Deliverance;
 the Philistines were encamped marshalled their forces, and when battle was joined, they put the Israelites to rout;

 four thousand men were killed in that fight, 3 scattered through the countryside. So the army fell back upon its encampment; and now the elders of Israel were at a loss; why had the Lord so left them at the mercy of the Philistines? They would send to Silo for the ark that bore record of the Lord's covenant; surely he would come into their midst, and save them from the power of their enemies.

 brought it there all the way from Silo; and with the ark came the two sons of Heli, 5 Ophni and Phinees. Loud was the cry all Israel raised when the ark reached their camp, so loud that the earth rang again; 6 and the Philistines, hearing it, wondered what could have set the Hebrew camp in such an uproar. When they were told that the ark of the Lord had been brought 7 there, they were in a great taking of fear; God himself, they said, has come into the 8 camp! And they groaned aloud; An ill day for us! Such confidence has never been theirs till now; an ill day! What defence have we against such heavenly powers as these? These are the powers that brought great plagues on Egypt, out yonder in the 9 desert. Philistines, you must summon up your courage, and play the man, or these Hebrew slaves are like to be your masters.
 10 Courage, then; to arms! And they fought so well that Israel was utterly defeated, every man making for his own home in flight; here was a great disaster, in which thirty thousand of Israel's warriors fell.

The ark of God, too, was taken by the enemy, and Heli's sons, Ophni and Phinees, were killed.

There was a man of Benjamin that ran from the field, and reached Silo that same day, with torn garments, and dust scattered on his head. At the time when he reached it, Heli was sitting there waiting for news, on a seat by the wayside; his heart misgave him for the safety of God's ark. When the tidings so brought were made known publicly, the whole city fell to lamenting. The noise of it came to Heli's ears, and he asked what this tumult should mean. With all speed the messenger came up and told his news. (Heli was then ninety-eight years old; his eyes were dim with age now, and sightless.) I come with news of the battle, he said; this very day I have run back from the army. And the news, my son, asked Heli; what is the news? Israel has been routed by the Philistines, the messenger answered, and there is great havoc wrought among the people; and thy two sons, Ophni and Phinees, are dead; and the ark of God was taken. And Heli, when he heard mention made of God's ark, fell backwards from his seat, there in the door-way, and broke his neck, and died; so old a man was he, so spent with age. For forty years he had ruled Israel.

His daughter-in-law, the wife of Phinees, was then in her pregnancy, and near her time; she too heard that the ark of God had been taken, that her father-in-law was dead and her husband besides, whereupon her pangs bowed her down suddenly, and she gave birth. She was at the point of death when the women about her said, Take heart, thou hast borne a son; but she gave no answer, and took no heed. Only she gave her son the name of Ichabod, thinking how the divine presence had left Israel, now the ark was taken; thinking, too, of her father-in-law and her husband;
 but it was the loss of God's ark that made her say, The splendour has passed away from Israel.

5 Meanwhile the Philistines had carried off the ark of God, taking it from the Rock of Deliverance to Azotus; and when it reached Azotus it was carried into the temple of Dagon and set down there in front of Dagon's statue. Next morning, the men of Azotus woke to find Dagon lying face downwards in front of the ark; and although they put the statue back in its place, the second day shewed a worse sight still; Dagon was face downwards in front of the ark, and there in the doorway lay his head and both hands, severed from the trunk, that lay where it fell. That is why to this day the priests and the worshippers of Dagon never set foot on the threshold when they enter his temple in Azotus.

And now the Lord sent a heavy plague on the men of Azotus and its neighbourhood, to their undoing, a plague of swellings in the groin. All through their townships, all over the country-side, the infection spread; the mice, too, swarmed everywhere; in the city, the dead lay piled in heaps. The men of Azotus, finding themselves so plague-ridden, would not keep the ark of Israel's God among them any longer, to bring disaster upon themselves and their god Dagon; so they summoned a gathering of all the Philistine chiefs, and put the question what should be done with the ark. It must be carried about, the men of Geth told them, from place to place; and carry it about they did, but wherever it went, from city to city, the power of the Lord made itself felt in a grievous mortality; on high and low it fell everywhere, rotting away their inward parts, and the men of Geth could devise no better relief than to sit on seats of leather.

So now they sent the ark of God on to Accaron; but no sooner had it reached them than the men of Accaron began crying out, They have brought the ark of Israel's God here, for our ruin, our common ruin! And they summoned all the Philistine chiefs, who determined that the ark must be sent back whence it came, before it brought death on themselves and their people. No city was free from the fear of death, and God's heavy visitation; even those who survived had shameful sores to tend, and everywhere cries of anguish went up to heaven.¹

6 Thus, for seven months, the ark of the Lord remained in the country of the Philistines; and at the end of them the Philistines summoned their priests and diviners. What are we to do with the ark of the Lord? they said. How best can we send it back whence it came? And their answer was, Why, if you mean to send the ark of Israel's God home again, you must not send it back without a gift. An offering must be made in amends for the fault you have committed; and if, after that, you recover from your sickness, you will trace his hand in the calamities that now afflict you. What offering, then, must we make for our fault? they asked; and this was the answer given: You must make five little mounts of gold, and five golden mice, one for each of the Philistine provinces; it was the same divine punishment that afflicted all the provinces, all the chiefs alike. When they are ready, these emblems of your shame, these figures of the mice that have ravaged your land, make amends with them to the God of Israel, and ask relief for yourselves, and your gods, and your lands. What avails it, to harden your hearts against repentance? So Pharaoh and Egypt with him hardened their hearts, and would not let his people go till they had felt all his plagues, but in the end they went. A waggon, newly made, you must have in readiness, drawn by two heifers in milk such as never yet bore the yoke, and the calves of these must be left behind. Lift the ark of the Lord on to this waggon, and put in a casket, at the side of it, the golden offerings you would make in amends for your fault; then let it go on its way, and see what befalls. If it goes up towards Bethsames and its own land, then be sure this grievous plague of ours came from the Lord; if not, we shall know it was an evil chance, and no visitation of his.

This advice they followed, yoked to the waggon two heifers that were in milk, and left their calves stalled at home; put the ark of God on the waggon, and the casket with the five golden mice and golden mounts beside it. And the heifers went straight along the road that leads to ¹ The details of this visitation are obscure; the Hebrew text appears to be deficient, and it is difficult, in places, to attach any sense to the Septuagint Greek. An outbreak of hæmorrhoids has usually been supposed, but this would explain neither the contagion nor the mortality; and it seems better to understand the passage as referring, at least in part, to bubonic plague. The ancients are believed to have associated mice (or possibly rats) with the outbreak of pestilence.

Bethsames, and kept ever the same course, without swerving to right or left; lowing for their calves, but going on still; with the Philistine chiefs following them all the way 13 to Bethsames. The Bethsamites were out in the valley, reaping their wheat, when they looked round and saw the ark coming, 14 and they were glad men at the sight. It reached the land of Josue the Bethsamite, and there came to a stand, close by where a great stone was. So they broke up the waggon for fire-wood, and laid the heifers on it as a burnt-sacrifice to the Lord.
 15 Levites set down the ark of God, and with it the casket that contained the golden emblems, on the great stone, while the men of Bethsames, that day, brought the Lord burnt-sacrifice and offered him victims.

16 So the five chiefs of the Philistines returned, reaching Accaron that same day.
 17 The golden mounts which the Philistines gave to the Lord in amends for their fault came from the five cities of Azotus, Gaza, 18 Ascalon, Geth and Accaron; and there were golden mice to match the whole number of cities, walled or unwalled, in the five Philistine provinces, (right up to Abel the Great, where they put down the ark of the Lord, that had been till that day in the lands of Josue the Bethsamite).¹

19 And the Lord smote some of the Bethsamites themselves, for prying into the ark of the Lord. (And he smote seventy men out of the people, and fifty thousand of the common folk.)² Over this visitation the Lord had brought on them there was great 20 grief among the people; Who can stand his ground, the Bethsamites asked, before a God so holy as this? To whom can we pass 21 it on? And they sent messengers to the men of Cariathiarim, telling them that the Philistines had brought back the Lord's ark, and bidding them come and take it into their charge.

7 So they came as they were bidden, the men of Cariathiarim, and brought back the ark with them, housing it with a certain Abinadab in Gabaa;³ and they set apart his son Eleazar to keep watch over the Lord's ark. Long time the ark remained in Cariathiarim; twenty years so passed, and now the whole race of Israel sought rest from its troubles in following the Lord. Why then, Samuel told the Israelites, if your hearts are honestly set on coming back to the Lord, you must rid yourselves of all alien gods; no Baal for you, no Astaroth; your hearts must wait in readiness on the Lord and serve him only; then he will deliver you from the Philistine's power. So Israel cast Baal and Astaroth aside, to serve none but the Lord. Then Samuel would have all Israel meet at Masphath, so that he might beg the Lord's mercy for them there; and at Masphath they assembled, and drew water which they poured out before the Lord, and fasted that day, and made confession there to the Lord of their sin. And Samuel sat in judgement over Israel at Masphath.

This assembly at Masphath came to the ears of the Philistines, and their chiefs came out to offer Israel battle. Whereupon the Israelites, in great dread of them, bade Samuel pray to the Lord their God yet, if they were to be rescued from the power of the Philistines. So Samuel chose out a lamb still unweaned, and offered it whole to the Lord in burnt-sacrifice, crying out to the Lord for Israel, and obtaining an answer to his prayer. It was at the very moment when Samuel was offering sacrifice that the Philistines went to the attack; and the Lord volleyed his thunders against the Philistines that day, crashing loud above them, so that they were overcome with terror, and fell before Israel's onslaught; from Masphath all the way to the slopes of Bethchar the Israelites pursued them, cutting them down. Thereupon Samuel chose out a stone and set it up between Masphath and Sen, calling the place, The Rock of Deliverance, in token that the Lord was still their protector. So cowed were the spirits of the Philistines,

² Once more the words in brackets probably represent a corrupt text, which we have no means of restoring. According to the Septuagint Greek it was a single household, that of a certain Jechonias, that was punished, and punished for not sharing in the rejoicings of the other Bethsamites on this occasion.

³ 'In Gabaa'; the Hebrew text may also be translated 'on the hill'.

that they never crossed the frontiers of Israel again; the Lord kept the Philistines in check as long as Samuel lived. They must give back, too, all the cities they had wrested from Israel, right up to Accaron and Geth; thus the Israelites freed their territory from the Philistines' power, and enjoyed peace with their neighbours.

To Samuel men came for judgement all his life long; year by year he would go round from Bethel to Galgala, from Galgala to Masphath, holding assize in each of these cities, and so returning to his home at Ramatha; there, too, he sat in judgement, and there he raised an altar to the Lord.

8 In his old age, Samuel appointed his sons to perform the judge's office in Israel; the elder was called Joel, and the younger Abia, and they held assize at Bersabee. But these sons of his did not follow in his footsteps; greed bent them to take bribes, and to pervert justice. So all the elders of Israel met Samuel at Ramatha; Thou hast grown old, they said to him, and thy sons do not follow in thy footsteps. Give us a king, such as other nations have, to sit in judgement over us. It was little to Samuel's mind, this demand for a king to be their judge; but when he betook himself to the Lord in prayer, the Lord said to him, Grant the people all they ask of thee. It is my rule over them they are casting off, not thine. It has ever been the same, since the day when I rescued them from Egypt; me they will ever be forsaking, to worship other gods; and now it is thy turn. Grant their request, but put thy protest on record; tell them what rights their king will claim, when they have a king to rule over them.

In answer, then, to their request for a king, Samuel told the people all the Lord had said to him. When you have a king to reign over you, he will claim the rights of a king. He will take away your sons from you, to drive his chariots; he will need horsemen, and outriders for his teams; regiments, too, with commanders and captains to marshal them, ploughmen and reapers, armourers and wheelwrights. It is your daughters that will make his perfumes, and cook for him, and bake for him. All the best of your lands and vineyards and olive-yards he will take away, and entrust to his own bailiffs; and he will tithe the revenues of such crop and vintage as is left you, to pay his own courtiers and his own retinue. He will take away servants and handmaids of yours, all the lustiest of the young men, all the asses that work for you, to work for him instead; of your herds, too, he will take tithe. You will be his slaves; and when you cry out for redress against the king you have chosen for yourselves, the Lord will not listen to you; you asked for a king.

But Samuel could not gain the ear of the people; That will not serve, they cried out; a king, we must have a king! We must be like other nations, with a king to decide our quarrels, to lead us and be our champion in battle. So he listened to all this outcry of theirs, and brought it to the Lord's hearing. Give them their will, the Lord answered; appoint a king to rule over them. And Samuel bade the Israelites disperse, and go back to their homes.

9 There was a Benjamite in those days called Cis, descended through Abiel, Seror and Bechorath from Aphia, strong and vigorous, as a man of Benjamin should be; and he had a son named Saul, a fine figure of a man, none finer in Israel; he was a head and shoulders taller than any of his fellow-countrymen. There were some asses belonging to Cis that had gone astray; and he bade Saul go out on his travels, taking one of the servants with him, and look for them. All through the hill-country of Ephraim they went, and all through Salisa, without finding them; through Salim, and still no trace of them; through the country of Benjamin itself, and still no news heard of them. When they reached the Suph country, Saul turned to his companion; Come, said he, let us go home; my father will have ceased to care about the asses, and be anxious over us instead. But he answered, There is a servant of God dwelling in this city, a man greatly honoured; no prophecy of his but manifestly comes true. Let us make our way there, and ask if he can give us news 7 about this errand of ours. And if we make our way there, answered Saul, what then? What offering can we make to this servant of God? No bread left in our wallets, not even a basket of food to offer! We have no 8 present to make. I have a quarter of a shekel by me here, the other answered; some return to make for God's guidance 9 on our errand. (In those days, the Israelites used to speak of going to consult the seer, meaning by the seer what we now 10 call a prophet.) And at that Saul agreed that his plan was best; Come, said he, let us be on our way.

¹ 'Strong and vigorous, as a man of Benjamin should be'; literally, 'son of a man of Jemini, strong and vigorous'. The Latin version treats the words 'son of a man of Jemini' as if they were part of the genealogy; but a descent so traced from a nameless ancestor is both unparalleled and improbable. The Hebrew text may bear the sense 'a man of great wealth', rather than 'strong and vigorous'.

So they made for the city where God's 11 servant dwelt; and as they were climbing up the hill that led to it they met some maidens who were coming out to draw water, and asked whether the seer was to 12 be found there. He is, they answered, and not far forward on the road. Hasten after him; a public sacrifice on the sacred hill 13 has brought him here to-day, look for him as soon as you enter the city, before he goes up to take part in the feast. The people must await his coming before they can eat; he blesses the victim first, and then the guests will sit down. Up with you at once;
 14 this is the time when you will find him. So up they went into the city, and as they entered it, there was Samuel coming out towards them, on his way to the sacred hill.

15 The day before Saul's coming, the Lord warned Samuel privately, At this time of day to-morrow I am sending a man of Benjamin on an errand to thee. He it is thou must anoint to be the king of my people Israel; he is to deliver them from the power of the Philistines. Their plights have 17 not gone unheard, nor unheeded. And now, when Saul first met his eyes, the Lord told Samuel, This is the man of whom I spoke to thee; this is to be the ruler of my people.

18 There, then, in the gateway Saul came up to Samuel, and said, Pray shew me 19 where it is that the seer lives. I am the seer thou speakest of, was his answer; go up before me to the hill-top, where you shall eat at my side. To-morrow I will send thee on thy way, and tell thee all thou wouldst know. As for the asses that were lost three days since, put thy mind at ease, they have been found already. And here is all the best that Israel has to give, waiting for whom? For thee, and for thy father's kin. For me, answered Saul, a man of Benjamin, the smallest of Israel's tribes, sprung from a clan that is named last among the clans of Benjamin? What means this greeting thou hast given me?

But now Samuel took Saul and his companion with him, and led them into the dining-hall, where he gave them the highest place among the company that was bidden there, some thirty men; and told the cook, Bring out the portion I gave thee, with orders to keep it by thee separate from the rest. So the cook bore in a shoulder, and put it before Saul; Here, Samuel told him, is the provision we made for thee; sit down to it and eat thy fill; it was put aside for thee on purpose, when I invited my company. Saul, then, was Samuel's guest that day; together they went down from the hill into the city, and together they held converse on the house-top. There, on the house-top, Saul lay down and slept; waking early, at the first coming of the light, Samuel called out to him, Rise up, it is time I sent thee on thy way. Rise up he did, and together he and Samuel went out; and when they reached the edge of the city on their downward journey, Samuel said, Bid thy servant pass on before us, and do thou wait here a little; I have a message to give thee from the Lord.

10 And now Samuel took out his phial of oil, and poured it out over Saul's head; then he kissed him, and said, Hereby the Lord anoints thee to be the leader of his chosen people; thine it shall be to deliver them from the enemies that hedge them round. Wouldst thou have proof that this unction comes from the Lord? Listen, then; When thou leavest me to-day, and hast gone southward as far as Rachel's tomb, on the frontiers of Benjamin, thou wilt meet two men bringing thee news that the lost asses thou art looking for have been found; that thy father has forgotten them in his anxiety, and only asks how he is to find his son.

Then, passing further on thy way, thou wilt reach the oak of Thabor, and fall in with three men on pilgrimage to Bethel; one with three goats, one with three loaves of bread, one with a flagon of wine; from these thou wilt have greeting, and two of their loaves for a gift. So at last thou wilt come to the Hill of God, where the Philistines have set a garrison; and here, upon entering the city, thou wilt meet a company of prophets coming down from the sacred height.¹ With harp and tambour, flute and zither at their head, they will be uttering words of prophecy; and with that the spirit of the Lord will fall upon thee, making thee prophesy with the rest, and turning thee into a new man. When all these signs have been granted, go about the work that lies before thee; the Lord is at thy side. At need, betake thyself to Galgal, where I will come to meet thee, to present there thy burnt-sacrifice and thy welcome-offering; wait for me seven days, till I come and give thee thy orders.²

So parted Saul from Samuel, and as he went on his way, the Lord gave him a new heart. All the signs he looked for were fulfilled that day, and when at last he came to the Hill, there was a company of prophets on its way towards him; whereupon the spirit of the Lord fell on him, and he prophesied with the rest. None that had known him hitherto but marvelled, upon seeing him prophesy in the company of the others, what had befallen the son of Cis; Is Saul, too, they asked, among the prophets? Why, said one to another, who can tell the parentage of any of them?³ (This was how the saying grew up, Is Saul, too, among the prophets?) His trance over, Saul went on, back to the hill-country. There was an uncle of his, that asked where they had been, and was not content with their story of consulting Samuel about the strayed asses. Tell me, said he, what message did the prophet give thee? Why, answered Saul, he told me the asses were found. But of the kingship promised him he said no word.

And now Samuel bade the whole people¹⁷ gather in the divine presence at Maspha, and this message he gave them from the Lord God of Israel: It was I that rescued you from Egypt, I that protected you from the clutches of these and of all your oppressors. And now you have cast away¹⁸ your God, your only shield against so many misfortunes and afflictions; A king, you say, appoint a king to reign over us! Come then, present yourselves before the Lord, tribe by tribe, clan by clan. Then²⁰ Samuel brought forward all the tribes of Israel by name, and the lot fell on Benjamin; brought forward all the families of Benjamin by name, and the lot fell on Matri's; and in the end he reached Saul, the son of Cis. When they looked for him, he was nowhere to be found; was he on his way to Maspha? They asked the Lord,²¹ and the answer came that Saul was there, hiding in his tent. Whereupon they ran to fetch him, and before long he stood in their midst, a head and shoulders taller than any of them. The Lord's chosen! cried Samuel.²⁴ Look at him, and see if he has his like in Israel! And all the people shouted, Long live the king!

And now Samuel proclaimed to the²⁵ people what the king's rights were; wrote it down, too, in a book, which he laid up in the Lord's presence; then he bade them disperse to their homes. Saul went back²⁶ to Gabaa, and with him went some of the fighting men, whom God so inspired. There were others, graceless folk, who²⁷ asked contemptuously whether such a man as this could bring them victory; and no gift would they offer him. But Saul made as if he could not hear their mutterings.

11 It was a month later that Naas the Ammonite offered battle, and laid siege to Jabes-Galad; whereupon the men of Jabes would have made a treaty with him, and become his subjects. But² his terms were, that he should put out the right eye of each citizen, to the shame of all Israel. So the elders of Jabes asked for³

¹ 'The Hill of God' should perhaps be a proper name, 'Gabaa of God'; it was at Gabaa Saul lived. In verse 10 below. ² This seems to have been a general direction for times of emergency (cf. 13, 8), not a command to be observed on the present occasion. ³ 'Who can tell the parentage of any of them?'; literally, 'Who is the father of them?' The phrase is very obscure; the rendering given above assumes that the prophets were notoriously men of low birth, and that the question either expresses surprise (on account of Cis' wealth, 9. 1), or implies that the proceeding is natural (in view of Saul's obscurity, 9. 21).

a truce of seven days, while they sent messengers out to every part of Israel; if none 4 came forward to help them, they would open the gates to him.

5 When these messengers came to Gabaa, where Saul lived, and told the people their errand, the whole city made loud lament. And just then Saul came in from the country, driving his team of oxen; What ails the people, he asked, that they should weep? And he was told of the message 6 from Jabes. When he heard it, the spirit of the Lord fell upon him, and his heart 7 burned with rage; there and then he took both the oxen, and cut them into small pieces, which he sent round by messenger to every part of Israel; The man who does not rally, said he, to the cause of Saul and Samuel, will have his oxen treated like these. And the Lord put the whole people in such dread of him, that they answered 8 his summons to a man; when he called the roll at Bezech, Israel had sent three hundred thousand, and there were thirty thousand besides from Juda.

9 Back went the messengers, carrying word to Jabes-Galaad that relief would come next day, with the heat of the sun. So the men of Jabes, overjoyed at the news 10 the messengers brought, told Naas that they would open the gates on the morrow, and he should have them at his mercy.
 11 That next day, at the morning watch, Saul divided his army into three, and made his way into the heart of the Ammonite camp at the time of the morning watch. All morning, till the sun gained its heat, he smote the Ammonites down; and those who survived were so scattered that never a pair escaped together.

12 After this, the people cried out to Samuel, Where are the men who protested they would not have Saul for their king? Bring them out, and let us slay them. But 13 Saul answered, Nay, the Lord has given Israel a great victory; there shall be no slaughter this day. And now Samuel called on the people to come with him to Galgala, and renew the covenant of the 14 kingship there; so all went to Galgala, and there, at Galgala, took Saul for their king in the Lord's presence, which they honoured with welcome-offerings. A glad man was Saul that day, and not a heart in Israel but rejoiced with him.

12 But Samuel protested before the whole assembly of Israel: I have granted all you asked, and given you a king, who marches, now, at your head. I am an old man, and grey-haired, and you have sons of mine among you, and I am ready to answer for all my behaviour among you ever since my youth. Tell me, here in the presence of the Lord, and of the king he has anointed, have I robbed any man of ox or ass? Have I wronged anyone, oppressed anyone? Have I allowed anyone to bribe me? I will make restitution, not counting the cost. Never, they answered; never wert thou guilty of wrong or oppression; never didst thou take anything for thy own. The Lord is my witness, said he, and the king he has anointed is my witness as you stand before me this day, that you can find no charge to bring against me. The Lord is thy witness, they said.

Then he said to the people, It was the Lord that gave you Moses and Aaron, and rescued your fathers from Egypt; stand there now, in his presence, while I confront you with all the mercy the Lord has shewn to you and to your fathers, from the time when Jacob removed to Egypt. When your fathers pleaded with the Lord, he sent Moses and Aaron to rescue them from Egypt, and gave them a home in the place where you stand. But they forgot the Lord their God, till he put them at the mercy of Sisara, captain of Hazor's army, and the Philistines, and the king of Moab, who waged war against them; then they cried out to the Lord, We have sinned! We have forsaken the Lord, enslaved ourselves here to Baal, there to Astaroth! Deliver us now from the power of our enemies, and we will serve thee still. So the Lord sent Jerobaal, and Badan, and Jepthe, and Samuel, to deliver you from the power of the enemies that surrounded you, and you lived safe in your homes.

Then, when you saw Naas king of the Ammonites levying war on you, nothing would serve but that I should appoint a king to command you; as if the Lord your God were not reigning among you as your king! Here, then, at your pleasure is the king you asked for, the king you longed for; be content, the Lord has given you a king. But on this condition, that you are to fear the Lord your God, and worship him, and listen to him, instead of defying his commands; both you and the king who governs you are to follow the guidance of the Lord your God. If you rebel against him, if you defy his commands, the hand of the Lord will fall heavily on you and your race.¹ In token of it, here where you stand, you shall see the Lord do a wondrous thing before your eyes. It is harvest-time for the wheat already; but when I call upon the Lord's name, he will send thunder and rain, to give you visible proof of the great wrong you have done by defying him and asking for a king.

With that, Samuel cried out to the Lord, and the Lord sent down both thunder and rain that day, till the whole people was smitten with a great fear of the Lord and of Samuel. The whole people cried out with one voice, Pray to the Lord thy God for us thy servants, that our lives may be spared! We had sinned enough already, and now we have done him further wrong, by asking for a king to rule us. Do not be afraid, Samuel told them; you see how great is the wrong you have done; but now follow close where the Lord leads you, and serve him with all your hearts. Do not desert him for false gods which will play you false, granting neither aid nor deliverance. For his own renown, the Lord will not forsake his own people, and his people he has sworn you shall be. Pray for you? Never may I offend the Lord by ceasing to pray for you, and pointing you to the good paths, the right paths. Fear the Lord, and serve him loyally with all your hearts; you have seen what marvellous deeds he can do in your midst, and if you cling to wicked ways, you shall be swept away, you and your king.

13 Saul was (so many)² years old when he began to reign, and he had reigned for two years over Israel when he picked an army of three thousand men. Of these, two thousand were under his own command, around Machmas and the hill country of Bethel, and a thousand under Jonathan at Gabaa in Benjamin.

The rest of the people he sent back to their homes. But now Jonathan overpowered the Philistine garrison at Gabaa, and news of it was brought to the Philistines; whereupon Saul sounded an alarm all through the country, Hebrews, here is news for you! So the word went round that Saul had overpowered a Philistine garrison, and Israel was at war with the Philistines; and they raised their battle-cry under Saul's command at Galgala.

Meanwhile the Philistines mustered their forces to make war on Israel, their chariots thirty thousand, their horsemen six thousand strong, and the rest of their host countless as the sand by the sea. On they came, and encamped at Machmas, east of Bethaven. And now the Israelite folk found themselves hard pressed; and their evil plight drove them to take hiding in den and thicket, cave and cleft and pit; there were Hebrews, too, that fled across Jordan into Gad and Galaad. As for Saul, he stood his ground at Galgala, but it was a dispirited army that followed him.

For seven days he waited to keep tryst with Samuel, but still Samuel did not come; and meanwhile, men were deserting from his ranks; so at last he bade them bring the victims for burnt-sacrifice and welcome-offering, and performed the sacrifice himself. And now, when the burnt-sacrifice was over, he saw Samuel coming, and went out to greet him. What is this thou hast done? Samuel asked. And he answered, I found that men were deserting from my ranks; thou hadst not kept the tryst, and already the Philistines had raised their standard at Machmas. Can I let the Philistines sweep down on me here in Galgala, thought I, without first winning the Lord's favour? So I offered the burnt-sacrifice; there was no other way. But Samuel told him, This was great folly in thee, so to transgress the commands which the Lord thy God had given thee. But for this, the Lord would have destined thee, here and now, to found a line of kings that should have ruled Israel for ever.³ Now thy dynasty shall fall with thee; the Lord has found a man to fulfil his purposes, and rule his people instead of thee; such is the reward of disobedience.

² It would seem that some numeral must have fallen out in the Hebrew text before the word meaning 'years' or 'a year'; hence most versions give us the rendering, 'Saul was one year old'.

³ Since no other explanation is given in the sacred text, it seems best to suppose that Saul's disobedience consisted in not waiting till Samuel came before taking action preparatory to battle. Samuel had indicated seven days as the time of waiting (10. 8), but Saul should have waited longer. See note on 10. 8.

15 With that, Samuel left him, returning from Galgala to Gabaa in Benjamin. From Galgala, too, Saul and the forces that remained with him went up to Gabaa and the hill-country of Benjamin, to meet the attack; when he counted the roll, there were only some six hundred men to be 16 found in his company. There, at Gabaa, Saul and his son Jonathan encamped with their followers, while the Philistines confronted them at Machmas. Meanwhile, 17 there were three parties of the Philistine army that went out to find plunder; one of them to the Sual country, on the way to 18 Ephra, one by the Bethoron road, and one by the frontier path that looks down on the valley of Seboim, going out towards the 19 desert. (At this time, there were no workers in metal left in the whole of Israel; the Philistines had taken good care that the Hebrews should not be able to make sword 20 or spear. When a man would sharpen share or spade, axe or hoe, in whatever part of the country he lived, he must go down into the Philistine lands to do it. Blunted were 21 share and spade, fork and axe; even the goads needed to be straightened; and in times of battle Saul and his son Jonathan were the only men in the army that carried 22 sword or lance.) There was, too, a detachment of the Philistines that guarded the pass to Machmas.

14 And one day, Saul's son Jonathan proposed to the lad who carried his armour for him, Let us attack the Philistine detachment over yonder; but he said no word of it to Saul.

2 Saul was encamped on the outskirts of Gabaa, under the pomegranate tree at Magron, with some six hundred men under him; he had a priest with him, bearing the sacred mantle, Achias son of Achitob. (This Achitob was brother to Ichabod, and son of that Phinees whose father Heli was once the Lord's priest at Silo.) The men in the ranks, too, knew 4 nothing of Jonathan's errand. Just where he planned his attack on the Philistines, between the paths that climbed the hill, a rock jutted out on either hand like a single tooth, sheer on every side. One was called Boses and the other Sene; one faced northwards towards Machmas, and the other southwards towards Gabaa. Here, then, Jonathan said to his squire, Let us attack the post these uncircumcised Philistines have set on guard, and see if the Lord will speed us. Many or few, if the Lord means to grant us victory, who shall prevent him? As thou wilt, his squire answered; lead on, I will follow where thou biddest.

We approach them, then, said Jonathan, and shew ourselves. And now, if they bid us wait till they come down to fetch us, let us keep our ground, and abandon all thought of the ascent. But if they bid us come up to their side, then go up we will; it is a sign that the Lord means to give us the mastery. So both shewed themselves to the Philistine detachment; Why, said the Philistines, here are the Hebrews coming out of the pits where they lay in hiding! And they cried out from their post to Jonathan and his squire, Come up to our side; we have something to disclose to you. And at that, Jonathan said to his squire, Up, then, go we; follow me close; the Lord is giving Israel the mastery. So, crawling upon hands and knees, Jonathan climbed up, and his squire after him; and of the enemy, some fell to Jonathan himself, some to the squire as he came up behind him. This first slaughter that befell, when Jonathan and his squire assailed them, was but of twenty men, on a piece of ground that measured half an acre, a day's ploughing for a pair of oxen. But all through the camp, all through the countryside, came a sudden terror; the rest of the detachment, that were returning from a foray, stood there open-mouthed; the earth, too, shook, and it seemed as if a divine terror were abroad.

Looking out from Gabaa, the watchmen of Saul's army wondered at the sight; so many men that lay slain, so many more in flight this way and that. And now Saul bade his men find out who it was that had left the ranks, and learned that Jonathan was not there, nor his squire. So he bade Achias consult the ark of God¹ (it was there that day, God's ark, among the ranks

¹ According to the Septuagint Greek, it was not the ark but the sacred mantle (Ex. 25. 7) that was here used for divination.

19 of Israel); but even as he was talking with the priest, a great clamour arose in the Philistine camp, that gained force and grew louder with every moment. Stay thy hand, he said to the priest, and so, with his whole army, raised the war-cry and went to the attack. They found that the Philistines had come to blows, friend turning his sword against friend, and the slaughter raged beyond all bounds. Those Hebrews who, till now, had taken part with the Philistines, and were fighting at their side, now went over to the camp of Israel, the camp of Saul and Jonathan; and all those others who were in hiding among the hills of Ephraim, when they heard of the Philistine rout, came out to aid their fellow-countrymen, till Saul found himself at the head of some ten thousand men. Thus the Lord gave Israel the victory that day, and the field of battle spread wider till it reached Bethaven.

4 The Israelites were fighting, that day, in a close body, and Saul put a ban on them, Cursed be the man that touches food before evening comes; I must take full vengeance on my enemies! So none of them took any food; even when the whole army passed through a glade where there was honey lying on the ground, and they saw the honey oozing from its combs as they entered the glade, not one in the ranks put his hand to his mouth, such was their terror of the ban. Jonathan had not heard his father bind the people so; and he, reaching forward and dipping the end of his staff into a honeycomb, took a mouthful from his hand; whereupon his eyesight grew clearer at once. And what of the ban thy father laid on us, one of the men said to him, calling down a curse on anyone who should touch food to-day? But the Israelites were faint on their march, and Jonathan said, It is an ill turn my father has done to his country; why, could you not see for yourselves how my eyes grew brighter for a mouthful of yonder honey? Think what a blow we might have struck, if the men had eaten their fill when we came upon the plunder the enemy had left behind them!

That day's pursuit took the army all the way from Machmas to Aialon, and they were weary men indeed; falling on the plunder they had recovered, they carried off sheep and ox and calf and slaughtered them there on the ground, eating them blood and all. When complaint was made that his men had disobeyed the Lord's command by eating meat with the blood in it, Saul told them, You have broken the law; find a great stone, and roll it up to where I stand. Then he said, Go round and bid the folk bring ox and ram to me here, to slaughter their meat on this stone; sin no more by eating it with the blood in it. So, till late at night, each man brought his ox with him and slaughtered it there. And Saul built an altar to the Lord there, the first he ever raised to him.

And now, cried Saul, let us attack the Philistines in the darkness, and harry them till day dawns, so that none is left alive. Do as thou seest best, the people answered; but the priest said, God is present with us, let us have recourse to him. Saul, then, asked the Lord whether he should pursue the Philistines, whether Israel would be granted the victory; but that day no answer came. Summon all the chieftains, cried Saul; we must have clear proof who it is has brought guilt on us this day. As the Lord, Israel's protector, is a living God, though it were Jonathan, my own son, that is answerable for it, he shall die without hope of reprieve. And no voice among them all said him nay. Do you stand on one side, he told the men of Israel, I and my son Jonathan on the other. Do as thou seest best, the people answered. And Saul prayed to the Lord God of Israel, Lord God of Israel, send us right guidance; tell us why it is thou wilt give me, thy servant, no answer this day. If the guilt lies with me, or with my son Jonathan, let the sign be Revelation; if with thy people, let the sign be Holiness. Thereupon Jonathan and Saul were convicted, and the people went clear.¹ Then Saul bade them cast lots between himself and Jonathan, and the lot fell on Jonathan.

Tell me, said Saul to Jonathan, what it is thou hast done. So Jonathan told him; Touch food I did, but what food? A little honey picked up on the end of the staff I carried, and for that I must die. And Saul answered, Due punishment the Lord give me, Jonathan, and more than due, if thy life is not forfeited! But the people cried out to Saul, What, shall he die, Jonathan, who has won such a victory for Israel? As the Lord is a living God, that were great wrong. Never a hair shall fall from his head; this day he has done good service, God speeding him. So it was that the people, that day, saved Jonathan's life.

¹ In this verse, the Septuagint Greek differs widely from the Hebrew text, and the Latin version from both. This last probably means us to understand that Saul obtained an oracle by means of the sacred burse (Ex. 28. 30); although the operative words here used (Revelation and Holiness) are not the same as those used in the description of the burse (Wisdom and Truth).

46 And Saul halted, not continuing his pursuit of the Philistines, who now went back to their own country.

47 Once he was firmly established on the throne of Israel, Saul carried war into the territory of his enemies, Moab, Ammon, Edom, the kings of Soba, and the Philistines; and everywhere he won victories.

48 He, too, it was that mustered an army and defeated Amalec, putting an end to their forays against Israel. Saul had three sons, Jonathan, Jessui and Melchisua, and two daughters, the elder called Merob and the younger Michol. His wife's name was Achinoam, daughter to Achimaas. And he put his army under the command of his cousin Abner, son of Ner; like Cis, Saul's father, Ner was son of Abiel. As long as Saul lived, there was bitter war against the Philistines, and wherever he found a brave man or a skilful fighter, Saul would attach him to his own person.

15 But Samuel reminded Saul, It was the Lord that gave me commission to anoint thee king of his people Israel; to his voice thou must needs listen. And this is the message that comes to thee from the Lord of hosts: I have not forgotten how Amalec treated the Israelites, standing in their path when they were on the way here from Egypt. This, then, is thy errand, to destroy Amalec and all his domains, granting no pardon, coveting no plunder, but slaying man and woman, child and infant at the breast, camel and ass. Whereupon Saul summoned all his men to arms, and counted their muster as closely as a shepherd counts his lambs; two hundred thousand warriors, besides ten thousand from Juda. With these, Saul marched to Amalec's capital, and laid an ambush in the ravine there; but first of all he warned the Cinites, Up, move your camping ground clear of the Amalecites; I would not involve you in their ruin; the men of Israel, on their way here from Egypt, had nothing but kindness from you. So the Cinites separated from Amalec, and Saul routed the Amalecites, driving them before him all the way from Hevila to Sur, on the confines of Egypt. He captured Agag, the Amalecite king, but although he put all the common folk to the sword, he and his army spared Agag; spared, too, the best of the flocks and herds, the choicest garments, the fattest rams; they would not destroy anything that was precious. All that was mean and worthless they destroyed readily enough.

And the Lord's word came to Samuel, I repent, now, of having made Saul king of Israel; he has played me false, and left my command unfulfilled. At this, Samuel was greatly moved, and all night long he pleaded with the Lord. At early dawn he rose up, resolved to find Saul that same morning; Saul, he was told, upon reaching the town of Carmel,¹ had set up a monument there in his own honour, but had passed on now and made his way to Gailala. When Samuel reached it, he found Saul offering the Lord burnt-sacrifice, out of the first-fruits of the plunder taken from Amalec. The Lord's blessing on thee, was Saul's greeting to him; I have fulfilled the divine command.

And this bleating of sheep, Samuel asked, that comes to my ears, this lowing of oxen that I hear? Why, answered Saul, these are what they brought back from Amalec; my men saved the best out of flock and herd, to be offered in sacrifice to the Lord; all the rest we have destroyed. May I tell thee, asked Samuel, the message the Lord has given me in the night? and when Saul bade him speak out, he went on, It was little conceit thou hadst of thyself, when the tribes of Israel were committed to thy leadership. And the Lord anointed thee king of Israel, and sent thee on an errand; Up, he said, destroy the sinful men of Amalec, smiting them down till none is left. How is it thou didst not obey the

Lord's command? Why didst thou fall to plundering, in defiance of the Lord's will?
 10 Nay, protested Saul, obey the Lord I did; I went where the Lord's errand took me, and brought back Agag, king of Amalec, in chains, and destroyed Amalec utterly.
 1 If my men carried off sheep and oxen, these were but first-fruits that were saved from the slaughter of all the rest, to be offered up to the Lord their God here in 2 Galgala. What, said Samuel, thinkest thou the Lord's favour can be won by offering him sacrifice and victim, instead of obeying his divine will? The Lord loves obedience better than any sacrifice, the attentive ear
 3 better than the fat of rams. Rebellion is sin as witchcraft is sin, all one with idolatry is the unsubmitive heart. Thou hast revoked thy loyalty to the Lord, and he thy kingship.

1 Then Saul confessed to Samuel, I have sinned; I have transgressed the Lord's will and thy command; I was afraid of my own people, and humoured their desire. Grant that sin forgiveness; let me have thy company, while I go back to pay the Lord worship. Nay, answered Samuel, thou shalt have no company of mine; the Lord has revoked thy kingship over Israel, since thou hast revoked thy loyalty to him. With that, Samuel turned to go, and the other caught him by the border of his cloak, which tore in his hand. This day, Samuel told him, the Lord has torn away the kingship of Israel from thee, and given it to another and a better man than thyself. He who wins victories for Israel does not spare, does not relent; not his to alter his purpose like mortal men.¹ But Saul still pleaded with him, Guilty though I be, at least give me countenance before the elders of my people and before the men of Israel, by bearing me company as I go to worship. Thereupon Samuel turned back and went with him, and worship he did.

1 Then Samuel would have Agag, king of Amalec, brought into his presence; and he was brought in, gross of body and trembling with fear; A bitter parting, said he, is this of death.² But Samuel told him, 33 Many a woman that sword of thine has made childless, and now a childless woman thy own mother shall be; and he cut Agag to pieces, there in the Lord's presence at Galgala. So Samuel went back to Ra- 34 matha, and Saul to his home at Gabaa, nor did Samuel, long as he lived, meet Saul again. But ever he lamented over him, that 36 the Lord should have made him king of Israel, and afterwards revoked his kingship.

16 But now the Lord said to Samuel, What, still lamenting over Saul? I have cast him off; he is to be king of Israel no longer. Come, put oil in that phial of thine, and go on an errand for me to Jesse of Bethlehem; in one of his sons I have looked myself out a king. How 2 can I undertake such a journey, asked Samuel, without Saul coming to hear of it, and killing me? Take a young bull with thee, the Lord answered, and make it known, I have come to offer the Lord sacrifice. To this sacrifice Jesse must be bidden; 3 then I will reveal my will to thee, and thou shalt anoint the man I direct thee to anoint.

Thereupon Samuel did as the Lord bade him; and when he reached Bethlehem, the elders of the city greeted him in alarm, asking whether his coming boded well for them. Yes, he told them, I have come to offer the Lord sacrifice. Rid yourselves of defilement, and join with me in offering it. And with that he hallowed Jesse and his sons, and bade them come to the sacrifice with the rest. As soon as they entered the house, his eye fell on Eliab, and he said, Here stands the Lord's choice, in the Lord's presence! But the Lord warned 7 Samuel, Have no eyes for noble mien or tall stature; I have passed this one by. Not where man's glance falls, falls the Lord's choice; men see but outward appearances, he reads the heart.³ Then Jesse called 8

¹ Samuel here rebukes the optimism of Saul (verse 25) by pointing out that God does not take rash decisions and then go back on them, as we men do. There is only a verbal contradiction between this theological statement of the case and the phrase 'I repent' used in verse 11 above; in verse 11 (as often in the Old Testament) the Divine attitude is loosely described in the language of ordinary human life.

² 'A bitter parting is this of death'; literally 'Does bitter death so separate?' The Hebrew text is generally interpreted as meaning 'Thine bitterness of death has already been removed'.

³ The Latin version here assumes that Samuel had told Jesse the meaning of his errand, and announced to him the rejection of each son as he was brought in. The Hebrew text may also be understood (though perhaps less probably) as describing only Samuel's thoughts, the words of rejection being spoken to Samuel interiorly by Almighty God himself.

Abinadab, and brought him into Samuel's presence; but, No, said he, this is not the Lord's choice; then Samma, but he said, No, not this one either. Seven sons of his did Jesse thus present before Samuel, but none of these, he was told, had the Lord chosen. Then Samuel asked Jesse whether these were all, and he answered, One still remains, the youngest, herding the sheep. Send for him, answered Samuel; we must not sit down till he comes. And Jesse sent and fetched him, red-cheeked, fair of face, pleasant of mien. And now the Lord said, Up, anoint him; this is my choice. Whereupon Samuel took out the phial of oil and anointed him then and there in his brethren's presence; and on him, on David, the spirit of the Lord came down, ever after that day. As for Samuel, he rose up and went home to Ramatha.

14 Meanwhile the Lord's spirit passed away from Saul; instead, at the Lord's bidding, an evil mood came upon him that gave him no rest. God sends thee an ill mood, his servants told him, to disquiet thee. We are thy servants, waiting on our lord's bidding; shall we go and find some skilful player on the harp, to relieve thee, when God visits thee with this evil mood, by his music? Yes, answered Saul, find one who can play the harp well, and bring him to me. And here one of his servants offered advice; Stay, I myself have met such a man, a skilful player indeed, a son of Jesse the Bethlehemite. He is sturdy besides, and a tried warrior, well-spoken and personable, and the Lord is with him. Thereupon a message went out from Saul to Jesse, There is a son of thine, David, that looks after thy sheep; send him to me. And Jesse loaded an ass with bread, and a flagon of wine, and a kid, and sent these by David as a present to Saul. Thus it was that David met Saul and entered his service; and became his armour-bearer, so well Saul loved him. Let David remain here in attendance on me, Saul told Jesse; I like him well. And whenever Saul was taken with this evil mood of his, David would fetch his harp, and play; whereupon Saul was comforted and felt easier, till at last the evil mood left him.

17 And now the Philistines mustered their army for battle, and raised their standard at Socho, in Juda, encamping between Socho and Azeca, in the region of Dommim. Saul, too, mustered the Israelites, and they marched to the Valley of the Terebinth, where they drew up their array to meet the enemy; the Philistines held the mountain-slope on one side, and Israel on the other, with the valley between them. And the Philistines had a champion, a bastard born,¹ that was called Goliath of Geth. His height was six cubits and a span; he wore a helmet of bronze and a breastplate of mail, this too made of bronze, and weighing five thousand sicles; greaves of bronze on his legs, and a shield of bronze to guard his shoulders. As for his spear, it had a shaft as big as a weaver's beam, with an iron head that weighed six hundred sicles; and a man went before to carry his armour for him.

Such a man confronted the ranks of Israel, crying out, What need to come here armed for battle? Here am I, a Philistine born; do you, that wear Saul's livery, choose out one of yourselves to meet me in single combat. If he is a match for me, and can strike me down, we will accept your rule; if I have the mastery, and he falls, you shall accept Philistine rule, and become our subjects instead. Here and now, I set the host of Israel at defiance (said the Philistine); let them put forward a champion that will fight hand to hand with me. Terror fell upon Saul and all the men of Israel as they listened to the challenge, and their hearts failed them.

Now turn we to David, son of that Ephrathite of whom we spoke but now. This man, Jesse of Bethlehem-Juda, was father of eight sons, and in Saul's reign he was well on in years, and passed for an old man. Three of his sons, the eldest, had gone to the wars with king Saul; three warrior sons, the first-born Eliab, and Abinadab, and Samma. David was the youngest; and when his three eldest brothers went into Saul's service, he left it, and must go home to tend his father's flock at Bethlehem. When the Philistine had already been coming out from the ranks and confronting the Israelites for forty days together, it chanced that Jesse sent his son David on an errand. Here is a bushel of flour, said he, and ten loaves; take them with all speed to thy brethren in the camp; ay, and ten cheeses to be a present for their commander. Go and look for thy brethren, to see that all is well with them, and find out what their place is in the ranks.

It was in the Valley of the Terebinth he must find them, where they were carrying arms with Saul and all the men of Israel; so David rose early, leaving a man in charge of the flock, and went off with his load, to do his father's bidding. When he reached Magala, the army had raised its war-cry and gone out to fight; Israel was now marshalled for battle, and the Philistines awaited them. So David left all the gifts he had brought with him in the care of the baggage-master, and ran to the field of battle, to ask how his brethren fared. Even as he spoke, out came the champion of the Philistine cause, Goliath, the bastard of Geth; and David heard him repeat his customary challenge. All the men of Israel were shrinking away in terror from the sight of him; and the talk went round among them, Saw you this warrior that went by? He has challenged Israel; and great good fortune awaits the man who overcomes him. The king has promised such a man great riches, and his daughter's hand in marriage, and for his father's house, freedom from every tax levied in Israel. And now here was David asking, What reward is there for saving Israel's honour, by overcoming the Philistines? What, shall an uncircumcised Philistine defy the armies of the living God? So they repeated to him the tale of what the reward should be.

When his elder brother Eliab overheard the talk, he turned upon David in anger; Why hast thou come here? he asked. Why must that sorry flock of thine go astray in the desert? This is thy old self-conceit, thy old cunning; thou hast come here only to watch the battle! Why, what wrong have I done? David asked. Is there not matter here for questioning? Then, passing on a little beyond him, he spoke to another man, using the same words, and folk gave him the same answer as before. What David had said was soon noised abroad, till it came to the ears of Saul; and he was summoned ere long into Saul's presence. There is nothing here, he said, to daunt any man's spirits; I, my lord, will go and do battle with the Philistine. What, answered Saul, thou meet the Philistine and engage him in battle? Why, thou art only a boy, and this is a man trained to arms from his youth. But David told Saul, My lord, I used to feed my father's flock; and if lion or bear came and carried off one of my rams, I would go in pursuit, and get the mastery, and snatch the prey from their jaws. Did they threaten me, I would catch them by the throat and strangle them; that was my way of killing them. Lion or bear, my lord, I would slay them, and this uncircumcised Philistine shall have no better lot than theirs. Let me go out and save the honour of Israel; shall an uncircumcised Philistine defy the army of the living God? The Lord, said David, who protected me against lion and bear, will protect me against this Philistine.

Why then, said Saul, go, and the Lord be with thee. Then he made David wear his own armour, put a helmet of bronze on his head, and a breastplate round him; and David, as he girded on a sword over his armour, tried whether he had strength to walk in this unwonted array. Nay, he told Saul, I cannot walk, so clad; it was never my wont. So he disarmed, and took nothing but the staff he ever carried, and five smooth stones, which he picked out from the river-bed and put in his shepherd's wallet, and a sling in his hand; and so he went out to meet the Philistine.

The Philistine, with his armour-bearer going before him, came ever nearer on his way, and looked at David with contempt; here was a boy, red-cheeked and fair of face. What, he asked, dost thou take me for a dog, that thou comest to meet me with a staff? And he cursed David in the name of his gods. Come close, he said; let me give thy carrion to bird and beast. Nay, said David, though thou comest with sword and spear and shield to meet me, meet thee I will, in the name of the Lord of hosts; in the name of that God who fights for the armies of Israel. Thou hast defied them this day, and this day the Lord will give me the mastery; I will strike thee down, and cut off thy head. I will feed bird and beast with the corpses of Philistine warriors, and prove to all the world that Israel has a God; prove to all who stand about us that the Lord sends victory without the help of sword or spear. God rules the battle; he will put you at our mercy.

By now, the Philistine had bestirred himself, and was coming on to attack David at close quarters; so, without more ado, David ran towards the enemy's lines, to meet him. He felt in his wallet, took out one of the stones, and shot it from his sling, with a whirl so dexterous that it struck Goliath on his forehead; deep in his forehead the stone buried itself, and he fell, face downwards, to the earth. Thus David overcame the Philistine with sling and stone, smote and slew him. No sword he bore of his own, but he ran up and took the Philistine's own sword from its sheath, where he lay, and with this slew him, cutting off his head. And now, seeing their champion dead, the Philistines betook themselves to flight; while the men of Israel and of Juda rose up with a cry, and gave chase till they reached the low ground, and the very gates of Accaron; all the way to Geth and Accaron, along the road to Saraim, Philistines lay dying of their wounds. At last the men of Israel returned from their pursuit, and fell to plundering the Philistine camp.

As for David, he brought Goliath's head back with him to Jerusalem, and laid up the armour in his tent. Saul, as he watched him going out to meet the Philistine, had asked the commander of his men, Abner, from what stock this boy came. On thy life, my lord, said Abner, I cannot tell. So the king bade him find out who the boy's father was; and David fresh from his victory, was taken by Abner into Saul's presence, still carrying the Philistine's head with him. And when Saul asked of his lineage, David told him, I am the son of thy servant Jesse, the Bethlehemite.¹

18 By the time he had finished speaking with Saul, David's heart was knit to the heart of Jonathan by a close bond, and Jonathan loved David thenceforward as dearly as his own life. It was then that Saul took David into his service, and would not allow him to go back home; and Jonathan, loving him dearly as his own life, made a covenant of friendship with David, took off his robe and all his gear, even to sword and bow and belt, and gave them to David to wear.

This way and that David went at Saul's bidding, and his skill never failed him; when Saul put him at the head of his army, he earned the good will of the whole people, and of Saul's servants above the rest. But when David returned from slaying the Philistine, the women who came out from every part of Israel to meet Saul, singing and dancing merrily with tambour and cymbal, matched their music with the refrain, By Saul's hand a thousand, by David's ten thousand fell. And at this Saul was much displeased; it was no song to win his favour. What, he said, ten thousand for David, and but a thousand for me? What lies now between him and the kingship? So ever after, Saul eyed him askance. Next day, the evil mood had come upon Saul, divinely sent, and a frenzy took him, there in his house;² David was playing, as he ever did, upon the harp, and Saul, who had a lance in his hand, threw it at him, thinking to pin David to the wall. Twice David must needs flee from his presence, thus threatened.

Saul, then, began to fear David, as the heir to that divine favour he had lost; to remove him from his person, he gave him command of a thousand warriors, so that he must take the field at the head of his men. David's skill never failed him in his enterprises, and the Lord was ever at his side; and Saul, seeing how well he prospered, began to be afraid of him; he was in high favour, too, with the men of Israel and Juda, marching out to battle at their head. Saul, therefore, promised him the hand of his elder daughter, Merob, in marriage, if he would play a man's part in fighting the Lord's battles; No need for me to touch him, Saul thought to himself, let the Philistines rid me of him. Why, David answered, who am I, what rank

have I, what place does my father's kindred hold in Israel, that I should become the king's son-in-law? And sure enough, when the time came that David should have wedded Saul's daughter Merob, her hand was given to Hadriel the Molathite instead. Meanwhile, David had fallen in love with his younger daughter, Michol; and Saul was well pleased when he heard of it. I will promise her, thought Saul, in such a way as to entrap him; the Philistines shall rid me of him. And he told David, I have a second condition for thee to fulfil, and thereupon thou shalt have my daughter.¹

Meanwhile, Saul had bidden his servants encourage David, when he himself was not by, telling him what favour the king, what love the king's servants bore him; it was time he became the king's son-in-law. But when they whispered these hopes to him, David said, Think you such a prize is won easily, when a man has neither purse nor station? When his servants came back to him with the news that David had answered thus, Saul bade them tell David, The king claims no bridal gifts, if thou wilt bring him the foreskins of a hundred Philistines, to give him a royal revenge on his enemies. In this way, Saul thought to betray David into the power of the Philistines; but when they told him what their master had said, David was well pleased to win the king's daughter so. A few days afterwards, he set out with the men under his command, slew two hundred Philistines, and brought back their foreskins, which he counted out before the king as the price of his bride. And now Saul must give David his daughter Michol's hand.

That the Lord was with David, Saul could tell beyond doubt, and here was his daughter Michol David's loving wife; more than ever Saul grew afraid of him, and remained thenceforward his enemy. Meanwhile, the Philistine chiefs came out to battle; David, from the time when their attacks began, shewed greater skill than all the rest of Saul's officers, and his name was in high renown.

19 Once, Saul gave the word to Jonathan and to all his servants that they must put David to death. But Saul's son Jonathan, who loved David well, told him of the design; My father Saul, he said, means thy death; be on the watch tomorrow, keep apart, and hide thyself. Out in the open fields, close to thy hiding-place, I will stand talking to my father and will speak to him of thee; and afterwards I will tell thee what I have learned. So Jonathan pleaded David's cause with his father Saul; Do no wrong he said, to thy servant David, that has done thee no wrong, but is much thy benefactor. Did he not put his life in peril, that day when he slew the Philistine, and the Lord gave the whole army of Israel a great victory? Thou wast there to see it, and rejoice at it; and wilt thou bring on thyself the guilt of blood wrongfully shed, by slaying David, who is innocent of fault? Saul listened to the plea of Jonathan, and relented; As the Lord is a living God, said he, no harm shall befall him. So Jonathan called to David, and told him all that had passed; then he brought him back into Saul's presence, where he remained as he had been ever wont. And when war broke out afresh, David went into battle against the Philistines, and won a great victory, putting them to rout.

One day, Saul was sitting in his house, lance in hand, with the evil spirit upon him, divinely sent; and David was playing the harp before him. He tried to pin David to the wall, and David escaped from his presence, while the lance stuck in the wall, baulked of its aim. That night, David fled for his life; Saul had sent armed men to his house to make sure of him, for on the morrow he must die. But Michol, David's wife, warned him that death awaited him next day if he did not escape then and there, and let him down from a window. So David made good his escape that night; meanwhile, Michol brought out a sacred image and laid it in his bed, with goat's hair at its head, and coverlets wrapped about it; when Saul's pursuivants came to fetch David, they were told that he lay sick. But now they were sent back again to find David and bring him with them, bed and all, to die in Saul's presence; so they found, when they came in, an image lying on the bed, with goat's hair at the head of it. What is this trick thou hast played on me, Saul asked, helping my enemy to escape? Why, answered Michol, he threatened to kill me if I did not let him go.

- 18 So David reached safety, and went to Ramatha to find Samuel, and tell him of Saul's doings; and they retired, both of them, to live at the Naioth.¹ Saul, when he heard from common report that David was there at Ramatha, in the Naioth, sent pursuivants there to seize him. But all they found was a company of prophets standing there in ecstasy, with Samuel, their leader, at their head; and with that, the spirit of the Lord fell on the pursuivants, and they were carried away in ecstasy like the rest.
- 21 When Saul heard the news, and sent fresh messengers, these too fell into ecstasy, and the like happened when he sent a third time; so, in high displeasure, Saul took the road for Ramatha himself. When he reached the Great Well at Socho, he asked where Samuel and David were, and was told they were at the Naioth in Ramatha, so to the Naioth in Ramatha he went; and on him, too, the spirit of the Lord fell as he journeyed. Still in ecstasy he made his way to the Naioth in Ramatha, where he stripped off his garments and stood before Samuel in ecstasy with the rest; all that day and that night he lay on the ground naked. And so the proverb went abroad, Has Saul, too, turned prophet?

- 20 David meanwhile escaped from the Naioth at Ramatha, and came back to have speech with Jonathan. What is it I have done? he asked. For what wrong, what fault of mine does thy father threaten my life? Nay, said he, never that; thy life is safe enough. My father does nothing, of much moment or of little, without telling me first; why should he have kept this one design dark? It cannot be.
- 3 And once again he swore friendship. But David said, Thy father knows well enough what favour I enjoy with thee, and he thinks to himself, Jonathan must not know; this were great grief to him. But, as the Lord is a living God, and thy soul a living soul, there is but a step between me and death. Then, said Jonathan, make known thy will, and I will perform it. Tomorrow, David answered, is the first day of the month, and custom will have it that I should sit next to the king at table. Bear with me if I hide in the open fields, instead, till that day and the next are over; and if thy father looks about him and misses me, tell him that David asked leave of thee to go home on a sudden to Bethlehem, where all his clan are holding their yearly sacrifice. If he is content, all is well with me; if he falls into a rage, be sure that he is bent on doing me harm. I am thy servant, and thou hast made me swear a covenant of friendship with thee before the Lord; do me, then, this kindness. And if I am guilty of any fault, do thou thyself slay me, without seeking to reconcile me with thy father. God forbid! said Jonathan. If I find out that my father is bent on doing thee harm, nothing shall prevent me from telling thee of it.

And now, said David, if thy father gives thee a rough answer, who is to bring me news of it? Come out with me, said Jonathan; let us walk together in the open fields. And when they were together in the open, he said to David, Let the Lord God of Israel be my witness, if I sound my father to-morrow or next day, and hear good news of David, I will send a messenger to give thee the news; if not, may the Lord punish Jonathan as he deserves, and more than he deserves! But if my father is still bent on thy harm, then I myself will bring it to thy ear, and send thee on thy way unharmed; and the Lord be with thee, as he was once with my father. While I live, shew me friendship in the Lord's name, and when I die, let time never diminish thy friendship for my race. May the Lord, as he roots out David's enemies, one by one, from the land that knew them, leave out Jonathan's name from the list of his kindred; only on David's enemies let his vengeance fall! Thus did Jonathan make a covenant with the line of David, and the Lord's vengeance fell only on David's enemies.² And Jonathan swore a fresh oath to David, so dearly he loved him, dearly as his own life.

¹ 'The Naioth'; we do not know whether this was a building or a quarter of the town, but it seems likely, since it means 'the Abodes'; that it was a settlement in which the prophetic influence was focussed; cf. IV Kg. 2. 3-5.

² There is considerable confusion in the Hebrew text; it does not contain the end of verse 15; and verse 16 is absent both there and in the Septuagint Greek.

8 Then Jonathan said, Since it is the first 9 day of the month to-morrow, thou wilt be 10 missed; thy place will be empty then and 11 the day after. Make quickly, then, for the 12 valley, and hide thyself; thou must needs 13 be in hiding that third day, when men can 14 go about their work again. Wait, then, near 15 the rock called Ezel; and I will come and 16 shoot three arrows close to it, letting fly as 17 if I were shooting at a mark. Then I will 18 send a servant after them, bidding him go 19 and fetch my arrows. If I tell him the 20 arrows are on the near side of him, he has 21 only to go and pick them up, then do thou 22 come out to me; it means, as the Lord is 23 a living God, that all is well and no harm 24 is meant thee. If I tell him the arrows are 25 beyond him, then depart, and peace be 26 with thee; the Lord will have thee go. And 27 as for the promises we have exchanged, 28 may the Lord be arbiter for ever between 29 me and thee.

30 So David went and hid, out in the fields, 31 and the new month came, and the king sat 32 down to meat. He sat, as was his wont, on 33 a seat close to the wall; Jonathan was 34 standing there, and Abner took his place 35 next to Saul, but David's was seen to be 36 empty. That day, Saul said nothing of it; 37 perhaps David had incurred some defile-38 ment, and had not yet been cleansed. But 39 when the next day dawned after the new 40 moon, and David's place was empty still, 41 Saul asked Jonathan why the son of Jesse 42 had not sat down to meat that day or the 43 day before. He urged me, answered Jona-44 than, to let him go to Bethlehem. Pray 45 give me leave, said he; a yearly sacrifice 46 is being offered in the city, and one of my 47 brothers has summoned me there. Do me 48 the favour, then, to let me go with all speed 49 and visit my brethren. At this, Saul fell 50 into a rage with Jonathan; What, cried he, 51 thou son of a lecherous wife, dost thou 52 think I have not marked how thou lovest 53 this son of Jesse, to thy own undoing and 54 hers, the shameful mother that bore thee?
 55 Never, while the son of Jesse is left alive 56 on earth, will thy right to the throne be 57 established. Send and bring him to me, 58 here and now; he is a dead man. And why 59 must he die? Jonathan asked of his father.
 60 What wrong has he done? Thereupon 61 Saul caught up a lance as if to kill him; and 62 Jonathan saw his father was determined upon David's death; so he rose from table in hot anger, and that second day of the month no food crossed his lips, so grieved was he, for David's sake, by his father's insults.

When day dawned, Jonathan went afield to keep his tryst with David, taking with him a boy that was his servant. Go and pick up the arrows I shoot, he told him, and bring them back to me. Then, as the boy ran for the first, he shot a second arrow beyond him; and when he reached the place where the first fell, Jonathan cried out after him, There is an arrow there beyond thee. And now he called out after him, Make haste, do not linger where thou art. So the boy gathered up Jonathan's arrows, and brought them to his master; but of the business that was toward, he knew nothing; only Jonathan and David knew that. And now Jonathan handed the boy his weapons, and said, Take them back with thee to the city.

When the servant had gone, David rose up from his hiding-place, that gave upon the south country; he bowed his face to the earth, and three times did reverence, and then they kissed one another and wept together; there was no staunching David's tears. Go, said Jonathan, and peace go with thee. That, and the oath we have sworn in the Lord's name, making him the arbiter between me and thee, between my posterity and thine, for ever! So David set out on his journey, and Jonathan made his way back to the city.

21 It was to the priest Achimelech, at Nob, that David betook himself. Achimelech was dismayed at his coming; Why art thou alone, he asked, with none to attend thee?
 The king, David told him, has given me a task to perform, but errand and instructions are both secret; and he has given me a trysting-place where I am to meet my companions. Hast thou food for them ready to hand, though it were but five loaves? Let me have what thou canst afford. Why, answered the priest, never a loaf have I here for common uses; there is only the holy bread. Are they free from defilement, these followers of thine, from the touch of woman, at least? As to women, David told the priest, we are as clean as when we set out a day or two back;

and the packs the men carry are as clean as themselves. This is no holy errand of ours, but it will not bring any defilement, to-day, upon aught we carry with us.⁶ So the priest gave him hallowed bread, since he had nothing but the loaves which had been set out in the Lord's presence, and must now be taken away to make room for a new batch.

⁷ One of Saul's servants was there that day, waiting in the Lord's precincts, a man of Edom called Doeg, chief of Saul's shepherds.

⁹ Yes, answered the priest, there is the sword of the Philistine, Goliath, whom thou didst slay in the Valley of the Terebinth. Wrapped in a cloth it lies, behind the sacred mantle. If thou wilt take that, take it; there is none other but that. And there is none other like that, said David; give it me.

¹² David marked their words well, and now ¹³ he went in fear of Achis king of Geth. So he changed his mien when they were by, swooning in their hands and clinging to the door-posts and letting the spittle fall on his beard, till Achis told his men, Why, this is a madman you have found; why must you

¹⁵ bring him into my presence? Have we not fools enough, that you bring this fellow in to let me watch his antics? Is this the man you would have me take into my house?

22 Afterwards David moved on, and took refuge in the cave of Odollam. His brethren and all his father's ² kindred followed him there; and soon a band of men gathered about him, the ill-used, the debtors, the disaffected, and David became their leader, so that he had ³ some four hundred men at his heels. From

Odollam, he went on to Maspha, in the domains of Moab, and asked the king of Moab to let his father and mother dwell there, until they should find out what fortune the Lord meant to send him; under the protection of the Moabite king they were left there, and remained with him all the time David was in the hills. But the prophet Gad bade him leave his hill-fastness and make his way back to the domain of Juda; so he moved on, and betook himself to the forest of Haret.

When the news reached Saul that David and his followers had come into view, Saul was dwelling at Gabaa, and held his court, spear in hand, in the wood of Rama. Listen, men of Jemini, he said to his vassals who stood there at his side, do you think the son of Jesse is like to give all of you lands and vineyards, make all of you chiefs and captains under him? How is it that you are all in conspiracy against me, and none of you will tell me the truth, even when my own son is in league with the son of Jesse? Is there none of you that will feel my wrongs, and bring me news of it when my own son encourages my own servant in disaffection, a man that has ever plotted against me, and plots against me still? And the answer came from Doeg, the man of Edom, who was chief among Saul's servants. I was by, he said, at Nobe, when the son of Jesse was there with the priest Achimelech, son of Achitob, who consulted the Lord for him, and gave him food for his journey; armed him, too, with the sword of Goliath the Philistine.

Thereupon the king sent out his summons to the high priest Achimelech, son of Achitob, and all his priestly kindred at Nobe, and they all came into his presence. Listen, son of Achitob, Saul began, and Achimelech answered, I am here, my lord, at thy command. Why hast thou conspired against me, asked Saul, with the son of Jesse? Why didst thou give him bread, and a sword, and consult the Lord in his behalf, to help him in his rebellion, a man that has ever plotted against me, and plots against me still? Why, my lord, answered Achimelech, what servant of thine was ever so trusted as David, a king's son-in-law; one who ever goes on thy errands, and fills so high a place in thy household? This was not the first time I had consulted the Lord for him. God forbid, my lord king, that either I, thy servant, or any of my kindred should be brought under any such suspicion! Nay, I knew nothing of this business from first to last. And the king said, Achimelech, thou must die for it; thou and all thy kindred; then he bade his retainers, that stood about him, set to and kill the Lord's priests, men who had helped David by being privy to his flight and giving no tidings of it. But the king's retainers were afraid to lay hands on the priests of the Lord; so the king bade Doeg set to, and fall upon the priests. Fall upon them he did, Doeg the man of Edom, and slew that day eighty men that wore the linen mantle. Nobe, too, the city of the priests, the king put to the sword; man and woman, child and infant, ox and ass and sheep, all put to the sword.

There was only one descendant of Achimelech, son of Achitob, that escaped; his name was Abiathar, and he took refuge with David, bringing him the news that Saul had killed all the Lord's priests. I knew well, David told him, when I found Doeg the Edomite there that day, that he would not fail to tell Saul of it. I am answerable for the slaughter of all thy kinsmen. Stay with me here, and fear nothing; my enemies are thine, and here thou wilt be in safety.

23 News was brought to David that the Philistines were attacking Ceila, and plundering its threshing-floors. So he consulted the Lord, asking whether he should go and attack these Philistines; and the Lord answered, attack them he should, and bring the townspeople relief. But David's followers protested, Here are we going in fear of our lives, even on the soil of Juda; and wouldst thou have us make our way to Ceila, and fight the army of the Philistines? So David consulted the Lord again, and still the Lord said, Up, and to Ceila betake thee; I will give thee victory over the Philistines. So David and his men marched there and made war on the Philistines, driving off their cattle; he defeated them with great loss, and the town was rid of them. (It was here that Abiathar, son of Achimelech, took refuge with David; and he came bringing the sacred mantle with him.)

When news reached Saul that David had gone to Ceila, he thought, The Lord has put him at my mercy; he is shut in, now, by the barred gates of a city. And he bade his whole army march down there and lay siege to David and his men; but David, hearing of the secret plans that were being made for his hurt, would have Abiathar consult the sacred mantle. Lord God of Israel, was David's prayer, news has reached me that Saul is on his way to Ceila, to destroy the city that shelters me; what if the townspeople should hand me over to him? Tell me, Lord God of Israel, is the report true that Saul is on his way down? It is true, the Lord answered. Then David asked, Will the townspeople betray me and my companions into Saul's hands? And the Lord answered, They will. So David and his men, about six hundred strong, left Ceila and went back to their wandering life; and Saul, hearing that David had made good his escape from the town, said no more about his purposed attack.

After this, David must keep to desert fastnesses, and he made his home among the wooded hills in the wilderness of Ziph; and evermore Saul made search for him, but the Lord disappointed him of his prey. David lay close in the woods of Ziph, well knowing that Saul was bent on taking his life. And now Saul's son Jonathan ventured out, and visited him there in the woods, to bid him God-speed; Have no fear, said he, my father Saul will never find thee. Thou art destined to reign over Israel, and I to take the second place; my father Saul knows well that so it must be. So they made a covenant between them, there in the Lord's presence; and David lay close in the woods, while Jonathan went home again.

Meantime the men of Ziph betook themselves to Saul at Gabaa, and said to him, We have news of David for thee; he lies hidden in a forest stronghold on the slopes of Hachila, south of the desert. Come, then, where thou mayest have thy dearest wish; we will undertake to hand him over to the royal custody. The Lord's blessing on you! answered Saul; here are 22 men that feel for my wrongs. Go and make your preparations carefully; take good heed to enquire where he has halted on his march and who has seen him there; he knows well enough that a skilful hunter is on his track. Keep watch, and note all the lairs he lurks in; then come back to me with sure news, and I will go with you. Let him go to ground as he will, I will hunt him out among all the multitudes of Juda!

24 So they went back to Ziph to prepare the way for Saul, and found that David and his men were in the desert of Maon, on the low ground south of Jesimon. When Saul and his followers came in pursuit, David had news of it, and took refuge in a rock-fastness, haunting still the desert of Maon; and through the desert of Maon Saul went in pursuit of him, learning that he was to be found there. At last a time came when Saul was traversing one side of a mountain, while David and his men were on the opposite side. David had lost hope of slipping through Saul's hands, now that Saul's men had encircled his, ready to cut them off. But a message reached Saul, Come with all speed; the Philistines have invaded the land. Whereupon Saul must needs give up his pursuit of David, and go back to meet the Philistines. That is how the place came by the name it bears, the Sundering Rock.

24 Then David withdrew, and made the fastness of Engaddi his home. So, when Saul returned from driving the Philistines away, word was brought to him, David is over yonder, in the desert of Engaddi; and with three thousand picked men from the Israelite ranks he went to hunt out David and his followers, though it were among rocks so steep that only the wild goats could find a footing. Close by some sheep-folds that met him on his way, there was a cave, into which Saul went to ease himself; and in the inner part of this same cave, David and his men lay hidden. Now, David's servants told him, the time has come which the Lord foretold to thee, when he promised he would put thy enemy at thy mercy. Whereupon David rose to his feet, and silently cut off the skirt of Saul's cloak. Then his heart smote him, that he had even mutilated Saul's cloak; God be merciful to me, said he to his men, never may I do such despite to the Lord's unction, as to lay hands on the king he has anointed! So, with a word, he checked his men, and would not let them do Saul any violence.

When Saul left the cave, to go forward on his march, David followed him; he too left the cave, crying out after him, My lord king! And when Saul looked behind him, there was David bowing to the earth in reverence. Why wouldst thou lend an ear, David asked him, to such as tell thee David is thy enemy? Thou canst see with thy own eyes that the Lord put thee at my mercy, yonder in the cave, and the thought came to me that I might kill thee. But no, I looked down and spared thee; Never will I lift a hand, thought I, against the king the Lord has anointed. Do but look, my father, on what I hold in my hand; dost thou recognize the skirt of thy cloak? The skirt of thy cloak I cut off; kill thee I would not. Think on this, and tell thyself that there was never despite or wrong on my part, never a fault committed against thee; it is thou that art plotting against me, ready to compass my death. The Lord pass sentence between us; it is for the Lord to avenge me on thee; this hand shall never be lifted against thee. (So the old proverb says, Leave wrong to the wrong-doer, my hand shall not touch thee.) A fine quarry thou huntest, king of Israel, a fine quarry indeed! A dead dog, a flea, is all thy quest. The Lord give sentence between us; the Lord witness and redress my wrongs, and rescue me from thy power.

All this David said to him, and then Saul asked, Is it thy voice I hear, my son David? and wept aloud. Thou givest better measure, he said, than I; thou returnest good for evil, and I evil for good. And thou hast shewn thyself a true friend this day, sparing my life when the Lord had put it at thy mercy; should a man meet his enemy, and let him go unharmed? The Lord reward thee for this day's kindness. This I know past all doubt, that one day thou wilt be king, and have this realm of Israel in thy power; swear to me in the Lord's name that thou wilt not destroy the posterity which survives me, wilt not leave my name forgotten in the record of my father's race. So David bound himself to Saul by oath, and Saul went home, while David and his followers returned to their hill-fastness.

25 And now the Israelites must bewail the death of Samuel; all gathered with one accord and gave him burial at Ramatha, his home. Afterwards, David betook himself to the wilderness of Pharan.

There was a man who lived in the desert of Maon, and had lands at Carmel, a very rich man, owning three thousand sheep and a thousand goats; it happened just then that he was shearing his flocks at Carmel. Nabal was his name, and he had a wife called Abigail, that was a woman of good sense and of great beauty; but this husband of hers, descended from Caleb, was a churlish fellow, wicked and spiteful in all his dealings. When news came to David, there in the desert, that Nabal was at his shearing, he sent ten of his men to Carmel, to find Nabal and wish him well in David's name. And they were to bear this message: My brethren wish thee well, and thy kindred too, and all that is thine. News has come to me that they are shearing, those herdsmen of thine whom we met out in the desert; all the time we were at Carmel, we left them unmolested, and never a beast was missing from their herds; ask thy men, and they will assure thee of it. My servants come at an auspicious time; look kindly on their request, and send such a present as thou canst best afford to thy servants here, and thy son David.

So David's men went on their errand, gave him the message in David's name, and waited for his answer. From David? said he. From the son of Jesse? There is no lack, in these days, of slaves that run away from their masters. Tell him that bread of mine and water of mine and the meat I kill are for my shearers here, not for strangers that have sprung up I know not whence. So David's men must make their way home again, and bring him his answer. Whereupon he bade all his followers gird on their swords. Gird themselves they did, and so did he; some four hundred men went with him, and the other two hundred were left to guard the baggage.

Meanwhile Abigail, Nabal's wife, had been warned by one of the servants, Some messengers came here, sent by David from the desert to greet our master, and he has turned them away. And yet these men ¹⁵ were good friends to us, leaving us ever unmolested; loss had we none all the time they were with us in the desert; nay, they ¹⁶ were a protection to us, night and day, while we pastured our flocks among them. Take thought, then, and resolve what thou wilt do; thy husband and thy house ¹⁷ are marked down for vengeance, and he is so cross-grained a man that there is no reasoning with him. Abigail wasted no time; ¹⁸ she brought out two hundred loaves, two skins of wine, five rams ready cooked, five pecks of flour, a hundred clusters of raisins, and two hundred cakes of dried figs; all these she loaded on asses, and bade ¹⁹ the drivers go on before; she herself would follow. But she said no word of this to her husband Nabal.

She had mounted her ass, and was now ²⁰ at the bottom of the valley, when she saw David and his men coming down towards her; and she went to meet them. And still, ²¹ as he came, David uttered threats; It was a thankless care of mine to protect all this man's goods, out in the desert, so that he never felt loss; it is an ill return he makes me for such a service. God grant David's ²² enemies all they desire and more than they desire, if I let any male in this man's house live till morning!¹ But Abigail no sooner ²³ met David than she dismounted from her ass and fell down before him, her face bowed to earth, and said, kneeling at his feet, For this fault, my lord, let me bear the blame! Listen to thy handmaid, that ²⁴ craves audience of thee. My lord, pay no heed to this cross-grained fellow Nabal, a fool in nature as in name; I myself saw nothing of the men that came from thee. Oh, then, as thou art a living man, and the ²⁵ Lord is a living God, the Lord who has restrained thee from deeds of blood and kept thy hands clean, (may all my lord's enemies and ill-wishers be as ill-advised as Nabal!),² I entreat thee to accept this ²⁶ offering I have brought thee, as a handmaid to her master; share it, my lord, with ²⁷

¹ This is the same formula of imprecation which is used in Ruth 1. 17, and frequently elsewhere, evidently in the sense 'May the Lord punish me and over-punish me if I do not. . .'. The Septuagint Greek here has 'David' instead of 'David's enemies'. ² 'Has restrained thee from deeds of blood', it is ordinarily supposed that Abigail, in using this phrase, is assuming the success of her own mission. The words gain more force if we take them as an allusion to the events of chapter 24; the parenthesis which follows will then apply to Saul.

28 thy followers. And so let the fault of thy handmaid be forgiven! Sure it is the Lord means to grant thee abiding posterity, so well, my lord, dost thou fight his battles;
 and never may ill fortune attend thee, long 29 as thou livest!¹ Rise up who may to wrong thee and plot against thee, yet shall that soul of thine be in safe keeping with the Lord thy God, stored up in his casket of life; it is the souls of thy enemies he shall cast away, as from the whirling heart of a 30 sling. Why then, when the Lord has granted thee all his promised blessings, and made thee master of Israel, let there be no sigh of remorse in my lord's heart, at the memory of innocent blood shed, or vengeance cruelly taken! Rather, when the Lord has so blessed thee, mayest thou think gratefully of me, thy handmaid.

32 And David said to her, Blessed be the Lord God of Israel! A blessing, too, on 33 these words of thine, and on thyself, who hast prevented me this day from going on a bloody errand, using violence to avenge 34 my wrongs! Nay, as the Lord is a living God, the Lord who has preserved me from doing thee hurt, if thou hadst not come to meet me thus early, never a male in Nabal's 35 house should have lived till morning. So David accepted all the gifts she brought him; Go home in peace, he said to her;
 thy prayer is granted, thy suit has prospered.

36 So she went home to Nabal, and found him feasting royally. His heart was merry, for he had drunk deep; and she said no word to him, of little import, or great, till 37 morning. But in the morning, when he had slept away his carouse, his wife told him of all that had passed, and his heart 38 went dead within him, cold as a stone; and when ten days had passed, the Lord struck 39 Nabal down, and he died. When David heard of his death, he said, Blessed be the Lord, that has given me redress for Nabal's ill usage of me, keeping his servant clear of wrong, and himself punishing Nabal's 40 offering her marriage. And when David's messengers reached her at Carmel, and told her David had sent them on this 41 errand, she rose up, and bowed down to earth; Let thy handmaid be a waiting-woman, she said, to wash the feet of my lord's retainers! Then, without more ado, Abigail mounted her ass, took five maidens with her to wait on her needs, and went with David's messengers; and so he made her his wife.

He wedded Achinoam, too, from Jezrahel; both of these were wives to David.
 But as for Michol, that had been his wife once, her father Saul gave her in marriage to Phalti, son of Lais, a man of Gallim.

26 When the men of Ziph brought news to Saul in Gabaa that David was in hiding on the slopes of Hachila, that look out towards the desert, he set out with three thousand picked men from the ranks of Israel, and made his way to the desert of Ziph, to search for David there. On the slopes of Hachila Saul encamped; David, meanwhile, who was out in the desert, knowing that Saul meant to follow him there, had sent men to watch his movements, and it was Hachila they reported as Saul's halting-place. Then David himself went on a secret journey, and made his way to the spot; looked down at the place where Saul lay, where Abner lay, the commander of his army, and the very tent in which Saul slept, with all the rest of his men camped about him.

Thereupon David said to his companions, Achimelech the man of Heth, and Abisai, Sarvia's son, that was brother to Joab, Which of you comes down with me to the camp where Saul lies? And Abisai said, I will bear thee company. So, at dead of night, David and Abisai passed through into the Israelite lines, and found Saul asleep in his tent, with his spear driven into the ground by his pillow; all around him, Abner and the rest of his army lay sleeping too. Now, said Abisai, the Lord has left thy enemy at thy mercy! Let me pin him to the ground as he lies with one thrust of yonder spear; there will be no need for a second. Nay, answered David, kill him thou must not; none can lay hands on the king whom the Lord has anointed but he incurs guilt. As the Lord is a living God, David said, I will wait for the Lord to smite him down, till death comes to him, or he falls on the field of battle. The Lord be merciful to me, never will I lay hands on the king he has anointed! Come, take up the spear that is by his head, and yonder pitcher of water, and let us begone. So David took away the spear, and the pitcher of water that was by Saul's head, and back they went; none saw, none knew of it, none stirred; all lay tranced in a deep sleep the Lord had sent down upon them.

When David had crossed to the further slope, he stood on a peak of the hill far away, parted from them by a long distance, and cried out to the army of Israel, cried out to Abner, son of Ner. What, Abner, he said, wilt thou never answer? And answer he did, Who art thou, that criest so, disturbing the king's sleep? Thou wast ever a brave man, Abner, David said, none like thee in Israel; what guard is this thou keepest over thy lord the king? The life of thy lord the king was in danger but now, from a subject of his that found his way into the camp. This was great fault in thee; as the Lord is a living God, you are no better than dead men, you that watch so ill over your master, the king he has anointed. Look about thee, and see what has become of the king's spear, and the pitcher of water that was by his head.

With that, Saul himself recognized David's voice; Is it thy voice I hear, he asked, my son David? And David answered, It is mine, my lord king, no other. My lord, said he, why wouldst thou hunt down this poor servant of thine? What have I done amiss, what guilt lies at my door? My lord king, give thy servant a hearing. If it is the Lord that inspires thee with such hatred of me, then let him be appeased by sacrifice. But if it is the work of men, the Lord's curse be on them; they have exiled me this day from the Lord's domain, bidden me go and worship alien gods. Why must the earth be stained with my blood, under the Lord's eye? A fine quarry for the king of Israel! A flea, a partridge on the hills, were as well worth his chase. I have done thee wrong, Saul answered; return, my son David, return. Never again will I do thee hurt, after this day when thou hast spared my life. My folly, I see it now; my long blindness, I see it now. Here is the king's spear, said

David; best that one of the king's men should come across and take it. The Lord will make every man the return his own faith and honour have deserved; this day the Lord put thee at my mercy, and I would not lift a hand against the king he has anointed. I held thy life precious; may the Lord hold mine precious, and deliver me at all time of peril. A blessing on thee, my son David, Saul answered; much thou shalt achieve, much win. And with that, David passed on, and Saul went back whence he came.

27 The time must come, David thought to himself, when I shall fall into Saul's hands; were it not better to escape, and take refuge in the country of the Philistines? Then Saul will give up the hope of hunting me down within the borders of Israel, and I shall be safe from his power. So David removed, and betook himself, with six hundred men at his heels, to Achis, son of Maoch, that was king of Geth; there, in Geth, with Achis, he and his men settled down, each with his own household; David with his two wives, Achinoam from Jezrahel, and Abigail that had been wife to Nabal at Carmel. As for Saul, when he heard that David had taken refuge at Geth, he gave up the pursuit.

And now David said to Achis, Do me this favour; make me a grant of land in one of the townships here. No need that I, thy servant, should make my dwelling with thee in thy capital city. Whereupon Achis granted him Siceleg, and it has belonged to the kings of Juda from that day to this. David's stay among the Philistines lasted for four months; he would lead his men out, and drive off plunder from Gessuri and Gersi and from the Amalecites; these were settlements belonging to the old inhabitants of the land, which reached as far as Sur, on the borders of Egypt. Wherever he went, he ravaged the country-side, leaving neither man nor woman alive; then he would carry off sheep and ox and ass and camel and garments as his spoil, and so return to Achis. Did Achis ask where he had made his foray that day, he would answer, On the south of Juda, or of Jerameel, or of Ceni. Neither man nor woman must be taken alive and brought to Geth, for fear they should betray him and his. So David did, of set purpose, all the time he lived in the Philistine country;¹ and Achis believed what he said, and thought to himself, This man has brought great hurt on his own people of Israel; now he is bound to my service in perpetuity.

28 It happened at this time that the Philistines mustered all their array, to levy war on Israel. Be sure of this, said Achis to David, that thou and thy men shall march at my side to battle. Why then, David answered, thou shalt have proof, now, of thy servant's worth. Prove it, said Achis, and it shall be thine to guard my person at all times.

This was after the time when Samuel died, and was buried at his home in Ramatha, with all Israel to mourn him; after the time when Saul purged the country of soothsayers and diviners. The Philistines had joined their forces and marched to Sunam, where they encamped; and Saul, with the whole muster of Israel, went out to mount Gelboe to meet them; but as he looked down on the Philistine camp he was dismayed, and sorely his heart misgave him. When he consulted the Lord, no answer was sent him, by dream or priest or prophet; and at last he bade his servants find him some woman that was an enchantress, so that he could go and question her. There is such a woman, they told him, living at Endor. So he disguised himself, and put on other garments, and, with two of his men in attendance, visited the woman at dead of night. Use thy enchantments, said he, to bring up from the dead the man I name to thee. Nay, said she, thou knowest well how Saul has been at pains to rid the country of diviners and soothsayers; why wouldst thou entrap a poor soul, to bring her to her death? But Saul swore to her, As the Lord is a living God, no harm shall befall thee. And when she asked whom he would have brought up from the dead, he said, Bring up Samuel for me.

No sooner did Samuel appear to her, than the woman cried aloud, What is this trick thou hast played on me? Thou thyself art Saul! But the king bade her have no fear, and asked what it was she had seen. It seemed, she told him, as if gods were coming up from beneath the earth.² What form is it thou seest? he asked. And she said, An old man has come up, wrapped in a cloak. Then Saul knew that it was Samuel, and he bowed his face to the earth, and did reverence.

Why hast thou disturbed my rest, Samuel asked, and brought me to earth again? I am hard pressed, Saul told him; the Philistines are levying war on me, and the Lord has forsaken me, giving me no answer by prophet or by dream; and I have summoned thee to tell me how I am to make shift. Nay, answered Samuel, what need to ask? The Lord has forsaken thee, and gone over to one that is thy rival. He means to make good the threat I uttered in his name, that he would snatch the kingdom from thy hand, and give it to another; it was of David he spoke. And thy plight this day is the punishment the Lord sends thee for disobeying his command, instead of executing his vengeance on Amalec; over thee and all Israel he will give the Philistines mastery. To-morrow, thou and thy sons will be with me, and the Lord will leave the camp of Israel at the mercy of the Philistines.

With that, Saul fell his full length on the ground, so daunted was he by Samuel's words, so weak from taking no food all that day. The woman went to his side, seeing him thus overcome; My lord, she said, I obeyed thee at the peril of my life, and since I have so humoured thee, wilt thou not humour this handmaid of thine, by letting her set a mouthful of food before thee, to give thee strength for thy journey by the eating of it? But he refused to take any food, until his servants and the woman together put constraint on him; then at last he rose from the ground and sat on the bed. The woman had a calf by her that she had fattened; this she killed without more ado, took flour and kneaded it and baked it without leaven, and so she gave Saul

¹ According to the Hebrew text, the end of this verse should run 'for fear they should betray him by saying, David did this or that. Such was David's policy all the time he lived in the Philistine country' and his men their meal. When they had eaten it they rose to go, and on they journeyed the whole night through.

² Hebrew usage would allow us to translate 'god' here instead of 'gods'.

29 So the Philistines marshalled their whole forces in Aphec, while Israel encamped by the spring at Jezrahel; at the head of their hundreds and their thousands the chiefs of the Philistines marched by, and at the rear, with Achis, were David and his men. And now the chiefs of the Philistines began asking what these Hebrews did there; Why, said Achis, you have surely heard of David, that was in the service of Saul, king of Israel? He has been with me a long time, more than a year now, and to this day, from the day when he first took refuge with me I have had no fault to find with him.¹ But the chiefs of the Philistines took it amiss; Let this fellow go home, they said, and remain at the post thou hast allotted to him. He must not march into battle at our side; who knows whether he will turn against us when once we are engaged? What other peace-offering can such a man bring to his old master but these heads of ours? It was of this David the dancers used to sing, By Saul's hand a thousand, by David's ten thousand fell.

So Achis sent for David, and said to him, As the Lord is a living God, I know thee for a good man and true; thy place is at my side in battle, and never to this day from the day when first thou camest to me have I had any fault to find with thee. But the chiefs look askance at thee; go home, then, and peace go with thee; it were well thou shouldst not cross the chiefs of the Philistines. Why, said David, what harm have I done, what fault hast thou to find with thy servant, ever since I first appeared in thy presence, that I should be forbidden to come out and fight against the enemies of my lord the king? Nay, answered Achis, I can vouch for it that to myself thou art welcome as an angel of God; but the chiefs of the Philistines have decreed, He shall not go to battle with us. Come then, march away to-morrow with all thy company; rise up at dawn, and begone with the morning light. So David and his men rose up early on the morrow to march away and return to the Philistine country, while the Philistines went to the attack against Jezrahel.

30 When David and his men reached Siceleg, the next day but one, they found that the Amalecites from the south had attacked and overpowered it, and burnt it to the ground; the women, too, they had carried off. They did not put anyone to death, of high or low degree, but carried off all they found, and so went on their way. So David and his men, coming back to the city to find it burnt down, and their wives and sons and daughters taken prisoner, raised a great cry of lamentation, and wept till their tears would flow no more. David's two wives, Achinoam from Jezrahel and Abigail, Nabal's widow from Carmel, had been carried off like the rest, and his was a heavy lot to bear; his followers came near to stoning him, so sore were their hearts at the loss of son and daughter. But David found refuge in the Lord his God. Bring out the sacred mantle, he said to the priest Abiathar, Achimelech's son, and when Abiathar had brought it, he asked the Lord, Shall I give these freebooters chase? Is there hope of overtaking them? And the Lord said, Go in pursuit; past doubt thou wilt overtake them, and rob them of their prey.

So David and his six hundred followers marched all the way to the ravine of Besor, where some, for very weariness, must halt; but David himself still gave chase, with four hundred men at his back, leaving the other two hundred to rest from their weariness in the ravine of Besor. Then they came upon an Egyptian, out there on the plain, and brought him to David; but first they must give him bread and water, and part of a cake of dried figs, and two bunches of raisins; he must be restored and revived, after three days and three nights without food or drink. When David asked who he was, whence he came and whither he was bound, he said, I am a serving-man from Egypt; my master is an Amalecite; three days ago I fell sick, and he left me behind here. We had been making a foray over the ¹ 'A long time, more than a year now'; literally, 'days or years'. The statement in 27. 7 that David was in the Philistine country for four months may refer only to the time before he settled in Siceleg; or it may be that Achis here exaggerates, so as to make the other chiefs convinced of David's loyalty.

southern border of the Cherethites, against 15 Juda, too, and the south of Caleb, and we burned Siceleg to the ground. Then David asked him, Canst thou shew me where to find the company of which thou speakest?
 First, said he, thou must needs swear to me in God's name that thou wilt neither kill me nor give me up into my master's power; then I will shew thee where this company is to be found. So David took the 16 oath asked of him, and the Egyptian led him to where they lay, scattered pell-mell over the ground, eating and drinking and making holiday over their plunder, the spoils they had won from the Philistine 17 country and from Juda. All the rest of that day and all the next David drove them before him, and not one man escaped, except four hundred drivers who mounted their camels and fled.

18 So David recovered all the Amalecites had carried off, and his two wives with the 19 rest; never boy or girl or chattel was missing; all that had been carried away 20 David brought back. And as he came home, driving before him all the sheep and cattle he had won, the cry rose, This is 21 David's booty. So he reached the two hundred men that halted, too weary to follow, and were left behind in the ravine of Besor; and as they came out to meet him and his followers, David went up and gave 22 them friendly greeting. But there were churlish, graceless fellows among his own following who reasoned thus: Here are men that did not bear us company; for them, then, no share in the booty we have recovered. Let each of them take his own wife and children, and with these go away 23 content. Nay, brethren, David answered, that will not serve. All these gifts the Lord has given, besides protecting us and win-24 ning us the mastery over these marauding enemies. Over this you shall get no hearing; the man that stays behind with the baggage has the same rights as the man who went into battle, all must share alike.
 25 Ever since that day this rule has been recognized and established; it is the law still observed in Israel.

26 When David reached Siceleg, he sent presents to the elders of the neighbouring cities in Juda, bidding them accept his offering taken out of the spoil of the Lord's enemies. These were Bethel, Ramoth in the South, Jether, Aroer, Sephamoth, Esthamo, Rachal, the cities of Jerameel, the cities of Ceni, Arama, the Hollow of Asan, Athach, and Hebron; and other places besides, where David and his men had once made their home.

31 Meanwhile, the Philistines had engaged Israel; and the Israelites fled at their onslaught, and were cut down on mount Gelboe as they fled. Ever harder the Philistines pressed on the retreat of Saul and of his sons, till at last his sons, Jonathan, and Abinadab, and Melchisua
 had fallen, and he himself bore the whole weight of the attack. The archers were following close on his heels, and sorely the archers wounded him. Then Saul bade his own squire draw on him and kill him; he would not have uncircumcised foes kill him with outrage. And when the squire's heart failed him, so that he would not obey, Saul himself caught up a sword, and fell on it. Whereupon, seeing his master dead, the squire fell upon his own sword, and died with him. So perished Saul, and his three sons, and his squire, and all that army of his, in one day.

And now the Israelites who lived beyond the plain, beyond Jordan, when they saw Israel routed and Saul and his sons killed, abandoned their cities and took to flight, leaving the Philistines to come in and settle there. Next day, coming to plunder the slain, the Philistines found Saul and his three sons, where they lay on Mount Gelboe, and they cut off Saul's head, and stripped him of his armour, and sent these from place to place in the Philistine country, to publish the news in the temples of their gods, and among their people. His arms they dedicated in the temple of Astaroth, and hung up his body on the walls of Bethsan. But the folk of Jabes-Galaad came to hear of what the Philistines had done to Saul; whereupon all their fighting men went out, marching all through the night, and took down his body and the bodies of his sons from the wall of Bethsan; reaching Jabes-Galaad, they burned them there, and carried off their bones to burial in the wood of Jabes. And they fasted seven days to lament him.

THE SECOND BOOK OF KINGS

SOMETIMES CALLED THE SECOND BOOK OF SAMUEL

SAUL was already dead when David came back from routing Amelec, and spent two days in Siceleg; then, on the third day, a man from Saul's army came in view, his garments torn, his head covered with dust, who, upon sight of David, bowed down to earth and did reverence. Whence comest thou? David asked, and on learning that he had made his way there from the Israelite army, Tell me, how went the day? We were routed, said he, in the battle, and many of the common folk fell slain; worse yet, Saul and his son Jonathan are among the dead. What proof hast thou, David asked the messenger, that Saul and Jonathan were slain? I chanced, said he, to reach mount Gelboe, and there I found Saul, leaning on his spear. Chariots and horsemen were in close pursuit, and he turned to look behind him; saw, and hailed me, and learned I was ready at his command; asked who I was, and learned that I was an Amalecite. Then he said, Stand close, and give me my death-blow; the toils are closing round me, and I am a whole man yet. So I stood close, and dealt the blow, knowing well that there could be no life for him after his fall; then I took the crown from his head and the bracelet from his arm, and here I bring them to my lord. At that, David rent his garments, and so did all the men who were with him; mourned they and wept, and fasted till evening came, for Saul and his son Jonathan, and for the Lord's people, men of Israel's race, that lay fallen in battle. And now David asked the messenger, Whence is it thou comest? My father, he answered, was an alien, a man of Amelec. And wast thou not afraid, said David, to lay hands on the king the Lord had anointed, and slay him? Then he bade one of his men go up and make an end of the Amalecite, and when the blow had fallen, said over his dead body, Thou hast brought death on thy own head, by owning thyself the murderer of an anointed king.

This is the lament David made over Saul and his son Jonathan, and would have this lament of his, The Bow, taught to the sons of Juda;¹ the words of it are to be found in the Book of the Upright. Remember, Israel, the dead, wounded on thy heights, the flower of Israel, cut down on thy mountains; how fell they, warriors such as these? Keep the secret in Geth, never a word in the streets of Ascalon; shall the women-folk rejoice, shall they triumph, daughters of the Philistine, the uncircumcised? Mountains of Gelboe, never dew, never rain fall upon you, never from your lands be offering made of first-fruits; there the warrior's shield lies dishonoured, the shield of Saul, bright with oil no more. Where the blood of slain men, the flesh of warriors beckoned, never the bow of Jonathan hung back, never the sword of Saul went empty from the feast. Saul and Jonathan, so well beloved, so beautiful; death no more than life could part them; never was eagle so swift, never was lion so strong. Lament, daughters of Israel, lament for Saul, the man who dressed you bravely in scarlet, who decked your apparel out with trinkets of gold. How fell they, warriors such as these, in the battle? On thy heights, Gelboe, Jonathan lies slain.² Shall I not mourn for thee, Jonathan my brother, so beautiful, so well beloved, beyond all love of women? Never woman loved her only son, as I thee.³ How fell such warriors, what could blunt such swords as these?

2 After this David asked counsel from the Lord, whether he should remove ¹ 'And would have this lament of his, The Bow, taught to the sons of Juda'; literally, according to the Hebrew text, 'and he said to teach the sons of Juda the bow'. ² The word 'Gelboe' is not in the original, but some such addition would seem necessary to the sense. ³ The last nine words of this verse are not in the Hebrew text, nor in the Septuagint Greek.

into one of the cities of Juda. When the Lord bade him remove, he asked, Into which of them? And the answer came, To 2 Hebron. So thither David took his two wives, Achinoam from Jezrahel and Abigail that had been wife to Nabal at Carmel;
 3 thither, too, went the men who followed him, each with his own household, settling in the townships that belonged to Hebron.
 4 There the men of Juda came to him, and anointed him king over the line of Juda. And when David heard how the men of 5 Jabes-Galaad had given Saul burial, he sent messengers to say, The Lord's blessing on you, for the faithfulness you have shewn to Saul, your master, in thus 6 burying him; may the Lord make return to you for your loyalty and kindness! I too will prove myself grateful for it. Strong 7 be those arms of yours, keep your courage high; now that you no longer have Saul to rule over you, the tribe of Juda has anointed me to be its king.
 8 But meanwhile Abner the son of Ner, who was in command of the army, brought Isboseth forward, Saul's remaining son, and gave him a royal progress through the 9 camp; setting him up as king of Galaad and Gessuri and Jezrahel and Ephraim and 10 Benjamin and all the rest of Israel. Isboseth, heir to king Saul, was forty years old when his reign over Israel began, and it lasted two years; David had no following 11 except the tribe of Juda, and as king of Juda, for seven and a half years, he reigned at Hebron.
 12 And now they offered battle from their camp at Gabaon, Abner son of Ner and the men that recognized Isboseth as heir to 13 king Saul; and by the pool at Gabaon the army of David went out to meet them, under Joab son of Sarvia. So they met, and confronted one another on opposite 14 sides of the pool. Thereupon Abner proposed to Joab that champions should come forward and make trial of arms, and to this 15 Joab agreed. Come forward they did, twelve men that acknowledged Isboseth as the heir of Saul, and twelve followers of 16 David, and met one another. Each caught his man by the head and thrust his sword deep, and together they fell slain; there in the field by Gabaon which has taken its name from them, the Field of the Champions.

It was a fierce battle that raged that day, and David's men routed Abner and the Israelites. Two sons of Sarvia besides Joab were fighting, Abisai and Asael; Asael, swift of foot as any wild roe. And this Asael gave chase to Abner, following him still without swerving to right or left; till at last Abner looked behind him, and asked if he were Asael. When he learned that it was so, he warned him, Why then, turn aside this way or that, overtake one of my men, and from him secure thy spoils. But still Asael would not give up the pursuit, and again Abner warned him, Turn back, and follow me no more; must I strike thee down, and never again look thy brother Joab in the face? At last, finding that he would not listen to him and never turned aside, Abner, with a backward thrust of his spear, smote him through the groin. There and then he fell dead; and none that came up behind him ventured beyond the place where Asael died.

But meanwhile Joab and Abisai were in pursuit of Abner. When the sun set, they had reached the Hill of the Aqueduct, that lies on the side of the ravine opposite the desert road to Gabaon. All the men of Benjamin had rallied to Abner, and there they stood gathered in one mass, with one hill-top to defend. And now Abner cried out to Joab, Is there no glutting that sword of thine? Hast thou never heard that desperate men are dangerous? Call off thy men, before it is too late, from the pursuit of their own brethren. As the Lord is a living God, Joab answered, hadst thou only spoken, my men would have let their brethren alone while it was still morning. With that, he sounded his trumpet, and all his army halted; there was no more pursuit of Israel, no more fighting. All that night Abner and his men marched over the plain, crossed the Jordan, and made their way along Beth-horon to their camp.¹ When Joab returned after abandoning the pursuit, he called the roll and found only nineteen of David's men missing, besides Asael; whereas the toll they had taken of Benjamin and the rest of Abner's forces was three hundred and sixty dead. Asael they bore off, and gave him burial in his father's tomb at Beth-lehem; then they too, Joab and his army, marched all through the night, and reached Hebron as dawn was breaking.

3 It was a long struggle between Saul's line and David's; but ever the fortunes and power of David grew, while the cause of Saul became daily weaker. Six sons were born to David, there in Hebron; Amnon, his first-born, by Achinoam of Jezrahel, then Cheleab, by Abigail, that had been Nabal's wife at Carmel, then Absalom, by Maacha, daughter to Tholmai, king of Gessur. The fourth was Adonias, son of Haggith, the fifth Saphathia, son of Abital, the sixth Jethraam, that David's wife Eglah bore him; of all these Hebron was the birth-place.

As long as war lasted between the two dynasties, Abner the son of Ner was the head of Saul's party. But Saul had left a concubine, Respha the daughter of Aia; and of her Isboseth said to Abner, What wouldst thou mate with my father's concubine? And he, greatly angered by Isboseth's words, cried out, I have made all Juda shun me like a carrion-dog, by befriending the line of thy father Saul, his kindred and his court, instead of giving thee up to David; and am I to be called to account this day over a woman? God punish Abner as he deserves and more than he deserves, if I do not fulfil the promise which the Lord made to David; the kingship shall be taken away from Saul's line, and David shall reign over Israel and Juda alike, from Dan to Bersabee! Never a word did Isboseth say in answer, so greatly did he fear him.

Then Abner sent a message to David, claiming that the land lay in his own power; League thyself with me, the message ran, and I will help thee, and reduce all Israel to thy obedience. And David answered, Well said; I am ready to make a league with thee, but one thing first. Thou canst not be admitted to my presence unless thou bringest Michol, Saul's daughter, with thee; so only shalt thou find audience. At the same time, he sent a message to Isboseth, that was heir to king Saul, Give me back my wife Michol, the bride I won with the foreskins of a hundred Philistines. So Isboseth sent and had her¹⁵ taken away from her husband Phaltiel, son of Lais, who followed her, weeping, all the¹⁶ way to Bahurim. But Abner bade him turn and go back, and go back he did. Meanwhile, Abner sent the word round¹⁷ among the elders of Israel, It was but yesterday you were eager to have David for your king. It is time now, to fulfil the¹⁸ promise the Lord made to David; by David's hand I will rid my people Israel of the Philistines, and of all their enemies. Even among the men of Benjamin Abner¹⁹ sent the word out. Then he went to tell David, at Hebron, of the resolve made by Israel, and by the tribe of Benjamin at large. He came to Hebron with twenty²⁰ men, and there David made a feast for him and his companions. And now, said Abner, I will go and rally all Israel to thy²¹ cause, my lord king. By this league of ours, they shall be thy subjects, loyal to thy will. So David took leave of him, and he went on his way in peace.

Soon David's men, with Joab at their²² head, came home from an attack on the freebooters, loaded with spoil. They did not find Abner in Hebron; David had but now sent him on his way in peace; they²³ came too late, Joab and his men. But Joab was told how Abner, son of Ner, had visited the king, and of their friendly parting; so he went at once into the royal²⁴ presence, and cried, What is this? Abner with thee, and thou hast let him slip through thy hands, gone, free as air! Dost thou know Abner so little? He did but come²⁵ here to play thee false, spying upon thy comings and goings, learning of all thou dost. And Joab left the royal presence to send messengers after Abner, summoning him back, without David's knowledge, from the Pool of Sira. No sooner had²⁷ Abner come back to Hebron than Joab took him aside, there in the gates, under pretence of speaking with him, and smote him in the groin, avenging by that death the death of his brother Asael. It was²⁸ all over when David heard of it, and he cried, Never shall I or my kingdom be held answerable for Abner's death! On Joab's head let the guilt fall, and on²⁹ all his line; let the line of Joab never want a man that has a running at the reins, or is a leper, or works at the distaff like a woman, or falls in battle, or begs his bread.¹

30 Thus Joab and his brother Abisai murdered Abner, who had slain their brother 31 Asael in the fighting at Gabaon. As for David, he bade Joab and his men tear their garments and put on sackcloth, and go mourning at Abner's funeral; he himself 32 followed the bier, and wept aloud over Abner's tomb at Hebron, where they buried him; all the people, too, were in 33 tears. And this was the dirge with which he lamented him: Died Abner as the igno-34 noble die?² No bond tied thy hands, no gyves thy feet; thou didst fall as men fall when cruel wrong assails them. And all the people took up the refrain as they 35 mourned. Then, while it was still full day, they came together to eat, and would have David eat with them; but he took an oath, The Lord punish me as I deserve, and more than I deserve, if I taste bread or any 36 other food before set of sun! This all the folk heard, and more than ever they ap-37 plauded the king's doings; among all that multitude, and in all Israel, there was not a man that blamed David for the slaying of 38 Abner, son of Ner. Past all doubt, said the king to his servants, Israel has lost, this 39 day, the greatest of its chieftains. Alas, they have anointed a weakling to be their king; not mine to curb these sons of Sarvia. May the Lord punish the wrong-doer for the wrong done!

4 When Isboseth, Saul's heir, heard news of Abner's death at Hebron, he was a broken man, and all Israel was in 2 confusion. In command of his army, when they went out on forays, were two Ber-3 rothites from Benjamin, named Baana and Rechab, sons of Remmon; Beroth counted 4 as part of Benjamin, but these Berothites were exiles, and lived in Gethaim ever after. For heir, he had a grandson of Saul by Jonathan, a lame-footed boy;³ he was five years old when the news about Saul and Jonathan came from Jezrahel, and his nurse carried him off to safety, but in the hurry of the flight he fell and was lamed; he was called Miphiboseth.

And now Baana and Rechab, sons of Remmon the Berothite, entered Isboseth's house when the sun was at its full heat; Isboseth himself was abed, taking his noon-day sleep, and the woman that kept the door had fallen asleep too over the corn she was cleaning. (Taking ears of corn with them, Rechab and Baana made their way in secretly, and smote him in the groin, and made good their escape.⁴) When they had made their way in, they found him there in his own room, asleep on the bed, and despatched him with blows; then they cut off his head, and journeyed with it across the desert road all night. So they brought the head of Isboseth to David at Hebron; See, they told him, here is the head of Isboseth, the heir of Saul, that was thy mortal enemy; the Lord has revenged our royal master this day upon Saul and his race.

But this was the answer David made to Rechab and his brother Baana, sons of Remmon: As the Lord, my rescuer from all peril, is a living God, you shall repent it!⁵ There was one came to me at Siceleg and told me of Saul's death, thinking to bring me good news; and his reward was then and there to be seized and slain. And here are wretches that have murdered an innocent man in his own home, as he lay asleep; do you think I will not exact blood-vengeance from you, rid the land of you? So David ordered his men to kill them and cut off their hands and feet; the bodies were hung up over the fish-pond at Hebron. As for the head of Isboseth, it was carried away, and buried in Abner's grave.

5 After this, all the tribes of Israel rallied to David at Hebron; We are kith and kin of thine, they said. It is not so long since Israel marched under thy orders, when Saul was still reigning; and the Lord has promised thee that thou shouldst be its shepherd and its captain. And so the elders of Israel went to his court at Hebron; and there, at Hebron, in the Lord's presence, David made a covenant with them, and they anointed him king of Israel. He was thirty years old when his reign began, and it lasted forty years; for seven and a half years over Judah only, with its capital at Hebron, then for thirty-three more years over Israel and Judah both, with its capital at Jerusalem.

When the king and his army marched on Jerusalem, to attack the Jebusites, that were native to the soil, they met him with the taunt, Thou must rid thyself of blind men and lame, before thou canst make thy way in here, meaning that David would never make his way in; but take it he did, the Citadel of Zion that is called David's Keep. He had promised a reward to the conqueror of the Jebusites, to the man who could reach the gutters of the roofs, and clear them of the blind and lame (as he called them) that were David's enemies. That was how the saying arose, No entry into the precincts for the blind and the lame.¹

And now he made his dwelling in the citadel, and called it David's Keep; he built walls round it, too, with Mello for their outer bastion. So he went on, prospering and gaining in strength, and the Lord God of hosts was with him. Hiram king of Tyre, sent messengers offering him cedar planks and carpenters, and one-masons for the walls; and they built David's house for him. No doubt could David have that the Lord had ratified his sovereignty over Israel, and made him the king of a great people. So, when he moved from Hebron to Jerusalem, he provided himself with fresh wives and concubines there, and more sons and daughters were born to him; Jerusalem was the birth-place of Samua, Sobab, Nathan, Solomon, Jebahar, Elisua, Nepheg, Japhia, Elisama, Elioda and Eliphaleth.

When news reached the Philistines that David had been anointed as king of all Israel, they mustered their forces to hunt him down. David, hearing of it, withdrew into his stronghold, while the Philistines came in and occupied the whole valley of Raphaim. Thereupon David consulted the Lord; should he attack the Philistines? Would he be given the mastery? And he was bidden to go to the attack; the Philistines would be at his mercy. So David marched out to Baal-Pharasim, and defeated them there; The Lord has parted the enemy's ranks before me, he said, as easily as water parts this way and that; so the place came by its name, Baal-Pharasim, The Master of the Breach. They left their idols behind them there, and these fell into the hands of David and his men. But once more the Philistines came to the attack, and occupied the Raphaim valley; and this time, when David asked whether he might attack them with good hope of mastering them, the answer was, Do not go to the attack, circumvent them and come upon them from the direction of the pear-trees yonder. Wait till thou hearest, in the tops of the pear-trees, the sound of marching feet; then offer battle; it is a sign that the Lord will pass on before thee, to smite down the army of the Philistines. So David did as the Lord had bidden him; and he drove the Philistines before him all the way from Gabaa to Gezer.

6 Then David mustered anew the fighting men of Israel, thirty thousand strong.

Meanwhile, he set out with the men of Judah that followed him, and went to fetch the ark of God home; that ark which takes its name from the Lord God of hosts, dwelling there above it between the cherubim. And they carried the ark away from Abinadab's house at Gabaa, putting it on ¹ The sense of these verses is much disputed, and some think the text has suffered from corruption. As it stands, the meaning seems to be that David had, in the first instance, described the Jebusites contemptuously as blind men, to be torn from their battlements. The Jebusites retorted (verse 7) by telling David that he would not make his way in until he had rid himself of blind and lame men; by which it seems they meant his own troops, since we are told at the end of verse 8, 'That is why they said, The blind and the lame shall not make their way into the house'. The Latin version treats the remark as a proverbial saying, and gives 'temple' instead of 'house'; but the Hebrew text does not necessarily imply this. Some think the reference in verse 8 is not to a gutter, but to a conduit controlling the water-supply of the city.

a newly-made waggon, with Abinadab's 4 sons, Oza and Ahio, for its drivers. He it was had had charge of it, there in Gabaa, till now; but now they took it away from his house, with Ahio walking before it, 5 while David and the Israelites played music, there in the Lord's presence, on instruments of rare workmanship, harp and zither and tambour and castanets and 6 cymbals. They had reached the threshing-floor of Nachon, when the oxen began to kick and tilted the ark to one side; whereupon Oza put out his hand and caught hold 7 of it. Rash deed of his, that provoked the divine anger; the Lord smote him, and he 8 died there beside the ark. Great grief it was to David, this ruin the Lord had brought on Oza (the place is still called 9 Oza's Ruin), and a dread of the Lord came upon him that day; How shall I, he asked, 10 give shelter to the Lord's ark? No longer was he minded to give it a lodging in David's Keep; it must find a home with Obedom the Gethite instead.

11 For three months the ark of the Lord was left with Obedom the Gethite, and brought a blessing on him and his house-12 hold. Then word was brought to David how the Lord had blessed Obedom and all that was his for the ark's sake. So back he went, and brought the ark of God away from Obedom's house, into David's Keep, with great rejoicing; seven choirs of dancers he took with him, and a young 13 bull for a victim.¹ No sooner had the bearers of the ark gone six paces on their journey, than he sacrificed the bull and a 14 ram with it. As for himself, he went dancing with all his might, there in the Lord's presence; clad in the sacred mantle, 15 he must dance too. So David, and Israel with him, brought back the ark that bears record of the Lord's covenant, with re-16 joicing and a great din of trumpets. And as it came into David's Keep, there was Michol, Saul's daughter, looking on from her window; she saw king David leaping and dancing in the Lord's presence, and her heart despised him.

17 When the ark had been brought into the city, they put it down at the appointed place, in the midst of a tabernacle which David had there spread out for it; and David brought burnt-sacrifices and welcome-offerings into the Lord's presence there. Then, when his offering was done, 18 he blessed the people in the name of the Lord of hosts, and gave to every Israelite, 19 man or woman, a roll of bread and a piece of roast beef and a flour-cake fried in oil;² and with that, the people dispersed to their homes. David himself, going back to bless 20 his own household, was met by Michol, Saul's daughter. A day of great renown, she said, for the king of Israel, that exposed his person to man and maid, his own subjects, graceless as a common mountebank!

 Nay, answered David, it was at the Lord's 21 coming. He it is that has chosen me, instead of thy father or any of thy father's line, to rule the Lord's people of Israel;
 and before his coming play the mounte- 22 bank I will; humble myself I will in my own esteem, and those maids thou speakest of will honour me yet the more. And 23 Michol, that was daughter to king Saul, never bore child again to the day of her death.

7 The king had now a palace of his own to dwell in, and the Lord kept him safe, on every side, from all his enemies.
 Whereupon he said to the prophet Nathan, Here am I dwelling in a house all of cedar, while God's ark has nothing better than curtains of hide about it! And Nathan answered, Go thy own way, fulfil thy own purpose; the Lord is with thee. But that same night the divine word came to Nathan, Go and give my servant David a message from the Lord: Dost thou think to build a house for me to dwell in? House was never mine, since I rescued the sons of Israel from Egypt; still in a tabernacle, a wanderer's home, I came and went. This way and that the whole race of Israel journeyed, and I with them; now to this tribe, now to that, I gave the leadership of the rest, and never did I reproach any of them for not building me a house of cedar.

This message, then, thou wilt give to my servant David from the Lord of hosts: Out in the pasture-lands, where thou wast tending the sheep, I summoned thee away to bear rule over my people Israel; go where thou wouldst, I was ever at thy side,

exterminating thy enemies to make room for thee, granting thee such renown as only comes to the greatest on earth. Henceforth my people are to have a settled home, taking root in it and remaining in undisturbed possession of it, no longer harassed by godless neighbours, as they have been ever since I first gave Israel judges to rule them. No longer shall thy enemies trouble thee; and this too the Lord promises, that he will grant thy line continuance. So, when thy days are ended, and thou art laid to rest beside thy fathers, I will grant thee for successor a son of thy own body, established firmly on his throne. He it is that shall build a house to do my name honour. I will prolong for ever his royal dynasty; he shall find in me a father, and I in him a son. If he plays me false, be sure I will punish him; ever for man the rod, ever for Adam's sons the plagues of mortality; but I will not cancel my merciful promise to him, as I cancelled my promise to Saul, the king that was banished from my favour. Through the ages, far as thy thought can reach, dynasty and royalty both shall endure; thy throne shall remain for ever unshaken.

All this message, all this revelation, was handed on by Nathan to king David. And David went into the Lord's presence, and betook himself to prayer; Lord God, he said, that one such as I am, sprung from such a house as mine, should have been brought by thee to such power! But it was not enough, Lord God, thou wouldst do more; thou wouldst foretell the destiny of thy servant's line in days far hence; Lord God, can mortal man claim such rights?¹ No words can thy servant David find; such divine mercy thou showest him. In fulfilment of thy promise, in pursuance of thy will, thou dost bring about all these marvels which thou hast made known to thy servant. So great thou art, Lord God! None is like thee, thou alone art God, read we the history of past days aright. Can any other nation say, like thy people Israel, that its God came to buy it back for himself as his own people, winning such renown for himself, doing such deeds of wonder and dread against any country, and its people, and its god, as thou didst when thou didst buy back thy people from Egypt?² So didst thou pledge this people of Israel to be thy people eternally, and thou, Lord God, didst become their God.

This promise, then, Lord God, which thou hast made concerning thy servant and his line, do thou for ever fulfil; make thy word good, that so thy name may be for ever glorified, the Lord of hosts that is God of Israel; under thy divine care may the dynasty of thy servant David remain unshaken. Lord of hosts, God of Israel, thou hast given me secret knowledge of thy will, promised me a long posterity; what wonder that thy servant finds his heart full of such prayers as these? So be it, Lord God; thou art God, and thy word is ever faithful; since blessing thou hast promised to thy servant, blessing on his line bestow, and keep it always under thy protection. Thou, Lord God, hast spoken, and through this blessing of thine my race shall be blessed for ever.

8 After this, David defeated the Philistines and brought their pride low; wrested from them, too, their claim to exact tribute. He also defeated the Moabites, and measured out their fate to them by lot, bringing them down to the dust; life and death were the two lots he measured out to them; and Moab became tributary to king David.³ He defeated Adarezer, son of Rohob, king of Soba, that marched out to extend his domains beyond the river Euphrates; seventeen hundred horsemen he took alive, and twenty thousand that fought on foot, and cut the hamstring of the horses, but kept a hundred teams for himself. When the Syrians of Damascus came out to reinforce Adarezer, king of Soba, David routed their army of twenty-two thousand, and put a garrison of his own in the Damascus region of Syria, which became tributary to him.

² The Hebrew text here is involved (possibly through corruption), and the Latin version hardly less so, but the general sense is clearly that given above.

³ The Hebrew text here is usually understood as meaning that David 'cradled them on the ground' and actually measured them with a rope, but the expression, like the procedure supposed, seems improbable. The language of the Latin version suggests that it understood the word 'rope' metaphorically, as in Ps. 15. 6.

Undertake what enterprise he would, ever the Lord protected him.

7 All the golden trappings, which Adarezer's men wore, David carried off and 8 brought to Jerusalem; from Bete, too, and Beroth, cities in Adarezer's dominion, he 9 carried away great stores of bronze. When the news of this victory over Adarezer's 10 forces reached Thou, king of Emath, he sent his son Joram to greet David and wish him well, out of gratitude for the conquest and rout of Adarezer, who was Thou's enemy; and this Joram brought presents with him, of gold and silver and bronze, 11 which king David consecrated to the Lord, together with all the silver and gold he had set apart from the spoils of the conquered nations, Syria, Moab, Ammon, the Philistines, Amalec, and now Adarezer, son of Rohob, king of Soba.

13 David won renown, too, on his way back from the conquest of Syria, by defeating eighteen thousand men in the Valley of the Salt-pits; after this he kept troops in Edom 14 to garrison it, and the whole of Edom became subject to him. And still the Lord 15 protected David in all his enterprises. The whole of Israel was under his rule, and to all his people he administered justice and gave award. His army was commanded by 16 Joab, son of Sarvia, and Josaphat, son of Ahilud, kept the records; the priests were 17 Sadoc, son of Achitob, and Achimelech, son of Abiathar, and Saraias was secretary; 18 Banaias, son of Joiada, was at the head of the Cerethites and Phelethites, and David's sons, too, were his ministers.¹

9 Meanwhile the thought came to David, whether there were any of Saul's line left, so that he could shew them kindness in memory of Jonathan. There 2 was a serving-man left over from Saul's household, whose name was Siba; David now sent for him. Art thou Siba? he asked. And ready at thy command, the other 3 answered. Tell me, said the king, has Saul left any descendant alive, to whom I can shew the friendship God requires of me? Why yes, answered Siba, there is a son of 4 Jonathan that is lame-footed; and when David asked where he might be found, he told him, At the house of Machir, son of Ammiel, at Lodabar. So from the house of Machir, son of Ammiel, at Lodabar, David had him brought, Miphiboseth, son of Jonathan, that was the son of Saul. He 6 came into David's presence, and bowed low to do him reverence; and when David called him by name, he answered, I am 7 here at thy command. Do not be afraid, David said; I mean to shew thee friendship for the sake of Jonathan, that was thy father, and restore to thee all the lands which belong to thee as Saul's heir; and evermore thou shalt sit down to eat at my table. And the other said, bowing low, 8 Wouldst thou concern thyself with such a man as I am, no better than a dead dog?

Then the king sent to fetch Siba, who 9 had been serving-man to Saul. All that belonged to Saul, he told him, all the household that once was his, I have given to thy master's heir. Do thou, then, and 10 thy sons, and the servants under thee, till the lands for him, and bring in its revenues to maintain him. He, Miphiboseth, thy master's heir, shall evermore sit down to eat at my table. This Siba had fifteen sons, and twenty servants under him, and he 11 told David, My lord king, I am at thy service to do thy bidding. So Miphiboseth ate at the king's table, as if he had been one of the king's own sons. He had, too, a little 12 son of his own, called Micha. Thus Siba and his household worked for Miphiboseth, while he himself lived at Jerusalem, 13 eating ever at the king's table; a lame man, lame of either foot.

10 When the king of the Ammonites died, and his son Hanon succeeded him, David thought to himself, I will shew 1 kindness to Hanon, as his father Naas did to me; and he dispatched envoys to condole with him over his father's death. But when these reached the Ammonite country, the chiefs there 2 said to Hanon, their sovereign, What, David send messengers to comfort thee, in honour of thy father's memory? Nay, 3 if he has sent men here, they are spies who will make a report on the city, so that he may come and destroy it. So Hanon seized 4 David's messengers, shaved their beards on one side, and cut off the skirts of their clothes right up to the buttocks, and in that guise sent them back. David, when he heard of this, sent out to meet them, covered with confusion as they were, and bade them wait in Jericho, not returning home until their beards were grown again.

Meanwhile the Ammonites, well aware that they had made an enemy of David, sent and hired mercenaries from the Syrians of Rohob and the Syrians of Soba, twenty thousand men that marched on foot; a thousand, too, from the king of Maacha, and twelve thousand from Istob. Upon hearing this news, David sent the whole of his forces to engage them, under Joab. The Ammonites themselves had come out from the city, and drawn up their line at the approaches to its gates; the Syrians from Soba, Rohob, Istob and Maacha were at a distance, out in the open country; and Joab saw that he must fight one enemy in front while another was ready to take him in the rear. So he chose the best of his troops and led them against the Syrians, leaving the rest, under his brother Abisai, to face the Ammonites. Bring me aid, said Joab, if the Syrians are too strong for me, and I, if the Ammonites have the mastery, will bring aid to thee instead. Play the man, fight we valiantly for our people, and for the city walls that are sacred to our God; the Lord's will be done. So Joab and his men engaged the Syrians, who were routed by his first onslaught, and the Ammonites, when they saw the Syrians in full flight, gave way in their turn before the onslaught of Abisai, retreating into the city. After this, Joab went back from the Ammonite country to Jerusalem.

Thus defeated, the Syrians mustered the whole of their army, and Adarezer sent for those others of their race who lived on the further side of the river to reinforce him, putting his general, Sobach, in command of them. David, as soon as he heard the news, mustered the whole forces of Israel, and marched across the Jordan to Helam. There the Syrians drew up their forces to meet him, and gave battle; but the Israelites routed them, and David won the victory. Seven hundred chariots Syria lost that day, and four thousand horsemen; Sobach, too, their general, was wounded and died on the field of battle.

And now all the other kings who were vassals of Adarczer saw that they were no match for Israel; their troops lost heart and fled, fifty-eight thousand of them, at the enemy's approach. So they made peace with the Israelites and became their subjects; and no more was heard of the Syrians bringing aid to the men of Ammon.

11 And now spring returned, the time when kings march out to battle; and David sent Joab, with other servants of his and the whole army of Israel, to lay waste the Ammonite country and besiege Rabba, while he himself remained at Jerusalem. One day, he had risen from his midday rest, and was walking on the roof of his palace, when he saw a woman come up to bathe on the roof of a house opposite, a woman of rare beauty. So the king sent to enquire who she was, and was told that it was Bethsabee, Eliam's daughter, wife to Urias the Hethite. Thereupon he sent messengers to bring her to him; she came, and he mated with her, and as soon as she was cleansed from her defilement, back she went to her home. Then, finding she had conceived, she sent the news of her conception to David.

Therewith came a message to Joab, summoning Urias the Hethite to David's presence. So Joab sent him; and David, when Urias reached him, asked whether all was well with Joab and the army, and how the fighting went; then he bade him go back home and wash the dust from his feet. So Urias left the palace, and the king sent food after him from the royal table; but Urias slept the night at the palace gate among his master's attendants; go home he would not. Then David, learning from common talk that Urias had not gone home, said to him, Thou art newly come from a journey; why wouldst thou not go back to thy house? What, answered Urias, here are the ark of God and all Israel and all Juda encamped in tents, here are my lord Joab and all those other servants of my master sleeping on the hard ground; should I go home, and eat, and drink, and bed with my wife? The Lord save thee and keep thee, never that! David bade him stay one day more; he would let him go on the morrow. That day and the next 13 Urias spent in Jerusalem, and ever he must eat and drink in the king's presence, till he was bemused with wine; but still, when he went out at night, he made his bed beside his master's attendants, and never returned to his home.

14 Next morning, David wrote a letter to Joab, which he despatched by Urias himself; and this was its purport, You are to find a place for Urias in the first line, where the fighting is bitterest; there leave him unaided, to die by the enemy's hands. So, when he next made an assault upon the city, Joab gave Urias the post where he knew the defenders were strongest; and some of these made a sally against Joab's men, killing Urias and other of David's men besides. Then Joab sent David a full account of the battle; and this was his word to the messenger who carried it: When thou hast finished giving the king the report of the battle, it may be he will shew indignation. Why did you go so close to the wall, he will ask, when you were attacking it? You must have known that weapons fall thick under the battlements.

17 How fell Abimelech, that was son to Jero-baal? Was it not a piece of mill-stone, thrown by a woman, that killed him, there at Thebes? Why did you go so close to the wall?¹ Then let this be thy answer, Thy servant Urias the Hethite is among the dead.

22 So the messenger left him, and when he came into David's presence he gave him all Joab's message. The enemy were too strong for us, he told David; they sallied out to fight us in the open, so we went to the attack, and chased them back to the very gate of the city. But here the archers were shooting at us from the wall above, and many of the king's men fell; thy servant Urias the Hethite is among the dead.

25 Upon this, David sent him back with a message for Joab: Never be daunted by what has befallen; still uncertain are the chances of war; now one, now another, the sword claims for its prey. Hurl thy men ever more strongly against the city, and destroy it; bid them keep their courage high.

26 When Urias' wife heard that he was dead, she mourned for him; her mourning over, David sent and fetched her to his palace, wedded her and had a son by her. But meanwhile David's act had earned the Lord's displeasure.

12 So it was that the Lord sent Nathan on an errand to David; and this was the message he brought him. There were two men that lived in the same town, one rich, one poor. The rich man had flocks and herds in great abundance; the poor man had nothing except one ewe-lamb which he had bought and reared, letting it grow up in his house like his own children, share his own food and drink, sleep in his bosom; it was like a daughter to him. The rich man was to entertain a friend, who was on his travels; and, to make a feast for this foreign guest, he would take no toll of his own flocks and herds; he robbed the poor man of the one lamb that was his, and welcomed the traveller with that. David, burning with indignation at the wrong, said to Nathan, As the Lord is a living God, death is the due of such a man as this; for this cruel deed of his, he shall make compensation fourfold. And Nathan said to David, Thou art the man.

Here is a message for thee, said he, from the Lord God of Israel: I anointed thee king of Israel, I saved thy life when Saul threatened it; I gave thee thy master's goods to enjoy, thy master's wives to cherish in thy bosom; all Israel and Juda are in thy power, and if that were not enough, more should be thine for the asking. And thou, wouldst thou defy the Lord's commandment, and do the wrong he hates, putting Urias the Hethite to the sword, so as to take his wife for thy own? The men of Ammon struck the blow, but thou art his murderer. For the wrong thou hast done in robbing Urias the Hethite of his wife, to make her thine, murder shall be the heirloom of thy own race. This is the Lord's message to thee: I mean to stir up rebellion against thee in thy own household; before thy very eyes take thy own wives from thee and give them to another, that shall bed them in the full light of yonder sun. Thou didst go to work secretly; when this threat of mine is fulfilled, all Israel and yonder sun shall witness it.

Then David said to Nathan, I have sinned against the Lord; and Nathan answered, The Lord has given thy sin quit-4 haste brought on the Lord the contempt of his enemies,¹ and the son that has been 5 born to thee is doomed to die. So Nathan went home, and now the little son Urias' wife had borne to David was struck down by the Lord, and no hope was left for him.

 5 David still interceded for him with the Lord, keeping strict fast and passing his 7 nights on the ground; he would not humour his counsellors when they came and bade him rise to his feet again, nor would 1 he take food with them. Then, after six days, the child died; and David's servants had not the courage to tell him it was so.
 If he would not listen to our remonstrances, they thought, while the child yet lived, what penance will he do when we 2 tell him it is dead! But David, as he marked them whispering to one another, 3 guessed what had befallen; The child is dead? he asked, and when he heard that it was, he rose from the ground, washed and anointed himself, changed his garments, and went into the Lord's house to do reverence there. Then he came back to his 4 house, asked for food, and ate. And when his servants asked what his meaning was, that he should fast and lament over the child still living, rise up and take food once 5 the child was dead, he answered, Fast and lament I would, for the child's sake, while he lived; It may be, I thought, the Lord 3 will grant me his life. Now that he is dead, what need to fast? Can I bring him back from the grave? I shall go to be with him, 4 he will not come back to me. Then David comforted his wife Bethsabee, and took her to his bed; and she bore him a son whom he called Solomon. Him the Lord 5 loved, and sent word by the prophet Nathan that he was to be called The Lord's Favourite, in proof of his great love.
 6 Meanwhile, Joab was attacking Rab-7 bath, and took the royal quarter of it. Then he sent a message to David, I have been attacking Rabbath, but the river-side part of the city remains yet to be won. Muster 28 all the rest of thy army to attack the city and take it; I would not earn the credit of the victory by taking it myself.² So David, 29 mustering all his forces, marched on Rab-bath and stormed it. He took the king's 30 crown from his head, a crown of gold weighing a full talent, set with the rarest jewels, and wore it himself;³ much plunder he carried off from the city besides. As for 31 the people, he had them brought out and sawed in pieces, or crushed under iron chariots, or cut up with knives, or passed through a brick-kiln; and the same treatment he gave to all the cities of Ammon.

 Then David and his army returned to Jerusalem.⁴

13 A maid there was of rare beauty, called Tamar, sister to David's son Absalom; and it befell at this time that another of David's sons, Amnon, fell in love with her. Such was his longing that 2 he pined away wanting her; how should he approach a maid unwed, to compass her dishonour? But he had a friend called 3 Jonadab, son to Semmaa that was David's brother, a man of shrewd wits, that expostulated with him, Should a royal prince 4 pine away, day in, day out, and not tell the reason? Then Amnon told him, I am in love with my brother Absalom's sister, Tamar.

Lie down on thy bed, Jonadab told him, 5 and feign illness; then, when thy father visits thee, ask him to let thy sister Tamar come and tend thy wants, cook some dainty for thee, and give it thee with her own hand. So Amnon lay down, and 6 feigned to fall sick, and said to the king, when he came to visit him, Pray send my sister Tamar to boil me two mouthfuls of gruel, here in my presence, and give them me with her own hand. So David sent 7 word to Tamar's home, bidding her go to her brother Amnon's house and make gruel for him; and to her brother Amnon's 8 house she went, to find him lying abed.

¹ The Hebrew text here should mean 'thou hast despised the enemies of the Lord'; some think it ran originally 'thou hast despised the Lord', and was altered by the Jewish copyists as an irreverence.

² The Hebrew text probably implies that Joab took the lower part of the city (by the river side), and wrote to tell David he had done so (calling it the 'royal' part of the city); David was to come and storm the citadel above.

She took the flour and stirred it and boiled it, and when her cooking was done, she poured it out, and put it down beside him; but he refused to eat. Then Amnon would have all that were there leave his presence, and when all had left him, he bade her come into his room and give it to him with her own hand. So Tamar took the gruel and brought it into her brother Amnon's room; but when she held it out, he caught hold of his sister and would have her bed with him. Nay, brother, said she, do not force me to thy will; in all Israel, that were deemed great wrong. Forbear thy recklessness; else can I never shew my face, and all Israel will cry out on thy reckless folly. Ask me of the king for thy bride; he will not deny thee. But Amnon would not listen to her; he forced her to his will and so bedded her.

And now Amnon conceived a hatred of her that passed all measure; the love he once had for her could not compare with his hatred now; Up, he cried, and begone! Nay, said she, this is a greater wrong than the first wrong thou didst me, to drive me away thus. But he would not listen to her; he called to the serving-man that waited on him, and bade him thrust the woman out and shut the door on her. Clad in the long robe of a princess, she was thrust out, and the door was shut on her. Dust she sprinkled on her hair, tore the long robe, put her head between her hands, and went on her way in tears. So thy brother Amnon bedded thee? Absalom said to her. Keep silent for this while; he is thy brother. Do not eat thy heart out over it. So Tamar remained there in Absalom's house, pining away. Great sorrow had king David when the news came to him, but he would do nothing to cross his son Amnon, that he loved dearly; was he not his first-born? As for Absalom, he spoke no word to Amnon, fair or foul; so deeply did he hate him for dishonouring his sister Tamar.

Two years after, when it was shearing-time for Absalom's sheep at Baal-Hasor, by Ephraim, he would have all the king's sons there. But when he went to the king, and said, Thy servant's sheep are a-shearing, will not my lord king come to the feast, and his servants with him? the king answered, Nay, my son, do not ask us all to come and be a burden to thee; nor would he consent, for all Absalom's pleading; he would only give him his blessing for the journey. Then at least, said Absalom, let my brother Amnon come with us, if thou wilt not. There is no need for that, David said, but at last Absalom had his way, and David sent Amnon and all the princes with him. It was a royal banquet Absalom prepared for them; but first he gave orders to his men, Wait till Amnon is bemused with wine; then, when I say Strike, slay him. Have no fear; you do but execute my orders; take heart, and shew yourselves men of mettle. So Absalom's servants did his bidding on Amnon; and all the rest of the princes mounted on their mules and fled.

While they were still on their way, the story reached David that Absalom had slain all the princes, and not one had escaped with his life. At that the king rose up, and tore his garments, and cast himself down on the ground; and his servants tore their garments, all that stood by waiting on him. Only Jonadab, son of Semmaa that was David's brother, would have none of it; Do not believe, my lord King, he said, that all the princes have been killed; Amnon is dead, but only he. His name was ever on Absalom's lips, since the day of his sister Tamar's dishonouring. Never burden thy heart, my lord king, with the fancy that all are dead; it is only Amnon.

Absalom betook himself to flight. Meanwhile, a servant that was on the watch looked out and saw a throng of men coming down by an unfrequented path on the mountain-side; whereupon Jonadab said to the king, It is the princes that are coming; thy servant was in the right. And indeed, as soon as he had finished speaking, the princes came in view, and loud they wept as they came; the king, too, and all his servants made great lament. Absalom took refuge with Tholomai, son of Ammiud king of Gessur; and David all the while went on mourning for his son. Three years Absalom spent at Gessur as a fugitive; then David gave up the quest for him; already his grief for Amnon was assuaged.¹

14 Then Joab, son of Sarvia, aware that the king's heart had relented towards Absalom, sent for a wise woman who lived at Thecua, and spoke to her thus: Make as if thou wert in mourning, put on funeral garments, and never a drop of oil to anoint thee, like a woman who has long been mourning for the dead. Then go into the king's presence, and speak as I bid thee speak. And with that, he told her all she should say.

So the woman from Thecua came into David's presence and there bowed to the ground to do him reverence; Lord king, she said, give me redress! What wrong, asked he, is being done thee? And she said, I am a widow, with no husband to protect me. And, my lord, I had two sons; but they came to blows out in the open fields, where there was none to interfere, and one gave the other a blow which killed him. And now the whole clan is at my heels; give up the murderer I must, so that they may kill him in vengeance for his brother's death, and make an end of the race. The one hope that is left me they would extinguish, so that my husband will have none left on earth to bear his name. Go home, said the king; I will see that justice is done thee. And the guilt, said the woman of Thecua, let that rest with me and with my own kindred; the king and his heirs shall be quit of it. If anyone crosses thy will, the king said, bring him before me, and I will not let him do thee any more hurt. Ah, said she, if the king would only take an oath in the name of the Lord his God that the kinsfolk shall not be allowed to carry on the feud, that my son's life shall indeed be spared! Not a hair shall fall from his head, the king answered.

And now the woman asked leave to speak one word besides, and the king granted it. Then she said, Why does the king's grace treat the people of God so differently? Why does he persist in doing them wrong, by refusing to restore the man he has exiled? We must all die, water spilt on the ground; there is no bringing back the dead. Never a soul will God suffer to be lost in the reckoning; still he busies himself with remedies to save the life of him who is banished.¹ I came to make my suit before my lord the king, with his subjects standing by, thinking to myself, Come, I will plead with the king, and perhaps he will grant his handmaid's request; and the king's grace has listened to me, and given me redress against those who would have blotted out my name and my son's name from the record of the Lord's people. And now let this plea of thy handmaid's move thee, my lord king, to speak a generous word.² Though indeed my lord the king is wise as an angel of God; thou art not moved from thy purpose by fair word or foul; the Lord thy God is with thee.

Then the king said to her, I have a question to ask thee; answer it openly. My Lord king, she said, thou hast only to speak. Tell me then, said the king, was not Joab concerned in all this? As thou art a living man, she answered, that guess the king's grace has made has not missed the truth by a hair's breadth. It was thy servant Joab who sent me on my errand, and told me all I was to say; it was thy servant Joab who bade me use this parable. My lord king, thou art wise as an angel of God; nothing on earth is hidden from thee. And the king turned to Joab, and said, I relent, and grant thy request; go and bring my son Absalom home. Whereupon Joab bowed his face to the ground in reverence, and blessed the king's name. To-day, he said, I am assured of thy royal favour, that thou shouldst so grant thy servant his will. Then he set out on his journey to Gessur, and brought Absalom back to Jerusalem. But the king said, Let him go back to his own house, and never come into my presence; so Absalom went home, and might not have access to the king.

This Absalom was a man of good presence and famed for his beauty, none like him in all Israel; from the sole of his foot to the crown of his head was no blemish to be found; and when he cut his hair, as each year he must for the heavy burden it was, the locks that were cut weighed two hundred sicles by common weight.³ Three sons he had, and one daughter called Tamar, a woman fair to see.

¹ This rendering seems to give the best sense to the Latin; but its language is obscure, and that of the Hebrew text even more so. ² 'To speak a generous word'; literally, 'that thy word may be as a sacrifice', but the Hebrew word evidently meant is one which can also mean 'a free gift'. The Hebrew text has a 'refreshment'. ³ Two hundred sicles would be more than six pounds, and some think the figure has been exaggerated by an error in the text.

28 So for two years Absalom was in Jerusalem without sight of the king; then he 29 sent for Joab, to win him audience, but Joab would not come. A second time the 30 request was made and refused; then Absalom said to his servants, You know that field of Joab's next to mine, that is under barley; go and set fire to it. So Absalom's men set fire to the crop, and now Joab's men went to find him with their garments torn about them, and told him Absalom had had part of his field burned. Thereupon Joab went to see Absalom at his house, and asked, What means it, that thy men have set fire to my crop? Why, answered Absalom, I was fain to see thee; it was my thought to send thee to the king, and ask him why he brought me home from Gessur. Better have stayed there; pray win me admittance to the king's presence, or let him put me to death if he cannot forgive the wrong. So Joab went and repeated this to the king, and Absalom was summoned into the king's presence. Low he bowed before him, with his face to the ground; but David greeted Absalom with a kiss.

15 And now Absalom must drive in state, with chariots and outriders, and fifty men that ran before him. He would rise early, and stand at the entrance to the gate, beckoning to him everyone who had business that called for the king's award, asking what city he came from, and, if he mentioned one of the Israelite tribes,¹ telling him, Thy pleadings seem to me well-founded and just, but the king has not appointed any judge to try thy cause. Ah, said Absalom, if only I could be appointed as judge in the land, so that all who had matters to decide could bring them to me for a careful hearing! And when men came up to greet him, he would put out his hand and take them to himself with a kiss. So he did to all the men of Israel who came up to get a hearing from the king, and stole away the hearts of the Israelites.

7 Then, in the fortieth year of the reign,² Absalom said to David, Grant me leave to go to Hebron and pay a vow I made to the Lord. It is a vow thy servant took when he was at Gessur in Syria, that if the Lord would restore him to Jerusalem, he would offer a sacrifice. Go, said David, and peace go with thee. To Hebron, then, he went, and meanwhile he had sent agents of his throughout all the tribes of Israel, bidding them wait till they heard the trumpet sound, and then raise the cry, Absalom is king! Absalom reigns at Hebron! And from Jerusalem itself he took two hundred men, who went with guileless hearts, not knowing why they had been summoned. He also invited from Gilo Achitophel, the Gilonite that was David's own counsellor. So Absalom began to offer his victims, and his conspiracy grew ever stronger, and the number ever greater that came to his support.

Soon a messenger came and told David that the whole of Israel was giving its allegiance to Absalom; and he said to the servants he had with him at Jerusalem, Up, we must make our escape, or we are in Absalom's hands! We must depart with all speed, or he will come and take us by surprise, overwhelm us and put the whole city to the sword! And his servants answered, We are at the command of our lord the king, we will do his bidding. So the king left the city on foot with all his attendants, leaving only ten concubines in charge of the palace. At some distance away he halted on his journey, with all the throng that accompanied him, his own servants walking at his side, and the Cerethite and Phelethite companies, as well as the Gethite warriors (six hundred foot, that had come from Geth in his retinue), marching on before him. Why dost thou come with us? the king asked of Ethai the Gethite. Go back to the court; thou art a wanderer who has already left his home and earnest here but yesterday; there is no need for thee to leave Jerusalem, as the rest of us are leaving it, to-day. I will go where I must; do thou and these brethren of thine return, and may the Lord's faithful mercies reward thee for this loyal service thou hast shewn. But Ethai answered, As the Lord is a living

God, as my lord the king is a living man, it cannot be. Wherever thou art, my lord king, in life or in death, there also will thy servant be. Come then, David said to him, pass on over the stream. So Ethai and his men passed over, and then the rest, weeping aloud as they went, till the whole throng had gone across. The king himself crossed Cedron stream, and they all set out on the road which leads to the desert.

Sadoc the priest was among them, and with him the Levites, carrying the ark that bore witness of God's covenant. They now set the ark down, only Abiathar going forward on his journey, till the whole multitude that had left the city should have passed by. But the king said to Sadoc, Carry God's ark back into the city; if the Lord takes my part, he will bring me home again, and I shall see his ark and his tabernacle there; if he tells me that I have lost his favour, I am at his command; his will be done. Thou hast the seer's gift; go back in peace to the city with thy son Achimaas and Abiathar's son Jonathan, and I will wait till I have word from thee before I come back from my hiding-place in the desert plain. So Sadoc and Abiathar carried the ark back to Jerusalem, and remained there.

So David went up the mount of Olives, and wept as he climbed it; bare-footed he went and with his head covered, and all that were in his company passed on, with covered heads, lamenting. And now David was told that Achitophel had taken part in Absalom's conspiracy; Lord, he prayed, do thou foil the designs of Achitophel. He had already reached the top of the hill, where he meant to pay the Lord worship, when he met Chusai the Arachite, his garments torn, and his head all smeared with dust. Nay, said David, if thou shouldst come with me, thou canst only be a burden to me; go back to the city, and tell Absalom, lord king, I am at thy command, I will be thy servant as I was thy father's. So thou wilt be able to thwart the designs of Achitophel. Thou hast the priests, Sadoc and Abiathar, to help thee; pass on to the priests, to Sadoc and Abiathar, every word thou hearest at court. Their sons remain with them, Sadoc's son Achimaas and Abiathar's son Jonathan; by them thou canst send me news of all thou hearest. So David's friend Chusai went back, and Absalom was entering Jerusalem as he reached it.

16 When David passed a little way beyond the top of the hill, there was Siba, the servant of Miphiboseth, coming to meet them. He had two asses with him, laden with two hundred loaves, and a hundred bunches of raisins, and a hundred cakes of figs, and a skin of wine. When the king asked what he did with all these, Siba answered, I brought the asses to be ridden by the king's courtiers, the bread and fruit for thy servants to eat, the wine to revive such as are faint in the desert. And where is thy master's son? the king asked. He remained in Jerusalem, Siba answered, thinking that the men of Israel would restore him this day to the throne of his father. Why then, the king told him, all that was Miphiboseth's is thine. And Siba answered, My prayer is that I may ever enjoy thy favour, my lord king.

But, as David reached Bahurim, a man of Saul's kindred came out to meet him, one Semei, son of Gera, and ever he cursed as he went, and threw stones after David, and his servants that walked to left and right of him, plain folk and warriors alike. Go thy ways, cried Semei, cursing the king, go thy ways, murderer and upstart! Now the Lord has avenged the blood of Saul's race, by handing over the kingdom thou didst usurp to thy son Absalom; no wonder if calamity comes home to thee, murderer as thou art! At this Abisai, son of Sarvia, protested to the king, Why must this hang-dog fellow be allowed to curse my lord the king? Let me go and cut the head from his body! What, sons of Sarvia, David replied, will you never give me any rest? Let him curse as he will; the Lord has bidden him curse David, and who shall call him to question for doing it? Then he cried out, so that Abisai and all his servants could hear him, Look you, here is the son of my own body conspiring against my life; why may not yonder Benjaminite do as much? Let him curse as curse the Lord has bidden him; perhaps it will move the Lord to pity my calamities, and bring good out of the ill fame I must endure this day. So David passed on, and his companions with him, while Semei strode along the ridge on the other side of the valley, cursing, and throwing stones and handfuls 14 of earth. A weary man was the king, and weary were all the people with him, when they reached their halting-place; and there they rested.

15 Meanwhile Absalom and his men had entered Jerusalem, and Achitophel with him; and there David's friend, Chusai the 16 Arachite, met them; Greeting, he said, greeting to the king! Why, said Absalom, is this thy friendship? Wouldst thou not 17 bear that friend of thine company? Not I, said Chusai; for me, the king who has been chosen out by the Lord, by these folk here, by the whole of Israel; my place is by his 18 side. And indeed, to whom is my service due, if not to the king's own son? Thou shalt have the same loyalty thy father had 19 from me. And now Absalom said to Achitophel, Bethink thee, what were best done.
 20 Whereupon Achitophel answered, Go and mate with the concubines thy father has left in charge of the palace. When they hear thou hast come between thy father's sheets, all Israel will rally to thy cause the 21 more fearlessly. So they spread a tent for Absalom on the roof, and he went in to bed his father's concubines, there with all Israel to witness it. Men followed Achitophel's advice then as if it were God himself they had consulted; so it was all the time he was David's counsellor, and all the time he was Absalom's.

17 Now, said Achitophel to Absalom, let me pick twelve thousand men, and set out in pursuit of David this very night; so I shall overtake him and easily defeat him, weary as he is and un-2 nerved; first scatter the company that went with him, and then strike him down, with 3 none to aid him. All the people I will bring round to thy cause, as easily as I would persuade a single man; thou hast but one enemy, the rest of the people will be well content.

4 Both Absalom and all the elders of Israel liked his counsel well; but Absalom would have them summon Chusai the Arachite, 5 to find out his opinion too. So Chusai the Arachite came in, and Absalom told him what Achitophel had said; Were it well done? he asked. What advice givest thou?

And Chusai answered, No, it will not serve our turn, this counsel Achitophel has given. Bethink thee now, what brave warriors they are, thy father and the men he leads; how fierce in their anger, fierce as the she-bear that lurks in a wood, when her cubs have been taken away from her; thy father is a fighting man, he will not remain there among the common folk. No, by now he is hidden in some pit under ground, or some other vantage-point. A few deaths among his pursuers, and the word will go round, Absalom's followers are routed! Then the most lion-hearted will be overcome with sudden fear; well all the people of Israel knows that thy father and the warriors that bear him company are men of mettle. No, here is a plan more to my liking, that thou shouldst summon all Israel, from Dan to Bersabee, an army countless as the sand, and thyself march out with it. Hide he where he may, we will find him, and we will be all about him, covering the earth like dew; never a man of his company shall escape us. Why, even if he should defend himself behind city walls, this great army of Israel could wind ropes round it and drag it down into the nearest valley, till never a stone was to be found of it! Thereupon Absalom and all the men of Israel agreed that Chusai the Arachite had given better counsel than Achitophel. Whereas in truth Achitophel's advice was the more to their purpose, but the Lord foiled it, to compass Absalom's ruin.

Then Chusai toid the priests, Sadoc and Abiathar, what Achitophel's counsel had been, and what his own; Send a message to David, said he, with all speed, telling him not to linger in the desert plain this night, but cross Jordan without delay; else he and all that are with him may be overwhelmed. Jonathan and Achimaas stood at their post by the spring of Rogel, and a maid-servant must go and give them the message before they could take it to king David; they did not dare shew themselves in the city. Even so a lad saw them, and told Absalom, and they must turn aside with all speed into the house of a man at Bahurim, that had a well by the porch of it, and climb down into this for safety. Nor was their hiding-place discovered; a woman came and spread a cloth over the mouth of the well, as if she would dry her o barley-groats there; and when Absalom's men reached the house, asking her where were Jonathan and Achimaas, she said they had gone quickly on their way, only stopping for a mouthful of water; so their pursuers returned baffled to Jerusalem.

 1 These gone, Jonathan and Achimaas climbed up out of the well, and brought king David word; Bestir yourselves, they said, and cross the river without more ado;
 and told what advice Achitophel had given.
 1 So king David and all that bore him company took the road, and were across Jordan before ever dawn broke; not a man was left west of the river.

As for Achitophel, when he found that his advice was not followed, he saddled his ass and went home to Gilon; there he put his affairs in order, and hanged himself.
 So there they buried him, in his father's tomb.

David made his way to the Encampment; and now Absalom crossed the Jordan after him, with all Israel at his back.
 In Joab's place, Absalom gave the command of his army to Amasa, that was son to a man called Jethra, of Jezrahel; he had mated with Abigail, daughter of Naas, that was sister to Joab's mother Sarvia. So Israel, and Absalom with them, pitched their tents in the country of Galaad.
 Meanwhile, upon David's coming to the Encampment, Sobi son of Naas the Am-monite, and Machir son of Ammiel from Lodabar, and Berzellai that dwelt in Galaad, at Rogelim, brought him presents;
 beds and coverlets and earthenware, wheat and barley, flour and parched corn, beans and lentils and fried pulse, honey and butter, sheep and fattened calves. So they made provision for David and his followers, that were like to be hard pressed with hunger and thirst, there in the desert.

18 And now David passed the men who were with him under review, appointing commanders and captains over them; one third he entrusted to Joab, one third to Joab's brother Abisai, and the remainder to Ethai of Geth. He himself, he told his men, would go into battle with them, but they would not have it. It makes no great matter to the enemy, they said, whether we are routed: even if half of us should fall, they would set little store by it; thy life is more to them than the lives of ten thousand others. Better that thou shouldst remain in the city and garrison it for us. So the king told them he would abide by their judgement, and he stood watching at the gate while they marched out company by company, in their hundreds and thousands. One charge the king laid upon Joab and Abisai and Ethai alike, Spare me my son Absalom; and this charge about Absalom was so given to each of them that the men in the ranks could hear it.

So his army took the field against Israel;
 it was in the forest of Ephraim that battle was joined. And the Israelites were routed by David's men, with great loss; twenty thousand men fell that day, and more of them perished in the woods than in the fighting itself, so scattered was their flight over all the country-side. Some of David's men encountered Absalom himself, riding on a mule; and away the mule went, under the tangled branches of a great oak, which caught him by the head and kept him hanging there between earth and sky, while the beast that carried him pressed on. A soldier, who witnessed it, went and told Joab that he had seen Absalom hanging from an oak. Thou sawest him, Joab answered, and didst not smite him then and there to the ground? I would have given thee ten sicles of silver and a belt besides. Nay, said he, thou mightest count out a thousand silver pieces into my purse, and still I would not lift a hand against the king's son. We were all of us within hearing when the king bade thee and Abisai and Ethai spare his son Absalom. It would have been at the risk of my life, and the thing would never have passed unnoticed by the king; why, thou wouldst thyself be laying information against me. That will not serve, answered Joab; I will smite him myself, and thou shalt be there to witness it. So he took three javelins with him, and thrust Absalom right through with them; then, as he still hung there writhing on the oak, ten squires who attended on Joab ran up and dispatched him. With that, Joab sounded the trumpet, and would not let his men go further in pursuit of Israel, to spare the lives of the common folk. As for Absalom, they threw his body into a deep pit, there in the forest, and piled a great heap of stones over him. Meanwhile, the men of Israel fled away to their tents.

 18 (The monument which stands in the King's Vale is one which Absalom erected for himself in his own life-time, thinking thus to perpetuate his name, since he had no son to follow him. And as he gave this monument his own name, it has been called Absalom's Mark ever since.)

19 And now Achimaas, son of Sadoc, asked leave to run and tell the king how God had punished his enemies, but Joab told him, Better some other day than this for bearing the message; I would not have thee tell the news to-day; here is a king's son dead.
 21 Afterwards Joab bade Chusi go and tell the king what he had seen;¹ so Chusi did reverence to him, and ran. And thereupon Sadoc's son Achimaas asked whether he might not run after Chusi. No need for that, my son, Joab answered; it is not good news thou wilt carry. But may I run?
 23 asked he. Run if thou wilt, said Joab. And Achimaas took a shorter way, and passed Chusi by.

24 David was sitting between the two gates; and now the watchman that stood above the roof over the gate, high up on the wall, looked up and saw a man running,
 25 all alone, and cried out to let the king know of it. If he is alone, the king said, he has good news to tell. Then, as the runner came nearer, the watchman saw a second courier on his way, and cried out from the roof, I see a second man running all alone. He too, the king said, is a welcome messenger. And the watchman told him, I have marked how the first messenger runs; he runs like Achimaas, son of Sadoc. A good man, the king said; his will be good news.
 28 And now Achimaas cried out, Hail, my lord king! Then he bowed down with his face to the earth, to do the king reverence, and said, Blessed be the Lord thy God; he has not suffered them to escape, the men who took up arms against the 29 king's grace. Is all well, the king asked, with my son Absalom? And Achimaas answered, There was a great stir round about Joab when he sent me, thy servant, on my errand; I can tell thee no more. Stand aside here, the king said; and as he did so, Chusi came up after him; Good news, said he, for my lord the king! The Lord has maintained thy cause against the rebels. Then the king asked Chusi, Is all well with my son Absalom? My lord king, Chusi answered, may all thy enemies, and all that conspire to thy hurt, fare as the prince has fared!

And with that, the king went up to the room over the gate in bitter sorrow, and wept there. O, my son Absalom, he said as he went, my son, my son Absalom! Would to God I had died instead of thee, Absalom, my son, my son!

19 Word came back to Joab that the king was in tears, mourning over his son; and the news of the royal grief went round among the army, so that the victory they had won that day issued only in lament. They would not even return that day to the city, feeling such shame as a broken and routed army feels; and all the while the king hid his face away, and went on crying aloud, My son Absalom, Absalom, my son, my son! At last Joab made his way into the royal lodging, and said to the king, Here is a fine day's work, to make all thy followers go about hanging their heads! The men who have saved thee and thy sons and daughters, thy wives and concubines, from peril of death! Nothing but love for thy enemies, nothing but hatred for thy friends; never a thought, this day, for thy own captains and thy own men! If we were all dead, and Absalom still lived, I warrant thou hadst been the better pleased. Bestir thyself, come out and speak to thy men, and earn their good will; I swear by the Lord that if thou dost not come out, not a man will be left to serve thy cause by night-fall; and worse awaits thee than all the troubles which have come upon thee from the days of thy youth till now. So the king rose up, and seated himself at the gateway; and there, once the word had gone round that the king was sitting in the gateway, all his followers came into the royal presence.

But the men of Israel had fled home. And now, all through the tribes of Israel, there was high debate; Here is a king, men said, that has rid us of our enemies, rescued us from the power of the Philistines, and he must be exiled from his kingdom to please Absalom! This Absalom, whom we anointed to be our king, has fallen in battle; why is no voice raised for bringing the king back to us? News of what the Israelites were saying had reached the court, and now king David sent word to the priests, Sadoc and Abiathar, bidding them ask the elders of Juda, Why are you the last to welcome the king home again? You are my own tribesmen, my own kith and kin, why do you hang back, instead of restoring me to the throne? He bade them, too, give this message to Amasa, Art thou not my own flesh and blood? May the Lord punish me as I deserve, and more than I deserve, if I do not make thee, instead of Joab, commander of my army henceforward! Thus he won over the men of Juda till they had but a single thought, and a message was sent to the king bidding him come back to them, and all his men with him.

So the king set out for home, and by the time he reached the Jordan, the whole of Juda had assembled at Galgal to meet him and escort him over the river. Semei the son of Gera, the Benjamite, hastened to bear them company, welcoming king David with a thousand of his own tribesmen; there was Siba, too, that had once been a servant in the court of Saul, with his fifteen sons and twenty servants of his, and these, plunging into the Jordan before the king could reach it, were across the ford, ready to escort his household and wait upon his bidding. Semei, Gera's son, was no sooner across Jordan than he fell at the king's feet; My lord, he said, do not hold me guilty, forget the wrong thy servant did thee when thou, my lord king, hadst left Jerusalem; let there be no grudge in thy royal heart. I, thy servant, confess this day the wrong I did; that is why I have come, first spokesman of the other tribes, to meet the king's grace on his way.¹ At this, Abisai son of Sarvia would have Semei put to death, for the curses he uttered against an anointed king. What, sons of Sarvia, David answered, will you never give me rest? This day, of all others, would you mar my peace? No Israelite shall lose his life this day, which has taught me for the first time that I am king in Israel. And to Semei he said, Thou shalt not die, and took his oath to confirm it.

Then the king was met by Miphiboseth, that was heir to Saul; he came with feet begrimed, with beard untrimmed, in garments that went unwashed from the day of the king's departure to the day of his return. Down from Jerusalem he came to meet him, and when the king asked, Why didst thou not bear me company, Miphiboseth? his answer was, My lord king, my own servant played me false; may it please thee, I bade him saddle me an ass, so that I could ride in the king's company, lame as I am; and he, not content with disobeying, has brought a false charge against me before my lord the king. But thou, my lord king, art wise as an angel of God; do what thou wilt. For indeed, the whole of my father's line deserve nothing better than death at thy hands, and thou hast given me, thy servant, a place among the guests at thy table; what right have I to complain? I will raise my voice no more in my defence. And the king told him, No need to say more. My word has been passed; do thou and Siba divide the lands between you.² Why, let him take all, Miphiboseth answered; enough for me that my lord the king has come home in peace.

Berzellai, too, the man of Galaad, came down from Rogelim, to attend his crossing of Jordan, ready to accompany him to the further bank. Berzellai of Galaad was an old man, eighty years old; he it was that brought the king provisions, while he lay at the Encampment, for he was a man of great riches. To him the king said, Bear me company, and take thy ease with me at Jerusalem. But Berzellai answered, What, a man of my years go up to Jerusalem with the king's grace? I am eighty years old now; are my senses still keen, to tell sweet from bitter? Can thy servant take pleasure in food and drink? Can my ear catch the tone of songster and songstress? Nay, I would not be a burden to my lord the king; let thy servant go with thee a little of the way beyond Jordan, and no more. I need no such exchange of friendship; rather, my prayer is that I should be allowed to go back and die in my own city, and be buried close to the grave where my father and mother lie. Here is thy servant Chamaam; let him go with thee, my lord king, and do with him what thou wilt. Chamaam shall go with me, the king replied, and it shall be for thee to choose what is to be done with him; no request of thine shall go ungranted. So, when he and all the people had crossed over Jordan, the king kissed Berzellai and blessed him, and he went home, while the king passed on to Gālgal, and Chamaam with him.

² 'My word has been passed', cf. 16. 4 above. David is perhaps interpreting his promise there made, 'All that was Miphiboseth's is thine' as meaning 'All that was Miphiboseth's is equally thine', so that the property would have to be divided between them. David has been criticized for not punishing Siba's treachery to his master; but it is quite possible that Siba was acting partly in Miphiboseth's interest, under the impression that Absalom was likely to be victorious—the property which Siba managed for his master (9. 16) would be safe from confiscation in either event.

All the men of Juda had been the king's escort, but of the other Israelites only a half; and now the men of Israel came to him with one accord, and asked, How is it that our brethren, the men of Juda, have stolen thee from us? By what warrant did they escort the king, and his household and the warriors of David's army, on their passage over Jordan? Why, answered the men of Juda, he is nearer of kin to us. There is no cause here for anger. Have we lived on the king's bounty, or been singled out to receive his gifts? And the Israelites replied, We are ten to one; our rights with the king, our claims upon David, are ten times as great as yours. Why did you wrong us by not conferring with us first about our king's restoration? Thus either side pleaded its own cause, but the men of Juda more bitterly than the men of Israel.

20 It chanced that there was a turbulent fellow there, called Seba, son of Bochri, from Benjamin, who now sounded his trumpet and raised the cry: David, then, is none of ours; not for us the son of Jesse; go back, men of Israel, to your homes! Thereupon all the Israelites parted from David's company, and marched away with Seba, son of Bochri; it was only the men of Juda that escorted David all the way from Jordan to Jerusalem. So the king came home. As for the ten concubines he had left in charge of the palace, he shut these away, giving them their allowance of food still, but never again having commerce with them; they remained shut away in their widowhood as long as they lived.

And now the king said to Amasa, Muster all the warriors of Juda, three days from now, and present thyself here with them. Amasa went to muster them, but dallied beyond the time which the king had named; and David said to Abisai, This Seba, son of Bochri, will do us more harm than ever Absalom did. Take the royal troops with thee, and go in pursuit of him; or he will find refuge within city walls and escape us. So in pursuit of Seba they went, under Abisai's command, Joab's men, and the Cerethites and Phelethites, and all the picked warriors in Jerusalem; and when they reached the great stone of Gabaon, they fell in with Amasa. Joab was there, clad in a tight-fitting cloak of the same length as his coat, and girt with a dagger whose sheath only reached to his loins, such that he could draw it easily and strike.¹ Greetings to thee, brother, said Joab, and with that he clapped his right hand under Amasa's chin, as if he would kiss him; then, with the dagger that had gone unmarked, he struck him in the side, and spilt his entrails on the ground, so that he died without a second blow. After this, Joab and his brother Abisai continued their pursuit of Seba, son of Bochri. And among Joab's men, that stood beside the body, the word went round, Here he lies that would have been David's chosen friend in place of Joab.² There Amasa lay, drenched in his own blood, till one who saw all the passers-by stopping to look at him, carried the body off into a field, away from the road; so they would halt on their journey no more. And sure enough, when it had been taken aside from the road, all were ready to follow Joab in pursuit of Seba, the son of Bochri.

Seba had gone through all the tribes of Israel, till he reached Abela that is called Beth-Maacha; and all their choicest warriors had rallied to him.¹ So to Abela Beth-Maacha they went, and besieged him there, surrounding the city with works, so that it was quite cut off; nor did Joab's men spare any pains to make a breach in the wall. But now a wise woman cried out from within the city, A word with you, a word with you! Bid Joab come here, and let me speak to him. Thou art Joab? she asked, as he came near; and when he answered to the name, Listen, she besought him, to what thy handmaid has to say. Listen I will, said he. There is an old proverb, she told him, that says, They who ask counsel must ask it at Abela; and so they did.² Here dwells a woman that tells Israelites the truth; and wouldst thou overthrow such a city, a mother-city in Israel? Why wouldst thou bring ruin on the Lord's chosen land? Never that, never that, Joab answered; ruin and destruction are not for me. The case stands otherwise; there is one Seba, son of Bochri, from the hill-country of Ephraim, that is in rebellion against king David; hand that one man over, and we will raise the siege. Wait then, said the woman; his head shall be thrown down to thee from the wall. And with that she went in, and spoke to the defenders in the wisdom that was her craft; whereupon they cut off the head of Seba, son of Bochri, and cast it down to Joab. So he blew his trumpet, and his men raised the siege and went to their tents; Joab himself went back to the king's court at Jerusalem.

Joab, then, commanded the army of Israel, and Banaias son of Joiada the Cerethites and Phelethites; Aduram was²⁴ overseer of the revenues, and Josaphat, son of Ahilud, kept the records; Siva was²⁵ secretary, Sadoc and Abiathar chief priests; Ira, too, the Jairite, was one of²⁶ David's ministers.³

21 There was a famine in David's reign that lasted three years continuously; and when David consulted the Lord's oracle he was told, It is because of Saul; he slew the Gabaonites, and the guilt of blood still rests upon his line. The Gabaonites did not belong to Israel; they were of the old Amorrite stock, and their lives had been spared in fulfilment of an oath, but Saul, jealous for the honour of Israel and of Juda, had tried to exterminate them. So king David summoned them, and asked what he could do to content them; what amends he could make, to recover their good will for the Lord's chosen people. Of silver and gold, the Gabaonites told him, there is no question here; our quarrel is with Saul and his kin; we would not take any toll of Israelite lives. What would you have me do, then? the king asked. And they said, We must efface the memory of the man who persecuted us and wrongfully oppressed us, leaving none of his stock alive from end to end of Israel. Hand over to us seven men of his line, and let us crucify them before the Lord at Gabaa, that is named after him; there dwelt he when the Lord chose him out to be king.⁴ And David said, You shall have them. But he spared Miphiboseth, the heir of Saul through Jonathan, to honour the covenant which Jonathan, Saul's son, had made with him; he took two sons that were born to Saul by Respha, daughter of Aia, one called Armoni and one that bore his cousin's name of Miphiboseth, and five sons of Michol, Saul's daughter, that she bore to Hadriel, son of Berzellai, at Molathi, and handed these over to the Gabaonites. And the Gabaonites crucified them before the Lord, there on the hillside. It was in the first days of the harvest, when the barley was beginning to be cut, that the seven of them perished, all at one time; and Respha, the daughter of Aia, spread herself a covering of sackcloth and sat there on the rock, from the beginning of harvest till the first rains fell on them; bird by day nor beast by night should touch them. The news of what Saul's concubine, Respha the daughter of Aia, had done, reached David's ears. And thereupon he recovered the bones of Saul and his son Jonathan from the men of Jabes-Galaad, who had stolen them back when the Philistines hung them up in the streets of Bethsan, soon after Saul's death on Gelboe; carried these away, and collected the bones, too, of the men crucified at Gabaa, and buried them. So they were laid in the tomb of Cis, that was Saul's father, in the Benjamite country, beside the bones of Saul and his son Jonathan; all this was done at the king's command. And now the land was restored to God's favour.

¹ 'Seba had gone'; this is presumably the meaning of the Latin, but both in the Latin and in the Hebrew text the sense might be, 'Joab had gone'. Both in this and in the following verse there is some discrepancy between the Latin and the Hebrew.

² It is possible that the text has suffered from corruption; according to the Septuagint Greek, the proverb insisted that Abela (at the north of Dan) was a genuine Israelite city.

War broke out again between Israel and the Philistines, and David went to battle against them with his men. But David's strength had left him; and he came near to being struck down by Jesbi-Benob, a man of the Araphite breed, that had a spear-head of ten pounds weight, and a new sword at his side. It was Abisai, Sarvia's son, that came to the king's rescue, and gave the Philistine his death-blow. But after that David's men swore that he should never go into battle with them again; that light must not be lost to Israel.

In another battle against the Philistines, at Gob, Saph, of the giant breed of Arapha, was slain by Sobochai, from Husathi; in a third, also at Gob, Elehanan the son of Jaare, an embroiderer from Bethlehem, slew Goliath of Geth, that had a shaft to his spear as big as a weaver's beam.¹ In a fourth, at Geth, there was a man of huge stature that had twelve fingers and twelve toes, another of the Araphite breed; and he taunted Israel, till Jonathan, son of David's brother Semma, struck him down.

All these four were Araphites from Geth, all slain by David and his men.

22 And this was David's song of thanksgiving when he found that the Lord had rescued him from the power of Saul, and from his other enemies: The Lord is my rock-fastness, my bulwark, my rescuer. It is my God that brings me aid, and gives me confidence; he is my shield, my weapon of deliverance, my protector, my stronghold; he it is that preserves me and frees me from wrong. Praised be the Lord! When I invoke him I am secure from my enemies. Death's terrors were near at hand, deep flowed the tide of wickedness, to daunt me; the toils of the grave were all about me, deadly snares had trapped my feet. One cry to the Lord, in my affliction, one word of summons to my God, and he, from his sanctuary, listens to my voice; the complaint I make before him finds a hearing.

Earth shivered and shook, the very foundations of the hills quailed and quaked before his anger; smoke went up before his indignant presence, and a consuming fire; burning coals were kindled as he went. He bade heaven stoop, and came down to earth, with mist at his feet; he came, mounted on the cherubim, borne up on the wings of the wind, shrouded in a pall of darkness, wringing out the rain-storm from the clouds of heaven; burning coals were kindled by the lightning that went before him; the Lord, sending his thunder from heaven, the Most High, letting his voice be heard. How they scattered when he rained down his arrows on them, fled in confusion before his lightning! The secret springs of ocean came to light, the very foundations of the world were laid bare, when the Lord threatened them, blew upon them with the breath of his anger. Then he reached down from heaven, caught hold of me, rescued me from that flood, saved me from triumphant malice, from the enemies that held me at their mercy. In that evil day he came to my side; the Lord upheld me and brought me out into freedom again; his great love befriended me.

And still as he sees me dutiful, the Lord will requite me; as he sees me guiltless in act, he will make return. Have I not kept true to the Lord's paths? Have I not been loyal to my God? No law of his, but I have kept it before my eyes; no task he laid upon me have I refused; ever stainless in his presence, ever watchful to keep myself clear of guilt. Surely the Lord will requite me as he sees me dutiful, as he sees me guiltless in act. Lovingly thou dost treat those who love thee, faithfully the courageous; he that is thy own shall find thee his very own, from the man who turns against thee thou wilt turn away. To humble folk thou wilt bring deliverance; the proud, with their haughty looks, thou wilt bring down to earth. Thou, Lord, art the lamp of my hope; thou, Lord, dost shine on the darkness about me. In thy strength I shall run well girded; in the strength of my God I will leap over a wall.

Such is my God, unsullied in his dealings; his promises are like metal tried in the fire; he is the sure defence of all who trust in him. Who but the Lord is God? What other power can there be except our God? It is he that girds me with strength, he that makes me go on a smooth way, untroubled. He makes me sure-footed as the deer, and gives me the freedom of the hills; these hands, through him, are skilled in battle, these arms are a match for any bow of bronze. Thy saving power, Lord, is my defence, thy tender care fosters me. Through thee, my steps are untrammelled as I go, foot of mine never falters; I can master the enemies I pursue, and never turn home till I have made an end of them; made an end of them, beating them to their knees, hurling them down at my feet. Thou girdest me about with a warrior's strength; whatever power challenges me thou dost subdue before me, putting my enemies to flight, and throwing all their malice into confusion. Loudly they cry out to the Lord, bereft of aid, but he makes no answer to their cries. I can crush them to pieces, like dust on the ground, spurn and trample them like mire in the streets.

Thou wilt deliver me, then, from sedition among my people; nay, thou hast a higher destiny for me yet, to rule over other nations, with alien folk for my subjects. Aliens offering battle, and then brought to my allegiance, so feeble have they grown, so hard pinched by distress! Blessed be the living Lord who is my God, praised be the God who rescues me! It is thou, my God, that bringest me redress, that grantest me dominion over my people, that savest me from my enemies, so that I am high above the reach of their assaults, proof against their violence. Then, Lord, I will give thee thanks in the hearing of all nations, singing in praise of thy name; how powerful thou art to protect the king thou hast chosen, how merciful thou art towards him thou hast anointed, towards David, and David's line for ever.¹

23 These are the words of David's last psalm. Thus speaks David, son of Jesse, thus speaks the man whom the God of Jacob swore to anoint, he who sang as none other sang in Israel. Through me the spirit of the Lord has spoken; his words are on my tongue. What says Israel's God, Israel's strong defender? That he who rules among men, governing them justly in the fear of God, shines out like the light of dawn, when the sun rises in a cloudless sky, grows strong like meadow grass watered by the rain. What worth has my kindred in God's sight, that he should make an everlasting covenant with me, sealed and ratified all of it? Everywhere he preserves me, everywhere grants me my will; no wish of mine but bears fruit. Sinful men he treats like briars, too sturdy to be plucked away with the hand, so that all who would interfere with them go armed with iron-shod poles, setting fire to them at last and burning them away to nothing.²

And these are the names of David's champions; first among the first three was Jesbaam the son of Hachamoni (the same that was called Plump as a Wood-worm),³

¹ See Ps. 17, which is only distinguishable from this canticle by verbal differences, some of them due to the Latin translator.

³ 'Jesbaam the son of Hachamoni'; so the Latin version transliterates the name in I Par. 11. 11; here, evidently finding the same names slightly distorted in the Hebrew original, it has translated them as if they were common nouns, 'a very wise man sitting in a chair'. The phrase 'the same that was called Plump as a Wood-worm' is an attempt to translate two words of uncertain signification in the Hebrew text, which possibly conceal a fresh proper name. Some think they are a corruption of the words 'he lifted his spear' (as in Paralipomena).

 9 After him, his cousin Eleazar the Ahohite,¹ one of the three champions that were with David when they defied the Philistines.
 10 These had mustered for battle, and the men of Israel had left the field; Eleazar stood there and cut down the Philistines until his arm grew weary and his hand stiff about his sword. A great victory the Lord gave Israel that day, and the men who had fled at first came back to gather up the 11 spoils of the dead. And after him Semma, the son of Age, from Arari. When a company of Philistines had gathered, close by a field of lentils, and routed the Israelites, 12 he stood there in the middle of the field and held it against the Philistines till he defeated them; that day, too, the Lord gave Israel a great victory.
 13 Once, when it was harvest-time, these three, the foremost of the Thirty, were at the king's side in the cave of Odollam; the Philistines had encamped in the Valley of 14 the Giants, and David kept close in his stronghold. The Philistines had a garrison at this time in Bethlehem: and now David, 15 overcome with longing, said aloud, Oh for a cup of water from the well by Bethlehem 16 gate! Whereupon the three champions broke through the Philistine lines, drew water from the well by the gate of Bethlehem, and brought it to David. Instead of drinking it, he poured it out as a libation 17 to the Lord; The Lord be merciful to me, said he, never that! That were to drink men's blood; they brought it at the peril of their lives; it is not for my drinking. Such were the feats of the three first champions.
 18 Abisai, too, Joab's brother, son of Sar-via, was one of three champions; he it was that engaged three hundred men with his own spear, and slew them. His name 19 stood as one of three, and among these he was foremost, leading the others, but he could not rival the first three. There was 20 Banaïas, too, whose father, Joiada of Cab-seel, was a warrior famous for his exploits.
 Banaïas it was that slew the two heroes of Moab;² he also went down into a cavern on a day of snow, and killed a lion there.

 And there was an Egyptian he slew, a wondrous man to see, that carried a great spear; Banaïas went into battle with a club, and killed the Egyptian with his own spear, wresting it from his hand. Such were the feats of Banaïas, son of Joiada;
 he, too, was one of the three champions that were foremost among the Thirty, but he could not rival the first three. He was the man David appointed to carry out his secret commands.

And these were the men who belonged to the Thirty; Asael, Joab's brother, and his cousin, Elehanan of Bethlehem; Sem-ma from Harodi, Elica from Harodi; Heles from Phalti; Hira, son of Acces, from Thecua; Abiezer from Anathoth; Mobonnai from Husati; Selmon the Ahohite; Maharai the Netophathite; Heled, son of Baana, also from Netophath; Ithai, son of Ribai, from Gabaath in Benjamin; Banaïa the Pharathonite; Heddai from the valley of Gaas; Abialbon the Arbathite; Azma-veth from Beromi; Eliaba from Salaboni; the sons of Jassen, Jonathan, Semma from Orori; Ajam, son of Sarar, the Arorite; Eliphelet, son of Asbai, son of Machati;
 Eliam, son of Achitophel, the Gelonite; Hesrai from Carmel; Pharai from Arbi; Igaal, son of Nathan, from Soba; Bonni from Gadi; Selec from Ammoni; Naharai the Berothite, that was squire to Joab the son of Sarvia; Ira and Gareb, the Jethrites, and Urias the Hethite; thirty-seven names in all.

24 But still the Lord's vengeance threatened Israel; and now it was through David he disturbed their peace, with a design for registering Israel and Juda.³ The king said to Joab, the chief of his army, Go through all the tribes of Israel from Dan to Bersabee, and make a muster-roll of the people, so that I may know the full tale of them. Why, said Joab, my prayer is that the Lord may increase yet more the number of the people, great as it is, and that thou mayest live to see it

¹ 'His cousin'; this may also be read as a proper name, 'the son of Dodo'. So also in verse 24 below.

² 'Two heroes'; and the Hebrew word here used, of uncertain significance, is translated as 'lions' in the Latin version here, and transliterated as 'ariels' in I Par. 11. 22. ³ Here, as often, the Old Testament record describes God's dealings with mankind in strictly human terms. By a somewhat violent metaphor, he is compared to a human ruler who is anxious to pick a quarrel with his neighbours, and employs an agent provocateur to give him a pretext for interference. In I Par. 21. 1 the same course of events is described in theological terms, and we are told that Satan tempted David to register the people.

a hundred times as great! But what is it my lord the king means by this design? But all that Joab and the captains of the army could say might not thwart the king's will; so Joab and the other commanders left the king's presence to make a register of Israel. They crossed the Jordan, and reached Aroer, on the right side of the city that stands in the vale of Gad; then they passed by way of Jazer into Galaad to the plain country of Hodsai, and so reached the woodlands of Dan. Thence they turned towards Sidon, passed close to the walls of Tyre, and all along the country that was still held by Chanaanite and Hevite, and came at last to the southern end of Juda, at Bersabee. So they made their review of the whole country, and returned to Jerusalem after nine months' and twenty days' absence. And Joab gave in the register to the king; it proved that there were eight hundred thousand warriors that bore arms in Israel, and five hundred thousand in Juda.

But, now the count of Israel had been made, David's heart reproached him. And he confessed to the Lord, I have sinned greatly in what I have done; Lord, give my sin quittance; I have played a fool's part.¹ And by the time he rose next morning, the word of the Lord had come to the prophet Gad, that was David's seer, Go and give David this message from the Lord; he is given a threefold choice, and he must choose his own punishment among the three. So Gad went to David with the message: Wilt thou have seven years of famine in thy country, or three months of flight from the pursuit of thy enemies, or three days in which thy country is smitten with plague? Think well, and tell me what answer I shall make to him whose word I bear thee. I am hard pressed on all sides, David told him; but it is better to fall into the hands of the Lord, so rich is he in mercy, than into the hands of men. So the Lord sent a plague upon Israel, from that morning till the time he had appointed; and it raged all the way from Dan to Bersabee, till seventy thousand men had perished. But when the angel of the Lord was stretching out his hand over Jerusalem, to bring destruction on it, the Lord was moved with pity over their calamity, and said to the angel who was smiting the people down, It is enough, stay thy hand. The angel of the Lord stood close, then, to the threshing-floor of Areuna the Jebusite. David, when he saw how the angel was smiting the people down, had said to the Lord, The sin is mine, the fault is mine; these poor sheep of mine, what wrong have they done? Nay, turn thy hand against me, and my own father's race!

Then Gad brought David the message, Go up to the threshing-floor of Areuna the Jebusite, and build an altar there. David went up, in obedience to the command which the Lord had given him through Gad; and when Areuna looked round, to see the king and the king's servants coming towards him, he came forward, bowing down with his face to the ground to do the king reverence. What would my lord king with his servant? he asked. And David said, I have come to buy thy threshing-floor; I must build an altar here to the Lord, to put an end to the mortality which goes unhindered among the people. Then Areuna answered, Let the king's grace take all he needs for his offering; here are sheep for a burnt-sacrifice, here is the waggon, and the yoke my oxen bear, for kindling-wood. All this is Areuna's royal gift to the king.² And may the Lord, Areuna added, grant thy prayer. But the king would not let him have his will; Nay, said he, I must buy it from thee; the victims I offer to the Lord my God must not be procured without cost. So David bought threshing-floor and ox-team for fifty silver pieces; there he built an altar to the Lord, and there he brought burnt-sacrifice and welcome-offering. So the land was received back into the Lord's favour, and the plague disappeared from Israel.

¹ Some think the sin of David consisted only in pride. But it seems likely that the census he took was an act of tyranny, designed to transform the free citizens of Israel into servants of the state. The forced labour which King Solomon exacted from his subjects was the direct cause of their revolt after the accession of Roboam (111 Kg. 12. 4). ² 'All this is', or perhaps, 'All this was'; it is not certain where Areuna's speech ends. If his allusion to a 'royal gift' is to be taken literally, it is most natural to suppose that he claimed descent from the Jebusite kings who reigned before the Israelites conquered Jerusalem.

THE THIRD BOOK OF KINGS

AND now David had grown old, and so chilled with age that there was no warming him by heaping coverlets on his bed; so his attendants asked leave of him to go and find a young maid, who should be brought to the court and cherish him by sleeping in his bosom, to give their royal master warmth. And of all the fair maids in Israel they chose out one, Abisag from Sunam, who was brought into the king's presence; a fair maid indeed, who now shared the king's bed and waited on him, yet never did the king mate with her.

Meanwhile Adonias, David's son by Haggith, aspired to win the throne; he must drive in state, with chariots and outriders, and fifty men to run before him; and never a word did his father say to check or challenge him; he came next to Absalom in birth, and was like Absalom for beauty. Joab, son of Sarvia, and the priest Abiathar were in his confidence; but, while these favoured Adonias's cause, he could not win over the priest Sadoc, and Banaias son of Joiada, and the prophet Nathan, Semei and Rei and the picked men of David's army. Adonias, then, would offer sacrifice of rams and calves and other fattened beasts at the Stone of Zohemoth, by Enrogel spring; bidding his brother princes there as guests, and the men of Juda that were in David's service, but not the prophet Nathan, or Banaias, or the leaders of the army, or his brother Solomon.

Thereupon Nathan said to Solomon's mother Bethsabee, Hast thou heard the news that Haggith's son Adonias has come to the throne, and our lord king David none the wiser? Act quickly, following the advice I now give thee, if thou wouldst protect thyself, and thy son Solomon, from mortal peril. Go and demand access to king David's presence; ask him openly, My lord King, didst thou not promise me, thy handmaid, upon oath, to let my son Solomon be thy heir, and succeed to thy throne? How comes it that Adonias is king? And while thou art still speaking, I will come in after thee, and lend weight to these words of thine. So Bethsabee gained access to the king's own room, where he sat, an old, old man, with Abisag the Sunamite in attendance on him. Low was the reverence Bethsabee made, and when the king asked what was her will, she answered, My lord, thou didst swear to me by the Lord thy God that my son Solomon should be thy heir, and succeed to thy throne; and here is Adonias already reigning, while thou, my lord king, art kept in ignorance. Nay, he has sacrificed bulls, fattened beasts, and rams without number, with the priest Abiathar, and Joab, the commander of thy men, for his guests, and all the princes except thy servant Solomon. My lord king, all Israel looks to thee for a sign, to know who shall sit on thy royal throne after thee. How shall we fare, I and my son Solomon, when the king's grace has been laid to rest with his fathers? Our lives will be forfeit.

She was still speaking with the king, when the prophet Nathan came, and word was brought in that the prophet Nathan was in attendance. So in he came, and made his reverence before the king, with his face bowed to the ground; Lord King, he said, was it thy decree that Adonias should be thy heir, and succeed to thy throne? Away he goes, to offer up bulls, fatten beasts, and rams without number; all the princes are summoned to the feast, and the chiefs of the army, and the priest Abiathar; and there they sit, eating and drinking, while the cry goes up, Long live king Adonias! As for me, thy servant, and the priest Sadoc, and Banaias son of Joiada, and prince Solomon, no summons came to us. Can it be that the king's grace has made this decree, without a word to me, his servant, to say who should succeed my lord the king on his throne? Send for Bethsabee, king David answered; and when she had come in, and stood there in the royal presence, the king took an oath: As the Lord is a living God, he who has

30 preserved my life against all perils, my sworn word to thee, in the name of the Lord God of Israel, that thy son Solomon should be my heir and succeed to my 31 throne, shall be fulfilled this day. And Bethsabee, bowing her face to the ground, did reverence; Unending life, said she, to my lord king David!

32 Then king David would have the priest Sadoc, and the prophet Nathan, and Bananais son of Joiada, summoned to his presence, and when these waited on him, 33 his orders were: Take the royal troops with you, and escort my son Solomon, mounted upon my own mule, to Gihon; 34 there let him be made king of Israel, with the priest Sadoc and the prophet Nathan to anoint him; there sound the trumpet, and make proclamation, Long live king 35 Solomon! Then bring him back, to sit on my throne and reign instead of me; to him I commit the charge of Israel and Juda alike. And Banaïas son of Joiada cried, 36 Well said! May the Lord, the God who protects the king's grace, decree no otherwise; as he has been with thee, so may he 37 be with thy son, and make Solomon's throne more glorious than the throne of 38 David himself. Then Sadoc and Nathan and Banaïas, mustering the Cerethites and the Phlethites, mounted Solomon on king David's own mule, and escorted him to 39 Gihon; there, with a phial of oil brought out from the tabernacle, the priest Sadoc anointed Solomon king; and they sounded the trumpet, while the cry went up every-40 where, Long live king Solomon! All the common folk went with him, and there was playing of flutes and great rejoicing, till earth echoed again with the noise
of it.

41 It reached Adonias and his guests when the banquet was already over; and Joab, as he heard the cries of the multitude, began asking what this uproar in the city 42 might mean. The words were still on his lips when Jonathan approached, that was son to the priest Abiathar. Come in, cried Adonias; a brave fellow such as thou art surely brings good news. That have I none, 43 Jonathan answered him; our lord king David has given the throne to Solomon.
44 Mounted on the royal mule, with the priest Sadoc and the prophet Nathan and Bananais son of Joiada, with the Cerethites too and the Phlethites for his escort, he has 45 ridden to Gihon, where Sadoc and Nathan anointed him king. And now they have come back in triumph, and all the city is echoing with it; that is the noise which has reached your ears. There Solomon sits on 46 the royal throne, while the courtiers 47 shower blessings on our lord king David, praying God to make Solomon's renown greater than his, Solomon's domains wider than his; and he, lying on his bed, cries out in adoration, Blessed be the Lord God of 48 Israel, that has given me this day an heir to my throne, while I still have eyes to see it!

His words spread terror, and all Ado-49 nias' guests rose up, and scattered to their homes. As for Adonias himself, in his 50 great fear of Solomon he left the place and made his way to the altar, and clung to one of its horns. So news came to Solomon 51 that Adonias, in fear of his royal brother, was clinging to the altar's horn, crying out, I must have king Solomon's oath this day that my life shall be spared! Why, answered 52 Solomon, prove he a loyal man, never a hair shall fall from his head; if he is found to be plotting mischief, he shall die for it. Then he sent to bring him away 53 from the altar, and Adonias came into king Solomon's presence, and did reverence there. And with that, Solomon sent him away to his house.

2 And now the time drew near when David must die; but first he left with his son Solomon this charge. I am going, 2 said he, the way all mortal things go at last; do thou keep thy courage high and play the man. Hold ever true to the Lord 3 thy God, following the paths he has shewn us, observing his ceremonies, and all those commands and awards and decrees that are contained in the law of Moses; so shalt thou be well advised in all thou doest, at every turn of the way. So will the Lord 4 make good his promise to me, that if my sons would but tread those paths of his, still proving loyal to him with the whole purpose of their heart and soul, the throne of Israel should never lack one of my race to fill it.

And now to speak of Joab, son of Sarvia.
5 Thou knowest well the ill turn he has done me; here were two commanders of the Israelite army, Abner son of Ner and Amasa son of Jether, that fell by his hand. They were at peace with him when he struck the warrior's blow, stained himself, from the shoes on his feet to the girdle on his loins, with the blood that should have been spilt 6 in war. Let prudence be thy guide, do not allow those grey hairs to find a peaceful 7 end. To the sons of Berezai the Galaadite thou must shew gratitude, and let them be among those who eat at thy table; they made me welcome when I fled to escape 8 from thy brother Absalom. Thou hast to reckon, moreover, with Semei son of Gera, the Benjamite from Bahurim. Foul were the curses he hurled at me on my way to the Encampment; but when I crossed Jordan again he came out to meet me, and I swore to him in the Lord's name that I 9 would not slay him. Thou hast no cause to leave him unharmed; thou hast wit enough to resolve what to do with him, how to prepare a bloody end for his grey hairs.

10 So David was laid to rest with his fathers, and the Keep of David was his 11 burial-place; he had ruled Israel forty years, seven at Hebron and thirty-three at 12 Jerusalem. And Solomon, who succeeded as his father's heir, established himself firmly on the throne.

13 As for Adonias, son of Haggith, he gained access to Bethsabee, king Solomon's mother, telling her that he came on a peaceful errand; there was a matter he 14 would confide to her. So she bade him speak out, but still he hesitated; Once, said he, the throne was mine, and all Israel had chosen me for their king; now the royal power has changed hands, and gone 16 to my brother; it was God's will. There is only one request now that I would make of thee; pray do not disappoint me. And 17 still she bade him speak out. My request is, said he, that thou wouldst say a word for me to king Solomon; there is nothing he can refuse thee. Bid him give me 18 Abisag the Sunamite for my wife. Why, yes, answered Bethsabee, I will speak to 19 the king on thy behalf. Bethsabee, then, made her way to king Solomon, to prefer Adonias' request; the king rose to meet her and bowed low, then he sat down on his throne again, and a throne was brought for her, the king's mother, to sit down at his right hand. There is a light request, she told him, that I would make of thee; pray do not disappoint me. Make thy request, mother, said he; I will not turn a deaf ear to it. It is, said she, that thy brother Adonias should be given Abisag the Sunamite for his wife. But this was king Solomon's answer to his mother, What, Abisag the Sunamite for Adonias? Ask me to give him the kingdom, too; he is my elder brother, and has the priest Abiathar, and Joab son of Sarvia, to maintain his cause.

And hereupon king Solomon took an oath in the Lord's name; May the Lord punish me as I deserve, and more than I deserve, if this plea Adonias has made does not cost him his life! As the Lord is a living God, he that has established me firmly on my father David's throne, and made the dynasty mine, as he promised, Adonias shall die this day! So king Solomon gave orders to Banaias son of Joiada, and by his hand Adonias was put to death. The king had a command, too, for the priest Abiathar; Go back to thy lands at Anathoth. Nothing better thou deservest than death, but I will spare thy life this day; thine it was to carry the ark in my father's presence, and to share all the perils he endured. Thus king Solomon deprived Abiathar of his priesthood, in fulfilment of that sentence which the Lord passed on the race of Heli, long ago at Silo.

Tidings of this came to Joab, that had taken part with Adonias, not with Solomon;¹ and he took refuge in the Lord's tabernacle, where he clung to one of the altar-horns. And king Solomon, hearing he had fled to the tabernacle and was to be found there, close by the altar, sent Banaias son of Joiada with orders to kill him. So Banaias went to the Lord's tabernacle and bade Joab remove from it, in the king's name. Not I, said Joab, I will die here. When Banaias brought tidings of the answer Joab had made him, the king said, Let him have his will; put him to death there, and give him burial. Only rid me, and my father's kindred, of the blood-guilt Joab has brought upon us. On his head may the Lord's vengeance fall; did he not slay two innocent men that were his betters, Abner son of Ner that commanded Israel, and Amasa son of Jether that commanded Juda, drawing his sword on them with no word said to my father, king David? On Joab let the blood-guilt fall, and on his race for ever; to David and David's race, to David's throne and dynasty, may the Lord grant eternal prosperity! With that, Banaias son of Joiada went back and gave Joab his death-blow. He was buried at his own home, out in the wilderness; command of the army the king gave to Banaias son of Joiada, and the high-priesthood to Sadoc instead of Abiathar.

Then the king bade Semei come before him; Thou must build thyself a house, he told him, here at Jerusalem, and come to live there, instead of travelling freely this way and that. The day on which thou leavest Jerusalem to cross Cedron river shall be thy last, and the blame will lie only on thyself. To this Semei agreed, promising obedience to the royal command; and for a long time he continued to live at Jerusalem. Then, after three years, it chanced that some of his servants ran away, and took refuge with Achis son of Maacha, king of Geth. And when Semei was told that his servants were in Geth, he saddled his ass for a journey; to Geth he went and to the court of Achis in search of them, and brought them home with him. The news that Semei had journeyed to Geth and back reached Solomon's ears, and thereupon he sent for him. Did I not bind thee by an oath in the Lord's name, said he, warning thee that the day when thou shouldst begin to travel this way and that should be thy last? And didst thou not agree to the conditions I made? Forgotten, thy oath to the Lord, forgotten, the warning I gave thee! Then he added, Be-think thee, for it rankles yet in thy heart, of thy malice towards my father king David. Now the Lord has made thy ill will recoil on thyself; it is a blessing, not a curse, king Solomon inherits, and David's dynasty remains firm on the throne, to serve the Lord for ever. Then the king gave orders to Banaias son of Joiada, and he followed Semei out and put him to death.

3 By now, Solomon's power was firmly established, and he allied himself by marriage to the king of Egypt, whose daughter he wedded. He took her to live in the Keep of David; not yet had he built his own palace, or the Lord's house; not yet had he finished walling in Jerusalem. In those days, the Lord had no temple built for him, and men used to sacrifice on hill-tops.

Great love had Solomon for the Lord, and followed the counsel of his father David, though indeed he too went to mountain shrines, to sacrifice and offer up incense. Once he had betaken himself to Gabaon, where there was a famous mountain shrine, to worship there; a thousand victims king Solomon offered in burnt-sacrifice, there on the altar at Gabaon. And that night the Lord appeared to him in a dream, bidding him choose what gift he would. Thou hast been very merciful, answered Solomon, to my father David, a servant of thine that ever shewed himself loyal and observant, and kept his heart true to thee; and one great mercy thou didst keep till the last; thou hast granted the succession to a son of his own, the man thou seest. Yes, Lord God, thou hast bidden this servant of thine reign where his father reigned; but, Lord, what am I? No better than a little child, that has no skill to find its way back and forth. And here am I, thy servant, lost among the thousands of the people thou hast chosen, a people whose numbers are beyond all count and reckoning. Be this, then, thy gift to thy servant, a heart quick to learn, so that I may be able to judge thy people's disputes, and discern between good and ill. How else should a man sit in judgement over such a people as this, great as thy people is great?

The Lord listened well pleased, and looked with favour on the choice he had made. For this request of thine, he told Solomon, thou shalt be rewarded. Thou didst not ask for a long life, or riches, or vengeance upon thy enemies, but for wisdom to administer justice. Thy prayer is granted; hereby I grant thee a heart full of wisdom and discernment, beyond all that went before thee or shall come after thee. And I grant thee moreover all thou didst not ask for; in wealth, in glory, no king that ever was may compare with thee.

14 And if thou wilt follow the paths I have chosen for thee, as thy father did, keeping charge and commandment of mine, long 15 life thou shalt have too. With that, Solomon awoke; it was a dream. But when he came back to Jerusalem, he stood before the ark that bears record of the Lord's covenant, and brought burnt-sacrifice, and made welcome-offerings, with a great feast for all his servants.

16 And now two women, harlots both of them, came and stood in the royal presence. Justice, my lord! said one of them.
17 This woman and I share a single house, and there, in her presence, I gave birth to 18 a child; three days after my delivery, she too gave birth. We were still living together; none else was in the house but we 19 two. Then, one night, she overlay her child as she slept, and it died. So, rising at dead 20 of night, when all was still, she took my son from beside me, my lord, while I slept, put him in her own bosom, and her dead 21 son in mine. In the morning, when I raised myself to give my child suck, a dead child was there; and it was not till I looked at it more closely under the full light of day that I found this was never the child I bore.
22 And when the other woman said, No, it is thy child that is dead, mine that is alive, she persisted in answering, Thou liest; it is my child that lives, thine that is dead.
Such was the angry debate they held in the king's presence.

23 See, said the king, it is all, My child lives and thine is dead, on the one side, and Thy child is dead and mine lives, on the other.
24 Bring me a sword. So a sword was brought out before the king. Cut the living child 25 in two, he said, and give half to one, half 26 to the other. Whereupon the true mother of the living child, whose heart went out to her son, cried out, No, my lord, give her the living child; never kill it! Not so the other; Neither mine nor thine, she said; 27 let it be divided between us.¹ No, said the king, do not kill the living child, give it to 28 the first; she is its mother.² This award was talked of throughout all Israel, and men feared the king, that was so inspired by divine wisdom in the judgements he gave.

4 All the tribes of Israel were under king Solomon's rule. These are the names of his ministers; Azarias, son of the priest Sadoc, and the two sons of Sisa, 3 Elihoreph and Ahia, were secretaries; Jo-saphat, son of Ahilud, kept the records; 4 Banaias, son of Joiada, commanded the army; Sadoc and Abiathar were the chief priests; Azarias, son of Nathan, was head 5 of the royal prefects; Zabud, son of Nathan, a priest, was the king's privy counsellor; Ahisar was controller of the household, and Adoniram, son of Abda, 6 controller of the revenues.

Solomon appointed twelve commis-7 sioners in the various parts of Israel to secure the maintenance of the king and his court, each of them providing the revenues needed for one month in the year. They 8 were these; the son of Hur, for the hill country of Ephraim, the son of Decar for 9 Maces, Salebim, Bethsames, Elon and Bethhanan, the son of Hesed for Aru-10 both, with Socho and the whole of Ephrthe son of Abinadab, who married Solo-11 mon's daughter Taphet, for the whole of Naphath-Dor. Bana, son of Ahilud, of 12 Thanac and Magedo and the whole region of Bethsan (close by Sarthana that lies under Jezrahel) from Bethsan itself to Abel-Mehula, that faces Jecmaan. The 13 son of Gaber for Ramoth-Galaad, with the townships Jair, son of Manasses, conquered in Galaad; he controlled all the Argob district of Basan, containing sixty great walled cities that had bolts of bronze.
Ahinadab, son of Addo, for Manaim; 14 Achimaaas (husband of Solomon's daugh-15 ter Basemath) for Nephthali; Baana, son of Husi, for Aser and Baloth; Josaphat, 17 son of Pharue, for Issachar; Semei, son of Ela, for Benjamin; Gaber, son of Uri, 19 for Galaad, that once belonged to the Amorrhite king Sehon and to Og, king of Basan; for all that country he alone was answerable.

So Juda and Israel, countless in number 20 as the sand by the sea, ate, drank, and were merry. As for Solomon, he bore rule over 21 all the kingdoms between Euphrates and the Philistine country, right up to the frontiers of Egypt, enjoying the tribute

¹ No indication is given whether the plaintiff or the defendant was in fact the true mother. ² 'To the first'; literally, according to the Latin, 'to this woman', according to the Hebrew text and the Septuagint Greek, 'to her'. But the context makes it evident that the first of the speakers in verse 26 is indicated.

they brought him and the service they did 2 him all his life long.¹ Sixty quarters of flour went every day to Solomon's household, and a hundred and twenty of meal, 3 ten oxen from the stall, and twenty from the meadow, and a hundred rams; besides venison of red-deer and roe-deer and gaz-4 zelle, and farmyard birds. All the country that lies west of the Euphrates, from Thaphsa to Gaza, was subject to him, with all the kings that dwelt in those parts; look about him where he would, all was peace.
 5 As long as the reign of Solomon lasted, Juda and Israel lived secure from alarm, each man under vine and fig-tree of his own, all the land's length from Dan to 6 Bersabee. Forty thousand stalls king Solomon had for his chariot-horses, and 7 twelve thousand mounted men; the keep of these was a charge on the royal commissioners aforesaid, beside the great ado they had to furnish the king's table month 8 by month; barley and straw for horse and mule must be conveyed to this place or that, according to the king's own movements.

9 Wisdom, too, God gave to Solomon, and great discernment, and a store of knowledge wide as the sand on the sea-shore.
 10 For that, no king of the east or of Egypt could vie with him, of all men the wisest; 11 wiser than Ethan the Ezrahite, or Heman, or Chalcol, or Dorda, that were sons of Mahol; no nation round about but had 2 heard of his fame. Three thousand parables king Solomon uttered, and of songs he 3 made a thousand and five; and he dis-coursed of all the trees there are, from the cedar on Lebanon to the hyssop that grows out from the wall; and of beasts, and birds, 4 and creeping things, and fish. From all peoples and all kings of the world, when his fame reached them, men came to take back word of Solomon's wisdom.

5 Messengers, too, were sent by Hiram, king of Tyre, when he heard that Solomon had been anointed king in place of his father David, that had ever 2 been Hiram's friend. And this message 3 Solomon sent to Hiram in return; My father David, as thou knowest, was for building a house in honour of the Lord his God; but there were threats of war all about him, and he must needs defer his purpose till the Lord should have crushed his enemies under his feet. Now, the Lord 4 my God has given me security on every side; neither foe nor ill chance assails me, and I have a mind to build a temple dedicated to the Lord my God. He himself 5 promised my father David, The son I will give thee for thy successor shall build a house in honour of my name. If thou wilt 6 bid thy workmen cut down cedars for me on Lebanon, and let my workmen take part with thine, thy workmen shall have whatever pay thou demandest. As thou knowest, there is no woodman's craft among my people such as the Sidonians have.

When Solomon's message reached Hi-7 ram, great was the joy it gave him; Blessed be the Lord God, said he, for what he has done this day, in granting David so wise a son to rule so populous a kingdom. Then 8 he sent Solomon his answer: I have heard thy message, and therewith granted thy request; cedar and fir thou shalt have to thy heart's content. My workmen shall 9 convey them from Lebanon to the sea; on the sea I will embark them in rafts for whatever port thou shalt name; and when I have landed them there, it shall be thy part to carry them away. And meanwhile, thou shalt supply the needs of my own household. So Hiram gave Solomon cedar 10 and fir wood to his heart's content, while 11 Solomon provided Hiram with forty thousand quarters of wheat to feed his household, and forty quarters of pure oil;² such was the payment he made each year.
 Solomon had the gift of wisdom the Lord 12 had promised him; he kept peace with Hiram, and a treaty was made between them.

And now Solomon picked out Israelites 13 for his workmen, levying thirty thousand of them to that end; and he used to send 14 them to Lebanon for a month at a time by turns, so that each man should spend two out of every three months at home; it was Adoniram who was in charge of the levy.
 Seventy thousand men king Solomon had 15

¹ This is presumably the sense of the Hebrew text; the Latin has 'from the river of the land of the Philistines to the border of Egypt'.

² According to the Septuagint Greek, forty thousand quarters of oil.

to carry loads for him, and eighty thousand 16 to cut wood on the mountain-side, not counting the overseers who were in charge of the work done, three thousand three hundred overseers to give the workmen 17 their orders. And the king bade them bring great stones, costly stones, to be the foundations of his temple, and to hew 18 them into shape. This work of hewing was shared between Solomon's masons and Hiram's; and the men of Gibel, too, prepared wood and stone for the building of the house.

6 It was in the four hundred and eightieth year after the Israelites left Egypt, in the second month (Zio, as it is called) of the fourth year of Solomon's reign in Israel, that the building of the 2 Lord's house began.¹ This house built by Solomon in the Lord's honour was sixty cubits long, twenty wide, and thirty high; 3 in front of the temple was a porch whose length, like the width of the temple itself, was twenty cubits, but it was only ten 4 cubits wide. Slanting windows he made to light his temple, and about its walls he 5 built storied galleries, that ran all round the sides of the temple and its shrine with 6 pent-houses round about them; the lowest of these galleries was five, the middle six, and the highest seven cubits broad; and they rested on beams close to the outside of the building all about, they were not 7 attached to the temple walls. All the time the temple was a-building, the stones used were ready hewn and shaped, so that there was no ringing of hammer or axe or iron tool in the house itself, while it was being 8 built. There was a door in the middle of the pent-house on the southern side of the building; from this a spiral staircase led to the first floor, and another to the top floor.
 9 When he had finished building the walls of the house, Solomon covered it in with 10 cedar rafters; then, over the whole of it, he built an added storey five cubits high, and roofed the house with planks of cedar.

11 This was a message the Lord sent to 12 Solomon: Sothou art building me a house?
 Follow, then, my commandments, execute my decrees, hold fast to all the laws I have given thee, and by these guide thy steps.

 So I will grant thee fulfilment of the promise I made to thy father David; I will come and live among the sons of Israel, and not forsake my people any more.

So Solomon pressed on with the building of the house, until all was finished. Its walls within were cedar-panelled, from the floor to the top of the walls, where the rafters sprang, no panel but was of cedar;
 only the floor was covered with planks of fir. The furthest part of the temple was cedar-panelled to a height of twenty cubits from top to bottom; it was this inmost recess that he made into a shrine, a place all holiness, and before the doors of this shrine the remaining forty cubits of length made up the temple proper. All was cedar panelling, rounded and fitted with the craftsman's utmost skill, embossed with carving, cedar everywhere, and no stone in the walls allowed to shew itself. And there in the midst, in the inmost part of the building, stood the shrine in which the ark of the Lord was to rest; twenty cubits in length, width, and height, and covered with plates of pure gold; plated, too, was the cedar altar. Then he covered all the rest of the building, the ante-room of the shrine, with plates of pure gold, fastened with golden nails. Nothing in the temple but was sheathed in gold, the altar that stood before the shrine with the rest.

Within the shrine stood two cherubim, made of olive-wood, ten cubits high; each of these had wings of five cubits' breadth, so that there was ten cubits' distance between the tips of them. The second cherub matched the first in height, no difference of size or of workmanship between them.
 Ten cubits high they stood, there in the midst of the inner shrine, either touching the wall with one wing and its fellow's wing with the other. The cherubim, too, he plated with gold.

All the walls of the temple were adorned with bands of carved and embossed work, cherubim and palm-trees and other patterns, standing out in high relief; the floor, within the sanctuary and without, he covered with gold. At the entrance to the shrine he made doors of olive-wood, between five-sided pilasters; doors of olive-wood, carved with figures of cherubim and palm-trees, and other sculpture in high relief; doors and cherubim and palm-trees and all the rest were covered with gold. At the entrance to the temple were square posts of olive-wood; and the door on either side was of fir-wood; either door was double, but the two halves were connected, so that they opened together. Cherubim, and palm-trees, and other sculpture stood out in high relief, and he covered all with gold plates squared by rule. He also built an inner courtyard, whose walls had three courses of dressed stone and one of cedar-wood.¹

So, in the month of Zio of the fourth year of his reign, the foundations of the building were laid; and it was finished, in all its parts and with all its appurtenances, in the eighth month (Bul, as it is called) of his eleventh year; so that it was seven years in building.

7 Then, for thirteen years, Solomon was engaged in building a palace for himself; so long was it before all was finished. It was then that he set up the building known as the Forest of Lebanon. This was a hundred cubits long, fifty cubits wide, and thirty cubits high, containing four galleries that ran between pillars cut from the trunks of cedars; he roofed it in, too, with cedar rafters, supported by forty-five pillars. The galleries were divided by rows of fifteen pillars placed at fixed intervals so as to face one another, with equal spaces between pillar and pillar; and these supported square beams of cedar that matched one another. There was a pillared hall fifty cubits long and thirty wide, and a second hall in front of it, with pillars to support the architrave. And there was a hall containing his judgement-seat, panelled in cedar from floor to ceiling; within it was a private apartment which he used when he was administering justice. The house he built for Pharaoh's daughter that he had married was of the same workmanship as this hall.

All was built of costly stone, cut to exact shape and measure within and without, from top to bottom of the walls, from the entrance up to the great courtyard; the foundations, too, were of costly stones, some ten, some eight cubits long; nor were the stones above less in measurement, with cedar panels to match them. The great courtyard, which was round, had three courses of dressed stone and one of planed cedar-wood; thus the court around the palace porch was to match the inner court of the temple.

There was a craftsman named Hiram, living at Tyre, that king Solomon sent for; his father had been a Tyrian, but his mother, now a widow, belonged to the tribe of Nephthali. A craftsman in bronze, wise, adroit and skilful at doing a brazier's work; and to do such work king Solomon had now summoned him. Two brazen pillars he made, eighteen cubits in height and twelve in girth, and cast the two capitals of bronze that were to rest on them, each five cubits high, with a pattern of net-work and of chains cunningly enlaced. There were seven rows of chain-work on either capital, all cast in metal. The pillars, too, had their capitals covered with two rows of pomegranates, all round the net-work; both pillars alike. On the base of either capital there was a chain of lily-work, four cubits long;² it was the remaining part of the capitals, above, that had the net-work pattern, which went the full round of the pillar; on this second part of them, too, were the rows of pomegranates, two hundred in number. He set up the two pillars before the porch of the temple, calling the one on the right Jachin and the other Booz.³ Above the pillars he did work in lily pattern, and so the making of the pillars was finished.

He cast, too, a great round basin of molten work, ten cubits from brim to brim, five cubits high, and with a girth of thirty cubits. Under the rim ran a moulding ten

¹ In this description, as in that of the tabernacle, the meaning of the Hebrew text is sometimes far from clear, and the Latin version is sometimes in doubtful correspondence with it. Nor is the meaning of the Latin always beyond dispute: but the sense given above seems the most probable. ² 'On the base'; literally, 'in the porch', which is evidently meaningless. It seems probable that the word so rendered by all the translators should be interpreted 'on their fronts' (cf. the Hebrew text of Ps. 72. 4).

³ The two names seem to denote God-given fixity and God-given strength respectively; the exact form of them is uncertain.

25 cubits long; two rows of fluted moulding, all cast in metal. The basin stood on the figures of twelve oxen, three facing north, three west, three south, three east, so resting on them that their hind quarters, 26 turned inwards, could not be seen. The basin was three inches thick, and its brim curved as the brim of a cup does, or a lily-leaf; it held sixty-four tuns.

27 He also made ten brazen stands for smaller basins, four cubits long, four cubits 28 wide, and three cubits high. Even these stands were of embossed work; there was 29 moulding between the shafts; moulding, too, between the upper and the lower rims, of lions and bulls and cherubim, and between the shafts above them the same 30 pattern; and under the lions and oxen hung thongs, as it were, of bronze. Each stand had four wheels, with axles of bronze; and on each of its four corners it had a bracket of molten work, to take the basin, four brackets facing one another at opposite 31 corners. These supported a rest on which the extremity of the basin was to stand; a round rest which measured a cubit across, or a cubit and a half with the basin. At the corners round it there were engraved columns, and the space between them was filled by other columns, square, 32 not round. The four wheels were at the four corners of the stand, each pair connected under the stand itself; every wheel 33 was a cubit and a half in height; such wheels were they as might be found in a chariot, axles and spokes and rims and 34 naves all of molten work, just as the four brackets, springing from the corners of each stand, were of molten work and part 35 of the stand itself. At the top of each stand was a round rim, half a cubit across, carefully made so that the foot of the basin could rest upon it; a rim covered with engraving, that had embossed work springing 36 from it. The rings of which I have spoken were of bronze, and around these, and at the corners about them, were cherubim and lions and palm-trees, standing out like statues, as if they had been added on, instead of being cast with the rest. Thus he 37 made the ten stands, all alike in the manner of their casting, in their measurements, 38 and in their figured work. Then he made the ten bronze basins, each holding three hundred gallons, four cubits across, and set one basin on each stand. Five of the stands were on the right side of the temple, five on the left, and the great basin itself on the right, towards the south-east.¹

Pot and shovel and bucket Hiram made, all that king Solomon needed for the service of the Lord's temple. He made the two pillars, and the chain-work for their capitals, and the net-work to cover the chain-work, and four hundred pomegranates to go with the net-work, two rows of them for each piece of net-work, to adorn the capitals of the pillars, ten stands, and a basin for each stand, the single great basin, and the twelve oxen that supported it, and pot and shovel and bucket besides. All the appurtenances of the Lord's temple which Hiram made for Solomon were of burnished bronze, and the king had them cast in the clay soil of the Jordan valley, between Socoth and Sarthan; a great multitude of them, such a multitude that he did not reckon the weight of all the bronze he used.

Other appurtenances, too, of the Lord's house must Solomon make; the golden altar, and the golden table upon which the hallowed loaves were set out, the golden lamp-stands, five on the right and five on the left, in front of the shrine, all of pure gold, the lily-work, and the golden lamps that rested in them; the golden tongs, and 50 pot and fork and bowl and saucer and censer, all of pure gold. Of gold, too, were the door-hinges, both for the inner sanctuary and for the temple building. Thus 51 Solomon completed all the work needed for the service of the Lord's house; and he brought into it all the silver and gold and other ware that his father David had consecrated, laying them up among its treasures.

8 Then all the elders of Israel, the chiefs of the tribes, and the heads of clans, met in Jerusalem to help king Solomon bring the ark home; the ark then rested in the Keep of David, which we call Sion. It was on the great feast day of the seventh month (Ethanim, as it is called) that king Solomon sent out this summons

¹ Here again, in verses 1-39, both the Hebrew text and the Latin versions are very obscure, and the meaning intended by either can only be a matter of conjecture.

3 to the whole of Israel, and the elders, one and all, came in answer to it. The priests 4 took up the ark, and soon ark and tabernacle and all the tabernacle's appurtenances were borne aloft, with priests and 5 Levites to carry them. King Solomon walked before the ark, and with him all the throng of Israelites that had assembled; no reckoning made, no count taken, of the sheep and oxen they offered up as victims.
6 So the ark that bears witness of the Lord's covenant was borne by the priests to the place designed for it, there in the temple's inner shrine, where the cherubim spread 7 their wings; spread them over the very place where the ark rested, to protect it and 8 protect the poles that bore it. These poles jutted out indeed, so that the ends of them could be seen by one standing before the shrine, beyond the limits of the inner sanctuary; but never again were they seen in the open; they have remained in the 9 temple to this day. And nothing was in the ark except the two stone tablets Moses laid up there on mount Horeb, when the Lord made his covenant with the sons of Israel after their escape from Egypt.

10 As soon as the priests had left the inner sanctuary, the whole of the Lord's house 11 was wreathed in cloud; lost in that cloud, the priests could not wait upon the Lord with his accustomed service; his own glory 12 was there, filling his own house. Where the cloud is, cried Solomon, the Lord has 13 promised to be; it is true, then, the house I have built is to be thy dwelling, thy 14 throne for ever immovable. With that, the king turned to bless the whole assembly of Israel; all Israel, that stood to receive his 15 blessing. Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, he said, who has now fulfilled in act the promise he made to my father David.
16 So many years since he had rescued his people from Egypt, and never a city among all the tribes of Israel had he chosen to be the site of his dwelling-place or the 17 shrine of his name; but a man he did choose out, to rule his people, king David. And when he, my father, would have built a house in honour of the Lord God of Israel, 18 the Lord told him that he had done well to conceive such a purpose in his heart; But 19 it is not for thee, he said, to build me a house. A house shall be built in my honour, but by thy son, the heir of thy body. That promise of his the Lord has 20 fulfilled; I have come forward in my father's place, to sit upon the throne of Israel, as the Lord promised I should; it has been mine to build a house to the honour of the Lord, Israel's God, and to 21 find a home for this ark, witness of the covenant made with our fathers when they escaped from Egypt.

Then Solomon stood before the Lord's 22 altar in full view of all Israel, and lifted his hands to heaven; and thus he prayed: Lord God of Israel, thou reignest without 23 rival in heaven and earth, making good thy merciful promises to all who follow thee with undivided hearts. And thou hast not 24 disappointed thy servant, my father David; thy act matches thy word; this day, who doubts it? Do not forget, Lord God 25 of Israel, that other promise of thine to David, that he should always have an heir to sit on the throne of Israel, would but his sons guide their steps, like David himself, as in thy presence; let that promise, too, 26 Lord God of Israel, be ratified!

Folly it were to think that God has a 27 dwelling-place on earth. If the very heavens, and the heavens that are above the heavens, cannot contain thee, what welcome can it offer thee, this house which I have built? Yet, O Lord my God, do not 28 let this prayer go all unheeded, that sues for thy favour; listen to the cry of entreaty thy servant makes before thee this day!
This I ask, that thy eyes should be ever 29 watching, night and day, over this temple of thine, the chosen sanctuary of thy name;
be this the meeting-place where thou wilt listen to thy servant's prayer. Whatever 30 requests I or thy people Israel make shall find audience here; thou wilt listen from thy dwelling-place in heaven, and listening, wilt forgive.

Has a man wronged his neighbour, and 31 is he bidden to clear himself of the charge by an oath? Then, if he comes to this house of thine, to swear the lie before thy altar, thou, in heaven, wilt be listening, and 32 ready to strike the blow; thine to do justice between thy servants, passing sentence on the guilty and avenging the wrong, acquit-ting the innocent and granting him due redress.

Are thy people of Israel condemned to 33 flee before their enemies, in punishment of the sins they will surely commit? Then, if they come here repentant, and acknowledging thy power, pray to thee and plead with thee in this temple of thine, do thou, 34 in heaven, listen to them, and forgive the sins of thy people Israel, and restore them to the land which thou gavest to their fathers.

35 Does the sky bar its gates against them, and give no rain, in punishment for their sins? Then, if they come here acknowledging thee with prayer and repentance, and turn away, in their sore need, from 36 their sins, do thou, in heaven, listen, and grant thy servants the people of Israel forgiveness; teach them to guide their steps aright, and send rain on the land thou hast given them for their home.

37 Is there famine in the land, or pestilence, blight or rust, locust or mildew? Does some enemy press hard on it, besieging our city gates? Many are the forms 38 of plague and sickness, of curse and ban, that may fall upon all Israel without distinction. But each heart knows the wound that galls it; and if any one man stretches 39 out his hand to thee in this temple, thou, in heaven, thy dwelling-place, wilt listen and relent. Thou knowest the hearts of all human kind, and wilt send to each man, according to the dispositions of his heart, 40 the lot his deeds deserve; so will men learn to fear thee, long as they live to enjoy the land thou gavest to our fathers.

41 Nay, is it some stranger, with no part in thy people Israel, who yet comes here from distant lands for love of thy renown? For indeed there will be talk of thy renown, of the constraining force thy power 42 displays, all the world over. When such a man comes to pray in this temple, thou, in 43 heaven, in thy secure dwelling-place, wilt listen to the alien's prayer and wilt answer it. So all the world shall learn to fear thy name, no less than Israel itself; shall doubt no more that this temple I have built claims thy protection.

44 Sometimes thy people will go out to levy war upon their enemies, here and there at thy bidding. Then, as they fall to prayer, let them but turn in the direction of the city thou hast chosen, the temple I have 45 built there in thy honour, and thou, in heaven, wilt listen to their prayer for aid, wilt maintain their cause.

But what, if they have offended thee by their faults? No man but is guilty of some fault; it may be thou wilt give them up, in thy anger, into the power of their enemies, and as prisoners they will endure exile in neighbouring countries, or countries far away. But ere long, in their banishment, they will come back to thee with repentant hearts, crying out, poor exiles, We are sinners, we have done amiss, rebels all! In that alien land, the land of their captivity, they will come back to thee with all the purpose of their heart and soul. Then, if they turn in prayer towards the land thou gavest to their fathers, the city of thy choice, and the temple I have built there in thy honour, thou, in heaven, on thy peaceful throne, wilt once more listen to their prayer for aid, wilt maintain their cause still. Thou wilt relent towards thy people, though they have sinned against thee, wilt pardon the wrong their transgressions have done thee, wilt melt the hearts of their captors into pity. Are they not thy own people, thy coveted possession, the men thou didst rescue from Egypt's furnace of iron? Ever let thy eyes be watchful, to look down upon me, thy servant, and upon thy people, when they cry for aid; give all their requests a hearing. Hast thou not set them apart, among all the peoples of the world, to be thy coveted possession? Was not this thy promise, given through thy servant Moses when thou didst rescue our fathers from Egypt, O Lord our God?

So prayed king Solomon, so he pleaded with the Lord; and when he had finished, he rose up from before the Lord's altar, where he had knelt on the ground with his hands outstretched towards heaven, and standing there, gave his blessing aloud to the whole assembly of Israel. Blessed be the Lord, he said, that he has given his people of Israel the repose he promised them; of all the hopes his word through Moses gave us, never one has been left unfulfilled. May the Lord our God be with us still, as he was with our fathers, never forsaking us, never casting us away; may he turn our hearts towards himself, ready to follow every path he has shewn us, keep every command, observance and decree he bade our fathers keep. May this prayer I have uttered before him plead with the Lord our God day and night, to win redress, for me, and for his people Israel, as o the time shall need it; proving to the whole world that the Lord alone is God, there 1 can be no other. Wholly be our hearts given to the Lord our God, ready (as we are ready this day) to live by his laws, and keep true to his commandments.

2 Then the king and all Israel with him immolated their victims in the Lord's pre-3 sence; twenty-two thousand oxen and a hundred and twenty thousand sheep were slaughtered as Solomon's welcome-offering to the Lord. Thus the king and the men 4 of Israel dedicated the temple. That day, the king must needs hallow the middle part of the court before the Lord's house, burning there the burnt-sacrifice, and the bloodless offerings, and the fat taken from 5 the welcome-victims; there was no room for these on the brazen altar that stood there in the Lord's presence. High festival king Solomon kept at this time before the Lord our God, and with him a great multitude from the whole land of Israel, that stretched from the pass of Emath down to the River of Egypt. Fourteen days it 16 lasted, a whole week and then a second week;¹ and at last, when the eighth day came, the king sent the people home. So back they went to their dwelling-places, rejoicing with full hearts over all the mercies the Lord had shewn to his servant
David, and to his own people of Israel.

9 When Solomon had finished building temple and palace, and achieved 2 all his purpose, the Lord appeared to him a second time, as he had appeared to him 3 once at Gabaon. I have listened to thy prayer, the Lord told him, to the suit thou hast preferred before me; and this temple thou hast built I myself have hallowed, to be the everlasting shrine of my name;
never a day but my eyes shall be watching, 4 my heart attentive here. Do thou guide thy steps, like thy father, as in my presence, with an undivided heart and steadfastly; do thou fulfil all that I command, 5 hold true to my observances and my decrees; and I will grant to thy line dominion over Israel eternally. Such was my promise to thy father David, that he should always have an heir to sit on the throne of Israel. But if you and your children are 6 content to turn your backs on me, following me no more, neglecting the commands and observances I have enjoined on you, betaking yourselves to the service and worship of alien gods, then I will sweep 7 Israel away from the land I gave them, and this temple which I have hallowed as the shrine of my name, shall be thrust away out of my sight. Israel shall become a proverb and a by-word among all the nations, and this house shall be the monu-8 ment of its fall. The passer-by will stand wondering, and hiss in derision; What means it, he will ask, that the Lord has treated this land, this house so cruelly? And 9 the answer will come, Because they forsook the Lord their God, who rescued their fathers from the land of Egypt, and betook themselves to the worship and service of alien gods; that is why the Lord brought all this ruin upon them.

It was twenty years after Solomon had 10 finished the two buildings, temple and palace, that Hiram, king of Tyre, who had 11 sent him the cedar and the fir-wood and the gold he needed for his undertaking, received twenty townships from him, be-12 longing to the land of Galilee. And when he came on a visit from Tyre to see the townships Solomon had allotted to him, 13 he liked them but little; What, brother, he cried, were these the only cities thou couldst spare me? And he gave that region the name of Chabal,² which it bears to this day. It was twenty thousand talents' 14 weight of gold that Hiram sent to king Solomon.

As for the reasons why king Solomon 15 made such heavy disbursements, they were these; he must build the temple, and the palace, and Mello, and Jerusalem wall, and Hesper, and Mageddo, and Gazer.
16 Gazer had been taken and burnt by the invading army of Pharaoh, king of Egypt;
its inhabitants, who were Chanaanites, he put to the sword, and later gave it by way of dowry when his daughter married king 17 Solomon. It was for Solomon, therefore, to rebuild it, together with Lower Bethoron,

¹ It is probable that one week was devoted to keeping the feast of Tabernacles (Lev. 23. 34). ² The precise meaning of the word Chabal cannot be determined. Some have supposed a popular derivation which gave it the sense of 'worthless'.

18 and Baalath, and Palmyra out in the 19 desert. And in general he fortified the unwall'd towns in his dominions; he must have cities, too, in which his chariots and horsemen could be quartered. Much else, too, he had the whim to build in Jerusalem, and on Lebanon, and in all parts of his 20 kingdom. (Many of the former inhabitants still remained, not of Israelite stock, Amorrhites, Hethites, Pherezites, Hev-21 ites, and Jebusites; and these descendants of the races which Israel could never exterminate, king Solomon made into bond-22 servants, as they are to this day. Among the Israelites, he would make no man his slave; it was from these that he drew his warriors and his courtiers, his princes and his captains, the commanders of his 23 chariots and horsemen. Five hundred and fifty overseers king Solomon had, to hold 24 the people to their appointed tasks.) And no sooner had Pharaoh's daughter removed from the Keep of David to her new palace, than Solomon set about building up Mello.

25 Three times a year Solomon offered burnt-sacrifice and welcome-offerings on the altar he had made in the Lord's honour, and burned incense in the Lord's presence; and he kept the temple in repair.¹

26 King Solomon also built a fleet at Asion-Gaber, near Ailath on the shore of 27 the Red Sea, in the territory of Edom. In this fleet, Hiram sent men of his own, mariners that had long experience of the sea, to serve with king Solomon's men.
 28 They sailed as far as Ophir, and thence brought back to Solomon four hundred and twenty talents' weight of gold.

10 And now Solomon was visited by the queen of Saba. She had heard by report of the wisdom with which the Lord's favour had endowed him, and came to make trial of his powers with knotty 2 questions. Magnificent was the retinue with which she entered Jerusalem; spices and abundant gold and precious stones were the lading of her camels. And when she met king Solomon, she told him all the thoughts that exercised her mind; every 3 doubt he resolved, no question of hers but found an answer. And when she saw how 4 wise a man he was, saw, too, the house he had built, the food that was on his table, 5 the lodging of his servants, the order and splendour of his court, how the wine went round, and what burnt-sacrifice he offered in the Lord's temple,² she stood breathless in wonder. And she said to the king, 6

 It was no false tale I heard in my own coun-7 try, of all thou doest and of all the wisdom that is thine. I could not believe what they told me, without coming and seeing it for myself; and now I find that half of it was lost in the telling; here is greater wisdom, greater prosperity than all the tales that 8 reached me. Happy thy folk, happy these servants of thine who wait ever upon thy presence and listen to thy wise words.
 9 Blessed be the Lord thy God, who, in his eternal love for Israel, has brought thee, his favourite, to the throne, given thee a king's power to do justice and to make award!

A hundred and twenty talents' weight 10 of gold she gave to king Solomon, with many spices and precious stones; never did such abundance of spices come to Israel as those which the queen of Saba gave.
 (Though indeed Hiram's fleet, when it 11 brought back the gold from Ophir, brought rich store of sandal-wood, as well as pre-12 cious stones; and of this sandal-wood king Solomon made pedestals for temple and palace, harp and zither for his musicians;
 finer sandal-wood never reached us, no, 13 nor was ever seen.) Solomon, in his turn, gave the queen of Saba all she desired and asked for; gave her much, too, unasked, in the royal munificence that was his. And so she went back to her own country, with all her retinue.

The weight of gold that reached Solo-14 mon every year was six hundred and 15 sixty-six talents, not counting what was brought him by his revenue officers, merchants and pedlars, from the kings of Arabia, and from his own commissioners.
 16 Two hundred shields king Solomon made of the purest gold, allowing six hundred

¹ 'Kept the temple in repair'; literally, in the Latin, 'finished it'. But it seems impossible to give any good reason why the finishing of the temple should be mentioned here as if it were a new event: and the verb used in the Hebrew text has the root sense of 'making safe'.
² 'What burnt-sacrifice he offered in the Lord's temple'; or perhaps, 'his stairway to the Lord's temple'.

sicles of gold to the plating of each; three hundred bucklers, too, of assayed gold, with three (hundred) minas of gold to cover each;¹ and all these the king put in the building that was called the Forest of Lebanon. He also made a great throne of ivory, and lined it with gold unalloyed; six steps led up to it, and at the back the upper part of it was rounded. The seat itself had two supporters, with a lion standing by each, and on each step there was a lion at either side; no other kingdom could shew such workmanship. Of gold were all the goblets from which king Solomon drank, of purest gold all the furniture in the building called the Forest of Lebanon; no silver was used, for indeed in King Solomon's day silver was little thought of. And every three years the king's fleet and Hiram's would sail to Tharsis, whence they came back laden with gold and silver; with ivory, too, and apes, and peacocks for their freight.

So, both in riches and in wisdom, Solomon outvied all the kings of the world; and from every part of the world men craved his audience, to make proof for themselves of the wisdom God had put in his heart. And all these brought him gifts, so that gold and silver ware, presents of clothes and of armour, spices too, and horses and mules, came in year by year. Of chariots and horsemen king Solomon mustered a great force, fourteen hundred chariots and twelve thousand horsemen; of these, some were in the fortified towns, and some at the king's side in Jerusalem. Silver he made as common in Jerusalem as stone, and cedars plentiful as the sycamores that grow in the plains. And horses were brought to Solomon from Egypt and from Coa,² where his agents bought them and sent them to him for a fixed sum. Six hundred pieces of silver was the cost of a chariot brought from Egypt, and fifty of a horse: the kings of the Hethites and of Syria, too, sold him horses at the same price.

11 But king Solomon gave his heart to many women of alien birth, not only to Pharaoh's daughter, but to Moabites and Ammonites, Edomites and Sidonians and Hethites. It was of such races that the Lord had warned Israel, You must not mate with them, or let them mate with your daughters; no question but they will beguile your hearts into the worship of their own gods. Hotly he loved and close he clung to them; seven hundred wives, each with a queen's rights, and three hundred concubines besides; what marvel if they beguiled his heart? So, an old man now, he was enticed by women into the worship of alien gods, and his heart was not true to the Lord, his own God, like his father David's before him. To Astarthe, goddess of the Sidonians, Solomon bowed down, and to Moloch, the false god of Ammon, and set the Lord's will at defiance, instead of shewing his father's loyalty. To Chamos, the false god of Moab, and to Moloch, the false god of Ammon, Solomon built shrines, there on the mountain-side in full view of Jerusalem, and humoured thus all those foreign wives of his, that must burn incense, each to her own god, and offer victims.

So the Lord was angry with Solomon for playing him false, when he, the Lord God of Israel, had twice appeared to him, and warned him against this very sin of alien worship; a warning that went unremembered. Since this is thy mind, he told Solomon, to disregard my covenant and the bidding I gave thee, I will not scruple to tear the kingdom from thy grasp, and give it to one of thy own servants. Only, for the love of thy father David, I will not do it in thy life-time; it is thy son that shall lose his kingdom. Nor will I take away the whole of it; one tribe he shall have left to him, for the sake of my servant David, and Jerusalem, the city of my choice.

And the Lord gave Solomon an enemy to contend with, Adad the Idumean, of the royal dynasty of Edom. This man had made his escape, at the time when David invaded Idumea, and Joab, the commander of his army, was seeing to the burial of all its male inhabitants, who had been put to the sword. Joab, with all the fighting men of Israel, had spent six months there, exterminating every male survivor of the Edomite race, and meanwhile Adad, still in early boyhood, took refuge in Egypt, under the charge of certain Edomites, that had been his father's servants. It was from Madian they began their journey, and when they reached Pharan they found adherents there; with these, they made their way into Egypt and had recourse to king Pharao, who gave Adad a house of his own, with an allowance of food and lands to cultivate. Great favour Adad won with king Pharao, who gave him his own sister-in-law, the sister of queen Taphnes, for his wife; by her he had a son, Genubath, whom Taphnes brought up at Pharao's palace, so that he lived at court among Pharao's own children.

² The sense of the Hebrew

When news reached Adad, there in Egypt, that David had been laid to rest with his fathers, and that Joab, too, the commander of his army, was dead, he asked Pharao's leave to go back to his own country. Why, Pharao asked, what is lacking to thee here, that thou shouldst be pining for thy home? Nothing, said he, but give me leave for all that. (Meanwhile, God gave Solomon another enemy to contend with, Razon, son of Eliada, that ran away from his master, Adazerer king of Soba, and levied war on him. When David conquered Soba, Razon became leader of a robber band, that went and settled in Damascus, where they made him king; and all through Solomon's reign he was the enemy of Israel.) Such was the cause of Adad's rebellion and his ill will against Israel, and he set up a kingdom in Syria.¹

There was a servant, too, of king Solomon's that turned against him, Jeroboam son of Nabat, an Ephraimite that lived at Sareda with his widowed mother, Sarva. And this is the story of his rebellion against his master. At the time when Solomon was building Mello, and filling up the gap his father had left in the walls of David's Keep, this Jeroboam was a warrior at the height of his strength, and Solomon marked him out for a young man gifted and active, so he put him in charge of the labour that was exacted from the northern tribes.² And now, as Jeroboam was leaving Jerusalem, he met the prophet Ahias, of Silo, that was clad in a new cloak, out in the open country, where none else was by. And Ahias, tearing the new cloak he wore into twelve pieces, bade Jeroboam take ten of them; This message, said he, the Lord God of Israel sends thee, I mean to wrest the kingship from the power of Solomon, and make over ten tribes to thee. One tribe shall remain his, for the sake of my servant David, and of Jerusalem, among all the cities of Israel the city of my choice. He has forsaken me, to worship Astarthe, goddess of the Sidonians, Chamos, god of Moab, and Moloch, god of Ammon; he has not followed the path I bade him follow, by doing my will and keeping command and decree of mine, like his father David before him. Not from his hand will I take the kingdom away, nor all of it; while he lives, I will grant him rule over it, for love of my chosen servant David, that kept command and decree of mine faithfully; but his son shall lose it. Ten tribes I will give to thee, and to his son one tribe only, so that my servant David may still have his lamp alight in my presence, there in Jerusalem, the favoured sanctuary of my name. On thee my choice shall fall; thou shalt have power to thy heart's content, the king of Israel. And if thou wilt attend to the charge I lay upon thee, following the ways I bid thee follow and doing my will, keeping command and decree of mine as my servant David once did, then I will be with thee, and grant thee a dynasty abiding as David's was. I will make Israel over to thee; such sorrow I will bring on the race of David, but not for ever.

Solomon would fain have put Jeroboam to death, but he was up and gone; he took refuge with Sesac king of Egypt, and remained there till Solomon's death. As for the rest of Solomon's life and doings, and the stories told of his wisdom, they are all to be found in the Annals of king Solomon.

42 He was forty years on the throne, with his capital at Jerusalem, but with all Israel for his subjects; and when he was laid to rest with his fathers, they buried him, David's heir, in David's Keep. And he was succeeded by his son Roboam.

12 This Roboam betook himself to Sichem; at Sichem the whole of Israel had assembled to crown him king. But meanwhile Jeroboam, son of Nabat, who had fled to Egypt to be out of king Solomon's reach, had come back home upon hearing the news of his death; and he, too, was summoned to meet them. He, and all Israel with him, came to make a request of Roboam; Thy father, they said, made us bear a bitter yoke. That cruel sway of his, that hard yoke, do thou mitigate, and we will be thy servants on that condition. Give me two days, said he, and then come back to hear my answer. So, when the people had left him, king Roboam asked advice first of the older men that had been courtiers in the life-time of his father, king Solomon; what answer should he make to the people? Why, they told him, if thou dost defer to them and do their will, granting this request of theirs and speaking graciously to them, they will never cease giving thee loyal service. But he left their advice unheeded, and took counsel instead with the younger men who had grown up with him; How think you, he asked, I should make answer to the people's request, that I would lighten the yoke my father laid on them? And these, men of his own upbringing, gave him advice in their turn. Do they complain that thy father laid a heavy yoke on them, and ask for relief? Then tell them there is more strength in thy little finger than in all the breadth of thy father's back; if his yoke fell heavy on them, thine shall be heavier still; if thy father's weapon was the lash, thine shall be the scorpion.¹

12 So the third day came, and Jeroboam, with all the people at his back, kept the tryst which the king had made with them for the third day following. And the king, instead of heeding the advice which the older men had given, spoke to the people harshly, with such words as the younger men had prescribed to him. If my father's yoke fell heavy on you, he told them, mine shall be heavier still; if his weapon was the lash, mine shall be the scorpion. Thus the king refused to fall in with his people's will; the Lord had left him to his own devices, in fulfilment of the promise Ahias the Silonite made, in his name, to Jeroboam son of Nabat. And when the people found that the king would not listen to them, they were quick with their answer. David is none of ours, they cried; not for us the son of Jesse; go back, men of Israel, to your homes! Let David look to the affairs of his own tribe! And with that, the people dispersed to their homes; none but the Israelites living in the cities of Juda would acknowledge Roboam as king.

And now, when Adoram, who had charge of the levy, came to them in the king's name, the Israelites stoned him to death; whereupon Roboam mounted his chariot and betook himself, with all speed, to Jerusalem. From that day to this, the men of Israel have refused allegiance to the dynasty of David. Hearing of Jeroboam's return, they met and summoned him to be present; and so they made him king of all Israel, leaving none to take part with David's line except the one tribe of Juda. Roboam, indeed, upon reaching Jerusalem, mustered the whole tribe of Juda, including Benjamin, a hundred and eighty thousand choice warriors, to make war on the men of Israel; their cry was that Roboam, Solomon's heir, must be restored to his kingdom. But the Lord sent word to the prophet Semeias, Here is a message for Roboam, son of Solomon, king of Juda, and for the men of Juda and Benjamin, the loyal remnant of the people. You are not to march out, the Lord says, and make war upon the sons of Israel, your own brethren; go home, every man of you; all this is my doing. So they obeyed the Lord's will, and gave up their journey at his bidding.

As for Jeroboam, he fortified Sichem, in the hill-country of Ephraim, to be his capital; then he went on to fortify Phaniel. And it came into his mind, The kingdom will go back to the dynasty of David if these subjects of mine are allowed to go and sacrifice in the Lord's house at Jerusalem. Their loyalties will go out again to their old

¹ 'Scorpion' was probably a name given to some instrument of punishment then in use,

28 master, king Roboam of Juda; they will kill me, and return to his allegiance. And this was the plan he devised; he made two golden calves, and said to the men of Israel, Here are your gods; the same gods that rescued you from the land of Egypt; no need to make pilgrimage to Jerusalem any more. One of the calves he set up at 29 Bethel, and the other at Dan. Here was great sin caused; all the way to Dan men would go on pilgrimage, to worship a calf. 30 Jeroboam made shrines, too, on the hill-tops, and chose men to be priests here and there and everywhere among the people, 31 men that were not of Levi's race. And he appointed a feast-day of his own, on the fifteenth day of the month, to match the feast-day kept in Juda, but it was in the eighth month. He too, in Bethel, would mount the steps of the altar and do sacrifice, but to calf-gods of his own making. And at Bethel he established the priests that served the hill-shrines he had made. 32 On the fifteenth day, then, of the eighth month, his self-devised feast-day for the sons of Israel, Jeroboam went up to the altar he had built in Bethel, and began, standing there, to offer incense.

13 At that very moment, as Jeroboam stood at the altar and cast the incense down, a prophet came to Bethel, 2 sent by the Lord from Juda; and in the Lord's name he cried aloud against the altar. Listen, thou altar, listen to a message from the Lord. I see a prince that is to come, born of David's race, Josias by name, that shall sacrifice on thee the very priests who now feed thee with incense; the bones of dead men shall be thy sacrifice. 3 And he offered them proof, there and then; Here is a sign, he told them, to prove that this message comes from the Lord; see if this altar does not fall apart, and spill 4 the ashes it holds! So cried the prophet against the altar at Bethel; and the king, hearing it, lifted his hand from the altar, pointed to the prophet and cried, Seize him! With that, his outstretched hand withered up; no more could he bring it 5 back to his side; and meanwhile, the altar fell apart, spilling its ashes; the very sign which the Lord had inspired his prophet to foretell. Plead with the Lord thy God, 6 the king said to him, and pray for me, that I may have the use of my hand again. So the prophet entreated God's mercy for him, and his hand was restored to him, as sound as before. And now the king would 7 have the prophet come home with him to take food, and to be rewarded with gifts, but he answered, Thou mightest offer me 8 half thy kingdom before I would come with thee, before a crust of bread or a drop of water should pass my lips. Such is the 9 charge the Lord's word laid upon me; I must neither eat nor drink, nor go home by the way I came hither. So he set out 10 home by another road, not retracing the journey by which he had come to Bethel.

There was an old seer dwelling at 11 Bethel, whose sons came and told him what deeds the prophet of God had done in the town that day; told what words had passed, too, between him and the king. Whereupon their father asked what road 12 he had taken, this prophet from Juda; and when he had found out this from his sons, he bade them saddle the ass for him. 13 Saddle it they did, and he mounted, and went out in search of the prophet, whom he found sitting under an oak-tree. Asking whether he were the prophet from Juda, and learning that he was, he bade him 15 come home and share his meal. But the other said, I must not turn back and go with thee, must not take food or drink 17 here; when the Lord spoke to me, it was part of his message that I must neither eat nor drink at Bethel, nor leave it by the way I entered it. But he would take no denial; 18 I too, said he, am a prophet like thyself, and an angel has brought me a message from the Lord that I am to take thee home and give thee food and drink. With such 19 words the prophet was beguiled, and went back to eat and drink with him.

Even as they sat at table, the Lord's 20 word came to the seer that had detained him. A message from the Lord, cried he 21 to the prophet from Juda. Thou hast disobeyed him; he, the Lord thy God, gave thee a strict injunction, and thou hast not kept it. Thou hast turned back, there to eat and drink where he bade thee leave food and drink untasted. For thy punishment, thy body shall not be laid to rest in the burying-place of thy fathers.

When their meal was done, he saddled 23 his own ass for the prophet, his guest. And 24

he, setting out on his journey, met with a lion, that slew him. There lay his body on the open road, with the ass close by; the lion, too, remained standing there beside its prey. Passers-by told how they had seen it, a lion standing beside a dead man's body that lay in the road, when they reached the township where the old seer lived, and when it came to his ears, he bethought him of his guest; It must be the prophet, said he, that was disobedient to the Lord's command; the Lord has suffered this lion to maul and kill him, in fulfilment of the divine threat that was made to him. Then he bade his sons saddle him an ass; and when it was saddled, he set out on his journey, and found the body lying there by the road with ass and lion standing over it; never a morsel of its prey had the lion eaten, and to the ass it did no harm. So the old seer took up the prophet's body and put it on the ass, and returned with it to his own city, to mourn over the dead. In his own tomb he laid the corpse down, and they mourned for him, crying out, Alas, brother, alas the day! And after they had finished mourning, he said to his sons, When I die, bury me in this tomb where God's prophet rests, laying my bones beside his. It will come true past all doubt, the threat which he uttered in the Lord's name against the altar at Bethel, and the hill-shrines in the cities of Samaria.

All this notwithstanding, Jeroboam would nor amend his sinful ways; still he appointed priests here and there and everywhere among the people, consecrating the first comer to minister at his hill-shrines. So it was that the race of Jeroboam became tainted with guilt, doomed to perish and to leave no trace behind it.

14 And now Jeroboam's son Abia fell sick. Whereupon Jeroboam said to his wife, Here is a journey needs to be made; but first disguise thyself, so that none may know thou art the wife of Jeroboam. It is to Silo thou must go, where Ahias lives, the prophet who foretold that I should be king of this realm; to him betake thyself, bearing ten loaves with thee, and some pastry, and a pot of honey; from him thou wilt learn what is to become of the boy. So Jeroboam's wife did his bidding; to Silo she made her way, and found Ahias' house. Ahias had no sight left now, so dim were his eyes grown with old age; but the Lord made it known to him that Jeroboam's wife was coming to ask him about her son, that had fallen sick, and told him what words he must use to her. She, as she entered, would have given herself out to be other than she was; but Ahias, as soon as he heard the fall of her feet on the threshold, cried out, Come in, wife of Jeroboam; why dost thou feign thyself to be another? I am charged with bitter tidings for thee.

Go and give Jeroboam this message from the Lord God of Israel: Was it for this I chose thee out among the common folk, and gave thee command of my people Israel, tearing David's kingdom asunder to enthrone thee? My servant David was not such a man as thou art. He kept my commandments, obeying me with all his heart, and doing my will. And thou? Thou hast done more amiss than any who went before thee, making thyself molten images of alien gods; me thou hast defied, me thou hast rejected. And I, in return, mean to bring ruin on all Jeroboam's race, smiting every man that belongs to it, bondman or free man, throughout all Israel; I mean to sweep away the last remnants of his race, like the dung that must be swept away till all is clean. Die they in the city, they shall be food for the dogs; die they in the open country, they shall be food for all the birds of heaven; it is the Lord's decree. Up, then, betake thyself home, and as thy feet cross the threshold of the city, thy son will die. Lament and burial he shall have from the people of Israel; in him alone, of all Jeroboam's race, some loyalty to the God of Israel is found, and he alone, of all Jeroboam's race, shall be carried to the grave. This day, even as I speak, the Lord has marked out for the throne of Israel one who shall destroy the race of Jeroboam. And as for Israel itself, it shall tremble under the hand of the Lord God, as a reed trembles in the water; he will root them out from the fair land which he gave to their fathers, and scatter them beyond the Great River, men that defied the Lord with forest-shrines of their own fashioning.

16 And if the Lord abandons Israel thus, it is for the guilt of Jeroboam, that sinned, and taught Israel to sin.

17 So Jeroboam's wife left him, and made her way back to Thersa, where her feet no sooner crossed the threshold than her son died. Burial he had, and all Israel mourned for him, as the prophet Ahias had promised in the Lord's name. What else Jeroboam did, how he fought and how he reigned, is to be found written in the 20 Annals of the kings of Israel. When his reign had lasted twenty-two years, he was laid to rest with his fathers, and the throne passed to his son Nadab.

21 Meanwhile king Solomon's son Roboam was reigning in Juda. He was forty-one years old when he came to the throne, and for seventeen years he reigned as king at Jerusalem, the city which the Lord chose out of all the cities of Israel to be the sanctuary of his name. His mother was an 22 Ammonitess called Naama. In his reign the men of Juda earned the Lord's displeasure by sinning against him more defiantly than their fathers ever had before 23 them. They, like the men of Israel, raised altar and image and shrine, on every high hill and under every spreading tree; and 24 these shrines had their prostitutes; they flourished again, all the unnatural deeds of the heathen, whom the Lord dispossessed at Israel's coming. In Roboam's 25 fifth year, Sesac king of Egypt marched on 26 Jerusalem, and took away all the treasures from temple and palace, plundering everywhere; took away, too, the shields of gold 27 which Solomon had fashioned. In place of these, Roboam made shields of bronze, which he entrusted to the captains of his 28 shield-bearers and palace guards; when he made a progress into the Lord's house, they were carried by the officers that 29 marched before him, and afterwards taken back to the shield-bearers' armoury. What else Roboam did, all the history of his 30 reign, is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Juda. All through his reign there 31 was war between him and Jeroboam. So Roboam, son of the Ammonitess Naama, was laid to rest with his fathers, with the Keep of David for his burying-place; and the throne passed to his son Abiam.

15 Abiam, coming to the throne of Juda in the eighteenth year of Jeroboam, reigned three years at Jerusalem. (His mother was called Maacha, daughter of Abessalom.) Everywhere he followed the sinful example his father had set him, unworthy heir of David, that ever kept faith with the Lord his God. Yet, for 4 David's sake, the Lord suffered him to keep the lamp of the royal dynasty burning at Jerusalem; a son he must have to follow him, for the city's preservation. Such 5 reward David had for doing the Lord's will, nor ever swerving, while life lasted, from his decrees, except in the matter of 6 Urias the Hethite. While Roboam lived, he was at war with Jeroboam, and there 7 was war, too, between Jeroboam and Abiam. What else Abiam did, all the history of his reign, is to be found in the 8 Annals of the kings of Juda. So Abiam was laid to rest with his fathers, with the 9 Keep of David for his burying-place, and the throne passed to his son Asa.

Asa, coming to the throne of Juda in the 10 twentieth year of Jeroboam, reigned as king at Jerusalem for forty-one years. His mother was called Maacha, daughter of 11 Abessalom. And Asa did the Lord's will, like king David, his ancestor, ridding 12 the land of shrine-prostitutes, and sweeping away all the filth of idolatry his fathers had brought in with them. He even deprived 13 his mother Maacha of her queenly rank, for her worship of Priapus and for dedicating a forest shrine to him; the grotto she had made he overthrew, broke the image and 14 burnt the fragments of it and cast the ashes into the river Cedron. He did not abolish 15 the hill-shrines; but all his days his heart was true to the Lord; and he enriched the Lord's house with gold and silver and other offerings for its use, some dedicated by his father and some in performance of his own vows.

This Asa and Baasa king of Israel were 16 at war continually. Baasa would not be content with his own Israelite territory; he invaded Juda and began making a fortified city of Rama, so as to deny Asa's 18 subjects free passage. Whereupon Asa took out all the silver and gold that was left in the treasure-chambers of temple and palace; this was to be conveyed by his messengers to Damascus, to Benadad, son of Tabremon, son of Hezion, king of 19 Syria. There is an alliance between us, he said, inherited from thy father and mine; witness these gifts of silver and gold I send thee. Do thou annul the treaty thou hast made with Baasa, king of Israel, and help 20 me drive him out of my country. Benadad, falling in with the request, sent out his generals with orders to attack the cities of Israel; Ahion they overcame, and Dan, and Abel Beth-Maacha, and all Cenneroth, till 21 Nephthali had no land remaining. So Baasa, when the news reached him, went back to Thersa, leaving the defences of 22 Rama half finished; and the men of Juda, summoned by a royal decree which admitted of no denial, carried off all the stones and woodwork he had erected there; Asa made use of it to fortify Gabaa in 23 Benjamin, and Maspha. What else Asa did, the power he wielded, all his history, and the record of the cities he built, are to be found in the Annals of the kings of Juda. At last old age came upon him, and 24 with old age, disease attacked his feet. So he was laid to rest with his fathers, in the Keep of his ancestor David, and the throne passed to his son Josaphat.

25 It was in the second year of Asa that Jeroboam's son Nadab came to the throne of Israel, and his reign over Israel lasted 26 two years; he defied the Lord's will, following the evil example of his father, that 27 sinned and taught Israel to sin. Then, while he was laying siege to the Philistine city of Gebbethon, at the head of the Israelite army, Baasa son of Ahias, a man of 28 Issachar, conspired against him and killed him there. So, in the third year of Asa, 29 Baasa succeeded Nadab as king. And he, on coming to the throne, put all Jeroboam's kindred to death; not a man did he spare, so that the whole race perished, as the Lord's servant, Ahias the Silonite, had 30 prophesied in his name. So deep was Jeroboam's guilt, that sinned and taught

Israel to sin; so was he punished for defying the Lord God of Israel. What else Nadab did, all his history, is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Israel.

It was this Baasa that was at war with 32 Asa continually; Baasa, son of Ahias, who 33 came to the throne in Asa's third year, and for twenty-four years reigned over Israel at Thersa. He too defied the Lord's will, 34 and followed the sinful ways by which Jeroboam taught Israel to sin.

16 To this Baasa the Lord sent a message by Jehu, son of Hanani: Was it for this I raised thee up out of the 2 dust, and made thee ruler of my people Israel, that thou shouldst follow the ways of Jeroboam, teaching my people Israel to sin, and by their sins to defy my anger?
 See if I do not sweep away every trace of 3 Baasa and Baasa's line, treating thy race as I treated the race of Jeroboam son of Nabat. Die they in the city, they shall be 4 food for the dogs, die they in the open country, they shall be food for all the birds of heaven. What else Baasa did, all his 5 history and the record of all his battles, is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Israel. So he was laid to rest with his 6 fathers, with Thersa for his burying-place, and the throne passed to his son Ela. (It 7 was through the prophet Jehu, son of Hanani, that the Lord pronounced sentence upon Baasa and his line, and on all the provocations by which he had earned the Lord's displeasure, following the example of Jeroboam's race; and Baasa, for that reason, put the prophet Jehu to death.¹)

It was in the twenty-sixth year of Asa 8 that Baasa's son Ela came to the throne of Israel; and when he had reigned two years at Thersa, his own servant Zambri, that 9 led half his cavalry, rebelled against him.
 Ela was at Thersa, drinking himself drunk at the house of Arsa, that was prefect of the city, when Zambri rushed in and gave 10 him a mortal blow, taking the throne for himself, in the twenty-seventh year of Asa's reign over Juda. Once he was king, 11 and settled on the throne, he struck down all Baasa's descendants, leaving no male

among them alive, his kinsfolk, too, and his friends. When Zambri thus made an end of Baasa's race, the sentence which the Lord had passed on Baasa through the prophet Jehu was carried out; they must atone for their guilt, Baasa and his son Ela, that sinned and taught Israel to sin, defying the Lord God of Israel with their false worship. What else Ela did, all his history, is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Israel.

So, in the twenty-seventh year of Asa, Zambri reigned in Thersa for seven days. The army of Israel were then laying siege to the Philistine city of Gebbethon; and when news reached them of Zambri's conspiracy and the king's death, they chose, by common consent, a king of their own. This was Amri, who was then in command of the Israelite forces, and was present there in the camp. So Amri with all his men left Gebbethon and laid siege to Thersa; and Zambri, seeing that the city must needs fall, retired into the palace and burned it over his own head. So he died, in all the guilt of defying the Lord by following the example of Jeroboam; in all the guilt, too, he had brought on Israel by teaching them to sin. What else Zambri did, the story of his plot and of his tyranny, are to be found in the Annals of the kings of Israel.

Thereupon the Israelite people divided itself into two factions; half of them espoused the cause of Thebni, son of Gineth, and would have made a king of him, the other half followed Amri. But Amri's party gained the victory over Thebni's; so Thebni came to his death, and Amri to a throne. It was in the thirty-first year of Asa that Amri began his reign over Israel, which lasted twelve years. For the first six, his capital was at Thersa; then, for two talents of silver, he bought the hill of Samaria from Somer, and built on it a city which he called Samaria, after Somer's name. This Amri defied the Lord's will more recklessly than any king before him, following the wicked ways of Jeroboam, son of Nabat, that taught Israel to sin, and provoking the Lord God of Israel to anger with his false worship. What else Amri did, the record of all the battles he fought, is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Israel.

So Amri was laid to rest with his fathers, with Samaria for his burying-place, and the throne passed to his son Achab.

It was in the thirty-eighth year of Asa that Achab, son of Amri, came to the throne of Israel; and for twenty-two years he reigned over Israel at Samaria. This Achab, son of Amri, defied the Lord's will as no other had done before him; not content with following the evil example of Jeroboam, son of Nabat, he married Jezebel, daughter of the Sidonian king Ethbaal, and thenceforward enslaved himself to Baal's worship. To Baal he built a temple, to Baal he raised an altar, in Samaria; planted, too, a sacred wood, and did more to earn the Lord's displeasure than any king of Israel in earlier times.

It was in his days that Hiel, a man of Bethel, rebuilt Jericho; the foundation of it cost him his eldest son Abiram, and the gates of it his youngest son Segub; such was the doom pronounced by Josue, son of Nun, in the Lord's name.¹

17 And now word came to Achab from Elias, the man of Thesbe, that dwelt in Galaad, As the Lord I serve is a living God, in these years that are coming neither dew nor rain shall fall, without word of mine to command it. Upon this, Elias himself had a message from the Lord, Withdraw thyself, and make thy way eastwards; thou shalt find a hiding-place in the valley of the Kerith, that flows to meet the Jordan. There the river shall provide drink for thee, and the ravens, at my command, shall feed thee. Withdraw himself he did, as the Lord bade him, and made his way to the river Kerith, that flows to meet the Jordan; there he took up his abode. Morn and eve the ravens brought him bread, morn and eve they brought him meat, and of the river's water he drank, till, after a while, the land was parched, and the river dried up.

Then the Lord said to him, Bestir thyself, and make thy way to Sarephtha, a town in Sidon, where thou shalt make thy dwelling, at my command, a widow there will support thee. So he rose up and went to Sarephtha, and he had but reached the city gate when he met a woman gathering fire-wood; whereupon he called out to her, asking her to give him a cup of water to drink. And as she went to fetch it, he cried after her, And when thou dost bring it, bring me, too, a mouthful of bread. Why, she told him, as surely as the Lord thou servest is a living God, I have no food except a handful of flour at the bottom of a jar, and a drop of oil left in a cruet. Even now I am gathering a stick or two, to serve my son and me for our last meal. Have no fear, Elias said; go home on this errand of thine; only use the flour to make me a little girdle-cake first, and bring it me here; cook what is left for thyself and thy son. This message the Lord God of Israel has for thee: There shall be no lack of flour in the jar, nor shall the oil waste in the cruet, till the Lord sends rain on this parched earth. At that, she went and did Elias' bidding, and there was a meal for him and for her and for all her household; and from that day onwards there was still flour in the jar, still oil left in the cruet, as the Lord's message through Elias had promised her.

Afterwards, the housewife's son fell sick; and so violently did his disease take hold of him that at last he breathed no longer. Upon this, the woman said to Elias, Servant of God, why didst thou meddle with me? Didst thou come here to confront me, after all, with the record of my sins, and hand over my son to death? Give me thy son, said Elias, and took the boy from her bosom; then carried him up to the room where he himself lodged, and laid him down on the bed. O Lord my God, said he, must thou bring trouble even upon this widow, who is all my support, by taking her son's life away? Then, three times, he measured his whole length upon the child's body, crying out to the Lord, O Lord my God, send back life into the boy's limbs. So Elias prayed, and the Lord granted his prayer; the boy's life returned to him, and he revived. And when Elias took him down from the upper room into the house below, gave him back to his mother and shewed her that her son lived, the woman said to Elias, This proves to me that thou art God's servant indeed, and his promise on thy lips is true.

18 It was long before the Lord's word came to Elias; but at last, when two years had gone by, he said, Go and confront Achab; it is time I should send rain on this parched earth. So Elias went out to confront Achab. Sore famine there was in Samaria; and Achab had called his steward Abdias to his aid. This Abdias was one that held the Lord in great reverence; and when Jezabel killed the Lord's prophets, he rescued a hundred of them, by hiding them in two caves, fifty in each, and supplying them with food and water. To him Achab said, Go through the whole land in search of grass wherever it may be found, by spring or mountain torrent, to keep the horses and the mules alive, or we shall lose all the beasts. So they divided up the country into circuits and separated, Achab taking one way and Abdias the other; and it was Abdias that fell in with Elias in the course of his journey. Why, said he, bowing to the earth as he recognized him, it is my lord Elias! None other, said he; go and tell thy master that Elias is here.

Ah, my lord, answered Abdias, what wrong have I done thee, that thou wouldst hand me over to Achab to be slain? As the Lord thy God is a living God, there is never race or realm to which my master has not sent in search of thee; and as each answered, Not here, he would take an oath of them, race by race and realm by realm, that thou wert not to be found. Go and tell thy master, sayest thou, that Elias is here; and what will be the issue of it? Why, when I have left thee, the spirit of the Lord will carry thee off I know not where; my errand done, and thou nowhere to be found, Achab will put me to death; and am not I, thy servant, one that has feared the Lord since he was a child? Hast thou never had tidings, good master, of what I did when Jezabel was slaying the Lord's prophets; how I rescued a hundred of them, by hiding them in two caves, fifty in each, and supplying them with food and water? Why wouldst thou bid me court death by telling my master, Elias is here? Nay, answered Elias, as the Lord I serve is a living God, I mean to confront Achab this day.

So Abdias went to find Achab, and gave him the message. Whereupon Achab came to meet Elias; and his greeting was, So it is thou, the man that gives Israel no rest? Nay, answered he, if Israel finds no rest, the fault lies not with me, but with thee and with thy father's race, that have neglected the Lord's command, and betaken yourselves to the gods of the country-side.

19 But there is work to do; send out couriers, and gather me all Israel on mount Carmel, with Baal's four hundred and fifty prophets, and those four hundred, prophets of the forest-shrines, that feed on Jezabel's bounty. So Achab sent word to all the men of Israel, and gathered the prophets together, there on mount Carmel.

21 And now Elias appeared before the whole of Israel, and thus reproached them, Will you never cease to waver between two loyalties? If the Lord is God, then take his part; if Baal is God, then take his. No word did the people give him in answer, and Elias began speaking to them again; Here am I, he said, the only prophet of the Lord left, while Baal has four hundred and 22 fifty. Bring us two bulls; let them choose which they will, cut it up into pieces, and set these upon fire-wood, without kindling it. I will prepare the other bull, and I too will set it on fire-wood still unkindled.

24 Then call upon the names of your gods, and I will call on the name of the Lord I serve; and the God who sends fire in answer shall be acknowledged as God. Well said, cried all the people, well said!

25 Thereupon Elias bade them choose their bull, and offer sacrifice first, since theirs was the greater number; let them call upon the names of their gods as they would, but kindle no fire. And they, accepting one of the bulls he offered them, prepared it for sacrifice; all day long they cried out on the name of Baal, Lord Baal, hear us; but never a sound came, and there was none to answer, dance as they would on the altar they had built there. When mid-day came, Elias fell to mocking them; Cry louder, he said, a God Baal is, past doubt, but it may be he is detained in talk, or lodging abroad, or on a journey; or he has fallen asleep, and needs awakening.

28 Cry louder they did, cutting themselves with knives and lancets, till they were all bathed in blood; but mid-day passed, and they were still prophesying; and now it was time for the evening sacrifice to be offered, but still no sound came; there was none to answer them or listen to their supplications.

30 Then Elias bade the people come near;

and when they were standing close to him, he began repairing the altar of the Lord, that was broken down. Twelve stones he took, one for each tribe that sprang from the sons of Jacob, to whom the divine voice gave the surname of Israel; and with these stones he built up the altar again, calling on the Lord's name as he did it. Then he made a trench round the altar, of some two furrows' breadth; piled the wood high, cut the bull into joints, and laid these on the wood. Now, he said, fill four buckets with water, and pour it over victim and wood alike. And again he bade them do it, and when they had finished, a third time. When they had poured it out a third time, the water was running all round the altar, and the trench he had dug for it was full.

The time was now come for offering the evening burnt-sacrifice; and as the prophet Elias went to the altar, thus he prayed, Lord God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, give proof this day that thou art the Lord God, and I am thy servant, and all I have done was done at thy command. Audience, Lord, give audience! Prove to all the people that thou art the Lord God, and art calling their hearts back to thee! With that, the divine fire fell, consuming victim and wood and stones and dust, and swallowing up the very water in the trench. At the sight, the whole people fell face to earth, and raised a cry, It is the Lord is God, it is the Lord is God! Seize the prophets of Baal, Elias told them, and do not let one of them slip through your hands. Seize them they did, and Elias took them down to the valley of Cison, where he put them to death.

Then Elias said to Achab, Go back now, eat and drink; I hear a noise like a storm of rain. So Achab went back to eat and drink, while Elias climbed the heights of mount Carmel, and there sat, his face bowed to the ground between his knees. And he bade his servant go to the hill-top and look out seawards; so he went and looked, but came back with word that he had seen nothing. Seven times he must go back on the same errand; and at the seventh time, a little cloud shewed, no bigger than a man's foot-print, rising up out of the sea. Go back, Elias said, and bid Achab mount his chariot and return home, before the rain overtakes him. This way and that he turned; and now the whole sky was dark, and clouds came, and a wind with the clouds, and a great storm of rain began. So Achab mounted his chariot and betook himself to Jezrahel; as for Elias, the power of the Lord came upon him, so that he girded his cloak about him and ran all the way to Jezrahel at Achab's bridle.

19 But when Achab told Jezebel of what Elias had done, how he had put all her prophets to the sword, she sent Elias a message, The gods punish me as I deserve, and more, if by this time tomorrow I have not sent thee the way yonder prophets went. Whereupon he took fright, and set out upon a journey of his own devising; made his way to Bersabee in Juda, and left his servant to wait there, while he himself went on, a whole day's journey, into the desert. Betaking himself there, and sitting down under a juniper tree, he prayed to have done with life. I can bear no more, Lord, he said; put an end to my life; I have no better right to live than my fathers. With that, he lay down and fell asleep under the juniper tree; but all at once an angel of the Lord roused him, bidding him awake and eat. Then he found, close to where his head lay, a girdle-cake and a pitcher of water; so he ate and drank and lay down to sleep again. But once more the angel of the Lord roused him; Awake and eat, said he, thou hast a journey before thee that will tax thy strength. So he rose up, and ate and drank; strengthened by that food he went on for forty days and forty nights, till he reached God's own mountain, Horeb.

There he made his lodging in a cave; and all at once the Lord's word came to him, Elias, what dost thou here? Why, he answered, I am all jealousy for the honour of the Lord God of hosts; see how the sons of Israel have forsaken thy covenant, thrown down thy altars, and put thy prophets to the sword! Of these, I only am left, and now my life, too, is forfeit. Then word came to him to go out and stand there in the Lord's presence; the Lord God himself would pass by. A wind there was, rude and boisterous, that shook the mountains and broke the rocks in pieces before the Lord, but the Lord was not in the wind. And after the wind, an earthquake, but the Lord was not in the earthquake. And after the earthquake a fire, but the Lord was not in the fire. And after the fire, the whisper of a gentle breeze. Elias, when he heard it, wrapped his face in his mantle, and went out to stand at the cave door. There a voice came to him, Elias, what dost thou here? I am all jealousy, said he, for the honour of the Lord God of hosts; see how the sons of Israel have forsaken thy covenant, thrown down thy altars, and put thy prophets to the sword! Of these, I only am left, and now my life, too, is forfeit.

Then the Lord said to him, Retrace thy journey through the desert all the way to Damascus, and there anoint Hazael to be king of Syria. Over Israel, too, thou shalt anoint a king, Jehu the son of Namsi. And for thyself, thou shalt anoint a new prophet, Eliseus, the son of Saphat, from Abel-Meula, to take thy place. Those who escape the sword of Hazael shall be slain by Jehu, and those who escape the sword of Jehu shall be slain by Eliseus. Yet I mean to leave myself seven thousand men out of all Israel; knees that have never bowed to Baal, lips that have never kissed hand to do him worship.

Even as he went on his journey, Elias found Eliseus, that was son of Saphat, ploughing with twelve pairs of oxen. He was with the last pair of all; and Elias, upon reaching him, threw his own cloak about the man's shoulders. There and then he left his oxen behind, and ran after Elias; Give me leave, he said, to embrace father and mother in parting. Back home with thee, said Elias; I have but fulfilled my errand. Back then Eliseus went, and chose out a pair of oxen, which he slaughtered, and cooked there with the plough for fire-wood. Such was the feast he made for the folk with him; then he rose up and left them, to follow Elias and be his servant.

20 After this, Benadad king of Syria mustered his whole army, with thirty-two princes at its head, mustered all his horses and chariots, and would take Samaria by siege. Achab, king of Israel, was within the city; and to him Benadad sent messengers demanding the surrender of his silver and gold, his wives, too, and 4 all the likeliest of his sons. My lord king, answered Achab, I accept thy terms; all 5 that I have is at thy disposal. But now the messengers came back to him with a fresh demand from Benadad, Silver and gold, wives and sons, thou must hand over to 6 me; and meanwhile, at this time tomorrow, envoys of mine shall visit thee, to search thy palace and thy courtiers' houses; to these thou must give up all they have a mind to carry away with them.

7 Thereupon the king of Israel summoned all the elders of his land; Mark well, he said, how craftily this man deals with us; this is my reward for consenting to give up wives and sons, silver and gold, 8 at his demand. Elders and people had but one thought; there must be no listening to 9 Benadad, nor granting his will. Achab, then, thus answered Benadad's messengers, Tell my lord the king, I am thy servant, and ready to carry out that first demand of thine; but this I cannot grant.
 10 And he, when the answer was reported to him, sent them back with this message, May the gods punish me as I deserve, and more than I deserve, if I do not beat Samaria to dust! I have more than enough warriors here at my back to carry it away 11 in handfuls. To that, the king of Israel made reply, Boast he may who ungirds, 12 not he who girds for battle. This taunt came to the ears of Benadad when he sat drinking with his princes in his royal pavilions. Besiege me the city, he told his men, and besiege it they did.

13 And now a prophet came with a message from the Lord to Achab, king of Israel: Thou canst see for thyself what a great multitude of warriors is here; over all that multitude I mean to give thee victory this day, and prove to thee that I am the Lord.
 14 Victory? said Achab. And who shall win it for us? Whereupon the prophet gave him this answer from the Lord, It shall be the lackeys the chiefs have brought with them. And when Achab asked who should 15 lead them, he told him, Thou thyself. So he took count of the lackeys the chiefs had in their retinue, and found there were two hundred and thirty-two of these; then he took count of his army, the whole army of 16 Israel, seven thousand strong. When it was high noon, they sallied out from the city, while Benadad still drank deep in his pavilion, with the princes that had come to aid him; and the lackeys marched at 17 their head. Benadad, when his scouts told him that a sally was being made from Samaria, gave orders that the men should 18 be taken alive, came they out peaceably or for battle. So on they went, the lackeys in the van, and the rest of the army at their heels, and none but slew the first enemy he 19 met; so that the Syrians were routed, and Israel went in pursuit of them. Benadad king of Syria escaped on horse-back among his cavalry, and still horse and chariot fell before the king of Israel's sally, till he won a great victory over the men of Syria. But 22 the prophet sought him out again and warned him, Go back and strengthen thy forces; take good heed what thou art doing; in this next year the king of Syria will be marching against thee.

In Syria, the king's advisers told him, 23
 If the Israelites have defeated us, that is because their gods are gods of the hills;
 best to offer them battle on the low-lying ground, where we shall have them at our mercy. Meanwhile, something remains to 24 be done; remove the princes, one and all, from their posts, and appoint commanders of thy own in place of them. Then fill up 25 the gaps in the ranks of thy army, muster as many horses and chariots as thou hadst of old, and we will fight them in the plains;
 see if we do not get the mastery of them.
 Benadad was won over by their advice, and took it; when a year had passed, he mar- 26 shalled the Syrian forces and led them out to Aphec, where he offered Israel battle.
 The men of Israel marshalled their forces 27 too, provided themselves with food for the march and went out to meet the enemy.
 Where they lay encamped opposite, they seemed like two little herds of goats, while the Syrians swarmed over the countryside.

To the king of Israel God sent out one 28 of his servants with this message: Thus says the Lord, Thinkst thou that I am God of the hills, and not of the valleys too?
 Over all this great array I will give thee victory; such proof you shall have that I am the Lord. So, for seven days, the 29 armies stood threatening one another, and on the seventh battle was joined; on that one day the men of Israel routed a hundred thousand Syrians that fought on foot.

Those who survived took refuge in the city of Aphec, where the wall fell on them, twenty-seven thousand in number. As for Benadad, when he made his way into the city he took refuge in an inner room; and there his courtiers told him, This is the tale we have heard about the kings of Israel, that they are merciful men. Let us put sackcloth on our loins, and ropes on our heads, and give ourselves up to the king of Israel; it may be he will spare our lives. So, with sackcloth on their loins and ropes on their heads, they betook themselves to the king of Israel; Thy servant Benadad, they told him, pleads for his life. And Achab answered, Lives he yet, he is my brother. Whereupon, seizing from his lips that word of welcome augury, they cried, Benadad! He is thy brother! So Achab bade them fetch him; and when Benadad came out, would have him mount his own chariot. And now Benadad promised, I will give thee back the cities my father took from thine, and thou shalt have streets in Damascus, as my father had in Samaria, and I will go home at peace with thee. So Achab made peace with him, and let him go his way.

But now the Lord sent his inspiration to a disciple in the schools of the prophets. He bade one of his fellow disciples strike him a blow, and when he refused, told him, Thou shalt be punished for disobeying the Lord's voice thus. Thou shalt be mauled by a lion, said he; and they had barely parted when his fellow disciple met a lion, and was mauled by it. Meanwhile, his fellow disciple sought out another; Strike me a blow, he asked of him, and strike he did, leaving a wound on him. So the prophet went out to meet the king on the open road, first smearing his face and eyes with dust; and as the king passed, he cried out to him, My lord, a word with thee! I was lately in the thick of the battle, and one brought a fugitive to me, bidding me mount guard over him; did he slip through my hands, it was my life for his, or else I must pay a talent of silver. And then, as I looked this way and that in the press, all at once he was gone. Why then, said the king of Israel, thou must pay the forfeit that was named. With that, he wiped the dust from his face, so that the king of Israel knew him for one of the prophets; and he gave him this message from the Lord, And thou, hast thou not let a man worthy of death slip through thy hands? Thy life shall pay for his life, thy people for his people. A sullen man was the king of Israel and an ill man to cross when he reached his home in Samaria.

21 Now turn we to the vineyard at Jezrahel, which belonged to Naboth the Jezrahelite, close to Achab's palace, that was King of Samaria. Give me that vineyard of thine, Achab said to Naboth, so near adjoining my house, to make a herb-garden of it. In its place, I will give thee a better vineyard of my own, or its worth in money, if that likes thee better. The Lord be merciful to me, Naboth answered; should I give thee the land that was my fathers' patrimony? And at that, Achab went home sullen and ill to cross, only because Naboth had refused to give up his fathers' patrimony. Down on his bed he lay, face to wall, and would take no food. So his wife Jezebel came in to see him, and know what ailed him, that he should refuse to eat; and he told her the story, how he had offered Naboth the Jezrahelite a sum of money for his vineyard, or a better vineyard, if he would, in place of it, and Naboth had refused to give the vineyard up. A fine king thou art, she said, as ever ruled in Israel! Up with thee, and eat, set thy heart at rest; I will give thee the vineyard of Naboth the Jezrahelite.

Then she wrote a letter in Achab's name, sealing it with his own seal, and despatched it to the elders and chief men that were Naboth's fellow-citizens. The tenour of it was this; They were to proclaim a solemn fast, and where the greatest of the townspeople sat, there must be a seat for Naboth. Then two rogues must be suborned to bear false witness against him, accusing him of blasphemous speech about God and the king; and so they were to have him out, and stone him to death. So the elders and chief men, Naboth's fellow-citizens, obeyed the instructions Jezebel's letter had given them; they proclaimed a fast, and would have Naboth sit among the greatest of the townspeople; and there, opposite him, sat two rogues, whom they had brought in to that end. These, like the slanderers they were, accused Naboth of cursing God and the king; whereupon he was led out beyond the city walls, and stoned to death. Then a message was sent to Jezebel, telling her how Naboth had died by stoning; and no sooner had she heard of his death, than she bade the king bestir himself. Take for thy own, she said, the vineyard which Naboth the Jezrahelite would not sell thee; Naboth is dead, and can thwart thy will no longer. And away went Achab to take possession of Naboth's vineyard; Naboth was dead.

Thereupon the word of the Lord came to Elias the Thesbite, Up, and go to meet Achab, king of Israel, that dwells in Samaria; thou wilt find him now in the vineyard of Naboth; he has gone to take possession of it. And this message thou wilt give him from the Lord: Wouldst thou slay, and dispossess the slain? Then tell him, Thus says the Lord, Here, where the dogs licked the blood of Naboth, they shall lick thine.

Here is one comes to seek me out, was Achab's greeting, that is no friend of mine. Seek thee out I must, said he, to tell thee thou art a slave. Thou hast given thyself up to such doings as are hateful in the Lord's sight. And hateful is the ruin I mean to bring on thee, sweeping away every trace of thee; every male of Achab's house shall die, be he bondman or free man in the realm of Israel. No better shall thy race fare than Jeroboam's, that was son of Nabat, or Baasa's, that was son of Ahia; thou too hast earned my displeasure, thou too hast taught Israel to sin. And of Jezebel the Lord said, Here, in the purlieus of Jezrahel, the dogs shall have Jezebel for their food. As for Achab, die he in the city, he shall be food for the dogs, die he in the open country, he shall be food for all the birds of heaven.

Never was such another as Achab, that gave himself up to doings hateful in the Lord's sight, his wife Jezebel prompting him; very foully he did, in paying worship to the false gods of those Amorrhites whom the Lord dispossessed to make room for Israel. Yet Achab, when he heard Elias' warning, tore his garments and clothed himself in sackcloth, fasted and made sackcloth his bed, and went ever with head bowed, till the Lord sent this word to Elias the Thesbite: Achab, as thou seest, humbles his pride before me. Humbled for my sake, he shall have this reward; the doom shall not fall in his days. I will wait till his son is on the throne, and then bring calamity upon all his race.

22 The peace between Syria and Israel lasted three years. In the third year, during a visit from king Josaphat, of Juda, the king of Israel said to his courtiers, Here is Ramoth-Galaad, a city (as you all know) that belongs to us; and yet we leave it in the king of Syria's hands! Then he turned to Josaphat and asked, Shall I have thy aid in attacking Ramoth-Galaad? Why, said he, thou and I are at one; my army, my horses, they are all thine. But Josaphat would have Achab consult the Lord first. So Achab sent for his prophets, some four hundred in number, and asked whether he should attack Ramoth-Galaad or let it be? Go to the attack, they said; the Lord means to make the king's grace master of it. But still Josaphat asked whether there was no prophet of the Lord to be found, so that they could make enquiry through him.¹ Why yes, the king of Israel told him, there is one man through whom we might ask for the Lord's counsel, Michaeas the son of Jemla, yet is he no friend of mine; still he will be prophesying that ill fortune is to befall me, never good. Nay, my lord king, said Josaphat, think better of it. So Achab summoned one of his chamberlains, and bade him fetch Michaeas the son of Jemla with all speed.

There sat the king of Israel and Josaphat king of Juda, each on his throne, in all their royal state, in an open space by the gate of Samaria; and there in their presence all the prophets said their say. One of them, Sedecias the son of Chanaana, had provided himself with a pair of horns fashioned in iron; With these, he said, thou shalt toss Syria about, till thou hast made an end of it. And all the prophets had the same word for him; Go and attack Ramoth-Galaad, they told him, and a blessing on thy journey! The Lord means to make the king's grace master of it. So the messenger who went to summon Michaeas told him, Here are all the prophets bidding the king good speed, like one man; do thou join thy voice to theirs, and prophesy good fortune. Nay, said Michaeas, as the Lord is a living God, the word I speak shall be the word he gives me.

So he came into the king's presence, and when he was asked whether it were better to attack Ramoth-Galaad, or to let it be, he answered, Go to the attack, and a blessing on thy journey! The Lord means to make the king's grace master of it.¹ What! cried Achab, must I never cease adjuring thee in the Lord's name to tell me only the truth? Listen then, said he; I had a vision of all Israel as sheep, that strayed because they had no shepherd, and the Lord's word came, They have no master now; let them disperse to their home in peace. (It is as I told thee, Achab said to Josaphat; still he prophesies ill fortune, never good.) Then Michaeas went on, Here is a message to thee from the Lord. I had a vision of the Lord sitting on his throne, with all the host of heaven waiting on his pleasure, to right and left. And the Lord said, Who is to beguile Achab, king of Israel, so that he will march to Ramoth-Galaad, and there meet his fall? One said this, one that; till at last a spirit came forward and stood in the Lord's presence, offering to beguile Achab. And how wilt thou beguile him? the Lord asked. I will go abroad, said he, and on the lips of all his prophets I will make myself an influence to deceive. Deceive them thou shalt, the Lord said, and have thy way with them; go abroad, then, and carry out thy errand. And now, see what a lying influence the Lord has spread among these prophets of thine! For indeed the Lord has determined on thy ruin.

At that, Sedecias son of Chanaana went up and gave Michaeas a blow on the cheek; Has the spirit of the Lord passed me by, he asked, and spoken to none but thee?² And Michaeas only answered, Thou shalt live to see the day when thou must needs take refuge in an inner room, to hide there.³ Then the king of Israel said, Take Michaeas hence, and put him in the charge of Amon, the city governor, and of Joas, son of Amelech. And give them this royal command of mine, that they are to imprison him, and give him scant allowance of food and drink till I come back safe and sound. Come thou back safe and sound, Michaeas said, and mine was no message from the Lord. Witness my words, all you that stand here!

So the king of Israel, and Josaphat king of Juda, marched out to attack Ramoth-Galaad. And Achab would have Josaphat go to battle in full armour and all his royal array, while he himself went to battle in disguise. Meanwhile, to all the thirty-two commanders who now marshalled his chariots, the king of Syria had given the same orders: Press for no other mark, high or low, but the king of Israel himself. And these, upon sight of Josaphat, supposed that they had the king of Israel here; it was against him, then, that they directed their onslaught; but when he cried aloud, they knew that this was not the king of Israel, and so let him be. It was an archer who bent his bow and let fly a shaft at hazard that gave Achab a chance wound; it fell between lungs and gullet, and Achab bade his charioteer wheel about, and carry him away from the fight, so grievous his wound was. All that day the battle raged, and still the king of Israel stood upright in his chariot, facing the Syrians, and did not die till evening, though the blood from his wound flowed ever into the body of his chariot. Then, before sunset, a herald raised a cry all through the ranks, bidding every man return to his own region and city. So the king died, and was carried back to Samaria, where they buried him; and there the dogs licked his blood, for they washed his chariot and his chariot-reins in the pool at Samaria; and so the threat which the Lord had uttered was fulfilled.⁴

¹ It is generally thought that Michaeas' first answer was given in an ironical tone, and understood by Achab in that sense. ² According to the Hebrew text, Sedecias asks, "Which way did the spirit of the Lord go?" according to the Septuagint Greek, "What spirit of the Lord was this?" ³ "Thou shalt live to see the day"; or possibly, "thou shalt see (the answer to thy question) on the day". ⁴ "And his chariot-reins"; the traditional rendering of the Hebrew text is, "And they washed his armour"; but it is possible to understand the words as meaning "and the harlots washed in it". This latter sense is supported by the Septuagint Greek, which includes the same words above in 21. 19.

39 What else Achab did, all his history, and the record of the ivory palace he raised and the cities he built, is to be found in the 40 Annals of the kings of Israel. Achab, then, was laid to rest with his fathers, and the throne passed to his son Ochozias.

41 This Josaphat, son of Asa, had become king of Juda in the fourth year of Achab; 42 he was thirty-five years old when he came to the throne, and his reign in Jerusalem lasted twenty-five years. His mother's 43 name was Azuba, daughter of Salai. He followed the example of his father Asa, and never swerved aside from the Lord's will; 44 though indeed he did not abolish the hillshrines; men still offered sacrifice and in-45 cense on the mountain-tops. With the king of Israel, he lived on terms of peace. What 46 else Josaphat did, the record of his high exploits and of the battles he fought, is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Juda.
47 He it was that rid the land of all the shrine-48 prostitutes his father Asa had left. Since there was no king in Edom at this time to bar his way, Josaphat would build a fleet 49 in the southern sea to sail out and fetch gold from Ophir, but sail they might not, for they were all wrecked, there at Asion-Gaber. (Achab's son Ochozias had re- 50 quested at this time that mariners from his own country might sail with Josaphat's, but Josaphat would not consent.) So Josa- 51 phat was laid to rest with his fathers, with the Keep of his ancestor David for his resting-place, and the throne passed to his son Joram.

Ochozias, son of Achab, was crowned 52 king of Israel at Samaria in the seventeenth year of Josaphat, and his reign over Israel lasted two years. He defied the Lord's 53 will, following the example of his own father and mother, and of Jeroboam, that taught Israel to sin. To Baal's service he 54 gave himself and Baal's worship, and earned, as his father had earned, the displeasure of the Lord God of Israel.

THE FOURTH BOOK OF KINGS

IT was after Achab's death that the Moabites threw off their allegiance to Israel.

It went ill with Ochozias; he had a fall from the window of his upper room at Samaria. And he sent messengers to consult Beelzebub, the god they worship at Accaron, whether he might hope to recover from his sickness. But an angel of the Lord bade Elias go to meet these messengers from Samaria on their way, and ask them, Has Israel no God of its own, that you should go and consult Beelzebub, the god of Accaron? Here, then, is the Lord's message to Ochozias, Never shalt thou leave the bed thou liest on; thou art doomed to die. So Elias went on his errand; and Ochozias' messengers returned to their master. When he asked why they had returned, they told him how one had met them and bidden them go back to the king who sent them; of the Lord's message, too, that rebuked him for sending to consult Beelzebub, god of Accaron, as if Israel had no God of its own, and doomed him to die where he lay. Then he would know what was the look of the man who had met them and so spoken. A shaggy fellow, they told him, with a skin girt about his loins. And he said, It was Elias the Thesbite.

Thereupon the king sent a captain at the head of fifty men to find him. And this captain, climbing the mountain on which the prophet then dwelt, bade him come down in the king's name. If prophet I am, Elias answered, let fire come down from heaven to consume thee and thy men with thee; and with that, came fire from heaven, and he and his fifty were consumed. So the king sent another captain with fifty men more, and he too would have the prophet come down in the king's name. If prophet I am, said he, let fire come down from heaven to consume thee and thy men with thee; and once more, captain and men were consumed by fire. But when a third captain was sent out with his men, he came and knelt before Elias in entreaty; My lord prophet, he said, have some regard to my life, and the lives of these that follow me. Two other captains from heaven has consumed, and fifty men with either of them; on my life, I pray thee, have pity.

Then the angel of the Lord said to Elias, Go down with them; thou hast nothing to fear. So he set out to accompany the man into the royal presence. And he told the king, Thou, who hast sent to consult Beelzebub, Accaron's god, as though God in Israel there were none, shalt never leave the bed thou liest on; thou art doomed to die. And die he did, as Elias had foretold in the Lord's name, with never a son to follow him; the throne passed to his brother Joram. This was in the second year of Josaphat's son, Joram, king of Juda. What else Ochozias did, all his history, is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Israel.

2 And now the time had come when the Lord would have Elias carried up by a whirlwind into heaven. Elias was but then leaving Galgal, with Eliseus in his company; and he said to Eliseus, Pray stay on here awhile; the Lord has an errand for me at Bethel. As the Lord is a living God, said he, and thou a living soul, I will not part from thee. So together they journeyed to Bethel, where there was a school of prophets. And here the disciples greeted Eliseus by asking, Has it been made known to thee that the Lord means, this day, to carry off thy master? I, too, know it, he answered; say no more. Stay on here, Elias told him; the Lord has an errand for me at Jericho. As the Lord is a living God, said he, and thy soul a living soul, I will not part from thee. So together they reached Jericho, and here, too, the disciples of the prophets asked Eliseus whether he knew his master was to be carried away from him. I, too, know it, he answered; say no more. Here, too, Elias would have him stay on; for himself, the Lord had an errand for him at the Jordan; but still he said, As the Lord is a living God, and thy soul a living soul, I will not part from thee. So they went still in company; fifty of the prophets' disciples followed them, and stood watching, far away.

They came to a halt, those two, at Jordan bank. And there Elias, taking off his mantle and folding it together, struck the waters of Jordan with it. Whereupon they parted, this way and that, allowing those two to pass over dry-shod. When they had crossed, Elias said to Eliseus, Make what request of me thou wilt, before I am carried away from thee. And he answered, I would have a double portion of the spirit thou leavest behind thee.¹ It is no light request thou hast made, said he. If I am carried away in full view of thee, it means thy request is granted; if not, it is refused. And they were still going on, and talking as they went, when all at once, between them, a flaming chariot appeared, drawn by flaming horses, and Elias went up on a whirlwind into heaven. Eliseus watched it, crying out, My father, my father, Israel's chariot and charioteer! But now he had sight of him no longer. He caught at his own clothes, and tore them across; then he took up the mantle of Elias, that had fallen from him; and when he reached Jordan bank again, with this mantle that had fallen from Elias he struck the waters; but they did not part. Alas, cried he, where is he now, the God of Elias? With that, he struck the waters again, and they parted this way and that, for Eliseus to cross over.

When they saw that, the disciples from Jericho that stood watching cried out, The spirit Elias had has come down to rest on Eliseus! And so, meeting him, they fell down face to earth; Lord prophet, they said, we can muster fifty strong men of our company to go out and look for this master of thine; it may be the Spirit of the Lord has carried him off and left him on some hill-top or in some cleft of the valleys. He would not have them send, but they were urgent with him, till at last he relented and gave them leave. So the fifty men were sent, and for three days they searched in vain. When they came back (for he was still waiting at Jericho), all he said was, Did I not warn you not to send?

The citizens there had a complaint to bring before Eliseus; This city, my lord, has a fair site, as thou canst see for thyself, but the water is foul, and the soil barren. Bring me a new jar, said he, filled with salt. And when this was brought, he went out to the spring from which the water came and cast the salt in. Here, he said, is a promise the Lord makes to you: I have healed this water, it shall bring death and dearth no longer. And from that day to this the water has been pure, in fulfilment of Eliseus' promise.

Then he went back to Bethel, and as he climbed up along the road, he was mocked by some young boys from the city; Up with thee, bald-pate, they cried, up with thee, bald-pate! And he, turning to look, called down the Lord's curse on them. Thereupon, out came two bears from the forest, and forty-two of the boys were torn in pieces. From Bethel he went on to mount Carmel, and afterwards made his way back to Samaria.

3 It was in the eighteenth year of king Josaphat that Joram, son of Achab, began his reign over Israel at Samaria; it lasted twelve years. He too defied the Lord's will, but not so openly as his father and mother before him; the images his father had raised to Baal he abolished, but he clung to the sins of Jeroboam, that taught Israel to sin, and could not bring himself to leave them.

The king of Moab, Mesa, had great flocks in his possession, and used to pay a tribute of a hundred thousand lambs, and as many rams unshorn; but when Achab died, he renounced his agreement with the kings of Israel. Whereupon king Joram lost no time in marching out from Samaria, mustering his whole forces, and sending a message to Josaphat, king of Juda, bidding him come out and bear arms against the rebel king of Moab. I will march with thee, he answered; mine is thine, men and horses of mine are at thy disposal; what shall be our line of march? Through the desert of Edom, answered he; and march they did, the three kings of Israel, Juda and Edom, by so indirect a journey as took them seven days to accomplish, till the supply of water failed for man and beast. Alas, alas, the king of Israel cried, that the Lord should have gathered us here, kings three, to fall into the hands of Moab!

But Josaphat said, Is there no prophet of the Lord here, through whom we might win the divine favour? At that, one of Joram's men said, Eliseus the son of Saphat is close by, that was body-servant once to Elias. He is a man that has the power of the Lord with him, said Josaphat. So to Eliseus the three kings of Israel, Juda and Edom betook themselves. And thus he greeted the king of Israel, What makest thou with me? To those other prophets betake thyself, whom thy father and thy nother knew. Tell me this, said Joram; why has the Lord gathered us here, kings three, to fall into the hands of Moab? And Eliseus told him, As the Lord of hosts, the God I serve, is a living God, neither heed nor hearing thou shouldst have had from me, but for that reverence I bear for Josaphat, king of Juda. Bring a minstrel here. So a minstrel came, and while he played on his harp, the Spirit of the Lord came upon Eliseus, and he cried, A message from the Lord; Dig channels here, channels there, in this dry river-bed. Thus says the Lord, Never a sign shall there be of wind or rain, but this river-bed shall fill with water, for you and yours and for your beasts to drink. And the Lord will not be content with that; he means to give you victory over Moab. Every fortress and every cherished city of theirs you must overthrow, cut down every fruit-tree, stop up every well, strew all their best ploughland with boulders.

And so, next morning, at the time when sacrifice is offered, in came the water, flowing from Edom; water filled all the plain. And now the Moabites, who had heard that the kings were marching against them, called to arms every man that could wear a sword-belt, and stood ready to defend their frontier. They awoke that morning to find sunrise reflected in the water, so that it seemed, from their side of the valley, red as blood. Bloodshed! they cried; the kings have fallen out with one another and come to blows; men of Moab, there lies the spoil! So they made straight for the Israelite camp; where the Israelites stood to their arms and overpowered them, so that they turned to flee. And now the victors, with Moab at their mercy, overthrew the cities, smothered their best plough-land, every man throwing his stone, stopped up the wells, and cut down the fruit-trees. Only the City of Brick Walls was left, and even this, beleaguered by slingers, was in great part destroyed.

The king of Moab, seeing that his cause was lost, tried to break through, at the head of seven hundred warriors, and attack the king of Edom. When this would not serve, he took his own first-born son, the heir to the throne, and offered him up as a sacrifice on the walls. At this, great ruth came upon the men of Israel, so that they let him be, and went back to their own country.¹

4 There was a woman once that appealed to Eliseus for aid; her husband had been among the disciples of the prophets. Master, she said, thou knewest my husband for a faithful servant of thine, and one that feared the Lord. Now he is dead, and here is a creditor of mine that will come and take away my two sons, to be his bondsmen. What wouldst thou have me do for thee? asked Eliseus. How much hast thou by thee? My lord, she answered, I have nothing left in my house at all but a drop of oil to anoint myself with. Go then, said he, and borrow empty jars from all thy neighbours, and do not stint thyself. Then go home, and lock the door on thyself and thy two sons within; fill all these jars with the oil, and set them aside when they are full. So the woman went, and locked the door on herself and her two sons, and they began holding out the jars for her, while she filled them. When she had filled them, and, asking one of her sons for a fresh jar, was told that he had no more, the oil gave out. So she came and told her story to the servant of God, and he said, Go and sell the oil, and pay thy creditor;

¹ 'Great ruth came upon the men of Israel'; this is certainly the sense of the Septuagint Greek, and perhaps of the Latin. But the Hebrew text appears to say that anger was aroused against Israel: and the term used generally refers to divine anger. It seems not impossible that some words of the original story have dropped out.

8 At another time, Eliseus chanced to be passing through Sunam, and here there was a woman of rank that bade him to a meal, and would take no denial. He must needs go that way often, and ever this woman entertained him, till at last she said to her husband, I find him to be a servant of God, and a holy one, this man that passes 9 our way so often. It would be well if we kept a little room for his use, with bed and table and chair and lamp-stand in it, so that he may pass his time there whenever 10 he visits us. And so, one day, when he had turned in to this room of his, to rest there, she bade his servant Giezi fetch the woman of Sunam; and she, thus summoned, stood 11 awaiting his audience.¹ And Eliseus sent her, through his servant, this message, In all things thou hast bestowed thy constant care on us; what wouldst thou have me do for thee in return? Is there any business of thine, over which thou wouldst have me say a word for thee to the king, or to the commander of his army? And her answer was, Nay, my place is with my own folk.
12 And now, as he wondered what he could do for her, Giezi told him, No need to ask; she has no son, and her husband is an old man. So Eliseus would have her brought to him, and as she stood there in the doorway, When this time of year comes round again, he told her, at this very hour, live thou till then,² thou shalt conceive a son. Nay, my lord, she said, wouldst thou, a prophet, trifle thus with thy handmaid?
13 But at that very season of the year, and at the very time Eliseus had foretold, she conceived, and bore a son.

14 The child grew to boyhood, and one day, when he had gone out to be with his father where they were reaping the corn, he told his father, My head aches, my head aches sorely. His father bade one of the servants carry him back to his mother; carry him back he did, and brought him to his mother, and she nursed him on her lap 15 till noon came, but at noon he died. Thereupon she carried him up and laid him on the prophet's own bed, and shut the door on him; then went out and called her husband, and asked to have one of the servants with her, and an ass; she must go and see the prophet with all speed, and with all speed return. Why, said he, what means 16 this journey of thine? This is no feast of the new moon, no sabbath day. But she answered, Go I must. Then she saddled 17 the ass, and bade the servant lead on, and that in haste; let him lose no time over the journey, and wait ever on her bidding.

So out she went, and found the servant 18 of God on mount Carmel. And he, when he saw her approaching, said to his servant Giezi, That is the woman from Sunam; go to meet her, and ask her if all is well 19 with her, all well, too, with her husband and her son. All is well, she said; but when she reached the servant of God, there on the mountain, she clasped him by the knees. Giezi would have pulled her away, but the servant of God said, Let her alone; here is great anguish of spirit, and I none the wiser; the Lord told me nothing of it. Then she said, My lord, did I not ask to 20 have a son, imploring thee not to cheat me of my hopes? Whereupon he said to Giezi, Gird thyself, and take this staff of mine with thee; go at once, greeting none and returning no greeting by the way, till thou reachest the boy; and lay down my staff on his face. As thou livest, the woman 21 said, and servest a living Lord, I will not part from thee. So he rose up and went with her.

Giezi had gone on before him, and put 22 down the staff on the boy's face; but no sound came, no sign of life, so he went back to meet his master with the news, The boy did not stir. Then Eliseus went into the 23 house, where the boy lay dead in his bed; and there he shut himself in with the boy, and prayed to the Lord. So, rising from his prayer, he laid himself down on the 24 dead body, mouth to mouth, eyes to eyes, hands to hands, bending down close, till the boy's flesh grew warm. Then he went 25 away, and walked to the end of the house and back, and now when he mounted the bed and lay down, the boy yawned seven times, and opened his eyes. Then Eliseus 26 sent Giezi to fetch the woman of Sunam, and when she answered the summons, bade her take her son into her arms. So she 27 came up, and fell at his feet, bowing down to the earth; then she took up her son and went out, and Eliseus made his way to Galgal.

There was once a famine in the country, at a time when Eliseus had some of the young prophets staying with him. And he bade one of his servants put on the greatest pot they had, and cook broth for these disciples of his. The man who had gone out afield to gather wild herbs for them found a creeping plant in the woods, from which he filled his lap with wild gourds; and these, when he came home, he shredded into the pot of broth, never enquiring what they were. When the time came for his guests to have their meal, the broth was poured out; but no sooner had they tasted it than they cried out, Death it were, lord prophet, to taste this broth of thine; drink it they might not. Thereupon he would have some flour brought him; brought it was, and when he threw it into the pot and had broth poured out for the company, all bitterness had left it.

Once, too, a man came from Baal-Salisa, bringing with him twenty barley loaves, his first-fruit offering, and nothing besides except some fresh grain in his wallet. Eliseus would have a meal set before the company, and when his servant asked how this would suffice for a hundred mouths, he said again, Set it before the company for their meal; they shall eat, the Lord says, and leave some over. And when he set it before them, eat they did and leave they did; so the Lord's promise was fulfilled.

5 At this time the armies of the king of Syria were commanded by a certain Naaman; a great captain, high in his master's favour; brave, too, and a man of wealth, but a leper. Naaman's wife had a servant, a young Israelite maid that had been captured by Syrian freebooters; and this maid said to her mistress, If only my lord would betake himself to the prophet in Samaria! He would have cured him soon enough of his leprosy. Upon this, Naaman went to his master, and told him what the Israelite maid had said; and the king of Syria promised to send him with a letter to the king of Israel. So he set out with thirty talents of silver, and six thousand gold pieces, and ten suits of clothing. And the letter he carried to the king of Israel ran thus, Know by these presents that I am sending my servant Naaman to thee, to be cured of his leprosy. Upon reading this letter, the king of Israel tore his garments about him, and asked, Am I God, with power to kill men and bring them to life again, that he should send a leper to me to be cured? Mark well how eager he is to pick a quarrel with me!

But God's servant Eliseus, when he was told what ado the king of Israel had made over it, sent a message to him, Why rend those garments of thine? Send the man to me, and he shall learn that there is a prophet still left in Israel. So Naaman came with his horses and his chariots, and stood at the door of Eliseus' house; where Eliseus sent word out to him, Go and bathe seven times in the Jordan, if thou wouldst have health restored to thy flesh, and be clean. At this, Naaman was for going back home; Why, he said angrily, I thought he would come out to meet me, and stand here invoking the name of his God; that he would touch the sore with his hand, and cure me. Has not Damascus its rivers, Abana and Pharpar, such water as is not to be found in Israel? Why may I not bathe and find healing there? But, as he turned indignantly to go away, his servants came and pleaded with him; Good father, they said, if the prophet had enjoined some great task on thee, thou wouldst surely have performed it; all the more readily thou shouldst obey him when he says, Wash and thou shalt be clean. So down he went, and washed in the Jordan seven times, as the servant of God had bidden him. And with that, his flesh healed up, and became like the flesh of a little child, and he was clean. So, coming back with all his retinue, he stood there in the presence of God's servant; I have learned, he said, past doubt, that there is no God to be found in all the world, save here in Israel.

And now, he said, pray accept a gift from thy servant, to prove his gratitude! As the Lord I serve is a living God, Eliseus answered, I will accept nothing from thee; nor would any pleading bring him to consent. At last Naaman said, Have thy way, then, lord prophet, but grant me a gift instead. Let me take away with me part of the soil of Israel, as much as two mules can carry; my burnt-sacrifice, my offerings henceforward are for the Lord only, and for no alien god. Yet one fault pray the Lord to pardon in me thy servant. My master will still be going up to offer worship in the temple of Remmon, leaning on my arm for support. At such times, if I do reverence, as my master does reverence, in Remmon's temple, the Lord grant me his pardon! Go on thy way, said Eliseus, and peace go with thee. So there, on a spring day, they parted.¹

But to Giezi, the prophet's servant, the thought came, Here is this Syrian, this Naaman, with all his gifts, and my master has sent him away no poorer than he came. As the Lord is a living God, I mean to run after him and bring back some trifle with me. So after Naaman Giezi went; and Naaman, when he saw him running up, dismounted from his chariot and went to meet him; Is all well? he asked. All is well, said the other, but my master has sent me with a message to thee: Here are two young prophets but now come to visit me, from the hill-country of Ephraim; to these thou mayest well give a talent of silver, and two suits of clothing. Better two talents, Naaman said, and would take no denial. So two of his servants must shoulder a sack that held a talent of silver and a suit of clothes each of them, and carry these in front of Giezi. Evening had fallen when he reached home, took their load from them to lay it up in the house, and sent them away on their journey; then he went in to wait on his master. And when Eliseus asked whence he came, he said, Nay, my lord, I took no journey. What, said Eliseus, was not this heart of mine there to witness it, when yonder fellow turned back from his chariot to meet thee? And wouldst thou, at such a time, enrich thyself with a talent of silver here, a suit of clothes there, to buy thee oliveyard and vineyard, sheep and ox, man-servant and maid-servant? To thee, and to thy race for ever, Naaman's leprosy shall cling. And Giezi went out from his presence, a leper as white as snow.

6 There was a time when his disciples complained to Eliseus that they had no room to live there in his company; and they asked leave to take the road for Jordan, cut down, each of them, his load of timber from the forest, and build themselves a house there. Then, when he had given them leave, one of them said to him, Master, do thou come with us. Come with you I will said he, and bore them company. So they reached the Jordan, and began felling wood. It chanced that one of them, in felling a beam, let his axe-head fall into the river; and at that he cried aloud, Alas, alas, master! It was a borrowed axe, too! Where fell it? the prophet asked; and when the place was shewn to him, he cut a stick and threw it in there; whereupon the iron floated to the surface. It is there to thy hand, said he, and the disciple put out his hand and took it.

When the king of Syria went to battle with Israel, he would hold a council of war, and name some place where he would lay an ambush; and ever word came from Eliseus to the king of Israel, Beware how thou marchest by such and such a place; the Syrians are lying in wait there. Then the king of Israel would send and make sure of the place the prophet had told him of; and so he avoided danger, not once but many times. At this, the king of Syria's mind much misgave him; and at last he summoned his council and asked, was there no learning the name of this traitor that revealed his plans to the king of Israel? Whereupon one of his courtiers told him, Nay, my lord king, it is the Israelite prophet, Eliseus, that discloses to him the secrets of thy council-chamber. Why then, the king said, go and find out where he is, so that I can send and take him prisoner. And when news came that Eliseus was in Dothain, he sent horses and chariots and the pick of his army there, to surround the city at dead of night.

The prophet had a servant that was early abroad next day, and found the whole city beleaguered by armed men and horses and chariots; and as he brought the news, he cried out, Alas, alas, master, what shift will serve us now? Do not be afraid, said he; we have more on our side than they on theirs. Open his eyes, Lord, Eliseus prayed; give him clear sight. Thereupon the Lord opened the servant's eyes, and clear sight came to him; all at once he saw the whole mountain-side beset with flaming horses and chariots, there about Eliseus. Then, as the enemy closed in upon him, Eliseus prayed to the Lord anew, asking that this whole multitude might be smitten with blindness; and sightless the Lord smote them, at Eliseus' prayer. Eliseus would have it that they had taken the wrong road and reached the wrong city; Come with me, he said, and I will shew you the man you are looking for. So he led them to Samaria; and once they were there, he prayed anew, that their eyes might be opened, and clear sight given them. In Samaria, then, they found themselves, once their eyes were opened; and the king of Israel, upon sight of them, asked Eliseus, My father, shall I strike them down? Strike them down (said he) thou shalt not; they were not captured by sword or bow of thine, and wouldst thou slay them?¹ Set food and drink before them, and let them go home to their master. So a great banquet was made for them, and when they had eaten and drunk their fill, back to their master he sent them. And Israel was rid, for a while, of freebooters from Syria.

Some time after this, Benadad, king of Syria, mustered all his forces, and went to the siege of Samaria. And Samaria was famine-stricken; so long beleaguered, that men would pay eighty pieces of silver for an ass's head, or five for a pint of dove's droppings. And one day, as the king was making the round of the battlements, a woman cried out to him, Help me, my lord king! Help from the Lord is none, said he, and what means of help have I, in threshing-floor or wine-press? What wouldst thou have of me? And she told him, This woman who is with me bade me kill my son, to be food for us that day; hers should be our food the next. And then, my son's flesh already cooked and eaten, when I bade her kill hers next day, she kept him in hiding. Upon hearing this tale, the king tore his garments across; and as he made his way along the battlements the people, one and all, could see how his shirt underneath was of sackcloth. May the Lord punish me as I deserve, said he, and more than I deserve, if I leave Eliseus the son of Saphat a head on his body by night-fall!

So he sent a man on before him, to find Eliseus where he sat at home, in conclave with the elders of the people. To these, before ever the messenger reached him, Eliseus said, You must know that my head is in danger. The murderer is on his way, sent by the murderer's son. When he comes in, look to it that you keep the doorway barred; I hear his master's tread not far behind him. Even as he spoke to them thus, in came the messenger that had set out to find him. And this was the king's word, See what ruin the Lord has brought on me! Folly it were to expect relief from the Lord any longer.²

7 Thereupon Eliseus announced a message from the Lord; Thus says the Lord, by this time to-morrow a silver piece will be buying a peck of wheat, or two pecks of barley, in the market-place at the gate of Samaria. The king had one of his lords with him, to support him with his arm as he went; and this man mocked at the prophet's words. Perhaps the Lord means to open the flood-gates of heaven, said he; then it might be as thou sayest. And Eliseus answered, The sight of it thou shalt have, but not the eating of it.

Now turn we to four lepers, who were standing there in the open space round the city gate. They were saying to one another, This is no place to wait for death. Enter we the city, we starve; abide we here, we shall die none the less. Come, let us give ourselves up to the Syrian army; it may be they will spare our lives; if they kill us, it is but another form of death. So, when night fell, they ventured out, to make for the Syrian camp; and as they reached the edge of it, never a man was to be seen. That night, the Lord had made a noise heard in the camp of Syria like the stir of chariots and horses, and a great host of men; and the word went round, The Hethite chiefs, the Egyptians are upon us! The king of Israel has hired them to attack us! And with that the Syrians took to their heels,

¹ 'They were not captured by sword or bow of thine'; in the Hebrew text, 'Thy own sword and bow has captured them'. ² The situation is not altogether clear; it is generally supposed that Joram had repented of his oath, and came to recall the messenger from his purpose of murdering Eliseus. Some think that we should read 'king' instead of 'messenger' in verse 33, the two words being much alike in Hebrew.

and fled away in the darkness, leaving tents and horses and asses behind them, there in 8 the camp; fled for their lives. So these lepers, still at the very edge of the camp, went into one of the tents, ate and drank there, carried off silver and gold and clothing and went off to hide it; came back to another tent, plundered that too, and 9 hid away their plunder. Then one said to another, This is ill done; we are bearers of good news to-day. If we keep it secret, and wait till morning to spread it, that were shame to us. Back go we, and tell our tale in the king's court.

10 When they reached the city gate, and made it known how they had been to the Syrian camp, and found never a man there, only horses and asses that stood tethered, 11 beside pitched tents, the porters went off to the king's palace, and there spread the story about. The king himself rose, and held a midnight council. This is the trick, 12 said he, the Syrians are playing us; they know we are hard put to it by famine, and they think to lure us out by leaving their camp and hiding in the open country; so they hope to capture us alive, and make 13 their way into the city. But one of his counsellors said, There are still half a dozen horses left in the city; so few among so many of us; all the rest have been 14 slaughtered for food. Yet with these we may send out riders to report. So two horses were fetched, and on these men 15 were sent to search the camp of Syria. All the way to Jordan they followed in the enemy's track, and still all the road was strewn with garments and weapons which the Syrians had thrown away in the flight; and they brought back the report of it to the king.

16 So the whole city went out and plundered the Syrian camp; and it was a silver piece for a peck of wheat, a silver piece for two pecks of barley, as the Lord had fore-17 told. As for that courtier who had walked beside the king to support him, he was put in charge of the market-place; and such was the crowd at the gate entrance that he was trampled to death, as the servant of God had foretold when the king came to 18 visit him. It was nothing but truth Eliseus had told the king, By this time to-morrow a silver piece will be buying a peck of wheat, or two pecks of barley, in the market-place at the gate of Samaria. Perhaps the Lord means to open the flood-gates of heaven, this courtier said; then it might be as thou sayest. And Eliseus told him he should have the sight of it but not the eating of it; which prophecy was fulfilled in its turn, when he sat in the gateway there and the folk trampled him to death.

8 Now turn we to the mother of that boy whom Eliseus raised to life. Eliseus had said to her, Up, go on thy travels, thou and all thy household with thee, and there dwell where dwell thou canst; the Lord has a drought in store for us, which will fall upon this land for seven years together. She lost no time in carrying out the prophet's command, went abroad with all her household, and for a long time dwelt in the Philistine country; then, when the seven years were over, she came back from the Philistine country, and sought an audience with the king, to reclaim her house and lands. The king, at that very time, was in talk with Giezi, the prophet's servant, and had bidden him tell the story of all Eliseus' marvellous deeds; and Giezi was even then describing how the dead boy had been raised to life, when in came the boy's own mother, appealing to the king to restore her house and lands. My lord king, said Giezi, this is the very woman, and this is that son of hers, whom Eliseus restored to life. So the king, when he had questioned the woman and had the story from her, charged one of his own chamberlains to see that she came into her own, and recovered the revenues the lands had brought in ever since she left the country.

Eliseus was on a visit to Damascus when Benadad, king of Syria, fell sick. And when he heard that the servant of God was there, the king bade Hazael take gifts with him and go to meet the prophet; Bid him enquire of the Lord, he said, whether I shall recover from this sickness of mine or not. So Hazael went to meet him, and gifts went too, all the best Damascus had to offer, forty camels' burden of them. And when he had made his way to Eliseus' presence, and told how Benadad king of Syria had sent to know whether he would recover from his sickness, Eliseus said, Go and assure him of health restored; but for all that, the Lord has revealed to me that he is doomed to die. Hazael, as he stood there talking to him, was in great confusion, so that his face blushed red; but the servant of God fell a-weeping. Why weeps my lord? asked Hazael; and his answer was, I weep for all the calamity I know thou art to bring on the sons of Israel. Their cities thou wilt burn down, their young men thou wilt slay in battle; dash little children to the ground, and rip open the pregnant womb. Nay, said Hazael, not for a low-born wretch like thy servant here such great exploits as these! Thou art to be king of Syria, Eliseus answered; the Lord has revealed it to me. So he parted from Eliseus and went back to his master. What said Eliseus? asked he, and Hazael gave him the message that he should recover his health; but next day he took a piece of cloth, soaked it in water, and held it over Benadad's face till he was stifled; and thus he succeeded to the throne.

It was in the fifth year of Joram, Achab's son, king of Israel (and Josaphat, king of Juda), that Josaphat's son Joram became king of Juda;¹ he was thirty-two years old when he came to the throne, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted eight years. And he followed the example of the Israelite kings, just as Achab's line did; he himself had married a daughter of Achab's. So he defied the Lord's will; but the Lord would not bring ruin upon Juda; had he not promised his servant David to keep the lamp of his line unquenched for ever?² It was in Joram's days that the Edomites renounced their allegiance to Juda and set up a king of their own choice. Joram indeed attacked Seira with his whole force of chariots, and when the Edomites surrounded him, he broke through them with a night assault, broke through the commanders of the chariots and drove the foot-soldiers back to their tents; but Edom has never been subject to Juda from that day to this. Lobna, too, revolted at the same time. What else Joram did, all his history, is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Juda. So he was laid to rest with his fathers, and shared their burying-place in the Keep of David; and the throne passed to his son Ochozias.

This Ochozias, son of king Joram of Juda, came to the throne in the twelfth year of Achab's son Joram, king of Israel; he was twenty-two years old when he came to the throne, and he reigned at Jerusalem but one year; his mother was Athalia, descended from Amri, king of Israel. He, too, followed the example of Achab's line, and defied the Lord's will; to Achab's house he was close allied.² And with Joram, Achab's son, he went to fight against Hazael, king of Syria, at Ramoth-Galaad. Joram was wounded in this engagement with the Syrians, and went back to Jezrahel to recover his health. And when Joram, Achab's son, lay sick at Jezrahel, recovering from the wound he had received in fighting against Hazael at Ramoth-Galaad, Ochozias son of Joram king of Juda came there to visit him.

Thereupon the prophet Eliseus sent one of his disciples on an errand. Gird up thy tunic, said he, and make thy way to Ramoth-Galaad, with this phial of oil in thy hand. Once there, thou wilt find Jehu the son of Josaphat, son of Namsi, sitting among his brother-captains; bid him rise up, and take him with thee into an inner room. Then, holding up the phial of oil and pouring it out over his head, tell him, Thus says the Lord; herewith I anoint thee king of Israel. Then fling the door open and begone; I would not have thee linger there. So the young prophet made his way to Ramoth-Galaad, and, reaching it, found the captains of the army met in conclave. He asked to have speech with the commander; and when Jehu asked which of them all he meant, he said, With thee, my lord. Thereupon Jehu rose up, and went into the inner room; where the prophet forthwith poured the oil over his head. This is my message, said he, from the Lord God of Israel; Herewith I anoint thee king over Israel, the Lord's people. Thou art to overthrow the dynasty of King Achab that was thy master; so it is that I mean to take vengeance for all those

¹ The words printed in brackets are perhaps due to some fault in the text. Nor is it easy to see why king Joram of Juda came to the throne in the fifth year of his namesake, who had already been reigning seven years when Josaphat died (see III Kg. 22. 42; IV Kg. 3. 1), unless king Josaphat, two years before his own death, allowed his son the royal title. ² 'Close allied'; literally, 'son-in-law'. But he was already, it seems, descended from Amri (verse 26), so the word may have a more general significance.

8 prophets of mine, all those true servants of the Lord, that were slain by Jezabel. All Achab's race I mean to destroy, sparing no male issue of his, free man or bondman in the realm of Israel; it shall have no better fortune than the race of Jeroboam, son of Nabat, or the race of Baasa, son of Ahia. 10 As for Jezabel, she shall lie unburied in the purlieu of Jezrahel, for the dogs to eat. And with that he threw the door open, and was gone.

11 Is all well? Jehu's fellow officers asked, as he went back to them. What was this madman's errand? Know the man, said he, and you know his ranting talk. That will not serve, they answered; tell us what he said. Then he told them all that had passed, and how the Lord had assured him that he was the anointed king of Israel. 13 And they, without more ado, flung down their cloaks at his feet, to pay him all the honours of a throne; and loud the trumpets sounded to proclaim that Jehu was king.

14 Thus Jehu, son of Josaphat, son of Namsi, entered into a conspiracy against Joram. (Joram himself had been in command of the Israelite army that held Ramoth-Galaad against king Hazael of Syria, but had now gone to Jezrahel to recover from the wounds Hazael's men had given him.) As you love me, Jehu said, let no one make his escape from the city, or news of this will reach Jezrahel. Then he mounted his chariot and set out for Jezrahel, where Joram lay sick, with Ochozias, king of Juda, come to visit him. And now the watchman that stood on the tower of Jezrahel espied Jehu's company, and he cried out, I see a troop of men coming. So Joram would have a chariot sent out to meet them, with the message, Is all well? 18 But when the driver of the chariot met him, and asked, Is all peaceful? Jehu said, Talk not of peace;¹ pass on behind me and follow. And the watchman cried, The messenger reached them, but never returns. Then a second chariot was sent out; once more the king asked whether all was peaceful, and once more the answer was, Talk not of peace; pass on behind me and follow. So the watchman cried out, The messenger reached them, but never returns. And he who comes yonder drives as Jehu the son of Namsi drives; it is headlong speed with him.

Harness my chariot, said Joram. Harnessed it was, and side by side in their chariots these two kings went out, Joram king of Israel and Ochozias, king of Juda, to meet Jehu. And when they met him, it was on the land that once belonged to Naboth, the man of Jezrahel.

Joram greeted him by asking, Is all well, Jehu? And he answered, Can aught be well, so long as thy faithless mother Jezabel will be at her sorceries still? At that, Joram wheeled about and fled, crying aloud, Treason, Ochozias, treason! But Jehu grasped his bow and beat it; right between the shoulder-blades the arrow struck Joram, and pierced through his heart, and he fell down in his chariot where he stood. Then Jehu said to his squire Badacer, Take up his body, and throw it down on the land that was once Naboth the Jezrahelite's. I remember well, when thou and I were sitting in our chariot together, in attendance on his father Achab, how the Lord pronounced doom upon him: I swear that I will avenge the murder of Naboth and his children, that was done in my sight yesterday, avenge it on the very ground where thou standest. Take it up and cast it down there; let the Lord's word be fulfilled.

As for Ochozias, king of Juda, he fled at the sight, past the lodge of the royal garden; but Jehu followed, crying, Shoot him down too where he drives! And shoot him they did, on the hill where Gaver stands, by Jeblaam. He escaped at last to Maggedo, but there he died. On his own chariot his servants laid him down, and so bore him back to Jerusalem, to bury him where his fathers were buried, in David's Keep. It was during the eleventh year of Joram, Achab's son, king of Israel, that Ochozias held the throne of Juda.

Meanwhile, Jehu drove on to Jezrahel. As for Jezabel, when she heard of his coming, darken she must her eye-brows, and braid her hair; then she looked down from her window as Jehu passed the gate, crying out: Is all well? There was one Zambri, that murdered his master. Jehu looked up at the window, and asked who this was. Thereupon two or three of the eunuchs leaned out to greet him.¹ Throw her down, said he, and throw her down they did; blood spattered the wall, and the horses trampled her under foot. And he, going into the palace to eat and drink there, gave the word, Go find the accursed woman's body, and give it burial; she was a king's daughter. But when they went to bury her, nothing could they find but skull and feet and the tips of her fingers. When they went back to him with the news, he said, This is what the Lord foretold through his servant Elias the Thesbite. Jezebel, he said, shall be food for dogs in the purlieus of this city; in the purlieus of the city her corpse shall lie like dung on the ground, for the passers-by to wonder whether this is indeed Jezebel.

10 Over in Samaria, Achab had still seventy male descendants to his name. So Jehu dispatched a letter to the chiefs and elders there, and to those who had the young princes in their charge; these were the terms of it: Here is work to be done when this letter reaches you. You have the royal family among you; chariots and horses, strongholds and weapons of war, are at your disposal. Why then, you must pick out the likeliest among the princes, whichever enjoys your favour most, and put him on his father's throne; then take up arms in the royal cause, and do battle.

At this, they were thrown into consternation; here were two kings swept away by Jehu's onset, and what resistance could they hope to offer him? So all of them, guardians of the princes, chieftains and elders, sent word to Jehu, We are thy servants, awaiting thy commands; it is not for us to set up a king; do what is thy pleasure. And this was the second letter he sent them, If you are loyal lieges of mine, cut off the heads of the princes, and bring them to me at Jezrahel this time to-morrow. These leading men of the city had the seventy princes in their keeping, and when the letter reached them, they killed all seventy, and sent back their heads in baskets to Jehu at Jezrahel. He, when news came to him that the princes' heads had been brought there, would have them left in two heaps at the city gate till morning, then, at dawn, he went out and confronted the people. You are without bias, he said to them; tell me, if I conspired against my master, who is to blame for the death of all these?² You see for yourselves that no word of the Lord's curse upon the house of Achab has missed the mark; what the Lord prophesied through his servant Elias, he has here fulfilled. Then Jehu put to death all that was left of Achab's race in Jezrahel, with all that had been nobles, courtiers and priests in his reign, till no trace of him was left.

Then he made his way to Samaria; and when he reached the shepherds' lodging by the road side, he fell in with some of Ochozias' kindred, that had been king of Juda. And when he asked who they were, and they told him kinsmen of Ochozias, that were on their way to greet the sons and brothers of the king, he gave orders for their arrest. So they were seized as prisoners, forty-two of them in all, and their throats were cut over the pool by the shepherds' lodging; not one of them was left alive.

Passing on thence, he met Jonadab, son of Rechab, coming to greet him, and gave him welcome. Is thy heart true to me, he asked, as mine to thee? And when he learned that it was so, Give me thy hand, and lifted him up, by his outstretched hand, into the chariot. Come with me, he said, and witness my zeal in the Lord's cause. So, in his own chariot, he brought Jonadab to Samaria. And all of Achab's household that were left in Samaria he destroyed to a man, so fulfilling that curse which the Lord pronounced through Elias.

Next, Jehu called a general assembly of the people, and told them, It was but scant worship Achab paid to Baal; Jehu means to pay him greater worship yet. Summon me all Baal's prophets, all his worshippers,

¹ According to the Hebrew text, Jehu's question was, 'Who is with me? Who?'

² 'You are without bias'; the words would more naturally be rendered, 'You are innocent', but it is difficult to see how there could have been any question as to the innocence of the Jezrahelites in the events here described.

all his priests; at this great sacrifice I mean to offer Baal, none must be absent; it is death to the man whose place is found empty. All this was but a design Jehu had in hand, for destroying Baal's worshippers.

20 So he would have a solemn feast proclaimed in Baal's honour, and this summons of his went out all through the confines of Israel; all Baal's worshippers came in answer to it, not a man was left behind. And all made their way into Baal's temple,

22 till it was full from end to end. Then Jehu bade the wardrobe-keepers bring out garments for all Baal's votaries, and when 23 these had been brought, he and Jonadab the son of Rechab went into Baal's temple, and bade the worshippers look well to it that none of the Lord's servants were among them, only the followers of Baal.

24 And where they had entered, there was offering and burnt-sacrifice to be made. Without, Jehu had posted eighty men, telling them, If you let any of my quarry slip through your hands, it shall be life for

25 life. And now, when the burnt-sacrifice was done, he gave orders to his bodyguard and his officers to go in and make an end of them; not one must escape. So these, his bodyguard and his captains, put them to the sword. Then they went to the Keep of 26 Beth-baal,¹ and took out Baal's statue from the temple, to burn it, and crush it to pieces. As for Baal's temple, they pulled it down, and made it a house of easement, as it is to this day.

28 Thus Jehu abolished the worship of 29 Baal in Israel. Yet he would not forgo the sins of Jeroboam son of Nabat, that taught Israel to sin; at Bethel and at Dan the golden calves had their worship still. For thy zeal in doing my will, the Lord told him, for carrying out my just decrees against the line of Achab, I will let thy heirs keep the throne of Israel up to the

31 fourth generation; and still this Jehu was too careless to follow the law of Israel's God with his whole heart, by abandoning the sins of Jeroboam, that taught Israel to sin! It was in his days that the Lord began to grow weary of Israel; and Hazeal struck at all their frontiers, where these lay east of the Jordan, Galaad, and Gad, and

Ruben, and Manasses, and Aroer on the river Arnon, the whole territory of Galaad and Basan. What else Jehu did, all his history and the record of his great deeds, is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Israel. And at last he was laid to rest with his fathers at Samaria, and the throne passed to his son Joachaz; he had reigned over Israel, there in Samaria, for twenty-eight years.

11 Upon the death of Ochozias, his mother Athalia put all the princes of the royal house to death, except Ochozias' son Joas, who was saved by his aunt Josaba, daughter to king Joram. When the princes were slain, she stole him away, with his nurse, out of the bed-room, and kept him in hiding so that Athalia could not make away with him. For six whole years she kept him by her secretly in the Lord's house, while Athalia governed the country as queen. In the seventh year, Joiada sent for the commanders of the army and the royal bodyguard, took them into the temple and there made a compact with them, with the Lord's own house to be witness of their oath; then he shewed them the young prince. And with that, he gave them their directions. A third of your number, this sabbath day, will be keeping guard over the palace; some will be at the Sur gate, some at the gate by the armourers' lodging, and you have to guard, too, the house of Messa.² The other two thirds, that are relieved of duty that day, must come and keep guard over the king's person, in the Lord's house. Hedge him about well, with your swords drawn; do not let anyone enter the temple precincts with his life; wherever the king goes, attend him closely.

All the directions which the high priest Joiada gave them these commanders faithfully carried out; mustered their men, alike those who mounted guard and those who were relieved of duty on the sabbath, and presented themselves before Joiada, who supplied them with the spears and other weapons king David had bequeathed to the Lord's house; to right and to left of altar and temple stood armed men ready

¹ Literally, 'the citadel (or city) of the house of Baal', a turn of phrase to which it is hard to attach any significance.

² 'The house of Messa'; the meaning of this is quite uncertain, and the whole account, in the original, is somewhat obscure.

12 to protect the king. Then he brought the young prince out, and gave the royal crown and a copy of the law into his keeping. So was he crowned and anointed, while all clapped their hands and cried aloud, Long live the king! Meanwhile, the stir which the soldiers made in going about their errand reached the ears of Athalia; and she made her way into the temple, there where all the crowds were gathered, to find the king standing on a dais, as the king should, with singers and trumpeters at his side, while all the folk rejoiced, and the trumpets sounded. Well might she rend her clothes, and cry out, Treason, treason! Thereupon Joiada gave word to the commanders of the army that she must be taken out beyond the temple precincts, and if anyone tried to follow, he should be put to the sword; she must not be slain in the Lord's house, he told them. So they made her prisoner, and as she passed along the horse-way that leads to the palace, she was slain.

7 After this, Joiada would have a covenant made, that bound king and people to the Lord, as the Lord's own people; bound king and people to one another. And the whole populace went into Baal's temple, where they pulled down his altars and broke his images for good and all; they killed Mathan, too, Baal's priest, there at the altar. Then the high priest set guards over the Lord's temple, and presently he summoned the officers of the guard, with the Cerethite and Phelethite auxiliaries, and the whole populace with them; and together they brought the king back from the Lord's house, by way of the armourers' gate, into the palace, and he took his seat on the royal throne. All through the land were great rejoicings, and the city had rest, now that Athalia lay dead, there in the palace. Thus Joas came to his throne, a boy of seven years.

12 Joas began his reign in the seventh year of Jehu, and for forty years he reigned as king at Jerusalem. His mother's name was Sebia, a woman of Bersabee. As long as the high priest Joiada was his adviser, he obeyed the Lord's will; only he did not abolish the hill-shrines, men still sacrificed and burned incense on the mountain-tops.

1 This Joas made a proclamation to the priests; Here are gifts being brought to the temple all the while by pious folk that worship there, one paying a ransom for his life, another contributing as his devotion moves him. Such money the priests may take for their own, according to their rank; but they must be answerable for repairing the Lord's house, if they find anything that needs to be made good. The twenty-third year of King Joas came, and still the priests had done nothing to repair the temple. Whereupon king Joas summoned Joiada and the other priests; What means it, he asked, that you have not made good the temple's needs? Henceforth there must be no more taking money according to your rank; it must all be given up to the repairing of the temple. It was ordered, then, that the priests should no longer receive the gifts, and no longer be answerable for the repairs; instead, the high priest Joiada had a chest made, with a hole in the top of it, and put it close to the altar at the right hand side of the temple entrance; into this the priests who keep the door put all the money that was brought there.

Whenever the chest seemed to be over full, one of the king's secretaries betook himself to the temple, with the high priest, and together they emptied out and counted the money that was to be found there. This, when its value had been duly reckoned, they paid over to the master-builders, who distributed it to the carpenters and masons that worked in the Lord's house and carried out the repairs. The stone-cutters, too, must be paid, and wood and stone must be bought ready for fashioning. Thus the repairing of the Lord's house would not go short for the money which the work needed. The money was not to be used for making pitcher or fork, censer or trumpet, or any other piece of gold or silver ware for the Lord's house; all the offerings given to the temple were paid out to the workmen that were repairing the temple; nor was any account asked of those who handled this money and distributed it to the workmen, they were trusted with the handling of it. Meanwhile the fines paid for fault or wrong done were not put into the treasury, since these belonged to the priests as of right.

It was at this time that Hazael, king of Syria, marched on the town of Geth and took it by storm; then wheeled about and threatened to march on Jerusalem itself.

18 Nor might Joas preserve the city from attack, till he had collected all the offerings dedicated in the temple by himself, or by Josaphat, Joram and Ochozias, that were kings of Juda before him, all the silver, too, that was to be found there or in the royal palace, and sent them to Hazael, king of Syria. What else Joas did, all his history, is to be found in the Annals of the kings of 19 Juda. It was his own servants that set a conspiracy on foot against him, and slew him in the house at Mello, where the road 20 goes down to Sella; Josachar son of Semath and Jozabad son of Somer, his own attendants, gave him his death-blow. He was laid to rest with his fathers in the Keep of David, and the throne passed to his son Amasias.

13 It was in the twenty-third year of Joas, son of Ochozias, king of Juda, that Joachaz, Jehu's son, came to the throne of Israel, and reigned as king in 2 Samaria for seventeen years. He defied the Lord's will, following the sinful example of Jeroboam, son of Nabat, that taught Israel to sin, and never departing from it. 3 His anger thus provoked, the Lord left Israel at the mercy of Hazael, king of Syria, 4 and his son Benadad, without respite; till at last Joachaz besought the Lord's favour. (This prayer the Lord answered, seeing Israel hard pressed by the Syrian king's 5 inroads upon them; and he gave them a champion to set them free from the Syrian yoke. Then once more the men of Israel 6 could dwell in their old homes; but even so they did not forgo the sins of Jeroboam, son of Nabat, that taught Israel to sin; they 7 clung to them still, and still the forest-shrine had its place in Samaria.) In the time of Joachaz, nothing was left of the army but fifty horsemen, ten chariots, and ten thousand foot-soldiers; such havoc the king of Syria had made among them, sweeping them away like chaff on the 8 threshing-floor. What else Joachaz did, all his history, and the record of his great deeds, is to be found in the Annals of the 9 kings of Israel. He was laid to rest with his fathers, with Samaria for his burying-place, and the throne passed to his son Joas.

This Joas, the son of Joachaz, came to 10 the throne of Israel in the thirty-seventh year of Joas king of Juda; and his reign in Samaria lasted sixteen years. He defied 11 the Lord's will, and would not abandon the sins of Jeroboam, son of Nabat, that taught Israel to sin; he clung to them yet. 12 What else Joas did, all his history, and the record of his great deeds, and his war with Amasias king of Juda, is to be found in the 13 Annals of the kings of Israel. He was laid to rest with his fathers, and the throne passed to his son Jeroboam. (Joas was buried in Samaria, with the other Israelite kings.)

And now Eliseus lay sick in his mortal 14 illness, and Joas, who was then king of Israel, went to visit him; My father, my father, he said weeping, Israel's chariot and charioteer! Eliseus bade him fetch 15 bow and arrows, and when bow and arrows were brought, he would have the king of 16 Israel hold the bow in readiness. The bow was stretched, and Eliseus put his own hands over the king's hands; Now, said he, 17 open the window that looks east, and he opened it; Shoot, and he shot. Yonder shaft, Eliseus told him, betokens the divine deliverance, deliverance from the power of Syria. It is for thee to defeat the 18 Syrians utterly, there at Aphec. Then he would have Joas take up his arrows, and when he had done so, bade him shoot, there on the ground. Shoot he did three 19 times, and then held his hand. Whereupon the prophet said to him angrily, Five times thou shouldst have let fly, or six, or seven, to defeat the Syrians utterly; this signifies three defeats and no more.

In the year of Eliseus' death and burial, 20 the country was being ravaged by freebooters from Moab. Some of these ap- 21 pearing suddenly when a dead man was being carried out to his funeral, the bearers took fright, and threw the corpse into the first grave they could find; it was that of Eliseus. And no sooner had it touched the prophet's bones, than the dead man came to life again, and rose to his feet.

¹ The words in brackets may refer to some victories of Joachaz elsewhere unrecorded. But in view of verses 22-25 below, it seems more probable that the sacred author is anticipating events here, and the answer to Joachaz's prayer only came after his death.

22 All through the life-time of Joachaz, king Hazael of Syria had pressed Israel 23 hard; but now the Lord relented and came to their aid once more. Faithful to his covenant with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, he would not make an end of them and cast them off utterly as yet. So, when Hazael died, and his son Benadad succeeded him 24 as king of Syria, Joas was able to retake those cities which his father Joachaz had lost to Benadad's father Hazael, and by right of conquest; three times Joas was victorious, and restored the lost cities to Israel.

14 It was in the second year of Joas, son of Joachaz, king of Israel, that the throne of Joas, king of Juda, passed to his son Amasias. This Amasias was twenty-five years old when he came to the throne, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted twenty-nine years; his mother's name was Joadan, a woman of Jerusalem. He obeyed the Lord's will, not perfectly like his ancestor David, but in the manner of his father, king Joas; he too left the hill-shrines standing, so that men still sacrificed and burned 5 incense on the mountain-tops. Once he was king, he put his father's murderers to death, but spared their children, in obedience to the law of Moses; whose terms are, A father must not die for his son's guilt, or a son for his father's; no guilt but his own shall bring a man to death.¹ He also fought a battle against the Edomites in the Valley of the Salt-mines, killing ten thousand of them, and gaining possession of a rock-fortress, which he called by its present name of Jectehel.

8 Then he sent a challenge to Joas, son of Joachaz, son of Jehu, king of Israel; Come, let us have a trial of strength! And this answer Joas, king of Israel, sent to Amasias, king of Juda: Said Lebanon thistle to Lebanon cedar, Let my son have thy daughter to wife. But down came wild beasts from Lebanon forest, and all the thistle got was, he was trodden underfoot.
 10 Thou hast struck a shrewd blow at Edom, and now thy heart is puffed up with pride; keep thyself at home, content with the renown thou hast, do not invite disaster, to thy own and Juda's ruin. But Amasias would have his way, so these two kings, Joas of Israel and Amasias of Juda, met at a town in Juda called Bethsames; and there the men of Juda were routed by the Israelites, and scattered to their homes in flight. Thus Amasias, son of Joas, son of Ochozias, King of Juda, was captured by Joas king of Israel at Bethsames, and taken back to his own city of Jerusalem; where Joas made a gap in the walls four hundred cubits long, from the gate of Ephraim to the Corner gate, carried off all the gold and silver and other ware that was to be found in the temple or palace, took hostages besides, and made his way back to Samaria.

(What else Joas did, and the record of his great victory over Amasias king of Juda, is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Israel. He was laid to rest with his fathers, with Samaria for his burying-place, and the throne passed to his son Jeroboam.²) Amasias, son of the Joas that was king of Juda, survived Joachaz's son, Joas of Israel, by fifteen years; what else he did is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Juda. A conspiracy was made against him at Jerusalem, and when he escaped to Lachis they sent in pursuit of him and put him to death there; afterwards his body was brought back to Jerusalem in a horse-litter, and there buried with his fathers in David's Keep. Thereupon the whole people of Juda chose Azarias, a boy sixteen years old, to succeed his father Amasias; he it was carried out the designs of his dead father by fortifying the harbour of Aelath and restoring it to the possession of Juda.

It was in the fifteenth year of Amasias, son of king Joas of Juda, that Jeroboam, son of king Joas of Israel, began his reign in Samaria; it lasted forty-one years. He defied the Lord's will, and would not forgo the sins of Nabat's son Jeroboam, that taught Israel to sin. He it was restored to Israel its old territory, all the way from the pass of Emath in the North to the Dead Sea. So the Lord had foretold through a servant of his, the prophet Jonas, son of Amathi, from Geth-Opher: the Lord has not been blind to the affliction, past all endurance, that has fallen on Israel, bond-and 13 of chapter 13.

² Verses 15 and 16 have already appeared, with slight variations, as verses 12

man and free man alike perishing with none to succour them. So the Lord resolved not to let Israel's name vanish from the world; he would grant them redress through Jeroboam the son of Joas. What else Jeroboam did, all his history, and the record of his great deeds, how he fought and how he restored to Israel all of Damascus and Emath that once belonged to the Jewish kingdom, is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Israel.¹ So Jeroboam was laid to rest with his fathers, the royal race of Israel, and his throne passed to his son Zacharias.

15 It was in the twenty-seventh year of Jeroboam that Azarias succeeded his father Amasias on the throne of Juda. He was then sixteen years old, and for fifty years he reigned at Jerusalem; his mother's name was Jecheia, a woman of Jerusalem. He obeyed the Lord's will, following in all things the example of his father Amasias, but did not destroy the hill-shrines; men still sacrificed and burned incense on the mountain tops. On him the Lord's hand fell, and he ended his days as a leper, dwelling apart in a house of his own, while his son Joatham had charge of the palace, and heard the complaints of his subjects. What else Azarias did, all his history, is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Juda. So he was laid to rest with his fathers; among his ancestors, in the Keep of David, they buried him; and Joatham came to the throne.

It was in Azarias' thirty-eighth year that Jeroboam's son Zacharias began his reign in Samaria; it lasted six months. He defied the Lord's will, like his fathers before him, and would not forgo the sins of Jeroboam, son of Nabat, that taught Israel to sin. But soon a conspiracy was made against him by Sellum, son of Jabes, who attacked and killed him in the open street, and took the throne for himself.² What else Zacharias did is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Israel. Long before, in Jehu's time, the Lord had promised, Thy heirs shall keep the throne of Israel till the fourth generation; and so it proved. For one month this Sellum reigned as king at Samaria, in the thirty-ninth year of Azarias; then he was killed and superseded by Menahem, son of Gadi, who marched on Samaria from Thersa; what else Sellum did, all the history of his secret conspiracy, is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Israel. (From Thersa),³ Menahem brought destruction on Thapsa, and all its inhabitants, and all their country-side, because they would not open the gates to him; ripped up the wombs, too, of the women that were pregnant.

It was in Azarias' thirty-ninth year that Menahem, son of Gadi, began his reign of ten years at Samaria; he defied the Lord's will, and would not forgo the sins of Jeroboam, son of Nabat, that taught Israel to sin. All through his reign the country suffered invasion by Phul, king of Assyria, and Menahem paid him a thousand talents of silver, to win support for his claim to the throne. To find this tribute for the Assyrian king, Menahem imposed a tax of fifty silver pieces on all the rich and powerful men in his kingdom. Thus the Assyrian king was induced to go home and rid the country of his presence. What else Menahem did, all his history, is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Israel; he was laid to rest with his fathers, and succeeded by his son Phaceia. It was in the fiftieth year of Azarias that this Phaceia, son of Menahem, began his reign of two years at Samaria; he defied the Lord's will, and would not forgo the sins of Jeroboam, son of Nabat, that taught Israel to sin. A conspiracy was made against him by one of his own commanders, Phacee son of Romelia, who attacked and slew him in his castle keep (close by Argob and Arie), with fifty Galaadites, and so became king in his place.⁴ What else Phaceia did, all his history, is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Israel.

It was in the fifty-second year of Azarias that Phacee, son of Romelia, came to the ¹ 'The Jewish kingdom'; literally, 'Juda', but the sacred text seems to refer to the undivided kingdom of Solomon, not to the tribal area which was called 'Juda' after the separation of the two kingdoms under Roboam.

² 'In the open street'; the words used in the Hebrew text are of doubtful interpretation. The Septuagint interpreters seem to have rendered a text which read 'at Jeblaam'.

³ 'From Thersa' is a phrase difficult to explain, and perhaps corrupt; Thersa was to the north and east, Thapsa to the south and west, of Samaria.

throne at Samaria; he reigned over Israel twenty years, and defied the Lord's will, never forgoing the sins of Jeroboam, son of Nabat, that taught Israel to sin. During the reign of Phacee, the Assyrian king Theglath-Phalasar invaded Israel, taking Aion, Abel-Beth-Maacha, Janoe, Cedes and Asor, with Galaad and Galilee and the whole territory of Nephthali, and carrying off their inhabitants into Assyria. As for Phacee, he was caught unawares and slain by a conspirator, Osee son of Ela, who succeeded him on the throne in the twentieth year of Joatham, son of Ozias. What else Phacee did, all his history, is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Israel.

It was in the second year of Phacee, son of Romelia, that Joatham, son of Ozias, came to the throne of Juda. He was twenty-five years old when he came to the throne, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted sixteen years; his mother's name was Jerusa, daughter of Sadoc. He obeyed the Lord's will, following in all things the example of his father Ozias; but did not abolish the hill-shrines; men still sacrificed and offered incense on the mountain-tops. He it was built the high gate that leads into the Lord's house. What else Joatham did, all his history, is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Juda. This was the time at which the Lord began subjecting Juda to attack from Rasin, king of Syria, and Phacee, son of Romelia. So Joatham was laid to rest with his fathers, with the Keep of David for his burying-place, and the throne passed to his son Achaz.

16 It was in the seventeenth year of Phacee, son of Romelia, that Achaz, son of Joatham, came to the throne of Juda. He was twenty years old when he began his reign, which lasted at Jerusalem for sixteen years. This Achaz did not obey the Lord's will like his ancestor David before him; he followed the example of the Israelite kings, even consecrating his son by passage through the fire, after the idolatrous wont of those nations which the Lord drove out to make room for Israel.

Never a high hill or a mountain-slope or a leafy wood but Achaz must do sacrifice and offer incense there.

And now Rasin king of Syria and Phacee son of Romelia marched on Jerusalem and besieged Achaz there, but could not get the mastery of him. (It was then that Rasin recovered Ailam for Syria, by driving the men of Juda out from it; but the Edomites came and took possession of it, and it remains theirs to this day.) Thereupon Achaz sent a message to the Assyrian king, Theglath-Phalasar; Bring aid, master, to thy servant, father, to thy son; rescue me from the assault of Syria and Israel; gifts, too, he sent him, collecting all the silver and gold that was to be found in temple or palace. Nor was the king of Assyria unwilling; he marched on Damascus and laid it waste, carrying off the inhabitants to Cyrene and putting Rasin to death.²

When king Achaz went to meet Theglath-Phalasar at Damascus, he saw there an altar, of which he sent a likeness with a full account of all its workmanship, to the high priest Urias; and Urias built an altar in accordance with all the directions Achaz had sent him from Damascus, to greet his return. Returned from Damascus, Achaz went to see it and did reverence to it;³ then went up to make burnt-sacrifice and meal-offering; poured libations, and shed the blood of his welcome-offerings there. Then he removed the brazen altar, that stood ever in the Lord's presence opposite the tabernacle, away from its place between the new altar and the temple, to the north side of the new altar. And king Achaz bade the high priest Urias bring to this greater altar the morning burnt-sacrifice and the meal-offering at nightfall; here king and people would present burnt-sacrifice and meal-offering and libations, here the blood of the burnt-sacrifice and all other offerings was to be spilt; as for the altar of bronze, it should await the king's good pleasure. And the high priest Urias carried out all his bidding.

¹ Ailam is no doubt a mistake, in the copying of the Latin version, for Aelath (see 14. 22 above). ² But the Edomites came'; another tradition of the Hebrew text has 'And the Syrians came', the two names being much alike in Hebrew. But it seems more likely that we ought to read 'Edom' instead of 'Syria' in the earlier part of the verse; it is hard to see how Syria had any claim on a port lying in the Gulf of Akabah.

³ 'Cyrene' here is evidently some place in Assyria, 'Kir' in Hebrew. ³ 'And did reverence to it'; these words are not found in the Hebrew text, or in the Greek Septuagint.

17 King Achaz also took away the moulded stands and the smaller basins that rested on them; took away the oxen that supported the great basin and let it rest on a stone pavement instead; altered, too, the sabbath porch he had built in the temple, and the outer part of the royal entry.¹ Of all these changes in the temple building the king of Assyria was the cause.

19 What else Achaz did, all his history, is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Juda. So he was laid to rest with his fathers, with the Keep of David for his burying-place, and the throne passed to his son Ezechias.

17 It was in the twelfth year of Achaz that Osee, son of Ela, began his reign at Samaria; it lasted nine years. He too defied the Lord's will, yet not so wantonly as the other kings of Israel before him. This king was attacked by Salmanasar, king of the Assyrians, and made his vassal, and forced to pay tribute. Afterwards, the Assyrian king found out that he had sent an embassy to Sua, king of Egypt, hoping thus to rebel, and to be rid of his yearly tribute; whereupon he seized him, put him in chains, and imprisoned him. Then he overran the whole country with his troops, and marched against Samaria, which for three whole years he kept beleaguered. At last, in the ninth year of Osee, Samaria was taken, and all the Israelites carried off to the Assyrian country; where they were settled in Hala, in Habor, by the river of Gozan, and among the cities of Media.

7 Such was their doom, who had no sooner escaped from Egypt and from the power of Pharao, than they wronged the God who had rescued them by worshipping alien gods instead. Afterwards, they took their forms of worship from the very nations the Lord had driven out to make room for them, or from kings who imitated their ways. With false inventions these Israelites offended the Lord that was their own God, making themselves mountain shrines in all their townships from lonely hamlet to walled city.² No high hill, no leafy wood, but had its images and its sacred trees; and there they burnt incense on their altars, imitating the nations God had dispossessed before their onslaught. Foul deeds were done, to challenge the Lord's anger, shameless rites practised, such as the Lord had forbidden expressly.

The Lord did not leave himself without witness; by prophet and seer he warned them, Come back from these graceless ways, follow precept and observance of mine; as the law bids you, that I enjoined on your fathers; as the prophets bade you, my servants that spoke in my name. But they gave him never a hearing; strained at his yoke; they would be like their fathers, obstinately defying the Lord their God. The usages he had taught them, the covenant he had made with their fathers, the warnings he had given them by his prophets, all lightly cast aside, to false rites they betook themselves, and learned false ways; imitated the forbidden example of the heathen round about them. Forgotten, all the commandments of the Lord their God; they must have two golden calves, they must have sacred trees, they must worship all the host of heaven, and become Baal's servants; consecrate their sons and daughters by passage through the fire, take their orders from wizard and soothsayer; enslave themselves to defiance of the Lord's will, and provoke his vengeance. So it was that the Lord, in anger, banished Israel from his presence, and the tribe of Juda stood alone (not that even these kept the commandments of the Lord their God; these too strayed into false paths, of Israel's making). All Israel's race, then, the Lord cast off; humbled them, and left them at the spoiler's mercy; was ready, at last, to banish them from his presence altogether. So it was decreed, from the time when the Israelites first cut themselves off from David's line, and made Jeroboam, son of Nabat, their king; Jeroboam it was that drove men away from the Lord's worship, and taught them to commit heinous sin. To his evil example the men of Israel clung, and would never forgo it, until at last the Lord banished them from his presence, as all his prophets had foretold in his name, and they were carried off from their own country into Assyria, where they remain to this day.

¹ The word here translated 'porch' is of uncertain significance. It is not clear whether the alterations (no doubt all involving the removal of valuable metal) were made so as to provide further blackmail for the Assyrian king, or so as to prevent his eye falling on any valuable objects, if he should visit Jerusalem.

² 'Lonely hamlet'; literally, 'the tower of the watchmen'.

And now the Assyrian king brought men from Babylon, and Cutha, and Avah, and Emath, and Sepharvaim, and settled these, instead of the Israelites, in the cities that belonged to Samaria. So they took possession of it, and made their homes in its cities, but at their first coming they paid the Lord no reverence, and thereupon he sent a plague of lions, that preyed upon them. News of this came to the Assyrian king, and a warning with it: The nations thou hast removed, and settled down in the cities of Samaria, have never learned how the God of that land would be worshipped; and he, the Lord, has sent a plague of lions among them. Must they die for want of knowledge how their new God is to be worshipped? So the Assyrian king gave orders that one of the priests carried away thence should be restored to his home; should go to live among them, and teach them how to worship the Lord. So one of the exiled priests from Samaria came to live at Bethel, and teach them he did; but still each nation would fashion the image of its own god, and they set up these images in the hill-shrines they had made, one in this city and another in that. The men of Babylon must have Socoth-Benoth, and the Chutaeans Nergel, and the Emathites Asima, and the Hevites Nabahaz and Tharthac; while the men of Sepharvaim offered their own children to the gods of Sepharvaim, Adramelech and Anamelech.

And in spite of it, they worshipped the Lord. They found priests among the dregs of the people, fit to serve hill-shrines, and in the hill-shrines they installed them; but though they worshipped the Lord, they still paid court to their own gods with the usages of their own folk, learned before ever they came to Samaria. And so it is to this day; the old habits still cling. This is not to fear the Lord, this is not to keep observance and decree, law and command, as the sons of Jacob should; Jacob, to whom the Lord gave his name of Israel. With them he made a covenant; and by that covenant they were to give alien gods neither fear nor reverence, neither worship nor sacrifice. To the Lord your God, he told them, the God who rescued you from Egypt with such signal proofs of his constraining power, all fear, all worship, all sacrifice belongs; his the observances, his the decrees, his the law of tabled precepts, that you must keep ever in mind, obey ever in act; no alien god must you fear. Never let his covenant go unremembered; the worship you deny to alien gods give to him only; then he will deliver you from the power of your enemies. To all this they paid no heed; old custom was still the rule they lived by. Here then, were nations that worshipped the Lord, yet obeyed their own false gods still; their sons, their grandsons did no better; and such is the rule they follow down to this day.

18 In the third year of Osee, son of Ela, king Achaz of Juda was succeeded by his son Ezechias. This king was twenty-five years old when he came to the throne, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted twenty-nine years. Here was one that obeyed the Lord's will no less than his father David before him; scattered the hill-shrines, overthrew the images, cut down the sacred trees; broke in pieces, too, the brazen serpent Moses had made, because the Israelites, till his day, used to offer incense to it; the name given to it was Nohestan.¹ In the Lord God of Israel he put all his trust; never was a king of Juda to rival him before or after; in the paths the Lord had traced he followed still, holding ever close to him, keeping ever the commands he had given through Moses. What wonder if the Lord was with him, if he was well advised in all he did? Against the king of Assyria he rose in rebellion, and denied him tribute; and harried the Philistine townships as far as Gaza, from lonely hamlet to walled city.

It was in the fourth year of Ezechias, and the seventh year after Osee son of Ela came to the throne of Israel, that Salmanasar, king of Assyria, marched on Samaria and laid siege to it. And at the end of three years he took it; it was in the sixth year of Ezechias and the ninth of Osee that Samaria was captured, and all the Israelites carried off to Assyria, where they were settled in Hala and Habor by the streams of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes. And this, because they paid no heed to the Lord's bidding; false to his covenant, they left the commands he had given through his servant Moses unheard and unheeded.

13 Then, in the fourteenth year of Ezechias, the Assyrian king Sennacherib marched on the fortified cities of Juda and took them; whereupon king Ezechias sent word to the king of Assyria, then at Lachis: I have been to blame; withdraw thy troops, and I will pay whatever ransom thou dost demand. So the king of Assyria imposed on Ezechias king of Juda a tribute of three hundred talents of silver, and three hundred of gold. All the silver that was to be found in temple or treasury Ezechias gave him; broke up, too, the temple doors, with the golden plates he himself had nailed to them, and gave these to the king of Assyria.

17 After this the Assyrian king, who was still at Lachis, sent Tharthan, Rabsaris and Rabsaces at the head of a strong force to Jerusalem, where king Ezechias was. They marched up to the city, and halted by the aqueduct that fed the upper pool, on the way that brings you to the Fuller's Field. Their demand was to see the king, but they were met by Eliacim, son of Helcias, the controller of the royal household, and Sobna, the secretary, and Joahe, son of Asaph, the recorder. So Rabsaces bade them tell Ezechias, Here is a message to thee from the great king, the king of Assyria. What confidence is this that makes thee so bold? Doubtless thou hast some design, in so committing thyself to the fortune of war. On whose help dost thou rely, that thou wouldst throw off my allegiance? What, wilt thou rely on Egypt? That is to support thyself on a broken staff of cane, that will splinter and run into a man's hand, if he presses on it, and pierce him through; such does Pharao, king of Egypt, prove himself to all those who rely on him. Or wilt thou answer, We trust, I and my people, in the Lord our God? Tell me, who is he? Is he not the God whose hill-shrines and altars Ezechias has cleared away, bidding Juda and Jerusalem worship at one altar here? Come now, if thou wert to make terms with my master, the king of Assyria, by which I must hand over to thee two thousand horses, wouldst thou be able to do thy part by putting riders on them? Why, thou art no match even for a city prefect, the least of my master's servants. Trust, if thou wilt, in Egypt, its chariots and its horsemen; but dost thou doubt that I have the Lord's warrant to subdue this land? It was the Lord himself who sent word to me, Make war on this land, and subdue it.

At this, Eliacim and Sobna and Joahe said to Rabsaces, My lord, pray talk to us in Syriac; we know it well. Do not talk to us in the Hebrew language, while all these folk are standing on the walls within hearing. What, said Rabsaces, dost thou think my master hath sent me with this message for thee only, and for that master of thine? It is for the folk who man the walls, these companions of yours that have nothing left to eat or drink but the ventings of their own bodies. Then Rabsaces stood up and cried aloud, in Hebrew, Here is a message to you from the great king, the king of Assyria! This is the king's warning, Do not be deluded by Ezechias, he is powerless to save you; do not let Ezechias put you off by telling you to trust in the Lord; that the Lord is certain to bring you aid, he cannot allow the king of Assyria to become master of your city. No, do not listen to Ezechias; here are the terms the king of Assyria offers you. Earn my good will by surrendering to me, and you shall live unmolested, to each the fruit of his own vine and fig-tree, to each the water from his own cistern.¹ Then, when I come back, I will transplant you into a land like your own, which will grudge you neither wheat nor wine, so rich is it in corn-fields and vineyards, neither olives, nor oil, nor honey, and you will be spared from the destruction that threatens you. No, do not listen to Ezechias when he tells you that the Lord will deliver you. What of other nations? Were their countries delivered, by this god or that, when the king of Assyria threatened them? What gods had Emath and Arphad, what gods had Sepharvaim, Ana and Ava? Did any power rescue Samaria from my attack? Which of all the gods in the world has delivered his country when I threatened it, that you should trust in the Lord's deliverance, when I threaten Jerusalem?

¹ Verses 17-31 of this chapter are to be found, with slight variations, in the prophecy of Isaias (chapter 36).

- 36 But all kept silence, and gave him no word in answer; the king had given strict orders that they were not to answer him.
- 37 So Eliacim, son of Helcias, the controller of the royal household, and Sobna, the secretary, and Joahe, son of Asaph, the recorder, went back to Ezechias, with their garments torn about them, to let him know what Rabsaces had said.

19 No sooner had king Ezechias heard it, than he tore his garments open, and put on sackcloth, and went into the house of the Lord. Meanwhile, he sent word to the prophet Isaias, son of Amos. Eliacim, the controller of the household, and Sobna, the secretary, and some of the older priests, went on this errand. Here is a message for thee, they said, from Ezechias. Troublous times have come upon us, times to make us mend our ways, or else blaspheme God. What remedy, when children come to the birth, and the mother has no strength to bear them? Unless indeed the Lord should take cognizance of what Rabsaces has been saying, Rabsaces, who was sent here by his master, the king of Assyria, to blaspheme the living God. Surely the Lord thy God has listened to the reproaches he uttered. Raise thy voice, then, in prayer for the poor remnant that is left.

- 5 Thus visited by the servants of Ezechias,
- 6 Isaias answered, Give your master this message. Do not be dismayed, the Lord says, at hearing the blasphemies which the courtiers of the Assyrian king have uttered against me. See if I do not put him in such a mind, see if I do not make him hear such news, as will send him back to his own country. And when he reaches his own country, I will give the word, and the sword shall make an end of him.

- 8 And now Rabsaces went back to find the king of the Assyrians before Lobna, hearing that he had raised the siege of Lachis.
- 9 News had come that Taracha, king of the Ethiopians, was on the way to do battle with him. And the king, as he went out to meet Taracha, despatched messengers to
- 10 Ezechias; Give this warning, he said, to Ezechias, king of Juda, Do not let the God in whom thou puttest such confidence deceive thee with false hopes; do not think Jerusalem will never be allowed to fall into the hands of the Assyrian king. What, hast thou not heard what the kings of Assyria have done to the nations everywhere, destroying them utterly? And what hope hast thou of deliverance? What saving power had the gods of those old peoples my fathers overthrew, Gozam, and Haram, and Repheth, and the race of Eden who lived in Thalassar? Where are they, the kings of Emath, and Arphad, the kings who governed the city of Sepharvaim, and Ana, and Ava?

These despatches were handed by the messengers to Ezechias, and when he had read them, he went up into the house of the Lord, and held them out open in the Lord's presence. And this was the prayer which Ezechias made to him, Lord God of Israel, who hast thy throne above the cherubim, thou alone art God over all the kingdoms of the world, heaven and earth are of thy fashioning. Give ear, and listen; open thy eyes, Lord, and see; do not let Sennacherib's words go unheard, these blasphemies he has uttered against the living God. It is true, Lord, that the kings of Assyria have brought ruin on whole nations, and the lands they lived in, and thrown their gods into the fire; but these were in truth no gods; men had made them, of wood or stone, and men could break them. Now it is for thee, O Lord our God, to rescue us from the invader, and shew all the kingdoms of the world that there is no other Lord, no other God, save thee.

Then Isaias, son of Amos, sent word to Ezechias, A message to thee from the Lord, the God of Israel, granting the prayer thou hast made to him about Sennacherib, king of the Assyrians. This is what the Lord has to say of him: See how she mocks thee, flouts thee, Sion, the virgin city! Jerusalem, proud maiden, follows thee with her eyes and tosses her head in scorn. So thou wouldst hurl insults, and blaspheme, and talk boastfully, and brave it out with disdainful looks, against whom? Against the Holy One of Israel. In thy name, these servants of thine have hurled insults at the Lord. It was thy dream that thou hadst scaled, with those many chariots of thine, the slopes of Lebanon; thou hadst cut down its tall cedars, its noble fir-trees, till thou couldst reach the very summit of its ascent, the garden its woods enclosed. Thou wouldst dig wells and drink wherever it pleased thee, thou wouldst dry up, in thy march, the banked channels of the Nile.

24 What, hast thou not heard how I dealt with this people in time past? This present design, too, is one I have formed long since, and am now carrying out; such a design as brings with it ruin for the mountain fastnesses, the walled cities that fight against thee. Sure enough, they were overawed and discomfited, the puny garrisons that held them, frail as meadow grass, or the stalks that grow on the housetop, withering before they can ripen. But I am watching thee where thou dwellest, thy comings and goings and journeyings, thy raving talk against me. Yes, I have listened to the ravings of thy pride against me, and now a ring for thy nose, a twitch of the bridle in thy mouth, and back thou goest by the way thou didst come.

25 Here is a test for thee, Ezechias, of the truth of my prophecy; this year thou must be content with what crops are left thee, and next year the aftergrowth shall be thy food; in the third year you may sow and reap, plant vineyards and eat the fruit of them. A remnant of Juda's race will be saved, and this remnant will strike root deep in earth, bear fruit high in air; yes, it is from Jerusalem the remnant will come, from mount Sion that we shall win salvation; so tenderly he loves us, the Lord of hosts. This, then, is what the Lord has to tell thee about the king of the Assyrians; he shall never enter this city, or shoot an arrow into it; no shield-protected host shall storm it, no earth-works shall be cast up around it. He will go back by the way he came, and never enter into this city, the Lord says; I will keep guard over this city and deliver it, for my own honour and for the honour of my servant David.

26 It was after this that an angel of the Lord went out on his errand, and smote down a hundred and eighty-five thousand men in the Assyrian camp; when morning came, and he saw the corpses of the dead, the king broke up camp and was gone. So

Sennacherib, king of the Assyrians, made his way home, nor did he leave Nineve again. And one day, when he was at worship in the temple of his god Nosroch, two sons of his, Adramelech and Sarasar, drew their swords on him, and so escaped into the land of Ararat; and the throne passed to his son Asarhaddon.¹

20 And now Ezechias fell sick, and was at death's door; indeed, the prophet Isaias, son of Amos, visited him with this message from the Lord, Put thy affairs in order; it is death that awaits thee, not recovery. At this Ezechias turned his face towards the wall, and prayed to the Lord thus: Remember, Lord, I entreat thee, a life that has kept true to thee, an innocent heart; how I did ever what was thy will. And Ezechias wept bitterly. Whereupon, before ever Isaias reached the middle of the court-yard, the word of the Lord came to him, Go back, and tell Ezechias, the ruler of my people, Here is a message to thee from the Lord, the God of thy father David. I have listened to thy prayer, and marked thy tears; be it so, I have granted thee recovery. Within three days thou shalt be on thy way to the Lord's temple, and I will add fifteen years to thy life. And I will save thee and thy city from the power of the Assyrian king; I will be its protector, for my own honour and the honour of my servant David. Then Isaias bade them bring a lump of figs, and when this was brought and laid on the king's ulcer, he recovered. When Ezechias asked what sign should be given him that his health would be restored, and that he would set foot in the Lord's temple within three days, Isaias told him, Here is thy proof that the Lord will keep his promise. Wouldst thou have the shadow on the sundial climb forward by ten hours, or travel backwards as much? Why, said he, it were no great matter that it should advance ten hours; rather, by my way of it, let it travel ten hours backwards. So the prophet Isaias made appeal to the Lord, and the shadow retraced the last ten hours it had advanced on the sun-dial of Achaz.²

And now, hearing of his sickness, the king of Babylon, Berodach Baladan, son of Baladan, sent a letter and gifts to Ezechias. Ezechias was delighted at the coming of these envoys, and shewed them his scented treasure-house, with its gold and silver and spices and rich ointments; the rooms where his ornaments were kept; all the wealth of his store-house. There was nothing in palace or domain but he shewed it to them. Then the prophet Isaias gained audience of king Ezechias, and asked him, What message did these men bring, and whence had they come? They came to see me, said Ezechias, from a country that is far away, from Babylon. And when Isaias asked what they had seen in his palace, he told them, They saw everything in my palace; I have no treasures I did not shew them. And at that Isaias said to Ezechias, I have a message for thy hearing from the Lord. Behold, a time is coming when all that is in thy house, all the treasures which thy fathers have amassed there in times past, will be taken away to Babylon; nothing shall be left of it, the Lord says. And sons of thine, men of thy own line, of thy own stock, shall be carried off to be eunuchs in the palace of the kings of Babylon. Why then, Ezechias said to Isaias, welcome be the word the Lord has spoken through thee! In my time at least may there be peace; may the promise hold good.¹

What else Ezechias did, the record of his great deeds, and of the pool and conduit by which he stored water in Jerusalem, is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Juda. So Ezechias was laid to rest with his fathers, and the throne passed to his son Manasses.

21 Manasses was twelve years old when he came to the throne, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted fifty-five years; his mother's name was Haphsiba. This Manasses defied the Lord's will, by courting the false gods of those nations which the Lord destroyed to make room for the sons of Israel. He restored once again the hill-shrines which his father Ezechias had overthrown; he raised altars to Baal, and set up sacred trees, like Achab king of Israel, and gave to all the host of heaven worship and observance. Nay, he must set up these altars of his in the Lord's own house, the chosen shrine of his name; altars there must be for all the host of heaven in the two temple courts. He consecrated his own son by passing him through the fire; there was watching for auguries and taking of omens, there was divination, and sorcerers abounded, until this defiance of his provoked the Lord's anger. He made an idol, too, after the fashion of the sacred trees, and set it up there in the Lord's temple. And this was at Jerusalem, the Lord's choice among all the cities of Israel; this was in the temple that was to be the everlasting shrine of his name; so he had promised David and Solomon, Nevermore will I let the sons of Israel be dislodged from the land I gave their fathers, if only they will be true to all the observances I have enjoined, all the commands which my servant Moses taught them. That warning went unheeded; the very nations which the Lord destroyed to make room for the sons of Israel were guilty of less wrong than they themselves did, when they were led astray by the example of Manasses.

Thereupon word came from the Lord through his servants the prophets: King Manasses of Juda shall not go unpunished for these deeds of his, more detestable yet than any the Amorrites did before him; by which foul example Juda has become no less guilty than Israel. This warning, then, the Lord God of Israel sends him: I mean to bring such calamity upon Jerusalem and Juda as shall ring in the ears of all who hear it. Level with Samaria shall Jerusalem lie, lean in ruin as the house of Achab leans; I mean to efface Jerusalem as a wax tablet is effaced, scraping it over and over with pen downwards turned.² I mean to abandon this poor remnant of the people that once was mine, and let them fall into the hands of their enemies, so that every rival of theirs can lay their land waste and plunder it; since the day when their race

² The first part of the verse means literally, 'I will spread out over Jerusalem the line of Samaria, and the plummet of the house of Achab'. In the second half, the Latin version probably intends an allusion to the Roman custom of using the blunt end of the pen to erase the characters on a wax tablet. The Hebrew text is commonly interpreted as meaning that God will scrape Jerusalem clean, and turn it upside down, like an unused vessel.

left Egypt, they have never ceased defying me and provoking my anger.

- 16 And Manasses, not content with leading Juda into all these sins of disobedience, took innocent lives without number, till all 17 Jerusalem was brimming with blood. What else Manasses did, his history, and the record of his crimes, is to be found in the 18 Annals of the kings of Juda. So Manasses was laid to rest with his fathers, within the domains of his own palace, in Oza's garden, and the kingdom passed to his son Amon.
19 Amon was twenty-two years old when he came to the throne, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted two years; his mother's name was Messalemeth, daughter of Harus 20 of Jeteba. He disobeyed the Lord's will, 21 like his father Manasses before him; never a path his father had marked out but he must follow it, never a shameful cult his father had honoured but he must be its 22 slave; but the Lord, the God his ancestors had worshipped, he forsook utterly, and 23 followed his bidding never. Then there was a conspiracy among the courtiers, and 24 the king was slain in his own palace; but these conspirators were overthrown by a rising of the common people, who crowned 25 Amon's son Josias to succeed him. What else Amon did, is to be found in the Annals 26 of the kings of Juda. So they buried him in the tomb he had made for himself, in Oza's garden, and his son Josias came to the throne.

- 22 Josias was eight years old when he came to the throne, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted thirty-one years; his mother's name was Idida, the daughter of 2 Hadaia of Besecath. He was obedient to the Lord's will, and followed in all things the example of his ancestor, king David, never swerving to right or left.
3 In the eighteenth year of his reign, Josias had an errand for the controller of the temple, Saphan, son of Aslia, son of 4 Messula. He was to bid the high priest Helcias reckon up the sum collected by the temple door-keepers for the needs of the 5 Lord's house, and pay it out to the workmen through the temple overseers. Pay must be given to these workmen, engaged 6 on making good the temple fabric, carpenters, masons, and builders alike; there was timber to be bought, too, and stone from the quarries, before the Lord's temple could be repaired. No account 7 need be kept of these expenses; the overseers could be trusted with full disposal of the money. It was then that the high priest 8 Helcias told Saphan he had found, there in the temple, a copy of the law, which he gave him to read. And Saphan, going back 9 to the king with news of his errand, to report that the temple offerings had been reckoned up and paid over to the temple overseers, for distribution to the workmen, added that he had a book which the high 10 priest Helcias had given him.

This book, then, Saphan read out in the royal presence; and the king, upon hearing 11 the terms of the Lord's law, rent his garments about him. Then he gave his orders 12 to Helcias, and Ahicam son of Saphan, and Achobor son of Micha, and Saphan the controller of the temple, and Asaia, one of his courtiers; Go and consult the Lord, he 13 told them, in my name, and in the name of this whole people of Juda, about this new-found copy of the law. Fiercely the Lord's anger burns against us, that the words of this book should have fallen on deaf ears, and our race should have disobeyed the commands enjoined upon us.
So Helcias, Ahicam, Achobor, Saphan and 14 Asaia betook themselves to the prophetess Holda. She was wife to Sellum, son of Thecua, son of Araas, that once kept the royal wardrobe; her dwelling was at Jerusalem, in the new part of the city. So they 15 told her their business, and she, in return, gave them this message from the Lord God of Israel for the man that sent them: Thus 16 says the Lord, For this city and its citizens I have punishments in store, all the punishments threatened in yonder book the king of Juda has read. The men of Juda have 17 forsaken me, and offered sacrifice to alien gods; all they do is done in defiance of me;
the fire of my vengeance must needs break out against this city, and there is no quenching it. But to the king of Juda, who 18 sent you here to consult the Lord, give this message from the Lord God of Israel: Well for thee thou didst listen to the warnings this book gave thee! Well for 19 thee that fear caught at thy heart, and thou didst humble thyself before the Lord, at hearing him threaten city and citizens with despair and doom; that thou didst rend thy garments, and hadst recourse to me in tears! And thou hast won my audience, the Lord says; I will lay thee to rest with thy fathers, in quiet times thou shalt go to thy grave; not for thy eyes to witness the great calamities I mean to bring on this city of thine.

23 When they brought the king his answer, he summoned all the elders of Juda and of Jerusalem; then he went up into the Lord's temple, and all the warriors of Juda bore him company, and all the citizens of Jerusalem, priest and prophet, high and low. There, in their hearing, he read out the terms of the law from the book they had found in the Lord's house. And the king, standing on the dais, made a promise, there in the Lord's presence. They would make the Lord their leader, holding fast by command and decree and observance of his, heart and soul, with fresh loyalty to all the terms of the covenant which this book set on record. To that promise, the whole people gave its assent.

Then the king bade the high priest Helcias, and the priests of lesser rank, and the door-keepers, cast out from the Lord's temple all the appurtenances of worship that belonged to Baal and to the sacred tree and to all the host of heaven; these he burned in the valley of Cedron, and carried the ashes of them away to Bethel. All round Jerusalem, and all over Juda, he disbanded the priests whom the kings of Juda had appointed for the hill-shrines; priests, too, that burned incense to Baal, and sun, and moon, and the twelve stars, and all the host of heaven. The sacred tree must be carried away from the temple, away from Jerusalem, to Cedron valley, where they burned it to ashes, that were scattered over the common burying-ground. He destroyed the rooms in the Lord's house which had belonged to the prostitutes, and were now used by the women that wove curtains for the sacred tree. He brought the priests together from all the cities of Juda, and defiled the hill-shrines where they used to sacrifice, all the way from Gabaa to Bersabee; pulled down, too, the wayside altars at the approach to the gate of Josue, the city governor, to the left of the main gate. As for these priests of the hill-shrines, they were not allowed to minister at the Lord's altar at Jerusalem, but they shared the eating of the unleavened bread with their brother-priests. Tophet, in the valley of Ben-Ennom, he desecrated utterly, so that there might be no more devoting sons and daughters by fire to Moloch; and he rid the temple of those horses, sacred to the sun, which earlier kings had stabled at the entrance, by the hall of the chamberlain Nathan-Melech; the chariots of the sun he burned to ashes. There were altars, too, that had been set up by royal command on the roof of Achaz's dining-parlour; altars Manasses had built in the two outer courts of the temple; these Josias beat into dust, and made short work of it in the valley of Cedron.¹ He also desecrated the hill-shrines Solomon had made at Jerusalem itself, on the right hand side of the Hill of Shame, for Astaroath, the foul divinity of Sidon, and Chamos, that was Moab's, and Melchom, that was Ammon's; he broke their images, and cut down the sacred trees, and filled up the ruins with the bones of dead men.

In Bethel, too, there was an altar and a hill-shrine, the work of Jeroboam, son of Nabat, that taught Israel to sin; altar and shrine both Josias overthrew and burned and pounded to dust, setting fire at the same time to the sacred trees. And when he looked about him; and saw the hill-side covered with graves, he had bones fetched from these and burned them on the altar, just as the prophet had threatened in the Lord's name when he foretold all this. And now, seeing an inscription, he asked what this was; Why, the men of Bethel answered, it is the tomb of the prophet who came from Juda, and foretold how thou wouldst profane the altar here. Let him alone, then, said Josias; no one must touch these bones; so they rested on undisturbed, and with them the bones of that other prophet, that was Israelite born.²

² vs. 15-18; see III K. 13. 2. 'That was Israelite born', literally 'that came from Samaria'. The old prophet lived in Bethel, and the reference to Samaria is probably meant to imply that he belonged to Israel, not to Juda.

19 All the hill-shrines in the cities that once belonged to Samaria, raised by kings of Israel in the Lord's despite, Josias abolished, treating them as he had treated the shrine at Bethel; and the priests that served these altars he put to death, one and all. Then, having profaned the altars by burning men's bones on them, he returned to Jerusalem.

21 And now he bade all his subjects keep paschal holiday in honour of the Lord their God, with all the rites prescribed by the covenant which the book recorded. Many a judge had ruled, many a king had reigned in Israel and Juda, but never was pasch kept like that pasch Jerusalem kept in the Lord's honour, in the eighteenth year of Josias. Gone were the familiar spirits, the diviners, the images, gone were all the foul abominations of Juda and Jerusalem; Josias swept them all away; since Helcias had found the book in the Lord's temple he had no thought but to carry out the law's prescriptions in full. Never was there such a king as this; none before or after him came back to the Lord's allegiance, heart and soul and strength, as he did, with the law of Moses to guide him. Yet the Lord would not relent, so deep his indignation, so pitiless his anger against the men of Juda, after all Manasses' defiance of him; he was determined to banish Juda, no less than Israel, from his presence; to forsake his chosen city, Jerusalem, and the house in which he had promised to make a shrine for his name.

28 What else Josias did, all his history, is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Juda. It was in his time that Pharaoh-Nechao, king of Egypt, marched against the king of Assyria, all the way to the river Euphrates; and Josias, going out to offer resistance, encountered him at Mageddo and met his death there. From Mageddo, his servants carried his body back to Jerusalem, and buried it in the tomb he had made for himself; and now the people's choice fell on his son Joachaz, who was anointed to succeed his father as king.

31 Joachaz was twenty-three years old when he came to the throne, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted but three months; his mother's name was Amital, daughter of Jeremias of Lobna. This Joachaz disobeyed the Lord's will, after the fashion of his ancestors; but he did not reign at Jerusalem long. Pharaoh-Nechao kept him imprisoned at Rebla, in the Emath country; meanwhile he levied a fine from Juda, a hundred talents of silver and a talent of gold, and put Josias' son Eliacim on his father's throne, changing his name to Joakim. Joachaz was carried off to Egypt, where he died. The fine Pharaoh-Nechao had imposed was paid by Joakim, who levied a tax on the whole country; thus it was the citizens, each according to his means, that must satisfy Pharaoh-Nechao with gold and silver alike. Joakim was twenty-five years old when he came to the throne, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted eleven years; his mother's name was Zebida, daughter of Phadaia of Ruma. He, too, disobeyed the Lord's will, after the fashion of his ancestors.

24 In his time, Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon invaded the country, and for three years Joakim was his vassal; then he rebelled against him. But the Lord sent enemies to attack him, freebooters from Chaldaea, Syria, Moab and Ammon; sent them to attack Juda and lay it waste, in fulfilment of the threat which his servants the prophets had uttered in his name. It was by the Lord's own decree that this befell; he would banish Juda from his presence, in return for all Manasses' sins; and for all those innocent lives taken, in the days when Jerusalem ran with guiltless blood till the Lord refused to pardon it. What else Joakim did, all his history, is to be found in the Annals of the kings of Juda. So Joakim was laid to rest with his fathers, and the throne passed to his son Joachin. Meanwhile, the king of Egypt advanced no more beyond his own frontiers; all the possessions he held, from the brook of Egypt right up to the river Euphrates, the king of Babylon had taken away from him.

Joachin was eighteen years old when he came to the throne, and his reign in Jerusalem lasted but three months; his mother's name was Nohesta, daughter of Elnathan of Jerusalem. He disobeyed the Lord's will no less than his father before him. It was in his time that the forces of Nabuchodonosor, king of Babylon, marched against Jerusalem, and siege was laid to the city; and Nabuchodonosor came there in person to be with them, and to press on the siege. Whereupon Joachin, king of Juda, gave himself up, with his mother, his servants, his nobles, and his chamberlains; and the king of Babylon, in this, the eighth year of his reign, accepted the surrender. All the treasures of temple and palace he took away, and cut in pieces all the golden ornaments Solomon, king of Israel, had set up in the temple, so fulfilling what the Lord had prophesied.¹ All the citizens of Jerusalem he carried off as prisoners, the noblemen, and the best warriors in the army, ten thousand of them, the craftsmen and the smiths; none were left except the poor folk in the country-side. To Babylon Joachin must go, with his mother and his wives and his chamberlains; for Babylon all the judges in the land must leave Jerusalem as exiles; to Babylon Nabuchodonosor removed seven thousand warriors, and a thousand craftsmen and smiths, all that had strength to bear arms. In place of Joachin, he made his uncle Matthanias king, giving him the name of Sedecias.

Sedecias was twenty-one years old when he came to the throne, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted eleven years; his mother's name was Amital, daughter of Jeremias of Lobna. He disobeyed the Lord's will, as Joakim had; for now the Lord's anger hung over Juda and Jerusalem, ready to banish them from his presence. And Sedecias in his turn revolted against the king of Babylon.

25 And now, in the ninth year of Sedecias' reign, on the tenth day of the twelfth month, Nabuchodonosor reached Jerusalem at the head of his army. They surrounded it and threw up siege-works about it; and so the city continued, cut off and hedged in, until king Sedecias' eleventh year. Then, on the ninth day of the fourth month,² when famine had broken out in the city, and the poorer folk had nothing left to eat, a breach was made in the walls; and that night all the fighting men made their escape by way of the gate between the two walls, by the royal garden, leaving the Chaldaeans to continue the siege of the city. The road Sedecias chose for his flight was that which leads to the desert plain; and in the plain by Jericho he was overtaken by the Chaldaeans, who had set out in pursuit. All his army melted away from him, leaving him alone; and so, a prisoner, the king was borne away to Reblatha, where Nabuchodonosor passed sentence on him. He made him witness the death of his sons; then put out his eyes and carried him off in chains to Babylon.

On the fifth day of the seventh month in the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor's reign, the commander of his forces, Nabuzardan, came on his master's errand to Jerusalem, where he burned down temple and palace and private dwellings too; no house of note but he set it on fire. The troops he brought with him were employed in dismantling the walls on every side of it. Then Nabuzardan carried off the remnants of the people that were left in the city, the deserters who had gone over to Nabuchodonosor, and the common folk generally, leaving only such of the poorer sort as were vine-dressers and farm labourers. Brazen pillars and brazen stands and the great basin of bronze that stood in the Lord's temple the Chaldaeans broke up, and took away all the bronze to Babylon; for bronze, too, they carried away pot and ladle, cup and fork and saucer, all the appurtenances of worship that were of bronze; for gold, too, and for silver, bowl and censer of gold and silver; nothing did Nabuzardan leave behind him. There was no reckoning the weight of bronze, when the two pillars, the great basin, and the stands which Solomon had set up in the temple are included; each pillar was eighteen cubits high, and had a capital of three cubits' height resting on it, with the net-work and pomegranate mouldings on the capital all of bronze.

Prisoners, too, Nabuzardan carried away with him, the two chief priests, Saraias and Sophonias, the three door-keepers from the temple, and among the citizens, the chamberlain who commanded the army, five other courtiers who were still left in the city, Sopher, the army leader who had the levying of recruits, and sixty citizens of the common sort. All these were carried away by Nabuzardan to Reblatha, into Nabuchodonosor's presence; and there at Reblatha, in the Emath country, Nabuchodonosor put them to death. So the men of Juda were exiled from their country, and over the few he left remaining there the king of Babylon put Godolias, son of Ahicam, son of Saphan, in charge. When they heard of his appointment, the chieftains came to meet him at Maspha, Ismael son of Nathanias, Johanan son of Caree, Saraiais son of Thanehumeth from Netopha, and Jezonias son of Maachati, and all their men with them; and Godolias took an oath to chiefs and men alike. They need have no fear of living under Chaldaean rule; let them remain in the country as the king of Babylon's vassals, and all should go well with them. None the less in the seventh month this Ismael, son of Nathanias, son of Elisama, who was of the royal blood, came to Maspha with twelve of his followers and gave Godolias his death-blow; killed, too, all his retinue, Jew and Chaldee alike. Whereupon all the inhabitants of the country, high and low, and the chieftains with them, removed to Egypt, fearing the vengeance of the Chaldaeans.

On the twenty-seventh day of the twelfth month, in the thirty-seventh year after king Joachin of Juda had been carried into exile, he was released from prison by Evil-Merodach, king of Babylon, then in the first year of his reign. Graciously did Evil-Merodach receive him, gave him a seat of honour above the other captive kings, and relieved him of his prisoner's garb. All the rest of his life he was entertained at the royal table; all the rest of his life he received, day by day, a perpetual allowance made to him by the king's bounty.¹

THE FIRST BOOK OF PARALIPOMENA

FROM Adam, through Seth, Enos, 2 Cainan, Malaleel, Jared, Henoch, 4 Mathusale, Lamech, and Noe came 5 Sem, Cham and Japheth. From Japheth came Gomer, Magog, Madai, 6 Javan, Thubal, Mosoch and Thiras; from Gomer, Ascenez, Riphath and Thogorma;
7 from Javan, Elisa and Tharsis, the Cethim 3 and the Dodanim. From Cham, Chus, 9 Mesraim, Phut and Chanaan; from Chus, Saba, Hevila, Sabatha, Regma and Sabathacha; from Regma, Saba and Dadan.
10 (Chus, too, was the father of Nemrod, who 11 was the first great warrior.) From Mes-raim came the Ludim, the Anamim, the 12 Laabim and the Nephthuim, the Phetru-sim, too, and the Chasluim (from whom 13 the Philistines sprang), and the Caph-torim. Chanaan was the father of Sidon; 14 this was his first-born son. From him, too, 15 come Hethites, Jebusites, Amorrhites, Gergesites, Hevites, Aracites, Sinites, 16 Aradians, Samarites and Hamathites.

From Sem came Aelam, Assur, Arphaxad, Lud, Aram, Hus, Hul, Gether and Mosoch; Arphaxad was the father of Sale, 17 Sale of Heber, who had two sons; one was called Phaleg, Division, because in his 18 time the territory was divided up, and his brother's name was Jectan. This Jectan was the father of Elmodad, Saleph, Asarmoth, Jare, Adoram, Huzal, Decla, Hebal, 19 Abimael, Saba, Ophir, Hevila and Jobab; all these were Jectan's sons.¹

From Sem, through Arphaxad, Sale, Heber, Phaleg, Ragau, Serug, Nachor and Thare, came Abram, who is the same as Abraham.² And Abraham had two sons, Isaac and Ismahel. These had issue as follows.

Ismahel's first-born was Nabaioth; his other sons were Cedar, Adbeel, Mabsam, Masma, Duma, Massa, Hadad, Thema, 20 Jetur, Naphis, Cedma; all these were sons of Ismahel.³ (Abraham begot other sons 32 by his concubine Cetura, Zamran, Jecsan, Madan, Madian, Jesboc and Suë. From Jecsan came Saba, and Dadan who was the ancestor of the Assurim, Latussim and Laomim; from Madian Epha, Epher, He-33 noch, Abida and Eldaa; all these are descended from Cetura.⁴) Abraham's 34 other son Isaac was father of Esau and Israel.

Esau was father of Eliphaz, Rahuel, 35 Jehu, Ihelom and Core; Eliphaz of 36 Theman, Omar, Sephi, Gatham, Cenez, Thamna and Amalec; Rahuel of Nahath, 37 Zara, Samma and Meza.⁵ (It was Seir that 38 was father of Lotan, Sobal, Sebeon, Ana, Dison, Eser and Disan. Lotan had a sister 39 called Thamna, and his sons were Hori and Homam. From Sobal came Alian, 40 Manahath, Ebal, Sephi and Onam; from Sebeon Aia, and Ana that had a son called Dison; from Dison Hamram, Eseban, 41 Jethran and Charan; from Eser Balaan, 42 Zavan and Jacan; from Disan Hus and Aran.)

There were kings ruling in the Edomite 43 country before the Israelites had kings of their own; these are their names; Bale the son of Beor reigned in Denaba, and after 44 his death Jobab, son of Zare, from Bosra, who was succeeded by Husam from the 45 Themanite country; his successor was 46 Adad, son of Badad, who defeated Madian in the territory of Moab; he ruled at Avith.
Adad was succeeded by Semla from Mas-47 reca, and Semla by Saul from Rohoboth on its river, and Saul by Balanan son of 48 Achobor, and Achobor by Adad who ruled 50 at Phau; his wife's name was Meëtabel, daughter of Matred, who was daughter of Mezaab.

After Adad's death there were chiefs-51 tains in Edom instead of kings; Thamna, Alva, Jetheth, Oölibama, Ela, Phinon,

³ vv. 28-31, cf. Gen. 25. 13-15.

⁴ vv. 32-33, cf. Gen. 25. 2-4.

⁵ The ancestry of Seir is not given; in Gen. 36. 20 it seems to be implied that the Seirites were native to the land, the Edomites new-comers.

53 Cenez, Theman, Mabsar, Magdiel and Hiram; these were the chieftains of Edom.¹

2 The sons of Israel were Ruben, Simeon, Levi, Juda, Issachar, Zabulon, Dan, Joseph, Benjamin, Nephthali, 3 Gad and Aser. Juda had three sons by the Chanaanitess Suë, Her, Onan and Sela; Her, his first-born, displeased the Lord by 4 his evil life, and the Lord slew him. Then Juda had two more sons by his own daughter-in-law Thamar, Phares and Zara; so he was father of five sons in all. 5 From Phares came Hesron and Hamul, 6 from Zara Zamri, Ethan, Heman, Chalcol 7 and Dara, five in all...² From Charmi came Achar, who brought trouble on Israel by his sin in stealing the plunder that was 8 forfeit. From Ethan came Azarias, from 9 Hesron, Jerameel, Ram and Calubi; from Ram, Aminadab, and from Aminadab Nahasson, that was chieftain of the tribe 11 of Juda. From Nahasson came Salmon, from Salmon, Booz, from Booz, Obed, and from Obed, Jesse.

13 The name of Jesse's first-born was Eliab; the second son was called Abinadab, 14 the third Simmaa, the fourth Nathanael, the fifth Raddai, the sixth Asom; and 15 David was the seventh. They had two sisters, Sarvia and Abigail; Sarvia was the mother of three sons, Abisai, Joab and 17 Asael, and Abigail bore Amasa to Jether the Ismahelite.

18 (From Hesron's son Caleb, through Azuba and Jerioth, came Jaser, Sobab and 19 Ardon. On Azuba's death Caleb married 20 Ephratha and begot Hur, father of Uri, father of Bezeleel. Hesron, at the age of 21 sixty, took a second wife, the daughter of Machir, from whom came Galaad; and she 22 bore him a son called Segub, father of that Jair who occupied twenty-three townships 23 in Galaad, took Gessur, Aram, Jair's Villages, and Canath with its sixty townships...³ All these were sons of Machir, 24 father of Galaad. It was after Hesron's death that Caleb mated with Ephratha. Hesron had another wife called Abia, that bore him a son, Ashur, father of Thecua.⁴)

The sons of Hesron's eldest son Jerameel were called Ram, Buna, Aram, Asom and Achia; by his second wife Atara he begot Onam. And Jerameel's eldest son Ram was father of Moös, Jamin and Achar. From Onam came Semei and Jada; from Semei, Nadab and Abisur; from Abisur, by his wife Abihail, Ahobban and Molid; from Nadab, Saled (who died without issue) and Apphaim; from Apphaim, Jesi, from Jesi, Sesan, from Sesan, Oholai. From Semei's brother Jada came Jether (who died without issue) and Jonathan; from Jonathan, Phaeth and Ziza. Such were the descendants of Jerameel.

Sesan died without male issue, and it was to an Egyptian servant of his, Jeræa, that he gave his daughter in marriage; she bore him Ethei. From Ethei, through Nathan, Zabab, Ophlal, Obed, Jehu, Azarias, Helles, Elasa, Sisamoi, Sellum and Icamia came Elisama.

Jerameel's brother Caleb had a son called Mesa, father of Ziph, and another son called Maresa, father of Hebron. From Hebron came Core, Thaphua, Recem and Samma; from Samma, through Raham, Jercaam, and from Recem, through Sammai and Maon, Bethsur. By his concubine Epha, Caleb was the father of Haran, Mosa and Gezez; Haran also had a son called Gezez; this Epha was a daughter of Johaddai, whose other children were Regom, Joathan, Gesan, Phalet, Epha and Saaph. By his concubine Maaacha, Caleb was father of Saber and Tharana; (also of Saaph, father of Madmena, Suë, father of Machbena, and the father of Gabaa). Caleb's daughter was called Achsa.

(Hur, the first-born of Ephratha, had a son called Caleb; from him, through Sobal, comes Cariathiarim, through Salma, Bethlehem, and through Hariph, Bethgader. From Sobal, besides Cariathiarim, comes Haroe, part of the Manahathites; and the Jethrites, Aphuthites, Semathites and Maserites are also connected with Cariathiarim; the Saraites and Esthaolites derive from these. From Salma, besides Bethlehem, come the Netophathites, Ataroth, Beth-Joab, and the Saraites who are the other half of the Manahathites; the clans, too, of the Sopherites at Jabes, the Tirathites, Simeathites, and Suchathites. These were Cinites that came from Emath, father of the family of Rechab.¹)

3 And these are the names of David's sons. At Hebron, Achinoam the Jezrahelite gave birth to his first-born, Amnon, Abigail of Carmel to Daniel, Maacha daughter of Tholmai, king of Gessur, to Absalom, Aggith to Adonias, Abital to Saphatias, and Eglā, that was also one of his wives, to Jethraham. Thus six sons were born to him during the seven years and six months of his reign at Hebron; during his thirty-three years at Jerusalem Bethsabee, daughter of Ammiel, bore him four sons, Simmaa, Sobab, Nathan and Solomon; he also begot Jebara, Elisama, (Elipheleth), Noge, Nephge, Japhia, (Elisama), Eliada and Elipheleth, nine in all.² All these, with their sister Tamar, were David's children, and he had others by his concubines.

o From Solomon, the succession went from father to son, through Roboam, Abia, 1 Asa, Josaphat, Joram, Ochozias, Joas, 2 Amasias, Azarias, Joathan, Achaz, Ezechias, Manasses and Amon to Josias. 4 Josias had four sons, Johanan, Joakim, 5 Sedecias and Sellum. Joakim had two 7 sons, Jechonias and Sedecias, and Jechonias was father of Asir, Salathiel, Melchiram, Phadaia, Senneser, Jecemia, Sama 8 and Nadabia. Phadaia again had two sons, 9 Zorobabel and Semei, and Zorobabel was father of Mosollam, Hananias, and a daughter, Salomith; besides five others, 10 Hasaba, Ohol, Barachias, Hasadias, and 11 Josabehsed. From Hananias, through Phaltias, Jeseias, Raphaia, Arnan, Obdia, 12 and Sechenias, came Semeia, the father of six sons, Hattus, Jegaal, Baria, Naaria . . . 13 and Saphat. Naaria had three sons, Elioenaï, Ezechias and Ezricam, and of these Elioenaï had seven sons, Oduia, Eliasub, Pheleja, Accub, Johanan, Dalaia and Anani.

4 The men of Juda were descended from Phares, Hesron, Charmi, Hur, and Sobal. Sobal was father of Raia, Raia of Jahath, Jahath of Ahumai and Laad; thence come the Sarathite families. Jezrahel, Jesema, Jεδebos and their sister Asalephuni were children of Etam; he, like Gedor's father Phaniel and Hosa's father Ezer, was descended from Ephraim's first-born son Hur, from whom came Bethlehem. Assur, father of Thecua, had two wives, Halaa and Naara; Naara bore him Oozam, Hepher, Themani and Ahas-thari, and besides these sons of hers he had three sons by Halaa, Sereth, Isaac and Ethnan. . . . From Cos came Anob and Soboba, and all the family of Aharehel son of Arum. . . . Jabes was renowned above all his brethren; his mother had called him by that name as if she would say, Painfully I bore him. And this was Jabes' prayer to the Lord God of Israel, A full blessing, Lord! Wide lands, and thy hand with me, that enmity may never overcome me! And the Lord granted his request.

. . . From Caleb, brother of Sua, through Mahir and Esthon, came Bethrapha, and from Bethrapha Phesse and Tehinna, and from Tehinna the city of Naas; these are the men of Recha. . . . Cenez was father of Othoniel and Saraia, Othoniel of Hathath and Maonathi, and Maonathi of Ophra. Saraia's son was Joab, founder of the Valley of the Smiths, where all the folk were craftsmen. . . . Caleb, son of Jephone, had sons called Hir, Ela and Naham; from Ela came Cenez. . . and from Jalaleel Ziph, Ziphā, Thiria and Asrael. . . . The sons of Ezra were Jether, Mered, Epher and Jalon; and Mered³ begot Mariam, and Sammai, and Jesba, father of Esthamo; his Jewish wife bore him Jared, father of Gedor, and Heber, father of Socho, and Icuthiel, father of

¹ Much of this chapter is obscure and of uncertain interpretation, especially those passages which are included in brackets. The interpretation of verses 50-55 can only be guess-work; it seems clear that the geographical distribution of the various clans in Juda is the main topic under discussion. No attempt has been made here to follow the Latin where it renders as common nouns what are almost certainly meant to be proper names. The last sentence of the chapter is particularly obscure, and has not been sufficiently explained.

² Some doubt attaches to the names given in brackets; they are not given in II Kg. 14-16, and it looks as if a scribe's error had in two cases repeated a name instead of writing in a fresh one.

³ The name Mered is not expressed in the original, but it seems clear from the following verse that this is intended.

Zanoe, but these others were his children by Bethia, daughter of Pharao, whom 19 Mered took to wife. . . . (And the sons of the wife of Odaias, that was sister to Naham, father of Garmite Ceila and Machathite Esthamo). . . . The sons of Simon were called Amnon, Rinna, Ben-Hanan and Thilon; and Jesi's were called Zoheth and Ben-Zoheth.

21 Juda's son Sela begot Her, father of Lecha, and Laada, father of Maresa; from them, too, come the weaver-folk of Asbea and Jokim, and the men of Choseba, and Joas and Saraph, lords once of Moab; the men, too, of Jasubi-lehem. But that was 23 in bygone days; now they are potters, living about Netaim and Gedera to do the king's work for him; that is why they are left there.

24 And now for the sons of Simeon; these were Namuel, Jamin, Jarib, Zara, Saul; from him came Sellum, Mapsa and Masma; Masma that was father of Hamuel, 26 Zachur and Semei. This Semei had sixteen sons and six daughters, but his brothers had not many children, and the whole clan could not rival the sons of Juda for numbers. They dwell in Bersabee, Molada, 28 Hasarsuhai, Bala, Asom, Tholad, Bathuel, Horma, Siceleg, Bethmarchaboth, Hasarsusim, Sicheberai and Saarim; and these were the cities up to king David's time.
 32 They had villages, too, the five townships of Etam, Aën, Remmon, Thochen and Asan, and other villages too round about their cities right up to Baal. So they dwell, so their homes were distributed.

34 For chiefs, they had Mosobab, Jemlech, Josa son of Amasias, Joel, Jehu son of Josabias, the sons of Saraia, the sons of Asiel, Elioenai, Jacoba, Isuhaia, Asaia, 36 Adiel, Ismiel, Banaia, Ziza son of Sephei, son of Allon, son of Idaia, son of Semri, son of Samaia; all these named were chieftains 38 of their clans. And now, their households growing more numerous, they went further afield till they reached Gador, on the eastern side of the valley, in quest of a feeding-ground for their flocks. Pasture they found, rich and nourishing; and all that wide, fruitful land was free from alarms, long inhabited by descendants of

Cham. Hither they came, the chieftains named above, in the days of Ezechias king of Juda; smote tents and tent-dwellers there, so that to-day none of them are left, and occupied those fair pasture-lands instead. It was men of Simeon, too, five hundred strong, that invaded the hill-country of Seir, under Jesi's sons, Phaltias, Naarias, Raphaia and Ozziel; defeated the Amalecites who had taken refuge there, and occupy their land to this day.¹

5 And now for the sons of Ruben, Israel's first-born. First-born he was, yet never so reckoned, from the day when he came between his father's sheets; his privilege went to another son of Israel, Joseph, instead. Of all those brethren, Juda was the most powerful, and from him chieftains sprang; but it was still Joseph that had the first-born's privilege.

The sons of Ruben, Israel's first-born, were called Enoch, Phallu, Eron and Charmi. . . . From Joel came Samaia, Gog, Semei, Micha, Reia and Baal; from him, too, came Beera, the Rubenite chieftain who was carried off as a prisoner by Thelgath-Phalnasar, king of the Assyrians. But the stock of his clan counted many households, who had still their own chieftains, Jehiel, and Zacharias, and Bala, that was descended from Joas through Samma and Azaz, and held lands in Aroer right up to Nebo and Beelmeon. On the east, they were bounded by the approaches of the desert, and the river Euphrates; many were the cattle they grazed in the Galaadite country. In Saul's time, they had fought against the Agareans and made an end of them, occupying their tents thenceforward all over the eastern part of Galaad.

Beyond them, the descendants of Gad held all Basan up to Selcha; Joel held the primacy, and after him came Saphan, Janai and Saphat, there in Basan. Seven kindred chiefs they had, all at the head of their clans, Michael, Mosollam, Sebe, Jorai, Jachan, Zie and Heber; all these were descended through Abihail, Huri, Jara, Galaad, Michael, Jesesi and Jeddo from Buz; their kinsmen, too, the sons of Abdiel, son of Guni, were chieftains of clans. In ¹ The notices throughout this chapter here seem disconnected, as if they were fragments of an older document, put together on some principle which is now hard to discover. Some of the proper names here given are rendered by the Latin version as if they were common nouns.

Galaad they dwelt, and in the townships of Basan, and on the common-lands of Saron, right up to its borders. All these were registered in the days when Joatham reigned in Juda, and Jeroboam in Israel.

There were forty-four thousand seven hundred and sixty warriors from Ruben, Gad, and the eastern half of Manasses, with shield and sword and bow, trained men all, that went out to battle, and levied war on the Agareans, who had Ituraea and Naphis and Nodab to lend them aid. They cried out to the Lord as they went into the fight, and he, to reward their faith, paid heed to them, giving them the mastery over the Agareans and their allies. All the enemy possessed fell into their hands, fifty thousand camels, two hundred and fifty thousand sheep, and two thousand asses, besides a hundred thousand prisoners; and many of them they slew in battle. The Lord had espoused his people's quarrel, and the Agareans might never come by their own lands again till the time of the captivity.

As for the men of eastern Manasses, the territory they held reached from the frontier of Basan as far as Baal-Hermon, and Sanir, and mount Hermon itself, so great their number was. Their clan chiefs were Ephraim, Jesi, Eliel, Ezriel, Jeremia, Odoia and Jediel; these were the men of rank and power who gave their names to the clans.

But all these forsook the God of their fathers, and played the wanton by worshipping with the native folk whom God had dispossessed at their coming. So he, the God of Israel, would incite the Assyrian kings, Phul and Thelgath-Phal-nasar, to remove Ruben and Gad and eastern Manasses; to Lahela, Habor, Ara and the river Gozan he carried them off, and there they remain to this day.

6 Levi had three sons, Gerson, Caath and Merari. Caath was the father of Amram, Isaac, Hebron and Oziel, Amram of Aaron, Moses and Mary, Aaron of Nadab, Abiu, Eleazar and Ithamar. From Eleazar, through Phinees, Abisue, Bocci, Ozi, Zariaas, Meraiioth, Amarias, Achitob, Sadoc, Achimaas, Azarias and Johanan came the Azarias who was high priest when Solomon built his temple at Jerusalem. From this Azarias, through Amarias, Achitob, Sadoc, Sellum, Helcias, Azarias and Saraia came Josedec, who went out into exile when the Lord banished the inhabitants of Juda and Jerusalem through Nabuchodonosor.

All Levi's sons, Gerson, Caath and Merari had issue; Gerson was the father of Lobni and Semei, Caath of Amram, Isaac, Hebron and Oziel, Merari of Moholi and Musi. The lines of descent from Levi ran thus, from Gerson, Lobni, Jahath, Zamma, Joah, Addo, Zara, Jethrai. From Caath, Aminadab, Core, Asir, Elcana, Abiasaph, Asir, Thahath, Uriel, Ozias, Saul. (Elcana had three sons, Amasai, Achimoth and Elcana; from this Elcana the line ran through Sophai, Nahath, Eliab and Jeroham to another Elcana again. . . . The sons of Samuel were called Vasseni and Abia.) From Merari, Moholi, Lobni, Semei, Oza, Sammaa, Haggia, Asaia.

It was from these that David chose singers for the Lord's house, as soon as the ark found a resting-place; and in the tabernacle (until Solomon built the Lord a temple at Jerusalem) they rendered service of song, as well as waiting on the Lord in their turn. This hereditary service was rendered for the Caathites by a singer called Heman, descended through Johel, Samuel, Elcana, Jeroham, Eliel, Thohu, Suph, Elcana, Mahath, Amasai, Elcana, Joel, Azarias, Sophonias, Thahath, Asir, Abiasaph, Core and Isaac from Caath; and so from Levi and Israel.¹ On his right stood his confrater Asaph, descended through Barachias, Samaa, Michael, Basaia, Melchias, Athanai, Zara, Adaia, Ethan, Zamma, Semei, and Jeth from Gerson, and so from Levi. On his left stood the confraters from Merari, led by Ethan, who was descended through Cusi, Abdi, Maloch, Hasabias, Amasias, Helcias, Amasai, Boni, Somer, (Moholi) and Musi from Merari; and so from Levi.

Their fellow Levites were appointed to wait on all the needs of the tabernacle, the Lord's dwelling-place; but only Aaron and his descendants made offering on the altar of burnt-sacrifice and the altar of incense, busied themselves with the inner sanctuary, and made intercession for Israel; such was the command given through 50 God's servant Moses. The line of Aaron descended through Eleazar, Phinees, Abi-51 sue, Bocci, Ozi, Zarahia, Meraioth, Ama-52 rias, Achitob and Sadoc to Achimaas.

¹ The descent of Elcana from Caath bears several resemblances to the tree given in verses 22-27; and they may be two accounts of the same genealogy, differing either through imperfect manuscript transmission or through a confusion between natural and adopted sons (cf. note on Mt. 1. 16).

54 The descendants of Aaron had towns and enclosures to dwell in among the 55 Caathites, appointed to them by lot. Juda gave them Hebron with the lands round 56 it; the open country, with its villages, 57 belonged to Caleb, son of Jephone. And besides Hebron, the city of refuge, Aaron's 58 race held Lobna, Jether, Esthemo, Helon, 59 Dabir, Asan . . . and Bethsames, with the 60 lands round them; and Benjamin gave them Gabee, Almath and Anathoth, with the lands round them; thus in all they had thirteen cities.

61 The rest of the Caathite clan received ten cities from . . . the western half of Ma-62 nasses; the Gersonites thirteen cities from Issachar, Aser, Nephthali, and the Ma-63 nassites of Basan; and the Merarites twelve from Ruben, Gad and Zabulon. The 64 Israelites gave the Levites cities and lands round them, just as Juda, Simeon and 65 Benjamin allotted to them the cities which 66 have been named.¹ The Caathites had cities of their own in Ephraim; Sichem in 67 the hill-country of Ephraim was given to them as a city of refuge, and besides this 68 Gazer, Jecmaam, Bethoron, Helon and 69 Gethremmon . . . and the western half of Manasses gave them Aner and Baala; all 70 these cities, with the lands round them, belonged to the rest of the Caathites. The 71 Gersonites received from the eastern half of Manasses Gaulon and Astharoth; from 72 Issachar Cedès, Dabereth, Ramoth and 73 Anem; from Aser Masal, Abdon, Hucaç and Rohob; from Nephthali Cedès in Ga-74 lilee, Hamon and Cariathaim, with the 75 lands round them. The Merarites received 76 from Zabulon Remmono and Tabor; and on the further side of Jordan, opposite 77 Jericho, Ruben gave them Bosor, Jassa, 78 Cademoth and Mephaat; Gad gave them

Ramoth-Galaad, Manaim, Hesebon and Jezer; and they had lands round each of these cities.

7 Issachar had four sons, Thola, Phua, Jasub and Simeron. Thola's sons were Ozi, Raphaia, Jeriel, Jemai, Jebsem and Samuel, all heads of clans. A powerful chief was this Thola, and his clan, in David's time, counted twenty-two thousand six hundred men. Ozi's son Izrahia was the father of Michael, Obadia, Johel and Jesia; from Ozi came all these five chieftains, and under them were thirty-six thousand brave warriors, divided into families and clans, with many wives and children among them; and their fellow tribesmen of Issachar counted eighty-seven thousand, all fighting men.

Benjamin had three sons, Bela, Bechor and Jadhel.² Bela was father of Esbon, Ozi, Oziel, Jerimoth and Urai, five valiant chiefs, whose clans put twenty-two thousand and thirty-four men into the field. From Bechor came Zamira, Joas, Eliezer, Elioenai, Amri, Jerimoth, Abia, Anathoth and Almath. All these came from Bechor, and their clans counted twenty thousand two hundred men, brave warriors all. Jadhel had a son Balan, who was father of Jehus, Benjamin, Aod, Chanana, Zethan, Tharsis and Ahisahar. All these were descended from Jadhel, chieftains of clans that went bravely into battle seventeen thousand two hundred strong. Other clans there were, Sepham and Hapham, descended from Hir, and the Hasim, that came from Aher.

Nephthali's chieftains were Jasiel, Guni, Jeser and Sellum, the sons of Bala.

Manasses had a son called Esriel; and by a Syrian concubine he was father also of Machir, from whom came Galaad. And Machir found wives for his sons (Happhim and Saphan) . . . And he had a sister called Maacha . . . And the name of the second son was Salphaad; his children were daughters. . . . Machir's wife Maacha bore a son; he was called Phares and his brother Sares, and his sons were called Ulam and Recen; Ulam was the father of Badan. All

¹ The original has 'which they called by their names', but see Jos. 21. 9, of which this verse is evidently a repetition.

² Some think that the word 'Benjamin' has been inserted here by mistake; neither Zabulon nor Dan is represented in this list of the Israelite clans, whereas Benjamin's descendants are traced at the beginning of chapter 8.

these came from Galaad, that came from Machir, son of Manasses. And his sister Hammolecet was mother of Isahod, Abiezer and Mohola. . . . And these were sons of Semida, Ahin, Sechem, Leci, and Aniam.¹

Ephraim had a son called Suthala, the ancestor, through Bared, Thahath, Elada and Thahath of Zabad. Suthala, Ezer and Elad his sons were; but they went to Geth on a foray, and there were slain by the native folk. Long did their father Ephraim mourn for them, till his brethren gathered round to comfort him; so, at last, he bedded his wife again, and she, conceiving, bore him a son. This son he called Beria, as if he would say, At a time of misfortune for my race this one was born to me. He had a daughter, too, called Sara, that founded Bethoron, Lower and Upper, and Ozensara as well. Beria was the ancestor, through Rapha, Reseph, Thale, Thaan, Laadan, Ammiud and Elisama of Nun, the father of Josue. The places they dwelt in were Bethel, and Noran to the east, Gazer, Sichern and Aza, with their dependent villages.

Next to them came the descendants of Manasses, dwelling at Bethsan, Thanach, Mageddo and Dor, with their dependent villages; all these, too, belonged to Israel's son Joseph.

Aser had four sons, Jemna, Jesua, Jessui and Baria, and a daughter, Sara. Baria was father of Heber, and of Melchiel, from whom came Barsaith. Heber had three sons, Jephlat, Somer and Hotham, and a daughter, Suaa; Jephlat was father of Phosech, Chamaal and Asoth, Somer of Ahi, Roaga, Haba and Aram, and their brother (Helem) of Supha, Jemna, Selles and Amal.² From Supha came Suë, Harnapher, Sual, Beri, Jamra, Bosor, Hod, Samma, Salusa, Jethran and Bera. There were other chiefs, too, Jephone, Phaspha, and Ara, sons of Jether, and Aree, Haniel and Resia, sons of Olla. All these were heads of their clans and brave warriors, chieftains with chieftains under them, all descended from Aser; and their clan counted twenty-six thousand men that were of age to bear arms.

8 Benjamin's first-born was called Bale; his other sons were Asbel, Ahara, Nohaa and Rapha. From Bale came Ad-² dar, Gera, Abiud, Abisue, Naaman, Ahoe,⁴ Gera, Sephuphan and Huram. These are the sons of Ahod, chiefs of clans in Gabaa,⁵ that were removed to Manahath. . . (and Naaman and Achia and Gera;) he it was who removed them, and was afterwards the father of Oza and Ahiud. Saharaim,⁸ too, after he had put away his wives, Husim and Bara, begot sons in the land of Moab; his wife Hodes bore him Jobab,⁹ Sebia, Mosa, Molchom, Jehus, Sechia and Marma; all these children of his were clan chieftains. Ahitob and Elphaal were his¹¹ sons by Husim; and Elphaal's sons were Heber, and Misaam, and Samad that founded Ono and Lod with their dependent villages.³ The men who dwelt in¹³ Aialon, whence they had dislodged the Gethites, had Baria and Sama for their chieftains. Ahio, Sesac, Jerimoth, Za-¹⁴ badia, Arod, Heder, Michael, Jespha and¹⁶ Joha all came down from Baria. Zabadia,¹⁷ Mosollam, Hezeci, Heber, Jesamari, Jezlia and Jobab were descended from Elphaal. Jacim, Zechri, Zabdi, Elioenai, Selethai,¹⁹ Eliel, Adaia, Baraia and Samarath were descended from Semei.⁴ Jespham, Heber,²² Eliel, Abdon, Zechri, Hanan, Hanania,²³ Aelam, Anathothia, Jephdaa and Phanuel were descended from Sesac. . . . Samsari,²⁶ Sohoria, Otholia, Jersia, Elia and Zechri were descended from Jeroham. All these²⁸ were fathers of clans and chieftains, with their home at Jerusalem.⁵ Gabaon was²⁹ the dwelling-place of Abigabaon, whose wife was called Maacha, and his eldest son Abdon. From him came Sur, Cis,³⁰ Baal, Nadab, Gedor, Ahio, Zachar, and³¹ Macelloth that was father of Samaa; these lived separate from their brethren but

¹ In verses 13-19 it seems likely that there has been some disturbance in the text here; the whole passage is disjointed and obscure, and it looks as if the names Hapthim and Saphan, in verse 15, had crept in by mistake from verse 12 above.

² The name Helem seems doubtful: cf. verse 32 above.

³ The sense of verses 6-13 is by no means certain; the first three names in verse 7 may have been copied by error from verses 4 and 5 above. In verse 11, the Latin represents the words 'by Husim' as a single word, 'Mehusim'.

⁴ Semei should probably be identified with the Sama of verse 13.

⁵ It is difficult to believe that all these clan chiefs resided in the city of Jerusalem; perhaps we should understand, here and in verse 32, that the Benjamites remained politically attached to Juda, when the kingdom was divided.

had their home, like their brethren, at Jerusalem.

- 33 Ner was the father of Cis, Cis of Saul; and Saul had four sons, Jonathan, Melchisua, Abinadab and Esbaal. From Jonathan, through Meribbaal, came Micha, 35 who was father of Phithon, Melech, 36 Tharaa and Ahaz; from Ahaz Joada, who was father of Alamath, Azmoth and Zamri; 37 from Zamri, through Mosa, Banaa, Rapha 38 and Elasa, Asel, who had six sons, Ezricam, Bocru, Ismael, Saria, Obdia and 39 Hanan. All these were Asel's sons; his brother, Esec, begot Ulam, Jehus, and 40 Eliphalet. The sons of Ulam were great warriors, with strong arms to bend the bow; and their sons and grandsons multiplied till there were a hundred and fifty of them. All these were of the race of Benjamin.

- 9 The whole people was registered, and the Annals of the kings of Israel and Juda shew what their numbers were, at the time when they were exiled to Babylon in 2 expiation of their sins; the names, too, of the leading men, with the lands and cities they dwelt in, temporal holders of land, 3 priests, Levites and Nathinim.¹ Jerusalem had citizens belonging to Juda and Benjamin; some, too, from Ephraim and Manasses. The line of Phares was headed by 4 Othei, descended through Ammiud, Amri 5 and Omrai from Bonni; the Silonites by 6 Asaia and his younger brethren, the line of Zara by Jehuel and his brothers; this clan 7 was six hundred and ninety strong. Of the Benjamites, there were Salo, descended through Mosollam and Oduia from Asana, Jobania son of Jeroham, Ela, son of Ozi, 8 son of Mochori, and Mosollam, descended through Saphatias and Rahuel from Je- 9 banias. And brethren of theirs bore rule in their various clans, nine hundred and fifty-six heads of families.
- 10 And there were priests, Jedaia, Joiarib 11 and Jachin; Azarias, too, descended from Achitob through Helcias, Mosollam, Sadow and Maraioth, the high priest of God's 12 temple; Adaias, descended from Melchias through Jeroham and Phassur, and Maasai, descended from Emmer through Adiel, Jezra, Mosollam and Mosollamith. And brethren of theirs bore rule in their various clans; seventeen hundred and sixty priests there were, well endowed with strength for all the service they did in the house of God.

There were Levites, too, of name; Semeia, descended through Hassub and Ezricam from Hasebias, of the race of Merari, Bacbacar that was a craftsman in wood, and Galal, and Mathania, descended through Micha and Zechri from Asaph, and Obdia, descended through Semeia and Galal from Idithun, and Barachia, son of Asa, son of Elcana, whose home was close to Netophat. The chief men among the porters were Sellum, Accub, Telmon and Ahimam; but of all that brotherhood Sellum was the first in rank. Up to that time,² it was the Levites who kept watch, by turns, at the royal gate to the east; the Corites, Sellum son of Core son of Abiasaph son of Core and all his kindred, attended to the needs of public worship and also guarded the approaches to the tabernacle. It was their households that were in charge of the entry, marshalled, in former times, by Phinees son of Eleazar, there in the Lord's presence;³ meanwhile Zacharias son of Mosellomia was porter at the tabernacle gate itself. There were two hundred and twelve of these men chosen for the porter's office, and registered in the villages where they dwelt. David, and Samuel the seer, had appointed them to their charge, bidding them keep watch in their turn over the gates of the Lord's house, in those days a tabernacle; on every side, east, west, north and south, there were porters keeping watch. Meanwhile their brethren stayed at home in their villages, waiting for the week when it should be their turn for duty.

The four Levites named were in charge of all the porters, and of the store-houses and treasuries of the Lord's house; all round the temple they kept watch, and opened the doors when morning came. Others looked after the appurtenances of worship, that must be brought in and out

¹ The Nathinim are sometimes identified with the porters described in verses 17-27, but these were Levites, and the Nathinim seem to be mentioned here as a separate class among the inhabitants.

² Perhaps rather, according to the Hebrew text, 'to this day'.

³ 'There in the Lord's presence'; the sense of the Hebrew text is rather 'the Lord be with him'!

9 in due order; and others had the needs of the sanctuary itself entrusted to them, 10 taking care of the flour, wine, oil, incense and spices, (although the work of preparing the sacred ointment from the spices 11 was done by priests). It was a Levite, Mathathias, eldest son of Sellum the Corite, who had charge of all that was 12 cooked in the pans; and their kinsmen of the race of Caath must prepare the loaves that were set before the Lord, fresh every 13 week. . . . These were the chief singers, chosen out of the Levite families, to dwell ever in the temple precincts and perform 14 their duties day and night. The heads, too, of the Levite families had their dwelling at Jerusalem.

15 (Gabaon was the dwelling-place of Je-hiel, its founder, whose wife was called Maacha, and his eldest son Abdon. From him came Sur, Cis, Baal, Ner, Nadab, 16 Gedor, Ahio, Zacharias, and Macelloth that was father of Samaa; these lived separate from their brethren but had their home, like their brethren, at Jerusalem.
17 Ner was the father of Cis, Cis of Saul; and Saul had four sons, Jonathan, Melchisua, 18 Abinadab and Esbaal. From Jonathan, through Meribbaal, came Michah, who was father of Phithon, Melech, Tharaa and 19 Ahaz; from Ahaz Jara, who was father of Alamath, Azmoth and Zambri; from Zam-bri, through Mosa, Banaa, Raphaia and 20 Elasa, Asel, who had six sons, Ezricam, Bocru, Ismahel, Saria, Obdia and Hanan.
All these were sons of Asel.)

10 . . . And now the Philistines had engaged Israel; and the Israelites
fled at their onslaught, and were cut down
2 on mount Gelboe as they fled. Ever harder
the Philistines pressed on the retreat of Saul and of his sons, till at last his sons,
Jonathan, and Abinadab, and Melchisua
3 had fallen, and he himself bore the whole weight of the attack. The archers were following close on his heels, and sorely the 4 archers wounded him. Then Saul bade his own squire draw on him and kill him; he would not have uncircumcised foes kill
him with outrage. And when the squire's saul failed him, so that he would not obey, Saul himself caught up a sword, and fell

on it. Whereupon, seeing his master dead, 5
the squire fell upon his own sword, and
died with him. So perished Saul, and his 6 three sons; his dynasty died with him.

And now the Israelites who lived in the 7 plain took to flight; Saul and his sons killed, they dispersed and abandoned their cities, leaving the Philistines to come in and settle there. Next day, coming to 8 plunder the slain, the Philistines found Saul and his three sons, where they lay on mount Gelboe, and they cut off Saul's 9 head, and stripped him of his armour, and sent these from place to place in their own country, to publish the news in the temples of their gods, and among their people. His 10 arms they dedicated in the temple of their own god, and nailed up his head in the temple of Dagon. But the men of Jabes- 11 Galaad came to hear of what the Philistines
had done to Saul; whereupon all their 12 fighting men went and took down the bodies of Saul and of his sons; and reaching Gabes they buried them under the oak-tree there, and fasted seven days to lament them.² So died king Saul, for his 13 guilt in disobeying the Lord's command instead of carrying it out faithfully; for consulting the witch, too, instead of trust- 14 ing in the Lord; to death the Lord doomed him, and passed on his kingdom to David the son of Jesse.

11 After this, all the men of Israel rallied to David at Hebron; We are kith and kin of thine, they said. It is not 2 so long since Israel marched under thy orders, when Saul was still reigning; and the Lord has promised thee that thou shouldst be its shepherd and its captain.
And so the elders of Israel went to his 3 court at Hebron; and there, at Hebron, in the Lord's presence, David made a covenant with them, and they anointed him king of Israel, so fulfilling the promise which the Lord made to him through Samuel.

When David and his army marched on 4 Jerusalem, which was then called Jebus, and its native inhabitants Jebusites, the 5 defenders of it told him, Thou shalt never make thy way in here. But take it he did, the keep of Sion that is called David's

6 Keep. Chief and leader shall he be, David promised, that is the first to dislodge these Jebusites; and Joab son of Sarvia was first to scaie the walls, so he became leader of 7 the army. There, then, in the keep David made his dwelling, and called it the Keep 8 of David; he built walls about it, too, with Mello for their outer bastion, and left Joab 9 to build the rest of the city. So he went on, prospering and gaining strength, and the Lord God of hosts was with him.¹

10 And these are the names of David's champions, that helped him to attain that rule over Israel which the Lord had promised, the great warriors that were enlisted in David's service. First among all the thirty was Jesbaam the son of Hachamoni; his spear it was that slew three hundred men in one assault.² After him his cousin, Eleazar the Ahohite, one of the 13 three champions that were with David at Phesdomim, where the Philistines had mustered for battle. There in a field of barley, when Israel had fled in confusion, 14 these three stood in the middle of it and held it against the Philistines till they had defeated them; a great victory the Lord 15 gave Israel that day. And once these three leaders of the Thirty were at David's side in the cave of Odollam; the Philistines had encamped in the Valley of the Giants, and David kept close in his stronghold. The Philistines had a garrison at this time in 17 Bethlehem; and now David, overcome with longing, said aloud, Oh for a cup of water from the well by Bethlehem gate!
18 Whereupon the three champions broke through the Philistine lines, drew water from the well by the gate of Bethlehem, and brought it to David. Instead of drinking it, he poured it out as a libation to the 19 Lord; As God sees me, he cried, never that! That were to drink men's blood; they brought it to me at the peril of their lives; it is not for my drinking. Such were the feats of the first three champions.

20 Abisai, too, Joab's brother, was one of three champions; with his own spear he engaged three hundred men and slew them. A great name he had as one of the 21 second three, among whom he was foremost, leading the others, but he could not 22 rival the first three. There was Banaias,

King David's Champions; their Exploits too, whose father, Joiada of Cabseel, was a warrior famous for his exploits. Banaias it was that slew the two Heroes of Moab; he also went down into a cavern on a day of snow, and killed a lion there. And there 23 was an Egyptian he slew; a man five cubits high, that carried a spear as big as a weaver's beam; Banaias went into battle with a club, and killed the Egyptian with his own spear, wresting it from his hand. Such were the feats of Banaias son of 24 Joiada; he too was famous as one of the three champions, and of foremost rank 25 among the Thirty, but he could not rival the first three. He was the man David appointed to carry out his secret commands.

And these were great warriors in David's 26 army, Asahel, Joab's brother, and his cousin Elchanan of Bethlehem, Sammoth from 27 Aror, Helles from Phalon, Ira son of Acces from Thecuca, Abiezer from Anathoth, Sobbochai from Husath, Ilai the Ahohite, 29 Maharai the Netophathite, and Heled son of Baana, also from Netophath, Ethai son 31 of Ribai from Gabaath in Benjamin, Banaia the Pharathonite, Hurai from the valley of Gaas, Abiel the Arbathite, Azmoth the Bauramite, Eliaba from Salaboni, 32 the sons of Assem (that was a Gezonite), 33 Jonathan son of Sage, the Ararite, another Ararite, Ahiam son of Sachar, Eliphai the son of Ur, Hepher the Mecherathite, Ahia the Phelonite, Hesro of Carmel, Naarai son of Asbai, Joel that was brother to 38 Nathan, Mibahar son of Agarai, Selec the Ammonite, Naharai the Berothite (that was squire to Joab son of Sarvia),³ the 40 Jethrites Ira and Gareb, Urias the Hethite, Zabad son of Oholi, the Rubenite Adina son of Siza, that led a band of thirty Rubenites, Hanan son of Maacha, Josaphat 43 the Mathanite, Ozia the Astarothite, Samma and Jehiel the sons of Hotham (that was an Arorite), Jedihel son of Samri and 45 his brother Joha, from Thosa, Eliel the Mahumite, Jeribai and Josai the sons of Elnaem, Jethma the Moabite, Eliel, Obed, and Jasiel from Masobia.

12 Here are the names of the men who rallied to David's side at Siceleg, while he was yet being hunted down by ² 'Three hundred'; eight hundred according to II Kg. 23. 8. It seems possible that a copyist may have confused this verse with verse 20.

³ vv. 10-40, cf. II Kg. 23. 8-39.

Saul, the son of Cis; brave men all, and tried warriors, archers, too, that could sling stone or shoot arrow as well with the left hand as with the right; fellow tribesmen of Saul himself, from Benjamin. Ahiezer and his brother Joas, the sons of Samaa, from Gabaath; Jaziel and Phallet, sons of Asmoth; Baracha, Jehu of Anathoth, Samaia of Gabaon (one of the thirty chiefs, with thirty men behind him), Jeremias, Jeheziel, Johanan, Jezabad of Gaderoth, Eluzai, Jerimuth, Baalia, Samaria, Saphatia the Haruphite, Elcana, Jesia, Azareel, the Carehites Joezer and Jesbaam, Joela, and Zabadia that was son to Jeroham of Gedor.

There were men of Gad, too, that went over to David's allegiance when he was taking refuge in the desert, strong men, brave warriors, armed with shield and spear; no lion so terrible of aspect, no hind on the mountains so fleet of foot. These were their names in order of rank, Ezer, Obdias, Eliab, Masmana, Jeremias, Ethi, Elicel, Johanan, Elzebad, Jeremias, Machbanai. All these eleven were Gadites, and all held command, the last with a hundred men under him, the first with a thousand. It was in the first month, a time of flood, that they came across Jordan; and all the dwellers in those valleys, east and west of it, fled at their coming.

There were others that came to the stronghold where David lay, from Benjamin and Juda. To these David said, as he went out to meet them, If you come as friends, to aid me, knit be my heart with yours; if you are abetting my enemies, by laying a trap for an innocent man, then may the Lord God of our fathers look down and judge between us. With that, inspired to utterance, Amasai answered him, that was one of the thirty chiefs: Thine, David, we are; with thee, son of Jesse, our lot is cast. Peace be to thee, peace to all who take part with thee; thou hast thy God with thee, taking thy part. So David welcomed them, and made them captains in his army. And there were Manassites that went over to David; this was at the time when he would march out with the Philistines against Saul, but bring them aid he might not; the Philistine chiefs agreed to send him home, fearing he might go back to Saul's allegiance, to their great peril. So he had returned to Siceleg before these men of Manasses reached him, Ednas, Jozabad, Jedihel, Michael, (Ednas, Jozabad,) Eliu and Salathi, all chiefs of battalion among the Manassites. Brave warriors these were, and helped David to make war on the freebooters, as captains in his army. And now no day could pass but it brought David fresh allies, till his company reached great strength, like a host of God's own mustering.

And here is the muster-roll of the armed men who came to find David in Hebron, and make him heir, as the Lord had promised, to Saul's kingdom. There were six thousand eight hundred men of Juda that bore shield and sword, all in battle array; Simeon sent seven thousand one hundred fighting men, and Levi four thousand six hundred. (Among these were Joiada, chief of Aaron's clan, with three thousand seven hundred at his back, and Sadoc, a young man of rare promise, with twenty-two other chieftains, his kinsmen.) Saul's tribe of Benjamin sent but three thousand, since the greater part of them were loyal to Saul's race; Ephraim twenty thousand eight hundred, men well known among their clans for their prowess in war; and from the western half of Manasses came eighteen thousand, each one of them sworn to make David king. From Issachar came two hundred clan chiefs, men of good parts, that could give sure advice to Israel as the times demanded;¹ the rest of their tribe was of the same mind with them. From Zabulon, fifty thousand fighting men, all armed for battle, rallied to David with loyalty unfeigned. Nephthali sent a thousand chiefs, in command of thirty-seven thousand that carried shield and spear; Dan twenty-eight thousand six hundred men in arms; and Aser forty thousand warriors prepared to do battle. Besides these, there were a hundred and twenty thousand men in battle array from the tribes beyond Jordan, Ruben and Gad and the eastern half of Manasses.

So many armed warriors came to Hebron with loyal hearts, there to make David king of all Israel; and the rest of ¹ The Jewish tradition is, that the men of Issachar were learned in astronomy. But some think this verse implies no more than political sagacity among their leaders.

Israel, too, had but one thought, that 39 David should be king. There they spent three whole days in the royal presence, and of food and drink had no lack, so well had their fellow tribesmen made provision for 40 them; nay, there were asses and camels and mules and oxen bringing them food from their neighbours, as far away as Is-sacher, Zabulon and Nephthali; flour and figs and raisins and wine and oil; cattle, too and rams they had in great abundance.
 Such high festival they kept in the land of Israel.

13 And now, taking counsel first with his captains and commanders and 2 all the men of rank, David had a word for the whole assembly of the Israelites: What say you, does it come from God, this thought of mine? How if we should send word to the rest of our brethren, all over the land of Israel, the priests, too, and the Levites, where they dwell clustered round their cities, bidding them all muster here, 3 and help us bring home the ark of our God? Never, in Saul's days, have we had 4 recourse to it. To this, there was no voice but was raised in agreement; here was a project that pleased all alike.

5 So David summoned the whole people of Israel, from Sihor by Egypt right up to the pass of Emath, to help him bring back 6 God's ark from Cariathiarim. To Carithiarim hill, in Juda's country, they went up, great and small, to fetch the ark home, the ark which takes its name from the Lord God, dwelling there above it between the 7 cherubim. And they carried it away from Abinadab's house, putting it on a newly-made waggon, with Oza and Oza's brother 8 for its drivers. There were David and all the men of Israel, playing music at their best in the Lord's presence, singing to harp and zither and tambour and cymbals 9 and trumpet. They had reached the threshing-floor of Chidon, when one of the oxen, frisking as it went, tilted the ark a little to one side, whereupon Oza put out 10 his hand to steady it. This rashness of his in touching the ark provoked the Lord's anger; there, in the divine presence, the 11 Lord smote him, and he fell dead. Great grief it was to David, this ruin the Lord had brought on Oza, and he called the place by the name it bears still, Oza's Ruin. And a dread of the Lord came upon him that day; How shall I, he asked, give 12 shelter to the Lord's ark? No longer was 13 he minded to give the Lord's ark a lodging in the Keep of David; he took it to the house of Obededom the Gethite instead.

 There, in the house of Obededom, the ark 14 of God was left for three months, bringing a blessing upon all his household and all that was his.¹

14 Hiram, too, king of Tyre, sent messages offering David cedar planks and carpenters and stone-masons, to build a house for him. No doubt could David have that the Lord had ratified his sovereignty over Israel, and made him the king of a great people. So, in Jerusalem, 2 he provided himself with fresh wives, and had sons and daughters born to him. Jeru-3 salem was the birth-place of Samua, So-4 bad, Nathan, Solomon, Jebahar, Elisua, 5 (Eliphalet), Noga, Napheg, Japhia, Eli-6 sama, Baaliada and Eliphalet.

When news reached the Philistines that 8 David had been anointed as king of all Israel, they mustered all their forces to hunt him down, and David, hearing of it, went out to meet them. They had come in 9 and occupied the whole valley of Raphaim.
 Thereupon David consulted the Lord; 10 should he attack the Philistines? Would he be given the mastery? And he was bidden go to the attack; the Philistines would be at his mercy. And now they 11 advanced to Baalpharasim, where David defeated them; The Lord has parted the enemy's ranks before me, he said, as easily as water parts this way and that; so the place came by its name, Baalpharasim, The Master of the Breach. They left their 12 idols behind them there, and David had these burnt. But once more the Philistines 13 came to the attack, and occupied the Ra-phaim valley; and this time, when David 14 asked counsel of God, the answer was, Do not go to the attack; withdraw first, and 15 then come upon them from the direction of the pear-trees yonder. Wait till thou hearest, in the tops of the pear-trees, the sound of marching feet; then offer battle; it is a sign that the Lord marches on before thee, to smite down the army of the Philis-

16 tines. So David did as the Lord had bidden him, and he drove the Philistines before him all the way from Gabaon to Gazera.¹

17 After this, David's renown was noised abroad everywhere, and the Lord struck terror of him into all the nations' hearts.

15 When he put up buildings in the Keep of David, he was careful to leave a plot of ground for God's ark, and pitch a tent for it there. He thought to himself, too, God's ark must not be carried this way and that by the first comer; the Levites, whom the Lord has chosen out to be his servants for all time, have the duty of carrying it. So now, summoning all Israel to Jerusalem, for the removal of the ark to the site he had prepared for it, he summoned among the rest Aaron's descendants, and the Levites. There were a hundred and twenty Caathites, under Uriel, two hundred and twenty Merarites, under Asaia, a hundred and thirty Gersonites, under Joel, two hundred of Elisaphan's clan, under Semeias, eighty of Hebron's, under Eliel, and a hundred and twelve of Oziel's, under Aminadab. These six David sent for, with the chief priests, Sadoc and Abiathar; You, he said, are the chiefs of the Levite clans; look well to it that you and your brethren are purified of all defilement before you bring the ark of the Lord God of Israel to the site prepared for it. Earlier, when you were not there, we brought on ourselves the Lord's chastisement; there must be no such happening now, for want of due order taken.

14 So priest and Levite cleansed themselves for carrying the ark of the Lord God of Israel; and the ark was carried by Levites, with poles resting on their shoulders, as Moses, speaking in the Lord's name, had enjoined. Then David would have the Levite chiefs appoint some of their brethren to be singers, chanting there with instruments of music, zither and harp and cymbals, till heaven rang with the echoes of their rejoicing. So they appointed two Gersonites, Joel's son Heman and Asaph son of Barachias, and Ethan, son of Casias, of the clan of Merari, with others of lesser degree, their fellow clansmen, Zacharias, Ben, Jaziel, Semiramoth, Jahiel, Ani, Eliab, Banaias, Maasias, Mathathias, Eliphalu, Macenias, Obedom and Jehiel, that all held the office of door-keeper. Of these singers, Heman, Asaph and Ethan beat cymbals together, Zacharias, Oziel, Semiramoth, Jahiel, Ani, Eliab, Maasias and Banaias played, on their zithers, the Alamothe,² while Mathathias, Eliphalu, Macenias, Obedom, Jehiel and Ozaziu led the triumph-song, Seminit-fashion,³ with the harps they bore. And Chonenias, chief of the Levites, was burden-master,⁴ a burden-master chosen for his excellent skill. The doors of the ark were guarded by Barachias and Elcana; and there were seven priests, Sebenias, Josaphas, Nathanael, Amasai, Zacharias, Banaias and Eliezer, that blew trumpets before it. (And the doors of the ark were guarded by Obedom and Jehias.)⁵

So with great rejoicing went David, and with him went all the elders of Israel and all his captains, to Obedom's house, to fetch the ark that bears witness of the Lord's covenant. And as the Lord sped the Levites on their journey, with the ark for their load, seven bulls and seven rams were offered in sacrifice. Like the Levites who carried the ark, the singers, and Chonenias that went as burden-master among the singers, David was clad in a robe of lawn; and he had a mantle of linen as well. Thus all Israel brought the ark home, keeping high festival, to the sound of horn and trumpet and cymbals and zither and harp. Only Michal, Saul's daughter, watching from her window as the ark reached David's Citadel, thought scorn of king David as she saw him dancing and making music there.⁶

16 When the ark had been brought into the city, they set it up in the midst of the tabernacle which David had spread out for it, and brought burnt-sacrifices and welcome-offerings into the Latin as 'secret things'.

³ Another obscure musical term, rendered here in the Latin, 'for the octave'.

⁴ Possibly in connexion with the singing, but it may be the 'burden' was the carrying of the ark (cf. Num. 4, 15). The Latin has 'was in charge of the prophecy, as precursor'.

2 Lord's presence there. And David, when his offering was done, blessed the people 3 in the Lord's name, and gave to every Israelite, man or woman, a roll of bread and a piece of roast beef and a flour cake fried 4 in oil.¹ Then he arranged that the Levites should serve by courses before the Lord's ark, by courses, too, should bear record of his great deeds, and honour the Lord God 5 of Israel with hymns of praise. Asaph came first of all, and Zacharias second;
then Jahiel, Semiramoth, Jehiel, Matha-thias, Eliab, Banaias and Obedom. Harp and zither should be Jehiel's province, 6 Asaph should make the cymbals echo again; Banaias and Jaziel, that were priests, should ever be in attendance on the Lord's ark to sound the trumpet there.

7 It was then that David gave Asaph and his brethren their first lesson in offering thanks to the Lord.

8 Praise the Lord, and call upon his name; tell the story of his doings for all the nations 9 to hear; greet him with song and psalm, 10 recount his acts of miracle. Triumph in that holy name; let every heart that longs 11 for the Lord rejoice. To the Lord, to the Lord's strength, have recourse; ever-12 more court his presence. Remember the marvellous acts he did, his miracles, his 13 sentences of doom; are you not the posterity of Israel, his own servant, sons of 14 that Jacob on whom his choice fell? And he, the Lord, is our own God, wide though 15 his writ runs through all the world. Keep in everlasting memory that covenant of his,
that promise which a thousand genera-16 tions might not cancel. He gave Abraham a promise, bound himself to Isaac by an 17 oath; by that law Jacob should live, his Israel, engaged to him by an eternal cove-18 nant. To thee, he said, I will give the land of Chanaan, as the portion which thou and 19 thine must one day inherit. So few they were in number, only a handful, living 20 there as strangers! And ever they passed on from country to country, the guests of 21 king or people; but he suffered none to harm them; to kings themselves the warn-22 ing came, Lay no hand on them, never hurt them, servants anointed and true spokesmen of mine.²

23 In the Lord's honour, let the whole earth make melody; never cease bearing record of his power to save. Publish his 24 glory among the heathen, his wonderful acts for all the world to hear. How great is 25 the Lord, how worthy of honour! What other god is to be feared as he? They are 26 but false gods the heathen call divine; the Lord, not they, made the heavens. Honour 27 and beauty wait on his presence; worship and magnificence are the attendants of his shrine.

Lands of the heathen, make your offer-28 ing to the Lord, an offering to the Lord of glory and praise, an offering of glory to the 29 Lord's name; bring sacrifice, come into his presence; with reverent grace worship the Lord. Before the Lord let the whole earth 30 bow in awe; he has built the earth on foundations immovable. Rejoice, heaven, 31 and let the earth be glad; tell the heathen,
The Lord is king now. Let the sea, and all 32 the sea contains, give thunderous applause; smiling the fields, and all the 33 burden they bear; no tree in the forest but will sing for joy to greet its Lord's coming.
He comes to judge the earth.³

Praise the Lord, the Lord is gracious; 34 his mercy endures for ever. Cry we to 35 God, our deliverer, Deliver us now, gather us again in safety, scattered as we are among the heathen, to praise thy holy name, to triumph in thy renown. Blessed 36 be the Lord, the God of Israel, from all eternity to all eternity; let all the people cry, Amen, hymning the Lord.⁴

So he left Asaph and his brethren there, 37 with the ark that bears witness of the Lord's covenant, to attend it by turns on their appointed days. Obedom and his 38 brethren, sixty-eight of them. . . . And he made Obedom, son of Idithun, and Hosa door-keepers. Sadoc and the other 39 priests, his brethren, were left with the tabernacle, at the hill-sanctuary of Ga-40 baon, ever to offer the Lord victims on the altar of burnt-sacrifice, morning and evening; such was the charge the Lord had laid 41 on Israel. And with Sadoc were Heman and Idithun, and others of less name, chosen to give the Lord thanks for his 42 everlasting mercy; it was for Heman and Idithun to sound the trumpet and beat the cymbals at the divine music, and Idithun's

43 sons he made door-keepers.¹ And so the people dispersed to their homes, and David himself went back to bless his own household.

17 Now that David had a palace of his own to dwell in, he said to the prophet Nathan, Here am I dwelling in a house all of cedar, while the ark that bears witness of the Lord's covenant has nothing better than curtains of hide to cover it! And Nathan answered, Fulfil thy own purpose; the Lord is with thee. But that same night the word of the Lord came to Nathan, Go and give my servant David a message from the Lord: Not thine to build me a house to dwell in. House was never mine, since I rescued the sons of Israel from Egypt; still in a tabernacle, a wanderer's home, I journeyed this way and that, ever at Israel's side. Now to this ruler, now to that, I gave the leadership of my people Israel, and never did I reproach any of them for not building me a house of cedar.

7 This message, then, thou wilt give to my servant David from the Lord of hosts: Out in the pasture-lands, where thou wast tending the sheep, I summoned thee away to bear rule over my people Israel; go where thou wouldst, I was ever at thy side, exterminating thy enemies to make room for thee, granting thee such renown as only comes to the greatest on earth. Henceforth my people are to have a settled home, taking root in it and remaining in undisturbed possession of it, no longer harassed by godless neighbours, as they have been ever since I first gave Israel judges to rule them. Now, I have crushed all thy enemies, and this too thou must know, that the Lord means to grant thy line continuance. So, when thy days are ended, and thou hast become part of thy race, I will grant thee for successor a son of thy own body, established firmly on his throne. He it is that shall build me a house. I will prolong for ever his royal dynasty; he shall find in me a father, and I in him a son. I will not cancel my merciful promises to him, as I cancelled my promise to the king who went before thee. Sovereignty undisturbed I will give him among this people of mine, in this kingdom of mine, for ever; his throne, to endless time, is secure.

All this message, all this revelation, was handed on by Nathan to king David. And David went into the Lord's presence, and betook himself to prayer: Lord God, he said, that one such as I am, sprung from such a house as mine, should receive such gifts! But it was not enough, thou wouldst do more, wouldst foretell the destiny of thy servant's line in days far hence; Lord God, thou hast honoured me as no man ever yet was honoured. No words can thy servant David find; such glory thou dost grant, such favour thou dost shew him. Lord, thou wilt have thy great deeds known, and it has been thy pleasure to do great things in thy servant's behalf; none is like thee, Lord, thou alone art God, read we the history of past days aright. Can any other nation say, like thy people Israel, that its God came to buy it back for himself as his own people, as thou didst, in rescuing us from Egypt, in dispossessing the nations, through thy dread power, to make room for us? So thou didst pledge this people of Israel to be thy people eternally, and thou, Lord, didst become their God.

This promise then, Lord, which thou hast made concerning thy servant and his line, do thou for ever fulfil; make thy word good, so that thy name may for ever live, for ever be glorified. In one breath let men say, Israel has the Lord of hosts for its God, and, Through his favour, the dynasty of his servant David ever abides. O Lord my God, thou hast given me secret knowledge of thy will, promised me a long posterity; what wonder that I am emboldened to make this prayer before thee? So be it, Lord; thou art God, and it is thy word that promises thy servant such bounty; thou dost vouchsafe to bless his line and keep it always under thy protection; through this blessing of thine my race shall be blessed for ever.²

18 After this, David defeated the Philistines and brought their pride low; wrested from them, too, the possession of Geth and its daughter cities. He also defeated Moab, and Moab became tributary to king David. He defeated

¹ The details given here in verses 37-42 seem confused, and it is possible there has been some dislocation in the text. ² vv. 1-27, cf. II Kg. 7.

Adarezer, king of Soba in the Hemath country, when he marched out to extend his domains up to the river Euphrates; a thousand chariots he took from him, with seven thousand horsemen, and twenty thousand that fought on foot, and cut the hamstring of the horses, but kept a hundred teams for himself. When the Syrians of Damascus came out to reinforce Adarezer king of Soba, David routed their army of twenty-two thousand, and put a garrison of his own in Damascus, to make Syria his tributary vassal. In every enterprise he undertook, the Lord stood by him.

All the golden trappings which Adarezer's men wore, David carried off and brought to Jerusalem; from Thebath, too, and from Chun, cities in Adarezer's dominion, he carried away great stores of bronze, that Solomon used afterwards for the basin, the pillars, and the other brazen furnishings of the temple. When the news of David's victory over Adarezer's forces reached Thou, king of Hemath, he sent his son Adoram to make a treaty with him, and to wish him well over the conquest and rout of Adarezer, who was Thou's enemy. All the gold and silver and bronze ornaments, all the silver and the gold he took from so many nations, Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Philistines and Amalecites, king David consecrated to the Lord.

It was Abisai, son of Sarvia, that defeated eighteen thousand Edomites in the Valley of the Salt-pits, and put a garrison in Edom to secure its loyalty to king David. Thus the Lord protected David in all his enterprises; the whole of Israel was under his rule, and to all his people he administered justice and gave award. His army was commanded by Joab, son of Sarvia, and Josaphat, son of Ahilud, kept the records; the priests were Sadoc, son of Achitob, and Achimelech, son of Abiathar, and Susa was secretary; Banaias, son of Joiada was at the head of the Cerethites and Phelethites, and David's sons, too, held high office about the king's person.¹

19 When Naas, king of the Ammonites, died, and his son came to the throne, David thought to himself, I will shew friendliness to Hanon, as his father Naas did to me; and he dispatched envoys to condole with him over his father's death. But when these reached the Ammonite country on their mission, the chiefs there said to Hanon, What, David send messengers to comfort thee, in honour of thy father's memory? Nay, if he has sent men here, they are spies ready to search thy land and make report on it. So Hanon robbed David's men of their shoes, shaved them, and cut off the skirts of their clothes, feet to buttocks, and in that guise sent them back. When the news reached him of their return, David sent to meet them, covered with confusion as they were, and bade them wait in Jericho, not returning home until their beards were grown again. Meanwhile Hanon and the Ammonites, well aware that they had made an enemy of David, sent and hired mercenaries, with a thousand talents of silver, from Mesopotamia, and the Syrians of Maacha, and from Soba, with chariots, too, and horsemen. Thirty-two thousand they hired, as well as the king of Maacha with his army; all these came and pitched their tents before Medaba, and the Ammonites themselves left their cities, to offer battle. Upon hearing the news, David sent the whole of his forces to engage them, under Joab. The Ammonites had come out from the city, and drawn up their line at its gates; the kings who had come to aid them were at a distance, out in the open country. And Joab, seeing that he would be attacked both in front and from the rear, chose the best of his troops and led them out against the Syrians, leaving the rest, under his brother Abisai, to march against the Ammonites. Bring me aid, said Joab, if the Syrians are too strong for me, and I, if the Ammonites have the mastery, will bring thee aid instead. Play the man; fight we valiantly for our people, and for the city walls that are sacred to our God; the Lord's will be done. So Joab and his men engaged the Syrians and routed them; and the Ammonites, seeing the Syrians in full flight, gave way in their turn before the onslaught of his brother Abisai, retreating into the city. Thereupon Joab went back to Jerusalem.

Thus defeated, the Syrians dispatched messengers and brought their fellow tribesmen on the further side of the river to their aid; Sophach, Adarezer's general,

17 was in command of them. David, as soon as he heard the news, mustered the whole forces of Israel, and marched across the Jordan; he went straight to the attack, and they, seeing him drawn up in battle array, 18 prepared to meet him. But the Syrians were routed by Israel, with a loss of seven thousand chariots and forty thousand foot soldiers; Sophach himself was among the slain. 19 And now all the vassals of Adarezer, seeing that they were no match for Israel, went over to David and became his subjects; and no more was heard of the Syrians bringing aid to the men of Ammon.¹

20 And now spring returned, the time when kings march out to battle; and Joab mustered an army, the pick of all the fighting men, to ravage the Ammonite territory. He marched against Rabba and laid siege to it; nor had David himself yet left Jerusalem when Joab overcame Rabba 2 and destroyed it. David took the crown from Melchom's image, which he found to be of a full talent's weight, set with the rarest jewels, and made himself a crown out of it; much spoil he took from the city 3 besides. As for the people in the city, he brought them out and had harrows and sleds and chariots of iron driven over them, till they lay cut to pieces or crushed, and the same treatment he gave to all the cities of Ammon. Then he and all his men returned to Jerusalem.²

4 There was another battle against the Philistines at Gazer, in which Sobochai the Husathite overcame them, slaying Saphai, 5 that was of the Raphaim breed; and another in which Elehanan the son of Jair slew the brother of Goliath the Gethite, that had a shaft to his spear big as a weaver's beam. In another battle, at Geth, 6 there was a man of huge stature that had twelve fingers and twelve toes; he too was 7 of the Rapha breed; and when he challenged the Israelites, Jonathan, son of David's brother Samaa, smote him down. All these were Raphites from Geth, all slain by David and his men.³

21 But now Satan disturbed the peace of Israel, by inciting David to make 2 a register of the people. From David the word came to Joab and to the rulers of the people, Go through all the tribes from Dan to Bersabee, make a muster-roll, and let me know the full tale of them. Why, said 3 Joab, my prayer is that the Lord may increase the number of his people a hundred-fold. But, my lord king, are we not all at thy service? What need, my lord, to carry out such a design as may bring guilt on the whole of Israel?⁴ But the king's will might 4 not be thwarted; so Joab left his presence to make a review of the whole country, and when he came back to Jerusalem he handed 5 in to David the number of those he had registered; the full muster-roll was one million one hundred thousand that bore arms in Israel, with four hundred and seventy thousand in Juda. Levi and Benjamin were never counted, so loth was Joab 6 to execute the king's will.

But meanwhile, in his displeasure at the 7 command given, the Lord had begun to smite down Israel; whereupon David confessed to the Lord, I have sinned greatly in 8 what I have done; give my sin quittance; I have played a fool's part. And the word of the Lord came to Gad, that was David's seer, Go and give David this message from 9 the Lord; Here are three choices I grant thee, to choose thy own punishment. So 10 Gad presented himself before David, bidding him in the Lord's name make his choice. Wilt thou have three years of 11 famine, he asked, or three months of flight before thy enemies, and yet no escape, or three days in which the Lord's own sword of pestilence shall pass through the land, his angel dealing death all through the realm of Israel? Think well, and tell me 12 what answer I shall make to him whose message I bear. I am hard pressed on all 13 sides, David told him; but it is better to fall into the hands of the Lord, so rich is he in mercy, than into the hands of men. So the Lord sent a plague on Israel, by 14 which seventy thousand men perished. But when his angel reached Jerusalem, 15 ready to carry out his errand and smite it, the Lord was moved with pity over their great calamity; and he said to the angel that would have smitten them, It is enough, stay thy hand. The angel of the Lord stood close, then, to the threshing-

⁴ Some think this was a sin of pride; and others, that David meant to introduce forced labour.

16 floor of Ornan the Jebusite; and David, looking up, saw him standing there with drawn sword between heaven and earth, with his face towards Jerusalem. At that, both he and all the elders, that went clad in sack-cloth, fell prostrate on the ground.

17 Nay, said David to the Lord, was it not at my command that the muster-roll was taken? The sin is mine, the fault is mine; these poor sheep of mine, what wrong have they done? Against me turn thy hand, O Lord my God, and against my father's race; let the people be smitten no more.

18 Then, at the bidding of the Lord's angel, Gad would have David go up to Ornan's threshing-floor and build an altar there to the Lord his God; and Gad's word, that was the Lord's word, the king made haste to obey. Ornan and his four sons, that were threshing wheat there, had hidden themselves upon sight of the angel standing above them; but now, as he saw David approaching, Ornan went to meet him, and did reverence, bowing down to earth. Give me, David said, this site of thy threshing-floor, to build an altar to the Lord here; ask what price thou wilt, only let the people be plagued no more. Why, said Ornan, let the king's grace take all he needs and do what he will with it; here are oxen for the sacrifice, here is the sled for kindling-wood, here is corn for the offering; most readily I make the gift of them all. Nay, said the king, I must pay thee their price in money; should I accept them from thee, and offer the Lord a sacrifice which costs me nothing? So David paid Ornan six hundred golden sicles, duly weighed out, for the price of his land; and there he built an altar to the Lord, and brought burnt-sacrifice and welcome-offering. Fire came down from heaven upon his altar of burnt-sacrifice, to prove the divine acceptance of his plea; and with that, at the Lord's bidding, the angel put his sword back in its sheath.

28 So David, finding that the Lord had granted his prayer upon Ornan's threshing-floor, offered more victims there. As for the tabernacle which Moses made for the Lord in the wilderness, and its altar of burnt-sacrifice, they were still, at this time, in the hill-sanctuary at Gabaon; and to that altar David might not repair, in his need of the Lord's help, so adread was he of the sword which the angel of the Lord carried.¹

22 Here, said David, is the Lord's home; here Israel shall find an altar for its burnt-sacrifices. And thereupon he held a muster of all the men of alien birth that dwelt in Israel, and chose out from these masons that should cut and dress the stone for building God's house. It was David that procured iron in abundance for door-nail and flange and socket, a weight of bronze, too, beyond all reckoning; nor was there any counting the cedar planks that were provided for David by the men of Sidon and Tyre. My son Solomon, thought he, is but a boy and still untried; and this house I mean to have built for the Lord must be such that all the world tells of its renown; I must store up for him what he needs. So it was that before his death he had all the preparations made for it.

Then he summoned the young prince and laid a charge upon him, bidding him build a house for the Lord God of Israel. My son, he told him, it was my thought to have built such a house myself, to be a shrine for the name of the Lord my God; but this message came to me from the Lord: Blood thou hast spilt in rivers and wars thou hast waged a many; not for thee to build me a house, that comest before me with so much blood on thy hands. Thou shalt have a son born to thee whose reign shall be all peace; on every side I will secure his frontiers from attack, and he will be well named Solomon, the Peaceful, such untroubled ease shall Israel enjoy during his reign. He it is that shall build a house to be the shrine of my name; I shall find in him a son, and he in me a father, and I will maintain his dynasty on the throne of Israel for all time.

Courage, then, my son; the Lord be with thee, and prosper thou ever. Build a house for the Lord thy God, as he himself has promised; and may he grant thee prudence and discernment, in ruling thy people of Israel and in holding fast by the law of the Lord thy God. Do thou but keep decree and award of his, handed on through Moses to Israel, and all shall be well with thee; play the man, and keep thy

14 courage high, never doubting, never 15 daunted. My hard-earned store thou hast, to build the house with; a hundred thousand talents of gold, and a million talents of silver, bronze and iron of what weight I know not, past all reckoning; wood and stone too I have made ready against all thy 16 needs.¹ Many workmen thou hast in thy service, stone-cutters and stone-masons and carpenters, and masters of every craft 16 to work for thee, fashioning the gold and silver, the bronze and iron, that passes all reckoning. To the task, then! The Lord will be ever at thy side.

17 On all the rulers of Israel David laid the same charge, bidding them lend Solomon 18 their aid. You can see for yourselves, he told them, that the Lord your God is with you; has he not secured all your frontiers from attack, and given you the mastery over your enemies, so that the whole land now gives ready obedience to the Lord and 19 to the Lord's people? Give yourselves, then, heart and soul, to the following of the Lord your God; bestir yourselves, and build the Lord God a sanctuary, a house dedicated to his name, where the ark that bears witness of the Lord's covenant, and all the holy things consecrated to him, may find a resting-place.

23 David was already an old man, and near his end, and had already designated his son Solomon as king of Israel, 2 when he held this muster of the rulers, priests and Levites.

3 There were thirty-eight thousand Levites over the age of thirty; twenty-four thousand of these were appointed to carry 5 out various duties in the Lord's house; of the rest, six thousand were rulers and judges, four thousand were porters, and as many more were musicians, to sound the Lord's praises with the instruments David 6 had made for psalmody. It was David who prescribed courses of service for the various Levite families, all coming down 7 from Gerson, Caath, and Merari. From 8 Gerson came Leedan and Semei, from 9 Leedan Jahiel, Zethan and Joel, (from Semei² Salomith, Hosiel and Aran; all these of Leedan's race). From Semei Le- 10 heth, Ziza, Jaus and Baria, the first two 11 taking rank separately, while Jaus and Baria counted as one family, so few were their descendants. From Caath came Am- 12 ram, Isaac, Hebron and Oziel, from Am- 13 ram Aaron and Moses. Aaron and his sons were set apart to serve in the inner sanctuary for all time, to make the Lord due offering of incense and pronounce eternal blessing in his name. Moses, too, the man 14 of God's choice, had descendants who were reckoned among the Levites; from 15 him came Gersom and Eliezer. Gersom's 16 first-born son was Subuel, and Eliezer's 17 Rohobia; Eliezer had no other sons, but he had many descendants through Rohobia.

 Isaac's first-born son was called Salomith. 18
 From Hebron came Jeriau, Amarias, Jaha- 19 ziel and Jecmaan, from Oziel Micha and Jesia. From Merari came Moholi and 20 Musi, from Moholi Eleazar and Cis; of 22 these, Eleazar died without male issue, but his daughters married their cousins, the sons of Cis. Musi's sons were Moholi, 23 Eder and Jerimoth.

Clan and family of the Levites, their 24 courses named after these clan chieftains, used to do duty in the Lord's house after reaching the age of twenty; the Lord God 25 of Israel, thought David, has given his people a resting-place, and made Jerusalem their home for ever; no more need 26 of Levites to carry the tabernacle and all its furniture this way and that. It was by 27 David's last dispositions that the Levites were registered as soon as they reached the age of twenty. They were to assist the sons 28 of Aaron in the care of the Lord's temple, in court and chamber, wash-house and shrine, wherever their service was needed.
 There was work (for the priests)³ to do in 29 setting out the consecrated loaves, looking after the unleavened cakes, the frying and the roasting, the weights and the measures.
 There was work to do (for the Levites) in 30 waiting upon the Lord with songs of praise morning and evening; there was burnt- 31 sacrifice to be offered on sabbaths, and at the new moon, and on all other days of solemnity; every occasion had its due

¹ Some think the figures here given may have been distorted by an error in copying; Solomon himself only received 666 talents of gold among his yearly revenues (III Kg. 10. 14). ² It is not clear where this other Semei comes in the genealogy. ³ In verses 29 and 30 the words in brackets do not occur in the Hebrew text, or in the Septuagint Greek.

ceremonies that must still be carried out in the Lord's presence. The tabernacle with its usages, the sanctuary with its worship, the needs of their brethren, the sons of Aaron, as they ministered in the Lord's house, were all in the Levites' charge.

24 The descendants of Aaron were also divided into separate clans. Of Aaron's sons, Nadab and Abiu predeceased him, dying childless, so the priesthood passed to Eleazar and Ithamar. Sadoc represented the sons of Eleazar, and Achimelech the sons of Ithamar, when David appointed them the different duties they were to perform; and it proved there was no parity in their numbers, the division must take place between sixteen heads of families in Eleazar's clan, eight in Ithamar's. The order of these families was arranged by lot, the heads of families in either clan taking rank as overseers of the sanctuary and of all divine things. In the presence of the king and his nobles, of the high priest Sadoc, Abiathar's son Achimelech, and all the heads of the priestly and Levitical families, the Levite scribe Semeias, son of Nathanael, inscribed the names, precedence being given first to one of Eleazar's households, then to one of Ithamar's. And the lot gave the names in this order: Joiarib, Jedei, Harim, Seorim, Melchia, Maiman, Accos, Abia, Jesua, Sechenia, Eliasib, Jacim, Hoppa, Isbaab, Belga, Emmer, Hezir, Aphses, Pheteia, Hezechiel, Jachin, Gamul, Dalaiou, Maa-ziau. These were the courses under which they exercised their office in turn, duly entering the Lord's house after the manner prescribed by their father Aaron at the bidding of the Lord God of Israel.

Among the other Levite clans, the following gave their names to courses; of Amram's sons, Subael, of Subael's, Jehedeia, of Rohobia's, Jesias, of Issar's, Salemoth and his son Jahath, . . .¹ and his four sons, Jeriau, Amarias, Jahaziel and Jecmaan; of Oziel's, Michas, his son Samir, his brother Jesia and Jesia's son Zacharias. Of Merari's Moholi and Musi, . . . Benno son of Oziau. . . Oziau son of Merari. . .

¹ It seems probable that some words have fallen out: cf. 23. 19.

² In verses 26-29 there has perhaps been some disarrangement of the names. ³ The name Semeias has dropped out in the original text; it can be supplied from verse 17.

Soam, Zachur and Hebri. . . (Moholi had a son Eleazar who died without issue) . . . Jerameel son of Cis.² And of Musi's sons, Moholi, Eder and Jerimoth. Thus were Levi's descendants arranged by clans; and these too, in the presence of king David, and Sadoc, and Achimelech, and all the chiefs of the priestly and Levitical families, drew lots to match their brethren the sons of Aaron; greater or less, all must abide by the lot's arbitrament.

25 Next, David and his captains set apart the sons of Asaph, Heman and Idithun to give praise with harp and zither and cymbals, each fulfilling their appointed office in turn. The sons of Asaph, Zacchur, Joseph, Nathania and Asarela were under the direction of their father, that took his commands from the king. The six sons of Idithun, Godolias, Sori, Jeseias, (Semeias)³, Hasabias and Mathathias, were under the direction of their father Idithun, that played the harp while they sang the Lord's praise. Heman's sons were called Bocciau, Mathaniau, Oziel, Subuel, Jerimoth, Hanania, Hanani, Eliatha, Geddelthi, Romemthiezer, Jesbacassa, Mellothi, Othir and Mahazioth. This Heman was the king's seer, interpreting the divine utterance to him; and God had made him the proud father of all these;⁴ fourteen sons he gave him and three daughters. Thus were the sons of Asaph, Idithun and Heman marshalled, at the king's express order, for their temple service of making music with cymbals, harp and zither.

The whole number, including those brethren of theirs who had skill in the divine chant, all masters of their craft, was two hundred and eighty-eight; and they cast lots for the order in which they were to take turns, without regard to seniority or to skill. The first lot fell to Joseph, that was of Asaph's clan. Of the rest, each had twelve more, his brethren and his sons, associated with him; their names were Godolias, Zacchur, Sori, Nathania, Bocciau, Oziel, Jeseias, Mathaniau, Semeias, Asarela, Hasabias, Subuel, Mathathias,

22 Jerimoth, Hananias, Jesbacassa, Hanani, 26 Mellothi, Eliatha, Othir, Geddelthi, Ma-31 hazioth, Romemthiezer.¹

26 The door-keepers, too, were divided into families. For the Corites, there was Meselemia, a son of 2 Asaph, and his seven sons, Zacharias, 3 Jadhel, Zabadias, Jathanael, Aelam, Jo-4 hanan and Elioenai; together with the eight sons of Obededom, Semeias, Joza-5 bad, Joaha, Sachar, Nathanael, Ammiel, Issachar and Phollathi; such blessing had 6 Obededom from the Lord. His grandsons, 100, through Semeias, were tried warriors 7 and heads of separate families, Othni, and his warrior brothers, Raphael, Obed, Elza-8 bad, Eliu, and Samachias. All these were descended from Obededom, and with their sons and brethren, sturdy ministrants, 9 they made a company of sixty-two; the descendants of Meselemia, with their sons and brethren, valorous men too, were but 10 twenty-eight. And for Merari there were the sons of Hosa; their father, his first-born lost, gave the chief place among them 11 to Semri; the others were Helcias, Tabelias and Zacharias. Sons and brethren Hosa had in all thirteen.

12 These were the men appointed to serve as commanders of the temple watch, 13 sharing the duty with their brethren. Lots were cast between the various families, without regard to seniority, and so the 14 various gates were assigned to them; the eastern side fell to Meselemias, the northern to his son Zacharias, a shrewd 15 man and skilful; the south, where the elders sat in council,² to Obededom's 16 family, (to Sephim and) to Hosa the western side by the gate at the head of the ascent;³ to each family its own watch.
17 Each day there must be six Levites on guard to the east, four to the north, four to the south, with two more on each side of 18 the council-chamber, and on the west, where the door-keepers had their guard-rooms, four without and two in either 19 guard-room. Thus were duties assigned to the door-keepers, all of the Corite and Merarite families.

The Levites, too, under Achias, had 20 charge of the temple treasury, and of the votive offerings. Some of these came down 21 from Ledan, son of Gersom; the heads of their families were named after Jehiel, who was descended from Gersom by Ledan, and Jehiel's two sons, Zathan and Joel. 22 These families had the permanent treasures of the Lord's house in their charge, representing the whole Caathite clan, Am- 23 ramites, Isaarites, Hebronites and Ozihelites alike; and the treasurer was Subael, 24 descended through Gersom from Moses.
Meanwhile Gersom's brother Eliezer was 25 represented by Selemith, his descendant through Rahabia, Isaias, Joram and Zechri; it was Selemith and his kindred 26 that were treasurers of the votive offerings made by king David, by head of clan and captain and chief and general under him; out of their wars and the spoils of their 27 wars, they made these offerings for the maintenance and furnishing of the Lord's house. There was much that had been 28 dedicated by the prophet Samuel, by Saul the son of Cis, Abner son of Ner, and Joab son of Sarvia; everything so dedicated was under the care of Selemith and his kindred.

The Isaarite clan, under Chonenias and 29 his sons, had the affairs of Israel, beyond the confines of the city, in their charge, as teachers and judges; and for the Lord's 30 service and the king's business in general the Hebronites, a thousand and seven hundred active men under Hasabias and his brethren, commanded the whole of 31 Israel west of the Jordan. And of the Hebronites... with all their clans and families, Jeria was the chief. In the fortieth year of king David, a register was 32 taken at Jazer in Galaad, and the active men of his clan, all in the prime of life, counted two thousand and seven hundred (heads of families). These, for the Lord's service and for the king's business, David put in charge of Ruben and Gad and the eastern half of Manasses.⁴

¹ The names in verses 10-31 are here given in the same forms as in verses 2-4 above; in the original text there are several differences, Zachur appearing as Zachur, Sori as Isari, Oziel as Isreela, Asarela as Azareel, and Subuel as Subael. ² Or perhaps, 'where the stores were kept'. ³ The words in brackets are probably due to the error of a copyist who wrote down a Hebrew word in verse 15 twice over.

⁴ The details in verses 29-32 are obscure, and it seems likely that the text has been badly handed down. After hearing that the Hebronites had charge of Israel west of Jordan, we do not expect to be told that they were registered east of Jordan, and held command there. It looks as if some other name, perhaps 27 The men of Israel were marshalled under clan chiefs and commanders and captains; the king had, besides, his commissioners, serving him at the head of their several regiments. Each of them, with twenty-four thousand men under him, went on duty once a year and was relieved at the end of a month. The first regiment of twenty-four thousand was on duty in the first month, under Jesbaam son of Zabdiel; he was descended from Phares, and he took the first month as having precedence among the commissioners. The second regiment, in the second month, was under an Ahohite, Dudia, and afterwards under another called Macelloth. The third regiment was under Banaias son of Joiada, the king's minister,¹ the same Banaias that was a leader among the thirty, and had thirty under him; his son Amizabad commanded the regiment as his deputy. The fourth was under Joab's brother Asahel, and afterwards under his son Zabadias; the fifth under Samaoth of Jezer; the sixth under a man of Thecua, Hira son of Acces; the seventh under the Phallonite Helles, from Ephraim; the eighth under Sabochai the Husathite, of the race of Zarahi; the ninth under Abiezer the man of Anathoth, from Benjamin; the tenth under Marai the Netophathite, of the race of Zarai; the eleventh under Banaias the Pharathonite, from Ephraim; the twelfth under Holdai the Netophathite, of the race of Gothoniel.

Meanwhile the tribes had their own chiefs; Eliezer son of Zechri for Ruben, Saphatias son of Maacha for Simeon, Hasabias son of Camuel for Levi, Sadoc for the race of Aaron, Eliu, David's brother, for Juda, Amri son of Michael for Issachar, Jesmaias son of Abdias for Zabulon, Jerimoth son of Ozriel for Nephthali, Osee son of Ozaziu for Ephraim, Joel son of Phadaia for western Manasses, Jaddo son of Zacharias for Manasses in Galaad, Jasiel son of Abner for Benjamin, and Ezrihel son of Jeroham for Dan; these were the chiefs of Israel.² There was no register giving the number of Israelites under twenty years of age; had not the Lord promised that they should be countless as the stars of heaven? And indeed, when Joab son of Sarvia went about to register them, he left the task incomplete, because of the divine vengeance that fell on Israel; thus the annals of king David do not give the full number of those registered.

The controller of the king's own treasure-house was Azmoth, son of Adiel; what was stored in cities, townships and fortresses was in the keeping of Jonathan, son of Ozias. As for husbandry, the farmers were under Ezri son of Chelub, the vine-growers under Semeias the Romathite, the cellarage under Zabdias the Aphonite, the olive and fig plantations all through the country-side under Balanan of Geder, the store-houses of oil under Joas. Care of the herds that grazed in Saron belonged to the Saronite Satrai, of the cattle in the low grounds, to Saphat son of Adli, of the camels to the Ismahelite Ubil, of the asses to Jadias the Mero-nathite, and of the sheep to Jaziz the Agarean. These were the controllers of the king's property.

David had an uncle called Jonathan, a prudent counsellor and a man of letters; he, with Jahiel son of Hachamoni, had charge of the royal princes. Achitophel was the king's counsellor, and Chusai the Arachite held the title of king's friend; after Achitophel came Banaias' son Joiada, and Abiathar. And the army was commanded by Joab.

28 All these notables of Israel king David now summoned to his presence, the clan chiefs, and the commissioners that were the king's own servants; commanders and captains, controllers of the royal property, princes and chamberlains, all that was powerful and all that was valiant in the city of Jerusalem. Rose he, and stood before them; Listen, he said, fellow tribesmen of mine and true lieges. I thought to have built a house, in which the ark that bears witness to the Lord's covenant should find a home, in which God's feet should have their resting-place; and all that could be prepared to that end, prepare I did. But God warned me that it that of the Ozihelites (cf. verse 23 above) has dropped out. Nor is it easy to understand why Israel proper should have claimed the services of 1,700 Levites all told, if the tribes beyond Jordan were under 2,700 heads of Levite families.

¹ Literally, 'the priest'; see note on II Kg. 8. 18. are omitted from the list.

² It is not clear why the tribes of Gad and Aser was not for me to build such a shrine for his name; I was a war-maker and a shedder of blood. Yet, when he would grant Israel an abiding dynasty, it was on me, alone of my father's house, that his choice fell. Out of all the tribes he has chosen Juda, out of all Juda my father's house; and of all my father's sons, who but I was to be king of all Israel? And he is choosing still; many sons he has given me, and among all these it is Solomon that is to reach a throne, king of the Lord's own people. So the Lord himself has told me: It is Solomon, thy heir, that shall build house and court for me. I have chosen him for my son, and he shall find in me a true father; let him ever observe decree and award of mine as they are observed this day, and his dynasty shall endure for all time. Let me speak, then, as in the presence of all Israel, with our own God listening to us. Obey, all of you, the will of the Lord our God, study, all of you, to learn it; then it shall be yours to enjoy this fair land, and bequeath it to your posterity for ever. And do thou, my son Solomon, acknowledge ever thy father's God, serving him faithfully, serving him willingly; no heart but is open to the Lord's scrutiny, no thought in our minds but he can read it. Search for him, and thou shalt find him; forsake him, and he will for ever reject thee. Meanwhile, here is this house to be built, the Lord's sanctuary; on thee his choice has fallen; courage! To the task!

Then David handed over to his son Solomon the full plan of porch and temple, of store-house and parlour and inner chamber, of the throne of mercy itself; all his designs, too, for the outer courts and for the surrounding rooms in which the permanent treasures of the Lord's house and the votive offerings were to be laid up. He told him of the order in which priest and Levite were to do all that had to be done, keep all that had to be kept, in the Lord's temple. He gave him gold by weight and silver by weight for all the appurtenances of worship, varied for various needs. Gold and silver in due measure for every lampstand and lamp of gold and silver; gold for the table on which the hallowed loaves were set forth, gold and silver for every table of gold and silver. Pure gold for fork and bowl and censer and cup; no cup of gold or silver but had its due weight apportioned;¹ pure gold for the altar of incense, pure gold for the equipage of cherubs that should spread their wings to overshadow the Lord's ark. This came to me, said he, with the Lord's own sign-manual; all the pattern he would make clear to me. Play a man's part, said David to Solomon; courage! To the task! Never doubting, never daunted; the Lord thy God will be at thy side, never failing thee, never forsaking thee, and see that thou hast strength to do all that must be done for his temple. Priest and Levite are there, ready to fulfil their appointed duties in the Lord's house; chieftains and common folk are all minded to do thy bidding.

29 This, too, David said to all who were assembled there: The Lord's choice has fallen on my son Solomon, and no other, a prince still young and untried. Heavy the task, to house God, not man. Whatever lies in me I have done, to make ready the material for the temple of my God; gold, silver, bronze, iron, wood where they were needed, onyx and jet and precious stones of all colours, abundance, too, of the best marble. Such love had I to the house of my God; and now, over and above the preparations I have made for this holy work, I offer gold and silver out of my own purse for the temple's needs; three thousand talents of Ophir gold and seven thousand talents of tried silver. All this, for gilding the temple walls, and to put more gold and silver into the craftsmen's hands.

Let every man that has the will to offer make to the Lord here and now, with open hand, his gift. So chief and commissioner, commander and captain and overseer, promised to do their part; and their gift to God's house was five thousand talents of gold, and ten thousand gold pieces, ten thousand talents of silver, eighteen thousand of bronze, and a hundred thousand of iron; others, who had precious stones in their possession, gave these in, through Jaziel the Gersonite, to the temple treasury. Great was the rejoicing of the people that day, as promise after promise was made, so generously they offered what they had to the Lord; and greatly might David himself rejoice.

- 10 Then, before all the people, he blessed the Lord's name thus: Blessed art thou, O Lord, the God of our father Israel, from the beginning to the end of time. Thine, Lord, the magnificence, thine the power, splendour and glory and majesty are thine; to thee all that is in heaven, all that is on earth, belongs, to thee the kingdom, of all
- 12 princes thou art overlord. Riches and honour come from thee; all things obey thy will; from thee power comes and dominion; only thy hand exalts, only thy hand makes strong. To thee, then, our God, we pay homage this day, to thy glorious name bring renown. That I, that this people of mine, should have the means to make thee such promises! All things belong to thee; all that thou hast from us is thy own gift; as thou seest us, we are exiles and wanderers, no less than our fathers were; our days on earth pass like a shadow, and there is no abiding here.
- 16 O Lord our God, all this store we have in readiness, for the building of a shrine to thy name, comes from thy hands; all things are thine. My God, thou readest our hearts, I know it well, and it is the honest heart thou lovest. With honesty of intent I have made all these offerings gladly, and gladly have I seen all that are here assembled make their gifts to thee.
- 18 O Lord God of Abraham, Isaac and Israel, keep this will of theirs for ever unchangeable; still be that mind theirs, a mind set on thy worship. And oh, to my son Solomon give integrity of heart; command and decree and observance of thine may he hold ever in honour, and ever perform; be it his to build the temple for which I have made provision.

Then David would have the whole assembly bless the Lord's name, and bless it they did, the name of the Lord God of their fathers; and so made reverence, to God first and then to the king. Victims, too, they slaughtered in sacrifice to the Lord; on the day following they offered in burnt-sacrifice a thousand bulls, a thousand rams, and a thousand lambs, with due libations made, and with a sacrificial banquet in which the whole of Israel shared to their heart's content. So ate they and drank that day, keeping high festival in the Lord's presence, and anointed Solomon to be their prince, Sadoc to be their priest, in the Lord's service. Thus Solomon took his seat, instead of his father David, upon the throne the Lord had appointed; winning favour and obedience from all; not one of the chiefs and rulers, not one of the royal princes themselves, but did homage and accepted Solomon as king. High pre-eminence the Lord gave him over the whole people, and such royal majesty as never yet king had in Israel.

So reigned David the son of Jesse over the whole of Israel, for forty years' space, seven at Hebron and thirty-three at Jerusalem. And he died grown old in comfort, neither length of days nor riches nor honours wanting to him, and with his son Solomon to reign as his heir. All his deeds, first and last, stand recorded by the seer Samuel, and the prophet Nathan, and Gad the man of visions; the history of his reign, and the greatness of his reign, and the times that passed during his reign, in Israel and in all the kingdoms of the world

THE SECOND BOOK OF PARALIPOMENA

SOLOMON, then, king David's heir, was firmly seated on his throne, and the Lord his God was with him, brought him to great renown. And

2 now he sent out his summons to the whole of Israel, to commander and captain and warrior chief, to all judges of the 3 people and heads of their families, and, with such great retinue, betook himself to the hill-sanctuary at Gabaon. Gabaon was still the resting-place of that tabernacle which God's servant Moses fashioned, out 4 in the desert, to be the witness of the divine covenant. The ark of God had left it, first for Cariathiarim, then for the site 5 in Jerusalem where David had brought it, giving it a tent of its own. But the brazen altar which Beseleel made, Beseleel, son of Uri and grandson of Hur, was there still 6 before the entrance of the Lord's tabernacle. To it Solomon repaired, and the whole assembly with him; on that brazen altar, before the tabernacle that bore witness of the Lord's covenant, he offered a thousand victims in sacrifice.

7 That same night, the Lord appeared to him, bidding him choose what gift he 8 would. Thou hast been very merciful, Solomon answered, to my father David, in 9 granting him a son to succeed him; and now, Lord God, make good thy promise to 10 him. Since thou hast made me king over thy people, a great people countless as the dust, grant me wisdom and discernment in 11 all my dealings with them. How else should a man sit in judgement over such a people as this, great as thy people is great? And the Lord answered, For this choice 12 thou hast made, thou shalt be rewarded. Thou didst not ask for riches or possessions, for glory, or vengeance upon thy enemies, or a long life. Thy prayer was for wisdom and discernment, to make thee a better judge for the subjects I have given thee. Wisdom and discernment thou shalt have; and I will give thee riches and possession too, and such glory as never king shall have before or after thee.¹

So from the hill-sanctuary at Gabaon, 13 from the entrance of that tabernacle which bears witness of the covenant, Solomon returned to Jerusalem. There he reigned over Israel, and mustered a great force of 14 chariots and of horsemen; a thousand and four hundred chariots, and horsemen twelve thousand; some of these were kept in towns set apart for stabling them, others in Jerusalem at the king's side. Silver he 15 made as common in Jerusalem as stone, and cedars as plentiful as the sycamores that grow in the valleys. And horses were 16 brought to him from Egypt and from Coa, where his agents went to buy them for a fixed sum; six hundred silver pieces for a 17 chariot, and for a horse a hundred and fifty; the kingdoms of the Hethites, too, and the kings of Syria sold him horses at the same price.²

2 A house Solomon would build, to be a shrine for the Lord's name, and for himself a royal palace. So he made a register of seventy thousand men that should carry burdens on their backs, and eighty thousand to quarry stone in the hills; of overseers, he would have three thousand six hundred. And he sent a message to 3 Hiram, king of Tyre: When my father David was building the palace in which he dwelt, thou didst send him planks of cedar.
4 Do as much for me, now that I would build a temple dedicated to the Lord, the God I worship; there to burn incense of rich spices, keep hallowed loaves set forth continually, offer sacrifice at morning and evening, at sabbath and at new moon, and on all the feasts our changeless rite enjoins in the Lord's honour. A great fabric it
5 needs must be; great above all gods is the God we worship, and to build a house worthy of him is indeed too high a task for man's powers; who am I, that I should be his architect, whom heaven itself, and the heaven above the heavens, cannot contain?

Yet into his presence we must come, to offer incense there. A craftsman I would have of thee, that can work skilfully in gold and silver, bronze and iron, tapestry of purple and scarlet and blue; that can help the workmen my father David has left me, here in Jerusalem, carve the figures they would. Send me planks, too, of cedar and juniper and pine; I know well how deftly thy men can fell trees on Lebanon; mine shall be apprenticed to them, and cut me planks in abundance; it is a great temple, a famous temple, I would build. Thy woodmen shall have for their maintenance forty thousand quarters of wheat, and as many of barley, of wine and of oil six hundred and forty tuns.

To this Hiram, prince of Tyre, wrote in answer, A loving Lord this people has, to give them such a king as thou art. Blessed be the name of the Lord God of Israel, maker of heaven and earth, for giving David an heir so wise and so versed in affairs, so prudent and so discerning, fit to build a temple for the Lord, a palace for the king! I am sending thee a wise man and a skilful, one Hiram, that is a master of his craft. A woman of Dan was his mother, his father a Tyrian. Well he knows how to work in gold and silver, bronze and iron, in marble and in wood, in tapestry of purple and blue, lawn and scarlet thread; to carve what carving thou wilt, and devise all that needs devising, thy craftsmen to aid him, and the craftsmen the king's grace, thy father, left thee. For the rest, my lord, do thou send us wheat and barley, wine and oil, as thou hast promised, and we will set about cutting the planks thou needest, on mount Lebanon. They shall be brought in rafts by sea to Joppe, and it shall be thy part to carry them to Jerusalem.

It was king Solomon, not content with the register his father David had made, who registered afresh all the aliens that dwelt in Israel; the number of these proved to be a hundred and fifty-three thousand six hundred; seventy thousand to carry burdens on their backs, eighty thousand to quarry stone in the hills, and three thousand six hundred overseers.

3 Solomon, then, set about the building of the Lord's house, there on mount Moria, the place of David's vision, where David had bought the threshing-floor of Ornan the Jebusite. It was in the second month of his fourth year as king that he began building, and the foundations he laid for the Lord's house, using the old cubit measure, were sixty cubits long and twenty cubits wide. In front was a porch twenty cubits long, to match the width of the temple, and (a hundred and) twenty cubits high,¹ the gilding within was of the purest gold. The main building was faced with planks of pine, that had plates of fine gold attached to them, and it had a pattern of palm branches and chains interlaced; its floor was laid in precious marble, nobly patterned. The whole building, beam and pillar and wall and doorway, was faced with none but the purest gold, and on the walls of it were carvings of cherubim.

He made, too, an inner shrine, twenty cubits long like the width of the main building, and twenty cubits wide. Some six hundred talents of gold were used in the facing of it; the very nails were of gold, each of fifty sicles' weight; even the upper rooms were faced with gold. Within the inner shrine stood two carved cherubs, all plated with gold; the four wings of them had twenty cubits' stretch, either touching the wall with one of its wings, five cubits long, and its fellow cherub with the other. Thus, with outspread wings both of them, they occupied the whole space of twenty cubits; upright they stood on their feet, with their faces turned towards the outer building. A veil, too, he made, of fine linen thread twined with threads of blue, purple and scarlet, with a tapestry of cherubs. And before the doors of the temple he set up two pillars thirty-five cubits high, with capitals of five cubits; and he made chains (within the inner shrine) which he hung round the capitals, each interspersed with a hundred figured pomegranates.¹ At the very entrance of the temple he set up these pillars, one on the right, to which he gave the name of Jachin, and one on the left, to which he gave the name of Booz.

4 He made a brazen altar, too, twenty cubits in length and width, ten in height. And he cast a great round basin ten cubits from brim to brim, five cubits high, and with a girth of thirty cubits. It rested on figures of oxen, and without, a chain of moulding ran round its belly in two rows. The oxen were cast in metal, and supported the basin, twelve of them, three facing north, three west, three south, three east, with the basin so resting on them that their hind-quarters were hidden beneath it. The basin was a palm's breadth thick and its brim curved as the brim of a cup does, or of an open lily; it held ninety-six tuns. He also made ten smaller basins, and put five on the right, five on the left, for the washing of all that was to be offered in burnt-sacrifice; in the great basin the priests themselves washed.²

Within the temple were ten golden lamp-stands, of a prescribed pattern, five to the right and five to the left, and ten tables disposed in the same way. And there were a hundred goblets, all of gold. There were precincts, too, for the priests, and a great court; the doors of this court were covered with bronze. The great basin was put on the right, towards the south-east.

Pot and fork and bowl Hiram made, and all that the king needed for the service of the Lord's temple; pillar and soffit and capital, and net-work over capital and soffit; four hundred figured pomegranates, and two lengths of net-work pattern, two rows of pomegranates to each length of net-work, draped over capital and soffit alike. He made stands, and smaller basins for the stands to carry, the large basin, with the twelve oxen beneath it, and pot and fork and bowl besides all else. All such ornaments for the Lord's house did Hiram, king Solomon's master craftsman, fashion out of the purest bronze; the king had them cast in the clay soil of the Jordan valley, between Socoth and Saredatha; a great multitude of them, so that the weight of bronze was never counted or known.

Other appurtenances, too, of the Lord's house must Solomon make; the golden altar, and the golden tables on which the hallowed loaves were set out, the lamp-stand with its lamps, all of pure gold, ready to burn in due course before the shrine, and the flowered bosses for them, and the lamps themselves, and the tongs, of pure gold too. Nothing but must be made of the purest gold, incense-boat and censer and bowl and spoon. Carved doors within, leading to the shrine, temple doors without, alike were plated with gold. Thus Solomon completed all the work needed for the service of the Lord's house.³

5 And now Solomon must bring into the temple all the votive offerings his father David had made; silver and gold and lesser ware, all must be stored up in its treasure-chamber. Then he sent for the elders of Israel, the chiefs of the tribes and the heads of clans; all must meet at Jerusalem to bring the Lord's ark home from its resting-place in the Keep of David, which we call Sion. It was on the great feast day of the seventh month that all Israel obeyed the king's summons; and when the last of the chieftains had arrived, the Levites took up the ark and brought it in; the tabernacle, too, with all its equipment, and all the furniture of the sanctuary that remained still in the tabernacle, priests and Levites brought to the spot. Meanwhile king Solomon, with the whole Israelite assembly, all that had gathered before the ark, offered rams and bulls; so many were the victims that there was no counting them. So the ark that bears witness of the Lord's covenant was borne by the priests to the place designed for it, there in the temple's inner shrine where the cherubim spread their wings; spread them over the very place where the ark rested, to protect it and protect the poles that bore it. These poles jutted out indeed, being longer than the ark they bore, so that the ends of them could be seen by one standing before the shrine; but beyond the temple limits they were seen no more; and 10 so they have remained to this day. And nothing was in the ark except the two tablets Moses laid up there on mount Horeb, when the Lord gave the sons of Israel a law to live by, after their escape from Egypt.

¹ The words enclosed in brackets are obviously meaningless. Some think that, by a very slight error, the Hebrew word for the 'inner shrine' has been written by a mistake for a word meaning 'a necklace'.

11 At last the priests left the sanctuary; all of them who were present had purified themselves so as to gain admission, for as yet they had no times and manners of service 12 planned out for them. To the east of the altar stood Levites and singers, the clans of Asaph, Heman and Idithun alike, all robed in lawn, playing on their cymbals, zithers and harps; and now they had a 13 hundred and twenty priests with them, sounding with trumpets. Trumpet and voice, cymbals and flute, with all the other instruments, sounded aloud so that the noise of them could be heard far off, as they praised the Lord together; Praise the Lord, they sang, the Lord is gracious; his mercy endures for ever. And with that, the whole of the Lord's house was wreathed in 14 cloud; lost in that cloud, the priests could not wait upon the Lord with his accustomed service; his own glory was there, filling his own house.¹

6 Where the cloud is, cried Solomon, 2 the Lord has promised to be. It is true, then, the house I have built in his honour is to be, for ever, his dwelling-3 place. With that, the king turned to bless the whole assembly; all Israel, that stood 4 waiting there. Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, he said, who has fulfilled in act the 5 promise he made to my father David. So many years since he had rescued his people from Egypt, and never a city among all the tribes of Israel had he chosen to be the site of his dwelling-place or the shrine of his name, never a prince had he appointed 6 over his people of Israel, till at last he chose Jerusalem, to enshrine his name there, and 7 David for his people's ruler. And when he, my father, would have built a house in 8 honour of the Lord God of Israel, the Lord told him that he had done well to 9 conceive such a purpose in his heart; But it is not for thee, he said, to build me a house. A house shall be built in my honour, but by thy son, the heir of thy body.

That promise of his the Lord has fulfilled; 10
 I have come forward in my father David's place, sit upon the throne of Israel, as the Lord promised I should; it has been mine to build a house to the honour of the Lord, Israel's God, and to find a home for this 11 ark, witness of the covenant he made with Israel's sons.

Then Solomon stood before the Lord's 12 altar in full view of all Israel, and stretched out his hands. In the midst of the great 13 court he had bidden them set down a block of bronze, five cubits across either way and three feet in height; on this he mounted, and there, in the sight of all Israel, kneeling down with his hands lifted up towards heaven, he prayed. Lord God of Israel, he 14 said, thou reignest without rival in heaven and earth, making good thy merciful promises to all who follow thee with undivided hearts. And thou hast not disappointed 15 thy servant, my father David; thy act matches thy word; this day, who doubts it? Do not forget, Lord God of Israel, that 16 other promise of thine to David, that he should always have an heir to sit on the throne of Israel, would but his sons guide their steps, like David himself, as in thy presence; let that promise too, Lord God 17 of Israel, be ratified!

Folly it were to think that God has a 18 dwelling-place on earth. If the very heavens, and the heaven that is above the heavens, cannot contain thee, what welcome can it offer thee, this house which I 19 have built? Yet it has not been built in vain, O Lord my God, if thou wilt give heed to thy servant's prayer, that sues for thy favour, listen to the cry of entreaty he makes before thee. This I ask, that thy 20 eyes should be ever watching, night and day, over this temple of thine, the chosen sanctuary of thy name; be this the meeting-21 place where thou wilt listen to thy servant's prayer. Whatever requests I or my people Israel make shall find audience here; thou wilt listen from thy dwelling-place in heaven, and listening, wilt forgive.

Has a man wronged his neighbour, and 22
 is he ready to clear himself of the charge by an oath? Then, if he comes to this house of thine, to swear the lie before thy altar, thou, in heaven, wilt be listening, and wilt 23 do justice between thy servants, passing

sentence upon the guilty and avenging the wrong, acquitting the innocent and granting him due redress.

24 Are thy people of Israel condemned to flee before their enemies, in punishment of the sins they will surely commit? Then, if they come back to thee in repentance, call on thy name and plead with thee in this temple of thine, thou wilt be listening in heaven; forgive the sins of thy people Israel, and restore them to the land which thou gavest to their fathers.

26 Does the sky bar its gates against them, and give no rain, in punishment for their sins? Then, if they come here acknowledging thee with prayer and repentance, and turn away, in their sore need, from their sins, do thou, in heaven, listen, and grant thy servants the people of Israel forgiveness; teach them to guide their steps aright, and send rain on the land thou hast given them for their home.

28 Is there famine in the land, or pestilence, blight or mildew, plague of locust or caterpillar? Does some enemy press hard on it, besieging its city gates? Whatever be the plague or the sickness that weighs us down, if any one among thy people, accepting that plague or sickness as his own, makes prayer to thee, stretching out his hands in this temple, thou, in heaven, thy high dwelling-place, wilt be listening; do thou relent, and send to each man the lot his deeds deserve, thou, who alone readest the hearts of human kind. So will men learn to fear thee and to follow in thy paths, long as they live to enjoy the land thou gavest to our fathers.

32 Nay, is it some stranger, with no part in thy people Israel, who yet comes here from distant lands, for love of thy renown, for the constraining force thy power displays, and worships thee in this temple? Still, in heaven, thy secure dwelling-place, thou wilt grant the alien's prayer. So shall all the world come to hear of thy renown, and fear thee no less than Israel itself; shall doubt no more that this temple I have built claims thy protection.

34 Sometimes thy people will go out to levy war upon their enemies, here and there at thy bidding. Then, as they fall to prayer, let them but turn in the direction of the city thou hast chosen, the temple I have built there in thy honour, and thou, in heaven, wilt listen to their prayer for aid, wilt maintain their cause.

But what, if they have offended thee by their faults? No man but is guilty of some fault; it may be thou wilt give them up, in thy anger, into the power of their enemies, and as prisoners they will be banished into countries far away, or alien countries within sight of home. But ere long, in their banishment, they will come back to thee with repentant hearts, crying out to thee, poor exiles, We are sinners, we have done amiss, rebels all! In that alien land, the land of their captivity, they will turn back to thee with all the purpose of their heart and soul. Then, if they turn in prayer towards the land thou gavest their fathers, the city of thy choice, and the temple I have built in thy honour, thou, in heaven, on thy peaceful throne, wilt once more listen to their prayer for aid, wilt maintain their cause still. And thou wilt relent towards thy people, though they have sinned against thee.¹

My God! Ever be thy eyes open, ever thy ears attentive to the prayer that is offered here. Up, Lord, take possession of this, thy home, with the ark that makes known thy power; Lord God, let thy priests go clad in triumph, thy faithful people rejoice in thy bounty. Lord God, do not reject my prayer, the king thou hast anointed; bethink thee of the loving designs thou hadst for thy servant David before him.²

7 Scarce had Solomon finished his praying, when fire came down from heaven and consumed the burnt-sacrifice, consumed all the victims; the glory of the Lord, too, filled the temple, and the priests might not enter; his own glory was there, filling his own house. The fire that fell, the brightness of the Lord's visible presence, was seen by all Israel; there on the stone pavement they fell down to earth in worship, crying, Praise the Lord, the Lord is gracious, his mercy endures for ever. King and people offered their victims in the Lord's presence; the beasts king Solomon slew that day, when he and all the people dedicated the Lord's house, were twenty-two thousand bulls and a hundred and

² Or perhaps, 'the acts of mercy done by thy servant David'.

6 twenty thousand rams. There stood the priests at their task, and the Levites with the instruments of sacred music, that king David had given them to praise the Lord with, playing David's own chant of everlasting mercy, while the priests led with their trumpets, and all the people stood 7 around. That day, the king must needs hallow the middle part of the court before the Lord's house, burning there the burnt-sacrifice and the fat taken from the welcome-victims; the brazen altar he had made would not suffice for these and for the bloodless offerings too. After this, king
8 Solomon spent seven days in keeping the feast of Tabernacles, and with him a great multitude from the whole land of Israel, that stretched from the pass of Emath 9 down to the river of Egypt; and the eighth day he kept as a great holiday, after seven days given up to the temple dedication, 10 and seven to the feast. At last, on the twenty-third day of the month, he sent the people home, rejoicing with full hearts over the mercies the Lord had shewn to David, to Solomon, and to his own people of Israel.¹

11 When Solomon had finished building the temple, and his own palace, and brought all his plans for one and the other to a prosperous issue, the Lord spoke to him in a vision seen by night. I have listened to thy prayer, he said; this place, none other, shall be the home of my sacrifices. Shut I the heavens, so that no rain should fall, give I charge to the locust to ravage the country-side, send I pestilence 12 to destroy my people; if they, this people of mine, thus dedicated to my name, will betake themselves to my presence in entreaty, and repent of their ill doings, I, in heaven, will listen, will pardon their sins, 13 will bring healing to their country. Open my eyes shall be, my ears attentive to every man's prayer that here prays to me; I have set this place apart and hallowed it, to be the shrine of my name for all time; never 14 a day but my eyes shall be watching, my heart be attentive here.

17 Do thou guide thy steps, like thy father, as in my presence, do thou fulfil all I command, hold true to observance and decree of mine; and I will raise up a dynasty 18 to follow thee; such was my promise to thy father David, that he should always have an heir to sit on the throne of Israel. But 19 if you are content to turn your backs upon me, neglecting the decrees and commands I have given you, betaking yourselves to the service and the worship of alien gods, then I will pluck you up by the roots out 20 of the land I gave you, and this temple, which I have hallowed as the shrine of my name, shall be thrust away out of my sight; it shall be a proverb and a by-word among the nations. It shall be a monument to the passers-by, and they will ask in wonder, 21 Why has the Lord treated this land, this house so cruelly? And the answer will come, Because they forsook the Lord their God, who rescued their fathers from the land of Egypt, and betook themselves to the worship and service of alien gods; that is why all this ruin has come upon them.²

8 Twenty years passed, after Solomon had built the Lord's temple and his own palace; then he set about fortifying the towns which Hiram had made over to him, and establishing Israelite inhabitants there.³ He marched against Emath Suba, 3 and took possession of it, fortified Palmyra, 4 out in the desert, and other fastnesses in the Emath country. He rebuilt Bethoron, upper and lower, making two walled cities there, bolted and barred against attack; Baalath, too, and all those other fortress-cities which bear Solomon's name, cities where he stationed his chariots and his horsemen. In Jerusalem, on Lebanon, all through his kingdom Solomon built whatever he had the whim to design. Some of the old population was still left,
5 Hethites, Amorrhites, Pherezites, Hevites, Jebusites, that were no true breed of Israel, but came down from the stock which had 6 been spared by the invaders; these king Solomon made into bondservants, as they are to this day. Among the Israelites, he 7 would have no man enslaved to the royal

¹ vv. 4-10, cf. III Kg. 8. 62-66.

² vv. 11-22, cf. III Kg. 9. 1-9.

³ The corresponding passage in the third book of Kings refers to a cession of cities by Solomon to Hiram, in return for his help in building the temple. Some think the twenty cities were made over to Hiram for twenty years as payment, and that the present passage deals with the moment when he gave them back. But if so, the account given in the earlier book is a confused one. There may have been many rectifications of frontier between Solomon and his neighbours at this time, if only in connexion with royal marriages, cf. III Kg. 11. 1.

service; it was from these he drew his warriors and his courtiers, the commanders of his chariots and his horsemen. Five hundred and fifty captains king Solomon had, that issued his commands to the people at large. He must build a new house, too, for Pharaoh's daughter, so that she might dwell in David's Keep no longer. I will not house wife of mine, said he, in David's home, that was king of Israel; the ark of the Lord has found its way there, and it is hallowed ground now.

Solomon used the altar he had built to the Lord in front of the temple porch for offering burnt-sacrifice day by day, as the law of Moses enjoined, on sabbaths, too, and at the new moon, and for the three feasts that came round yearly, the feasts of Unleavened Bread, of Weeks, and of Tabernacles. And he assigned to the priests the duties they were to perform, as his father David had prescribed them; and to the Levites their duties of singing praise, and of helping the priests with their task, as the needs of each day required; and to the door-keepers their various posts. All that God's servant David had enjoined must be done; neither priest nor Levite might go beyond the king's orders, in this or in the keeping of the sacred treasures.

All that he needed king Solomon had by him, from the day when he laid the foundations of the Lord's house till the day when he finished it; after that, he betook himself to Asiongaber, and Ailath, in Edom, on the shore of the Red Sea, where Hiram's men met him with ships and skilful mariners. These, with Solomon's own men, sailed for Ophir, and brought back four hundred and fifty talents of gold to the royal coffers.²

9 And now Solomon was visited by the queen of Saba. His fame had reached her, and she came to make trial of his power with knotty questions. Great was the wealth she brought with her to Jerusalem; her camels were loaded with spices and abundant gold and precious stones. And when she met Solomon, she told him all the thoughts that exercised her mind; every doubt he resolved, no question of hers but found an answer. And when she saw how wise a man he was, saw, too, the house he had built, the food that was on his table, the lodging of his servants, the order and splendour of his court, the fine attire of his cup-bearers, and what victims he offered in the Lord's temple, she stood breathless in wonder. And she said to the king, It was no false tale I heard in my own country, of the powers thou hast, of the wisdom which is thine. I could not believe what they told me, without coming and seeing it for myself; now I find that half of it was lost in the telling, here are wonders surpassing all I heard. Happy thy folk, happy these servants of thine who wait ever on thy presence, and listen to thy wise words. Blessed be the Lord thy God, that would have a throne for himself, and thee, a king of his own, to sit on it! He loves Israel indeed, and means to preserve it evermore, that has appointed such a king to do justice and to make award for it.

A hundred and twenty talents' weight of gold she gave to king Solomon, with many spices and precious stones; never were such spices as the queen of Saba gave to king Solomon. (Though indeed Hiram's fleet, when it brought back gold from Ophir, brought sandal-wood, as well as precious stones; and of this sandal-wood king Solomon made pedestals for temple and palace, harp and zither for his musicians; never was such wood seen in Juda.) Solomon, in his turn, gave the queen of Saba all she desired and asked for, more than ever she brought with her; and so she went back to her own country, with all her retinue.

The weight of gold that reached Solomon every year was six hundred and sixty-six talents, not counting what was brought by the envoys of different countries, by his own merchantmen, and by the kings of Arabia, with the governors of their provinces; these, too, brought gold and silver to king Solomon. Two hundred shields king Solomon made of the gold;³ six hundred sicles of gold went to one shield; besides three hundred golden bucklers, three hundred sicles of gold being used for the plating of each; and all these the king put away in the store-chamber of the building that was called the Forest of Lebanon. He also made a great throne of ivory, and lined it with gold unalloyed; six steps led up to it, and the footstool was all of gold. This throne had an arm at either side, and a lion standing by it; twelve other lions stood on the steps, six on either side; no other kingdom had a throne to match it. Of gold all the plate was when the king feasted, of pure gold all the ornaments in the house called the Forest of Lebanon; in those days, silver was little thought of. Every three years the king's fleet and Hiram's would sail to Tharsis, whence they came back laden with gold and silver; with ivory, too, and apes and peacocks for their freight.

So, both in riches and in renown, Solomon outvied all the kings of the world; and kings from every part of the world craved his audience, to make proof for themselves of the wisdom God had put in his heart. And all these brought him gifts, so that gold and silver ware, presents of clothes and armour, spices, too, and horses and mules came in year by year. Forty thousand horses king Solomon had in his stables, twelve thousand chariots, and horsemen with them; some he kept in his chariot cities, and others at his side in Jerusalem. And he was overlord of all the kings from the river Euphrates to Philistia, and to the frontiers of Egypt. Silver he made as common in Jerusalem as stone, and cedars as plentiful as the sycamores that grow in the valleys; horses he had from Egypt and from all the world over.¹

What else Solomon did, first and last, is to be found in the book that was written by the prophet Nathan, in the prophecy of Ahias the Silonite, and in the vision of the seer Addo that pronounces doom against Jeroboam son of Nabat. For forty years Solomon reigned at Jerusalem over all Israel; then they laid him to rest with his fathers, with the Keep of David for his burying-place, and the throne passed to his son Roboam.

10 This Roboam betook himself to Sichem; at Sichem the whole of Israel had assembled to crown him king.

² But meanwhile Jeroboam, son of Nabat, who had fled to Egypt to be out of king Solomon's reach, had come back on hearing the news of his death; and he, too, was summoned to meet them. He, and all Israel, came to make a request of Roboam; Thy father, they said, made us bear a bitter yoke. Less thou must ask of us than those cruel exactions, those stern commands, if we are ever to be servants of thine. Give me three days, he said, and then come back to hear my answer. So, when the people had left him, he asked advice first of the older men that had been courtiers in the life-time of his father; what answer should he make to the people? Why, they told him, if thou wilt but court their favour, and win them with gracious words, they will never cease giving thee loyal service. But he left their advice unheeded, and began to take counsel instead of the younger men who had grown up with him, and were of his following; How think you? he asked. What answer shall I make to the people's request that I would lighten the yoke my father laid on them? And these, men that had been brought up with him in luxurious ways, gave him advice in their turn. Do they complain that thy father laid a heavy yoke on them, and ask for relief? Then tell them there is more strength in thy little finger than in all the breadth of thy father's back; if his yoke fell heavy on them, thine shall be heavier still, if thy father's weapon was the lash, thine shall be the scorpion.

So the third day came, and Jeroboam, with all the people at his back, kept their trust with him. And the king, instead of heeding the advice which the older men had given him, spoke to the people harshly, with such words as the younger men would have him use, If my father's yoke fell heavy on you, mine shall be heavier still, if his weapon was the lash, mine shall be the scorpion. Thus the king refused to fall in with the people's request; the Lord's will was to give effect to the promise he had made, through Ahias the Silonite, to Jeroboam son of Nabat. The people, thus churlishly answered, cried out, David is none of ours, not for us the son of Jesse; go back, men of Israel, to your homes! David's rule for David's tribe! And with that, Israel dispersed to their homes, leaving Roboam to reign over such Israelites as lived in the cities of Juda. And now, when Aduram, who had charge of the levy, came to them in the king's name, the Israelites stoned him to death; whereupon Roboam mounted his chariot and betook himself, with all speed, to Jerusalem. From that day to this, the men of Israel have refused allegiance to the dynasty of David.¹

11 Upon reaching Jerusalem, Roboam mustered the whole forces of Juda and Benjamin, a hundred and eighty thousand tried warriors, to do battle with the Israelites and recover his kingdom. But the Lord sent word to the prophet Semeias, Here is a message for Roboam, son of Solomon, king of Juda, and for all the Israelites of Juda and Benjamin. You are not to march out, the Lord says, and make war upon your own brethren; go home, every man of you; all this is my doing. Learning that this was the Lord's will, all went home, and never marched out against Jeroboam.²

Roboam had his capital at Jerusalem, but there were many other cities in Juda he fortified, Bethlehem, Etam, Thecue, Bethsur, Socho, Odollan, Geth, Maresa, Ziph, Aduram, Lachis, Azecha, Saraa, Aialon and Hebron. All these cities of Juda and Benjamin were fastnesses of his, each of them walled about, and furnished with a commander, and stores of food, wine and oil, and an armoury full of shields and spears; no pains did he spare in making them secure. Juda and Benjamin were his subjects, and from their homes in every part of Israel the priests and Levites rallied to him. Precincts and lands must be left behind, to Juda and Jerusalem they must betake themselves, now that Jeroboam and his heirs would have none of their divinely appointed ministrations; Jeroboam must have his own priests, to serve the hill-shrines, and the devil-gods, and the calves he had made. Nay, in all the tribes of Israel there were dedicated hearts that had recourse still to the Lord God of Israel; these, when they had victims to offer, would present themselves at Jerusalem, before the Lord God of their fathers. These added strength to the kingdom of Juda, and lent courage to Roboam, the son of Solomon, but only for three years. Only for three years did they follow loyally in the steps of David and Solomon.

Roboam married, first Mahalath, daughter of David's son Jerimoth, then Abihail, daughter of Jesse's son Eliab, the mother of Jehus, Somoria and Zoöm, then Absalom's daughter Maacha, who bore him Abia, Ethai, Ziza and Salomith. Roboam had eighteen wives and sixty concubines, who bore him twenty-eight sons and sixty daughters; but Maacha, Absalom's daughter, he loved best of all. And it was to Maacha's son Abia that he gave the foremost place among the royal princes, meaning to make him king. This prince was abler than the rest, and had more influence up and down Juda and Benjamin, as well as in the garrison cities. All alike must be well cared for, and wives a many found for the royal house.³

12 Now that Roboam was strong, and firmly seated on his throne, he defied the divine law, and all his people did the like.⁴ Then, in his fifteenth year, their sin against the Lord was punished; Sesac, king of Egypt, marched on Jerusalem with a thousand and two hundred chariots, with sixty thousand horsemen; nay, there was no counting the hordes that followed with him, Libyan and Troglodyte and Ethiopian all at once. All the strongest cities fell before him, and at last he reached Jerusalem itself. Thereupon the prophet Semeias came into Roboam's presence, where he sat with all the chief men of Juda, that had taken refuge in Jerusalem at Sesac's approach. This is the Lord's message for you, he told them; You have abandoned me, and now I am abandoning you to the mercy of Sesac. King and chieftains cried out in dismay, The Lord's sentence is just. And now, seeing them humbled, the Lord sent his word to Semeias, Their pride is humbled; I will spare them from ruin. A little aid they shall have from me, nor shall my vengeance rain down upon

³ The sense of this verse is obscure, and the text doubtful. Some understand it as meaning that king Roboam distributed his sons among the various districts of his kingdom. It is not clear whether it was Roboam or Abia who demanded many wives, and whether this was done, by one or the other of them, for himself or for the royal princes.

⁴ 'His people', literally 'Israel', curiously used here in the sense of 'Juda'.

Jerusalem with Sesac for its instrument.

8 But he shall be their master; they shall learn the difference between serving me 9 and serving an earthly king. Thus Sesac, king of Egypt, raised the siege of Jerusalem, but not until he had removed all the treasures of temple and palace. Among the spoils he carried away were the golden 10 shields Solomon had made, and in place of these, Roboam made shields of bronze, which he handed over to the chief shield-bearers that kept guard at the palace en-11 trance. When he made a progress into the Lord's house, they were brought in by the shield-bearers, and carried back after-12 wards to their armoury. Well for the men of Juda that their pride was humbled; they were spared the Lord's vengeance; were not doomed to perish, like a race in whom no good is to be found.

13 So Roboam took courage, and ruled his people yet. He was forty-one years old when he came to the throne, and for seventeen years he reigned at Jerusalem, the city the Lord chose, out of all Israel's tribes, to be the shrine of his name. His mother was 14 called Naama, an Ammonitess. An ill life his; here was no heart that learned to have 15 recourse to the Lord. All he did, first and last, is to be found set out fully in the writing of the prophet Semeias and the seer Addo. All through his reign there was 16 war between him and Jeroboam. Then he was laid to rest with his fathers, with the Keep of David for his burying-place; and the throne passed to his son Abia.

13 Abia, coming to the throne of Juda in the eighteenth year of Jeroboam, 2 reigned three years at Jerusalem; his mother was called Michaiä, daughter of Uriel from Gabaa. Between Jeroboam and Abia, a state of war continued.

3 With four hundred thousand warriors, picked men all, Abia came out to offer battle, and with eight hundred thousand, picked men too, Jeroboam came out to 4 meet him. It was at mount Semeron, in Ephraim, and there Abia took his stand;
Here is a message, he cried, for Jeroboam, 5 a message for all the men of Israel. Doubt there is none that the Lord God of Israel has pledged the kingship of it to David and all his heirs for all time, by an oath in-6 violable. Yet here is Jeroboam, son of Nabat, that held office under king Solomon, David's heir, rebelling against his own master; here are restless spirits, upstart rogues, have rallied to his side, and had their way against Roboam, that was true heir to Solomon. What could he do to withstand them, so new to his task and so faint-spirited? Think you now to maintain yourselves against that kingdom which David's line rules by divine commission?

Your numbers indeed are many; but what gods protect you? Only the golden calves Jeroboam made for you. For these, you have cast out the priests of the Lord, Aaron's race, and the Levites with them;
you must needs make priests of your own, like the heathen around you; the first comer, bring he a bull with him or seven rams for his hallowing, may be a priest, fit priest for the gods that are no gods. Our God is the Lord, unforsaken still; the priests that serve him are of Aaron's true breed; we have Levites to be their ministers. Day in, day out, they offer the Lord burnt-sacrifice; incense is ours, made as the law prescribes, and the loaves set out on the hallowed table; the golden lamp-stand is ours, and the lamps ever lit at evening; the commands of the Lord our God, among you so slighted, we keep.
Here, then, is an army that has God for its leader; it is his priests that will sound their trumpets for the attack. Men of Israel, do not fight against the Lord, or it will go ill with you.

While he thus addressed himself to them, Jeroboam was laying an ambush in his rear; still confronting them, he would surround the men of Juda unawares. And they, when they looked about them and found themselves attacked from front and rear at once, cried out to the Lord, while the priests with their trumpets sounded the alarm; a great shout went up from the men of Juda, and as they shouted, the Lord struck terror into Jeroboam's heart, and the hearts of all Israel that were Abia's and Juda's enemies; to Juda the Lord gave the mastery, and they drove Israel before them in flight.

A great victory Abia won that day, and there were five hundred thousand of Israel's warriors that fell; a sore blow for Israel's pride, and a day of great rejoicing for Juda, that put their trust in the Lord

God of their fathers. Abia pursued Jeroboam in his flight, and took three cities of his, Bethel and Jesana and Ephron, with their daughter villages, nor, while Abia reigned, might Jeroboam any more withstand him. Afterwards the Lord's vengeance fell on Jeroboam, and he died. So was Abia firmly established on his throne; fourteen wives he wedded, and had twenty-two sons by them, and sixteen daughters. What else Abia did, the life he led and all his exploits, may be found fully set down in the writings of the prophet Addo.

14 So Abia was laid to rest with his fathers, with the Keep of David for his burying-place, and the throne passed to his son Asa; for the first ten years of his reign, the land was at peace. His was a life well lived, in obedience to the Lord's will; altar and hill-shrine of alien worship he overthrew,¹ broke the images, cut down the forest sanctuaries, and bade Juda have recourse to the Lord, the God of their fathers, carrying out all his law enjoined. No city in Juda but he rid it of altar and of shrine, and so he reigned in peace. And now, the Lord so blessing him with peace, his reign free from every alarm of battle, he set about fortifying the cities in his realm. Rebuild we these cities, he said to the men of Juda, and wall them about, making them fast with tower and bolt and bar, while we are still free from wars, and the Lord God of our fathers grants to us, his worshippers, a time of peace with our neighbours. So build they did, without let or hindrance.

Three hundred thousand men of Juda this Asa had in his army, that carried shield and spear, besides two hundred and eighty thousand men of Benjamin, armed with shield and bow, trained warriors all. When Zara the Ethiopian marched in, and reached as far as Maresa, he had a million of fighting men and three hundred chariots to match against them. But Asa went to meet him, and offered battle in the valley of Sephata, close by Maresa. And there he made his plea to the Lord God; It is all one to thee, Lord, be they few or many to whom thou wouldst bring thy aid. Help us now, O Lord our God; in thee, in thy name we put our trust, boldly offering battle to such hordes as these. Lord, thou art our own God; do not let man have the mastery of thee. With that, the Lord struck terror into the Ethiopians as Asa and the men of Juda approached, so that they turned and fled; all the way to Gerara Asa and his men pursued them, till nothing was left of them; it was the Lord that smote them, his army that did battle against them; and rich were the spoils of that victory. All the cities about Gerara, now overcome with terror, they conquered and plundered, carrying away their booty with them; the sheep-folds, too, they broke down, and drove away sheep and camels in abundance. And so they returned to Jerusalem.

15 It was then that the spirit of the Lord moved Azarias, son of Oded, to prophesy. He it was went out to meet Asa, and thus greeted him: Listen to me, Asa, listen to me, tribes of Juda and Benjamin. If the Lord declares for you, it is because you have declared yourselves for him; have recourse to him, and he is yours, forsake him, and you will find yourselves forsaken. Israel he has abandoned; long must they wait without true God, true prophet or true law, till affliction brings them back to the Lord, their own God, and they look for him again, and find him. Meanwhile no peace, only constant marching to and fro; alarm of battle in the kingdoms all around, nation fighting against nation, city against city, because the Lord would have them ever restless, ever in sore straits.² But you, take courage; never slacken your resolve; still for your loyal service you shall have reward.

Upon hearing the inspired words of this prophet, Azarias son of Oded, Asa's courage rose; never an idol was left in Juda or Benjamin, or the cities he had recovered in the hill-country of Ephraim. He also dedicated anew the altar of the Lord before the temple porch, summoning all Juda and

² Some think verses 3-6 refer to the past history of God's people in the time of the Judges; some, that they look forward to the future of the ten tribes which revolted against Juda. Verse 3 in the original begins simply: 'Long must Israel wait'.

Benjamin, and with them new-comers from Ephraim, Manasses and Simeon; not a few of these Israelites had transferred their allegiance to him, when they saw what favour he enjoyed with the Lord his God. In the third month of Asa's twenty-fifth year they assembled at Jerusalem, and sacrificed to the Lord that day, out of their spoil and out of the cattle they had driven away, seven hundred bulls and seven thousand rams. Then he set about solemnly ratifying the covenant which bound them to have recourse to the Lord God of their fathers, heart and soul. Death to high or low, death to man or woman, Asa cried, that turns to any god save the Lord God of Israel! Loud were their cries of acclaim, loud rang trumpet and horn, as the oath was taken, binding every man in the territory of Juda under a curse. Loyally they swore, loyally kept their oath, nor did they turn to the Lord in vain; peace undisturbed on every frontier was their reward.

His own mother, Maacha, Asa deprived of her royal dignity, for making a forest shrine that had Priapus' image in it; the image he broke, and burnt the fragments of it, and cast the ashes into the river Cedron. He did not abolish the hill-shrines, but all his days his heart was true to the Lord; and he enriched the Lord's house with gold and silver and great array of other ornaments, some dedicated by his father, some in performance of his own vows.¹ And war there was none till Asa's reign had reached its thirty-fifth year.

16 Then, in the thirty-sixth year of Asa's reign, Baasa king of Israel invaded Juda, and began making a fortified city of Rama, so as to deny Asa's subjects free passage. Whereupon Asa took out all the silver and gold that was left in the treasure-chambers of temple and palace; this he sent to Benadad, king of Syria, at Damascus, with the message, There is an alliance between us; were not thy father and mine ever at peace? Witness these gifts of silver and gold I send thee; do thou annul the treaty thou hast made with Baasa, king of Israel, and help me drive him out of my country. Thus approached, Benadad sent out his generals with orders to attack the cities of Israel; Ahion they overcame, and Dan, and Abelmaim, and all the fortified cities of Nephthali. So Baasa, when the news reached him, left his plan of fortifying Rama half-finished; and Asa, with all Juda at his back, carried off the stones and wood-work that should have been used towards it, and with these fortified Gabaa and Maspha instead.

Thereupon the prophet Hanani came into the royal presence, with this message: This was ill done, to call the king of Syria to thy aid. If thou hadst put thy trust in the Lord, the army of Syria itself should have been at thy mercy. Stronger in chariots and horsemen, stronger in their huge array, were the Libyans and Ethiopians over whom the Lord gave thee mastery, in return for thy trust. Wide as earth is the Lord's scrutiny, and there he gives mastery where he finds hearts that have utter faith in him. Thou hast played a fool's part; henceforward, there shall be no lack of wars to threaten thee. At this, Asa fell into a rage, and had the prophet committed to prison, to vent his high displeasure; it was at this time, too, that he put many of his subjects to death.

All that Asa did, first and last, is set down in the Annals of the kings of Israel and Juda. In the thirty-ninth year of his reign, a malignant disease attacked his feet; nor, in that sickness, did he have recourse to the Lord, trusting rather in the skill of physicians. So, dying in the fortieth year of his reign, he was laid to rest with his fathers,² and they buried him in the tomb that had been dug for him by his own orders, in the Keep of David. There he lay, on his own bed, that was piled high with spices and rare ointments, mingled with all the perfumer's art; and these, in high funeral pomp, they burned over his grave.

17 The throne passed to his son Josaphat, who made his territories secure against threat from Israel; all the fortified cities of Juda he garrisoned, and kept troops on guard throughout Juda, and in the cities his father Asa had taken from ¹ vv. 16-18, cf. III Kg. 15. 13-16. The statement there made, that Asa and Baasa were at war all through their reigns, perhaps means only that their relations were unfriendly, not (in view of the present passage) that there was any border fighting.

² vv. 1-13, cf. III Kg. 15. 17-24.

3 Ephraim. Josaphat reigned, and the Lord was with him, because the first years of his father (David)¹ were the example he followed; he put his trust, not in gods of the country-side, but in his own father's God; kept close to the divine commandments, far from the sins of Israel. So the Lord gave him a firm hold on the reins of government; from all parts of Juda gifts came to Josaphat, till riches and renown were his in abundance. Boldly he upheld the Lord's commandments, sweeping away hill-shrine and forest sanctuary from Juda.²

7 In the third year of his reign, he would have some of his chief officers go out and give instruction in the townships of Juda, Benhail, Obdias, Zacharias, Nathanael, and Michaeas, and with them certain Levites, Semeias, Nathanas, Zabadias, Asael, Semiramoth, Jonathan, Adonias, Tobias and Tob-Adonias, and two priests, Elisama and Joram. They took a copy of the Lord's law with them, the better to instruct the men of Juda, and went round all its cities, teaching the common folk.

10 Never a king in all the countries about Juda durst levy war against Josaphat, such terror the Lord had struck into their hearts; the very Philistines brought him gifts, and paid a tribute of silver, and the Arabs must bring in their herds, seven thousand seven hundred rams and as many goats. Josaphat, then, grew to great magnificence, filling Juda with fortresses and walled towns; and all through the cities of Juda he had store in abundance. At Jerusalem, he was surrounded by brave warriors, clans thus enrolled: from Juda, three hundred thousand fighting men under the command of Ednas, one of his chieftains; from Johanan, and two hundred thousand under Amasias son of Zechri, that was set apart for the Lord's service. And (from Benjamin)³ two hundred thousand with bow and spear under brave Eliada, and a hundred and eighty thousand, well equipped for battle, under Jozabad. All these were close to the king's side, not counting those he had marshalled in the walled cities from end to end of Juda.

18 Rich and renowned, Josaphat had allied his house by marriage with the house of Achab; and now, when some years had passed, he went to visit him at Samaria. Many a ram, many a bullock did Achab slaughter to make him and his retinue welcome; then he had a plan to put before him, that they should march against Ramoth-Galaad. And what answer made Josaphat, king of Juda, when Achab, king of Israel, proposed that they should attack Ramoth-Galaad together? Thou and I, said he, are all at one; my army is all thine, we will stand at thy side in battle. But he would have Achab consult the Lord first. So Achab sent for his prophets, four hundred in number, and asked whether they should attack Ramoth-Galaad or let it be? Go to the attack, they said; the Lord means to make the king's grace master of it. But still Josaphat asked whether there was no prophet of the Lord to be found, so that they could make enquiry through him. Why yes, the king of Israel told him, there is one man through whom we might ask for the Lord's counsel; yet is he no friend of mine, still he will be prophesying that ill fortune is to befall me, never good; Michaeas is his name, the son of Jemla. Nay, my lord king, said Josaphat, think better of it. So Achab summoned one of his chamberlains, and bade him fetch Michaeas the son of Jemla with all speed.

There sat the king of Israel and Josaphat king of Juda, each on his throne, in all their royal state, in an open space by the gate of Samaria; and there in their presence all the prophets said their say. One of them, Sedecias the son of Chanaana, had provided himself with a pair of horns fashioned in iron; With these, he said, thou shalt toss Syria about, till thou hast made an end of it. And all the prophets had the same word for him; Go and attack Ramoth-Galaad, they told him, and a blessing on thy journey! The Lord means to make the king's grace master of it. So the messenger who went to summon Michaeas told him, Here are all the prophets bidding the king good speed, like one man; pray join thy voice to theirs, and prophesy

¹ The word 'David' is not given by some manuscripts of the Septuagint Greek; it may be a misleading footnote which has crept into the text, the real reference being, not to David, but to Asa. ² The hill-shrines referred to must have been those of false gods, not of the Jewish religion; cf. III Kg 22. 44. ³ The words 'from Benjamin' are omitted, probably by accident, in the Latin.

13 good fortune. Nay, answered he, as the Lord is a living God, the word I speak shall be the word he gives me.

14 So he came into the king's presence, and when he was asked whether it were better to attack Ramoth-Galaad, or to let it be, he answered, Go to the attack; all shall be well with you, and your enemies shall be

15 at your mercy. What, cried Achab, shall I never cease adjuring thee in the Lord's 16 name to tell me only the truth? Listen then, said he; I had a vision of all Israel straying over the mountains like sheep that had no shepherd, and the Lord's word came, They have no master now; let them

17 disperse to their homes in peace. (It is as I told thee, Achab said to Josaphat; still he 18 prophesies ill fortune, never good.) Then Michaeas went on, Here is a message to thee from the Lord. I had a vision of the

19 Lord sitting on his throne, with all the host of heaven waiting on his pleasure, to right

20 and left. And the Lord said, Who is to beguile Achab, king of Israel, so that he will march to Ramoth-Galaad, and there 21 meet his fall? One said this, one that; till at last a spirit came forward and stood in 22 the Lord's presence, offering to beguile Achab. And how wilt thou beguile him?

23 the Lord asked. I will go abroad, said he, and on the lips of all his prophets I will make myself an influence to deceive. Deceive them thou shalt, the Lord said, and have thy way with them; go abroad, then,

24 and carry out thy errand. And now, see what a lying influence the Lord has spread among these prophets of thine! For indeed the Lord has determined on thy ruin.

25 At that, Sedecias son of Chanaana went up and gave Michaeas a blow on the cheek; Has the spirit of the Lord passed me by, he asked, and spoken to none but thee?

26 And Michaeas only answered, Thou shalt live to see the day when thou must needs take refuge in an inner room, to hide there.

27 Then the king of Israel gave his orders; Take Michaeas hence, said he, and put him in the charge of Amon, the city governor, and of Joas, son of Amelech. And give them this royal command of mine, that they are to imprison him, and give him scant allowance of food and drink, till 28 I come back safe and sound. Come thou back safe and sound, Michaeas said, and mine was no message from the Lord. Witness my words, all you that stand here!

29 So the king of Israel, and Josaphat king of Juda, marched out to attack Ramoth-Galaad. And Achab said he himself would go into battle in disguise; let Josaphat, meanwhile, wear his royal robes. So none knew the king of Israel by his array, when he went into battle. To all the captains of his cavalry the king of Syria had given the same orders: Press for no other mark, high or low, but the king of Israel himself. And these, upon sight of Josaphat, cried out that this was the king of Israel, so that armed men surrounded him on all sides; but he cried out to the Lord, who brought him succour, and turned aside their attack. Then, seeing that this was not the king of Israel, the captains of the cavalry let him be. It was an archer, letting fly a shaft at haphazard, that gave Achab a chance wound; it fell between neck and shoulder-blades, and Achab bade his charioteer wheel about, and carry him away from the fight, wounded as he was. With night, the battle came to an end; all day, the king of Israel had stood upright in his chariot, facing the Syrians, and did not die till evening.¹

19 But Josaphat came home safe and sound to Jerusalem. There he was met by the prophet Jehu, son of Hanani, who said, What, wilt thou comfort the sinner, ally thyself with the Lord's enemies? Nay, thou wouldst have brought the Lord's vengeance on thyself, but for those worthy deeds thou hast to shew. Well for thee that thou hast rid Juda of those shrines, taken that resolve to have recourse only to the God of thy fathers!

And now, returned to his capital, Josaphat set out on a progress all through his kingdom, from Bersabee to the hill country of Ephraim, recalling the Lord God of their fathers to his people's minds anew. In every fortified city he appointed judges; and this was the charge he gave them: Take heed how you perform your office; it is the Lord's commission you hold, not man's, and according to the award you make, yourselves will be judged. As you fear the Lord's vengeance, do not spare yourselves any pains; when the Lord our God gives sentence, there is no wrongful award, no room for flattery of the great, or for bribery. At Jerusalem, too, he set up courts, under Levites, and priests, and heads of families, to give sentence and award in the Lord's name to the citizens. As you fear the Lord's vengeance, he warned them, go about your work faithfully, with sincere hearts. Suits will be remitted to you by your brethren in the other cities, of feud between clan and clan, of issues between law and decree, between statute and award given; yours to resolve their doubts, lest they should incur guilt in the Lord's eyes, and bring punishment on you and themselves alike. So shall your duty be done faultlessly; where God's rights are concerned, your high priest Amarias will preside over you, and Zabadias son of Ismahel, Juda's own chieftain, will have charge of every case that touches the king's prerogative. The Levites are at your side to instruct you; boldly and carefully set about your task, and the Lord will be with you to defend the right.

20 After this the Moabites and the Ammonites, with certain tribesmen that lived in the Ammonite country, mustered their forces to levy war on Josaphat; and messengers came to tell him that a great army was marching against him, from the country beyond the Dead Sea and from Syria; they were encamped even now at Asasonthamar (which is the same as Engaddi). Most fervently, in his great dismay, Josaphat betook himself to prayer, proclaiming a fast for the whole of Juda; whereupon all Juda gathered to offer the Lord their plea; from every city they assembled to prefer their common request. There, then, Josaphat stood in the Lord's house, at the entrance to the New Court, with all Jerusalem and Juda assembled round him. Lord God of our fathers, he prayed, from thy throne in heaven thou rulest all earthly kingdoms, holding a sceptre of such majesty that none may resist thee. Thou it was didst overthrow all the dwellers in this land to make room for thy people Israel; thy irrevocable gift it was to the sons of Abraham, thy friend. Here, then, thy dwell, and built a temple in thy honour. And if we come into thy presence, they said, here in the shrine of thy own name, crying out to thee in time of need, when disaster falls upon us, pestilence, or famine, or the avenging sword, then do thou hear, and save. See now what need is here! We are attacked by Ammon, Moab and Edom, the very nations whose frontiers thou didst forbid Israel to cross, after the march out of Egypt. Our fathers turned aside, leaving them unharmed, and this is our reward; we are to be driven out from the home thou hast given us. It is for thee, our God, to grant redress; we have no strength of our own to meet such an onslaught as this; despairing hearts, that know not where else to turn, we look to thee!

All Juda stood about him, there in the Lord's presence, even mothers with babes in their arms, children at their side. And now, upon one man in all that throng, the Lord's spirit fell; it was a Levite of Asaph's clan, Jahaziel, come down from Mathanias through Zacharias, Banaias and Jehiel. Listen, Juda, he cried, listen, citizens of Jerusalem, listen, king Josaphat, to a message from the Lord. Put an end to your fears, do not be dismayed at the sight of this great army; it is God's battle, not yours. Go down to-morrow and offer them battle, as they climb up the slope of Sis; it is there you will find them, at the head of the ravine which faces the Jeruel desert. Not yours the battle, you have but to stand firm, Juda and Jerusalem, and watch the Lord coming to your aid. No flinching, no faint hearts; go down to-morrow, and the Lord will be at your side.

At this, Josaphat and Juda and all the citizens of Jerusalem fell down face to earth, there in the Lord's presence; and the Levites, sons of Caath and Core, cried aloud till the heavens rang, in praise of the Lord God of Israel. Dawn came, and they began their march across the desert of Thecue; Josaphat, as they set out, came forward to speak. Listen to me, he said, men of Juda; listen, citizens of Jerusalem. Trust in the Lord your God, and you have nothing to fear; trust his prophets, and all shall go well with you. Thus he encouraged them, and would have the Lord's minstrels praise him in chorus, marching before the army and singing, Praise the Lord, the Lord is gracious; his mercy endures for ever.

22 As the chant rose, the Lord turned the stealthy approach of Juda's enemies, Ammon and Moab and Edom, to their own 23 discomfiture. First Ammon and Moab fell on the Edomites, cutting them down till there was nothing left of them; and when this was done, the two armies turned 24 against one another, till their feud brought destruction on both. And when the men of Juda reached the vantage-ground that overlooks the desert, nothing was to be seen, look where they would, but the corpses of the slain; not a man was left 25 there alive. So Josaphat and his men went down to strip them of their spoil, and found there, among the dead, such plunder of harness and clothes and precious ornaments as they could not carry with them; it was three days before all the booty was 26 taken away. Then, on the fourth day, they mustered in the Valley of Blessing, which still bears the name they gave it when they 27 returned thanks to the Lord there; and so went back to Jerusalem, men of Jerusalem and men of Juda alike, with Josaphat at their head, full of joy at the triumph the Lord had given them over their enemies; 28 into Jerusalem they came, and into the Lord's house, with harp and zither and 29 trumpets playing. So the Lord struck terror into the hearts of the heathen, with the news that he himself had fought against 30 Israel's enemies; Josaphat reigned in security, and on every frontier God gave him peace.

31 This reign of his over Juda began when he was thirty-five years old, and for twenty-five years it lasted, there in Jerusalem. His mother's name was Azuba, daughter of Selahi. He followed the example of his father Asa, and never swerved 32 aside from the Lord's will; though indeed he did not abolish the hill-shrines; not yet had his people turned their whole minds to worshipping the Lord, the God of their 33 fathers. What else Josaphat did, first and last, is told in the record preserved by Jehu son of Hanani, among the Annals of the kings of Israel.

35 At the end of his life, Josaphat made an alliance between Juda and Israel, under king Ochozias, that reigned very evilly.
 36 Together they would build a fleet that should sail for Tharsis; and build it they did, in Asiongaber; but Eliezer, son of Dodau from Maresa, prophesied to king Josaphat, The Lord has shattered those hopes of thine, because of thy alliance with Ochozias; and the ships were wrecked before ever they reached Tharsis.¹

21 Josaphat, then, was laid to rest with his fathers, with the Keep of David for his burying-place, and the throne passed to his son Joram. Many brothers
 2 Joram had, princes of the blood; Azarias, Jahiel, Zacharias (Azarias), Michael and Saphatias were all sons of Josaphat, king of Juda, and to all these their father gave 3 rich presents of silver and gold, money for their needs, and walled cities in Juda to be their homes, but to Joram, the eldest, he left his kingdom. So Joram came to his 4 father's throne, and when he was firmly established on it, he slew all these brethren of his, and some of the chief men of Juda with them.

This Joram was thirty-two years old 5 when he became king, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted eight years. He followed 6 the example of the Israelite kings, just as Achab's line did; he himself had married a daughter of Achab's. So he defied the 7 Lord's will; but the Lord would not bring ruin upon David's race; had he not made a covenant with him, promising to keep the lamp of his line unquenched for ever?
 8 It was in Joram's days that the Edomites renounced their allegiance to Juda, and set up a king of their own choice. Joram 9 indeed marched out across the river, with his captains and all the horsemen he could muster, and when the Edomites surrounded him, he broke through them with a night attack, broke through the commanders of their chariots; but Edom has 10 never been subject to Juda from that day to this. Lobna, at the same time, revolted from his allegiance.² An ill day it was for him when he forsook the Lord, the God of his fathers, raised hill-shrines in the 11 cities of his realm, taught Jerusalem to betray her troth, and made sinners of Juda.

A letter, too, was brought to him, written by the prophet Elias, with a message from the Lord, the God of his father David: Not for thee the example of thy father Josaphat, and of king Asa, that reigned in Juda before thee; thou wouldst play the wanton, like the house of Achab, teach the men of Juda and Jerusalem to betray their troth, after Israel's fashion, and wouldst slay thy brethren, princes of thy own father's line, better men than thyself. A heavy punishment the Lord will send upon thee, taking toll of thy people, of thy sons, of thy wives, and of all thou hast; and for thyself, a foul disease shall attack thy inward parts, that grows worse from day to day until thy very bowels drop out.

After this, the Lord embroiled the Philistines against Joram, and the Arab tribesmen, too, that dwell next the Ethiopians. These marched upon Juda and ravaged it, carrying off all the palace treasures, and his sons and wives with them; never a son was left to Joram but Joachaz, the youngest of all.¹ And, not content with this, the Lord smote him with an incurable disease of his inward parts. Wearily the days passed, lengthened themselves out till two whole years had run their course; till at last he voided his very bowels, and his sickness ended only with death. Right foul was the manner of his ending, and his subjects made no burning at his funeral, as they did for his ancestors. He had reigned but eight years, that was thirty-two years old when he came to the throne; a life ill lived. And they laid him to rest in David's Keep, but not in the burying-place of the kings.

22 It was his youngest son, Ochozias, that the citizens of Jerusalem made king in his place. All his elder brothers had been killed by Arab freebooters, that fell on the camp where they were lodged; and so Ochozias became Joram's heir, and reigned in Juda. When he came to the throne, he had lived (twice) a score of years and two,² and his reign at Jerusalem lasted but a year. His mother's name was Athalia, descended from Amri. He too followed the example of Achab's line, his mother prompting him to impious deeds. Little wonder if he defied the Lord's will no less than Achab's race, since these were his counsellors, to his undoing, after his father died.

He shared, too, their designs, and marched with the king of Israel, Joram that was son to Achab, against Hazael, king of Syria. They met at Ramoth-Galaad, and there Joram was wounded by the Syrians, so that he must go back to Jezrahel to recover; wounds a many he had received in the battle we speak of. And when Joram, son of Achab, lay sick at Jezrahel, Ochozias son of Joram king of Juda came there to visit him.³ It was the divine will, for Ochozias' punishment, that he should pay Joram this visit, and with him should offer battle to Jehu, son of Namsi, whom the Lord had anointed king to make an end of Achab's line. Jehu it was that fell in with the princes of Juda, sons of Ochozias' kinsmen and courtiers of his, and slew them, at the time when he was exterminating the line of Achab; Jehu it was that made enquiry after Ochozias himself, who was found hiding in the kingdom of Samaria, and so brought before him and slain. Yet he was given burial; was he not descended from king Josaphat, a king who had set his whole heart on following the Lord?⁴

Little hope there seemed then of Juda being governed any longer by Ochozias' kindred. The more so because his mother, Athalia, no sooner heard the news of her son's death, than she set about exterminating all the blood royal of Joram's dynasty. Only Joas, Ochozias' son, was rescued by the princess Josabeth, who stole him away while all the other princes were being slain, and hid him, with his nurse, in the room where the bedding was stored up. This Josabeth, who hid him, was a daughter of king Joram's, sister to Ochozias and wife to the high priest Joiada. Joas, then, escaped murder at Athalia's hands, and for the six years of her life that remained he was hidden away in the house of God.

¹ It appears that the 'brethren' of Ochozias (or Joachaz) mentioned in IV Kg. 10. 12 were only distant kinsmen, so called by the conventions of Hebrew speech.

² The reading 'forty-two' in the Hebrew text is clearly a scribe's mistake for 'twenty-two', which is preserved in the Septuagint Greek. This is evident both from IV Kg. 8. 26, and from the fact that Joram was only forty when he died.

³ ev. 4-6, cf. IV Kg. 8. 27-29.

⁴ This passage seems to correct the impression we should otherwise derive from IV Kg. 9. 27, that Ochozias died of the wound he received during his escape at Jezrahel. Jehu, it appears, killed him at Mageddo; 'in Samaria' is simply a way of describing the northern kingdom, as in III Kg. 13. 32.

23 Then, in the seventh year, Joiada was emboldened to act. He took some of the captains into his confidence, Azarias son of Jeroham, Ismahel son of Johanan, Azarias son of Obed, Maasias son of Adaja and Elisaphat son of Zechri; and these went round the whole of Juda, mustering the Levites and the clan chiefs in each city and summoning them to Jerusalem. There, in the Lord's own house, they all engaged their loyalty to the king; Here, said Joiada, is the heir to the throne; we must make him king, in pursuance of the Lord's will for the posterity of David. And now, here is your task. Those of you, priests, Levites and door-keepers, whose turn it is to mount guard this week, will be keeping watch, a third of them over the gates, a third over the royal palace, and a third at the Foundation-stone Gate. All the rest are to be in the temple courts, none entering the Lord's house itself, except those who have kept themselves free of defilement for that end, priests and Levites who are their ministers, but all alike attentive to the Lord's command. The king must have a bodyguard of Levites, all fully armed, ready to slay anyone else who tries to enter the temple, attending the king closely wherever he goes. All the commands which the high priest Joiada gave them, the Levites, and the rest of Juda with them, faithfully carried out; mustered their men, alike those who mounted guard and those who were relieved of duty that week, since the high priest would not let the companies who had finished go home. Joiada supplied the captains with spears, shields and bucklers, that king David had put up as offerings in the Lord's house; and from right to left of the temple, facing the altar and the temple itself, he drew up the whole array of his supporters, that were armed with daggers, to protect the king. Then they brought the young prince out, and gave him the crown and the pledge that went with it, a copy of the law to be held in his hand, and so they made him king. The high priest Joiada, with his sons, anointed him and prayed over him, and cried out, Long live the king! Meanwhile, the noise of all this stir and shouting reached the ears of Athalia, and she made her way into the temple, where the crowd was gathered, to find the king standing on a dais, there at the entry, with chieftains and bodyguard about him, while all the folk rejoiced, blowing trumpets and playing on instruments of many kinds, and shouting their praises. Well might she rend her clothes, and cry out, Treason, treason! Thereupon Joiada came out, and bade the captains and the commanders of the army lead her away beyond the temple precincts, and there dispatch her; She must not be slain in the Lord's house, the priest told them. So they caught her by the neck, and as she passed along the horse-way that leads to the palace, she was slain.

The High Priest Joiada makes Joas King

After this, Joiada would have a covenant made, that bound himself and the people and the new king to be the Lord's own people. And the whole populace went into Baal's temple and destroyed it, breaking down its altars and its images, and killing Mathan, that was Baal's priest, there before the altar. Then Joiada set up officers to look after the Lord's temple; but under the direction of those priests and Levites to whom David had assigned their tasks there, in offering burnt-sacrifice to the Lord as Moses bade them, and singing praise after David's own fashion. Porters, too, he placed at all the temple gates, that should forbid entry to all who were in any way defiled. Then, with the captains and the men of renown, with the nobles and all the common folk of the land, he escorted the king from the Lord's house by way of the upper gate into the palace, and there they set him on his royal throne. All through the land were great rejoicings, and the city had rest, now that Athalia lay dead.¹

24 Thus Joas came to the throne as a boy of seven years old, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted forty years. His mother's name was Sebia, a woman of Bersabee. As long as the high priest Joiada was alive, Joas obeyed the Lord's will, and it was Joiada who found him his two wives, that bore sons and daughters to him.

And now Joas had a mind to put the Lord's house in repair. He summoned priests and Levites, and bade them go round the cities of Juda, collecting money from all that were of Israel's race every year, so as to repair the temple of the Lord their God; and this he would have them do with all speed. But the Levites went about their work slowly, and the king must needs send for the high priest Joiada; Why hast thou been at no pains, he asked, to make the Levites collect money throughout Juda and Jerusalem, the same money which the Lord's servant Moses bade all Israel devote to the needs of the tabernacle?¹ Here is God's house all laid waste by Athalia, the goddess queen, and those sons of hers, that would deck Baal's temple with all the votive offerings that were once in the temple of the Lord. Then the king bade them have a chest made, and this they put by the outer gate of the Lord's house. And word went round Juda and Jerusalem that each man was to pay the tax Moses enjoined on all Israel, out in the desert. Gladly did chieftains and common folk together come in with their gifts for the Lord's treasury, piling the chest high till it was full. When the Levites saw that a great sum was amassed, it was time they should take it into the royal presence. The king's secretary would come in, and with him one that was appointed by the high priest; together they poured out the money that was in the chest, which they then put back in its place. Every day this was done, and the great sum thus collected was paid over by the king and Joiada to the master-builders, who hired stone-cutters with it, and other craftsmen, to repair the Lord's house; workers, too, in iron and bronze, so as to prop up what was like to fall down. Busily these men went about their tasks, till the breach was healed under their hands, and the building restored to its former state; the house stood firm once more. It was only when they had finished all this that the rest of the money collected was brought before the king and Joiada; with this they made all the appurtenances for worship and offering sacrifice in the temple; bowls, too, and other ornaments of gold and silver.²

All through Joiada's life-time burnt-sacrifice was offered in the Lord's house;

but at last he grew old, and the full tale of his years was complete; he died at the age of a hundred and thirty. And for his great services to Israel and to David's house, they buried him in David's own Keep, among the kings. But now that he was dead, the chieftains of Juda came in to do the king reverence, and with their smooth speech won him over to another mind; forgotten, now, was the Lord's temple, God of their fathers though he were; they must worship before forest shrines, and carved images. This guilt of theirs brought the Lord's vengeance on Juda and Jerusalem; still he would send them prophets, to bring them back to him, but their protest went unheeded. At last the divine spirit fell on the high priest Zacharias, that was son to Joiada; full in the presence of the people he stood up and gave them a message from the Lord God: What means it that you so transgress the Lord's command, to your peril, forsaking him, and by him forsaken? But they, at the king's orders, gathered about him and stoned him, there in the court of the Lord's house. Such was the gratitude of Joas; for the great services the father had done him, the son must die. And as he died, he said, May the Lord look on this, and exact the penalty.

A year passed, and the army of Syria was on the march against Joas. Into Juda, into Jerusalem they came, killed all that were of note among the people, plundered, and sent back what they had plundered to their master at Damascus. It was but a small force of Syrians that came, yet the Lord gave them the mastery over a great host; and all because Juda had forsaken the Lord God of their fathers. A shameful punishment Joas must undergo, and when they left him, they left him a prey to heavy sickness. Then, in vengeance for the murder of the high priest's son, courtiers of his own conspired against him and slew him in his bed. So dying, he received burial in the Keep of David, but not in the burying-place of the kings. It was Zabad, son of the Ammonitess Semmaath, and Josabad, son of the Moabitess Semaroth, that made the plot against him. What sons he had, what moneys he amassed, how he restored the house of God, may all be found set out in the Records of the Kings; and the throne passed to his son Amasias.

25 Amasias was twenty-five years old when he came to the throne, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted twenty-nine years; his mother's name was Joadan, a woman of Jerusalem. This Amasias obeyed the Lord's will, but not with full obedience. Once his power was firmly established, he put his father's murderers to death, but not their children; the Lord's injunction, laid down by the terms of Moses' law, was that a father must not die for his son's guilt, or a son for his father's; no guilt but his own should bring a man to death.¹

Then he mustered the whole of Juda, marshalling them by their clans, and appointing commanders and captains for the whole of Juda and Benjamin. When the count was taken of all that were above the age of twenty, he found himself in command of three hundred thousand fighting men, armed with spear and shield. To these he added a force of a hundred thousand warriors from Israel, hired for a hundred talents of silver. But now a messenger from God came and told him, My lord king, this force of Israelites must not march with thee; to Israel, to the whole kingdom of Ephraim, the Lord denies his aid. Count as thou wilt on the strength of thy array, God will give thy enemies the mastery; he alone sends victory and defeat. And when Amasias asked what was to become of the hundred talents he had spent on the mercenaries from Israel, the answer came, Worse losses yet the Lord can make good to thee. Thereupon Amasias drew off the Israelite troops and bade them go home; go home they did, but full of indignation against Juda. And he, with renewed confidence, led his own army out to the Valley of the Salt-pits, where they killed a thousand Edomites on the field; ten thousand more they captured alive, and took them to a steep rock, from whose summit they threw them down headlong, so that all were dashed to pieces. But meanwhile the army which Amasias had sent home, instead of taking them into battle with him, scattered here and there among the cities of Juda, all the way (from Samaria)² to Bethoron, killing three thousand of the inhabitants, and carrying away great store of plunder.

After this victory over the Edomites, Amasias brought home with him some of the idols men worshipped there in Seir; and these gods he made his own, worshipping them himself and burning incense before them. And the Lord, much angered with him, sent a prophet to ask, What gods are these thou worshippest, that could not rescue their own people from thy onslaught? He answered, What wouldst thou be the king's counsellor? Peace, or thy life shall pay for it! And the prophet said, as he turned to go, So much ill done, and no heed paid to my counsel! Certain it is the Lord has doomed thee to die. And now Amasias, upon ill advice taken, sent a challenge to Joas, son of Joachaz, son of Jehu, king of Israel, Come, let us have a trial of strength! And this message he had in answer: Said Lebanon thistle to Lebanon cedar, Let my son have thy daughter to wife. But down came wild beasts from Lebanon forest, and all the thistle got was, he was trampled under-foot. At the thought of thy victory over Edom, thy heart is puffed up with pride. Keep thyself at home, do not invite disaster, to thy own and Juda's ruin. But Amasias would have his way; the Lord's will was that he should fall into his enemy's hands, to punish him for worshipping the gods of Edom. So Joas, king of Israel, marched out, and they faced one another while Amasias, king of Juda, was still in his own territory, at Bethsames; here the men of Juda were routed by the Israelites, and scattered to their homes in flight. Thus Amasias, son of Joas, son of Joachaz, king of Juda, was captured by Joas king of Israel at Bethsames, and taken back to his own city of Jerusalem; where Joas made a breach in the wall four hundred cubits long, from the gate of Ephraim to the Corner gate, carried off all the gold and silver and other ware that was to be found in the temple, in the treasury of Ob-edom, and in the royal treasury, took hostages besides, and so made his way back to Samaria.

² The mention of Samaria is not in place here. We should expect the name of some town in the south of Juda, and on the way to Edom: perhaps Sama (Jos. 15. 26) or Samir (Jos. 15. 48).

Amasias, son of Joas, king of Juda, survived this Joas, son of Joachaz, king of Israel, fifteen years. What else Amasias did, first and last, is set down in the Record of the kings of Israel and Juda. But ever since he forsook the Lord, fresh troubles befell him. A conspiracy was made against him in Jerusalem, and when he fled to Lachis they sent in pursuit of him and put him to death there; afterwards his body was brought back to Jerusalem in a horse-litter, and there buried with his fathers in David's Keep.¹

26 Thereupon the whole people of Juda chose one of his sons, Ozias, a boy of sixteen years, to succeed his father Amasias; he it was who carried out the designs of his dead father by fortifying the harbour of Ailath and restoring it to the possession of Juda. Sixteen years old he was when he came to the throne, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted fifty-two. His mother's name was Jechelia, a woman of Jerusalem. He obeyed the Lord's will, as faithfully as once his father Amasias did. As long as Zacharias lived, a man taught by divine visions, Ozias had recourse to the Lord, and as long as he had recourse to the Lord, all went well with him.

He it was that marched out to battle with the Philistines, and laid in ruins the walls of Geth, and Jabnia, and Azotus; and built towns to command Azotus and the Philistines.² Such victory God gave him over the Philistines, the Arabs, too, that dwelt in Gurbaal, and the Ammonites; the Ammonites paid him tribute, and the renown of his many victories reached the very frontiers of Egypt. It was Ozias, too, that fortified the Corner Gate, the Valley gate, and the other gates on that side of Jerusalem, by building towers over them. Towers, too, he built out in the desert, and dug cisterns in plenty, for his many herds that grazed both in the lowlands and in the desert solitudes; he had vines, too, and vine-dressers to tend them, in the hill-country and about the town of Carmel; he was a man that loved husbandry.

He had an army of fighting men, marshalled in readiness for battle by the scribe

Jehiel and the controller Maasias; and out of all his generals he chose Hananias to command it. The clan chiefs that led it, all tried warriors, were two thousand six hundred in number; and the whole force under their command was one of three hundred and seven thousand five hundred fighting men, to maintain the king against his enemies. For all this great array Ozias provided shield and spear, helmet and breastplate, bows, too, and slings for shooting stones. At Jerusalem, he contrived engines of many sorts, poised on tower or on wall-corner, that discharged arrows and great boulders. Far spread his fame, such help the Lord gave him, and such greatness.

But this greatness of his made his heart proud, to his own undoing. He slighted the Lord his God; into the temple he would go, and there burn incense at the censuring-altar. Close at his heels the high priest Azarias entered, and eighty priests with him, strong men all, to withstand the royal will. Not for thee, Ozias, they cried, to burn incense in the Lord's honour; that is for the priests, the sons of Aaron, that are set apart for this office. Leave this holy place, and profane it no more; thou wilt win no favour from the Lord God by such doings as these. At this, Ozias turned round in anger, the censer already in his hand with the incense ready for lighting, and began to threaten them. And with that, in the priests' presence, there in the Lord's house, by the censuring-altar, the mark of leprosy started out on his brow. No time they lost, Azarias and his fellow priests, that sign once seen, in thrusting out the leper; he himself, feeling the stroke of the Lord's present judgement, was in haste to be gone.

King Ozias remained a leper till the day of his death, dwelling apart in a house of his own, while his son Joatham had charge of the palace, and heard the complaints of his subjects. What else Ozias did, first and last, stands recorded by the prophet Isaias, son of Amos. At last he was laid to rest with his fathers, not among the royal tombs, because he was a leper, but in the same burying-ground. And the throne passed to his son Joatham.

² 'To command Azotus': this seems the best rendering of the Hebrew text. The Latin version has 'in Azotus', which does not give a good sense.

27 This Joatham was twenty-five years old when he came to the throne, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted sixteen years; his mother's name was Jerusa, daughter of Sadoc. He obeyed the Lord's will, imitating the piety of Ozias, but not his sacrilege;¹ among the people, there were corrupt ways of worship still.

3 He it was built the high gate that leads into the Lord's house, and added much to the Ophel wall; there are walled cities, too, in the hill-country of Juda, fortresses and towers in woodland places, that are of his building. He gave battle to the Ammonites and defeated them; a hundred talents of silver the Ammonites must pay him, with ten thousand measures of wheat, and as many of barley, that year and in the two years that followed. Such greatness Joatham achieved by his obedience to the Lord's will. What else he did, the battles he fought and the life he lived, may be found set down in the Record of the kings of Israel and Juda. So, when he had lived forty-one years, and reigned sixteen years at Jerusalem, Joatham was laid to rest with his fathers, with the Keep of David for his burying-place, and the throne passed to his son Achaz.

28 This Achaz was twenty years old when he came to the throne, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted sixteen years. He did not obey the Lord's will like his father David before him; he followed the example of the Israelite kings, casting images of the countryside gods. He it was that burnt incense in the ravine of Benennom,² and consecrated his sons by passage through the fire, after the wont of those nations which the Lord overthrew to make room for Israel. Never a high hill or a mountain slope or a leafy wood but Achaz must do sacrifice and offer incense there.

5 So the Lord his God left him at the mercy of the king of Syria, who defeated him, and robbed his kingdom of rich spoils, which he carried off to Damascus. The king of Israel, too, had the mastery of him, and inflicted grievous loss; a hundred and twenty thousand men of Juda, all tried warriors, did Phacee son of Romelia lay in one day's space, and all because they had forsaken the Lord, the God of their fathers. At the same time Maasias, a royal prince, and Ezricza, the controller of the household, and Elcana, that was the king's chief minister, were put to death by Zechri, one of the great warriors of Ephraim.

Two hundred thousand captives the men of Israel took, women, and boys, and girls, their own flesh and blood, with much booty besides, and conveyed them to Samaria. But there was a prophet of the Lord dwelling there at this time, Oded by name, who went out to meet the army on their way into the city, and expostulated with them. Here are the men of Juda, said he, left at your mercy, only because the Lord, the God of your fathers, is angry with them; and you have made murderous use of your victory; the tale of your cruelties mounts up to heaven. That is not enough for you; against all right, you would seize bondmen and bondwomen from Juda and Jerusalem. What, have you no sins of your own to account for? Be guided by me; take the captives home, that are your own flesh and blood; if not, a bitter punishment from the Lord awaits you. And now four of Ephraim's chieftains barred the way against the returning army; Azarias son of Johanan, Barachias son of Mosollamoth, Ezechias son of Sellum, and Amasa son of Adali. Never offend the Lord, they cried, by bringing in these captives with you! Would you add sin to sin, crown the guilt that long stands at our door? Here is grievous wrong; here is a bitter punishment from the Lord threatening Israel! So, before their chieftains and before all the multitude assembled, the warriors gave up their booty and their prey. And the four men we have named stood there befriending the captives; those that went naked must be clothed out of the spoils; then, clothed and shod, they must be refreshed with food and drink, must be anointed after their journey. No care was wanting; some, that could not walk, or were of feeble age, must ride on asses. And so they escorted them to Jericho, the city of palm trees, and restored them to their kindred, and themselves went back to Samaria.

So evil were those times, that Achaz

must send to the king of the Assyrians to beg for aid. The Edomites came in and slew many of Juda's folk, taking rich spoils besides, and the Philistines spread out their forces among the cities of the plain, and over the southern part of Juda, taking Bethsames, Aialon, Gaderoth, Socho, Thamnan, Gamzo and their daughter townships to settle in. Thus did the Lord humble Juda, to shew how Achaz had robbed them of all aid, by slighting the divine will.¹ As for the king of the Assyrians, Thelgath-Phalnasar, the Lord made him an enemy, not an ally, to Juda, which he oppressed and plundered, with none to oppose him, till Achaz was fain to court his favour with gifts, stripping temple and royal palace and princely palace of their treasures, but no help did he win thereby. Such a man was this Achaz, that times of adversity did but minister to the contempt he shewed for the Lord; he would even offer victims to the gods of Damascus, that were his enemies; These Syrian gods, thought he, help their own country now, they will be on my side instead, if I win them over with gifts. But in truth these gods were his ruin, and all Israel's.² All the ornaments of the Lord's house he had already taken away and broken up; now he closed the temple doors, and built altars of his own in every corner of Jerusalem; altars, too, in every city of Juda, the smoke of whose incense enraged the Lord, the God of his fathers. What else he did, all his history, first and last, may be found in the Record of the kings of Juda and Israel. So Achaz was laid to rest with his fathers, with the city of Jerusalem for his burying-place; but among the tombs of Israel's kings they would not lay him. And the throne passed to his son Ezechias.

29 Ezechias was twenty-five years old when he came to the throne, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted twenty-nine years. His mother's name was Abia, the daughter of Zacharias. Here was one that obeyed the Lord's will no less than his father David before him. In the first year of his reign, when the first month came round, he opened the gates of the Lord's house again, and put them in repair. Then he summoned the priests and the Levites to assemble in the open space east of the temple. Men of Levi, he said, it is my will that you should cleanse yourselves; cleanse, too, the house of the Lord, the God of your fathers, and rid his sanctuary of all defilement. Ours is an inheritance of guilt, from fathers who have disobeyed the Lord our God, and forsaken him; turned their backs on his dwelling-place, where their eyes should ever be. Fast shut were the gates of yonder porch, spent the lamps, never did incense smoke, never was victim offered in the sanctuary of the God of Israel. What wonder if the Lord was angry with Juda and Jerusalem, doomed them to unrest, and ruin, and disgrace, such as you see all around? What wonder if they fell in battle, these fathers of ours; if sons and daughters and wives were carried off into exile? Here, then, is my resolve; we must bind ourselves by a covenant to the Lord our God, if his fierce anger is to relent. As my own sons I charge you, do not stand by with folded hands; on you the Lord's choice has fallen, to wait upon his presence, ministering, and doing worship, and burning incense before him.

Well did the Levites answer his call; Mahath son of Amasai and Joel son of Azarias, Caathites; Cis son of Abdi and Azarias son of Jalaleel, Merarites; Joah son of Zemman and Joah's son Eden, Gersonites; of Elisaphan's sons, Samri and Jahiel, of Asaph's, Zacharias and Mathanias, of Heman's, Jahiel and Semei, of Idithun's, Semeias and Oziel. Mustering their brethren, they purified themselves, and so, obedient to the royal command and the divine will, entered into God's house to cleanse it. The priests, too, were in the Lord's temple for the cleansing; no unhalloved thing they found in porch or temple but the Levites carried it away, into the Cedron valley beyond. It was on the first day of the first month that they set about their task; on the eighth day of the same month they were still in the porch, and then they took eight days more riding the temple itself of defilement; by the sixteenth day, their undertaking was complete. And now they craved audience with king Ezechias; We have cleansed the Lord's house, they told him, and the altar of burnt-sacrifice, with all that belongs to it, the table of hallowed loaves, and all that belongs to the table. We have cleansed all the temple furniture that was profaned in the time of king Achaz, when he fell a-sinuing; all this thou wilt find laid out before the Lord's altar.

² 'Israel's', that is, Juda's. This use of the whole for the part occurs several times in the Hebrew text of this book, but the Latin version usually corrects the name; for instance, in verse 19 above.

Next day, Ezechias was abroad early, with all the chief men of the city gathered about him, to make his way into the house of the Lord. Seven bulls they offered, seven rams, seven lambs; seven goats, too, as an offering for fault; all this on behalf of the royal house, of the priestly line, and of Juda.¹ And the king bade the priests, Aaron's sons, offer the victims at the Lord's altar. So bulls and rams and lambs were slaughtered, and the altar received their blood; the goats were brought out into the presence of king and people, who laid their hands on them, and then the priests slaughtered them, and poured out their blood at the altar to expiate Israel's common guilt; the king's command was that burnt-sacrifice and offering for fault should both be offered on behalf of the whole people. He had bidden the Levites take their stations, there in the Lord's house, with cymbals, harp, and zither, as David enjoined; as Gad, the man of visions, and the prophet Nathan enjoined, for it was through these prophets of his that David had learned the Lord's will. There stood the Levites, with instruments of David's own, and the priests with their trumpets; and when Ezechias gave the word, and the burnt-sacrifice began, loud echoed their praises to the Lord, loud the trumpets blew, loud rang the music planned by David, king of Israel, long ago. Still must singer and trumpeter be at their task among the throng of worshippers, till all the sacrifice was consumed; and when this was over, while the king and all his company bowed down to adore, these Levites were bidden by the king and his nobles to praise the Lord with psalms of David, and of Asaph, the man of visions. Praise him they did with hearts full of joy, and they too bowed down to worship.

It was not enough; Here, said Ezechias, are hands consecrated to the Lord afresh; come forward, and present victim and thank-offering in the Lord's house. Thereupon the whole multitude brought victims and thank-offerings, and some, in their devotion, whole burnt-sacrifice.² In burnt-sacrifice they offered seventy bulls, a hundred rams, and two hundred lambs, and consecrated to the Lord six hundred cattle and three thousand sheep. The priests were too few in number to flay so many burnt-offerings at once, and the Levites must needs help them to finish their task, till such time as more priests should have rid themselves of defilement; such cleansing is an easier matter for Levite than for priest.³ So much work there was to do with all the burnt-sacrifice that must be performed; the fat, too, of the welcome-offerings must be burned, and libations poured over the sacrifices.

Thus was the worship of the Lord's house restored in full. Greatly did Ezechias and all the people rejoice over their duty well done, for all that the resolve was taken so suddenly.

30 Then Ezechias sent out a summons to Juda and all Israel (for his word went out by letter even to Ephraim and Manasses), bidding them come up to the Lord's house at Jerusalem, and keep his paschal feast there. The king and his nobles and all Jerusalem were of this advice, that the pasch should be kept in the second month; keep it at the appointed time they might not, but must wait till priests had cleansed themselves in sufficient number, and the people could assemble at Jerusalem. Such was the resolve taken by the king and his subjects; and because so many had long neglected the law's injunction, the summons should go out to all Israel, from Bersabee to Dan, bidding them keep the pasch there at

² Ezechias talks of this temple cleansing as if it had been, in effect, a reconsecration of the priesthood. In this and the following verses it is necessary to distinguish between the burnt-sacrifice, which was devoted entirely to the Lord (Lev. 1), and the welcome-offering, which was shared between the Lord and his worshipper (Lev. 3).

³ The sense of the Hebrew text is rather that the Levites had been more energetic than the priests in going through the ceremony of personal purification.

Jerusalem, in the Lord's honour, that was 6 all Israel's God. So couriers went out in the king's service, bearing letters in his name and in the name of his nobles to Israel and Juda alike, and this was their purport; Come back, Israelites, to the Lord, all that remnant of you the Assyrian king has spared; and he, the God of Abraham, Isaac and Israel, will come back 7 to your side. See how your fathers and brethren have deserted the Lord, the God of their race, and been left to their doom; 8 be wiser than they. Do not rebel, as your fathers did, against his yoke; surrender to the Lord, and come up to this sanctuary, which he has hallowed for all time; obey him, the Lord, the God of your fathers, and his fierce anger will be appeased.
9 When you have come back to the Lord, the victors will relent, and allow your banished sons and brethren to return home; so gracious the Lord is, so merciful; turn back to him, and his face shall be hidden from you no more.

10 Swiftly the couriers went from city to city of Ephraim and Manasses, right up to Zabulon, meeting everywhere with scorn 11 and derision; but there were some tribesmen of Aser, Manasses and Zabulon that 12 fell in with the proposal, and came. In Juda, such was the Lord's enabling power, they had but one thought, to obey the Lord's will, obey the command of the king 13 and of his nobles. So it was a great throng that came to Jerusalem to keep this feast of unleavened bread in the second month.
14 First they set about destroying the altars up and down Jerusalem, overthrowing all the shrines at which incense had been burned to false gods; and these they threw 15 down into Cedron valley. Then, on the fourteenth day of the second month, they slew the paschal victim. Priest and Levite, cleansed of their defilement at last, offered 16 burnt-sacrifice in the Lord's house, keeping their due order, according to the terms of that law which God's servant Moses gave. Only it was the Levites that must hand over to the priests the blood which 17 was to be poured out, so many of the worshippers were still uncleansed; for all those who had not come in time to rid themselves of their defilement, the Levites must slay 18 the victim. There were many from Ephraim, Manasses, Issachar and Zabulon that must overstep the bounds of the law by eating their paschal meal while they were yet defiled; but Ezechias made intercession for these; surely the Lord, in his goodness, would pardon such as made the 19 Lord God of their fathers their whole heart's quest; cleansed or no, he would not find fault with them. In answer to this 20 prayer, the Lord gave his people quittance.

21 So, amid great rejoicing, for seven days together, all the Israelites assembled at Jerusalem kept the feast of unleavened bread. Day by day priest and Levite stood there praising the Lord as best their music might; Ezechias himself spoke to hearten 22 them, sons of Levi that had such skill in the Lord's service. All the seven days of the feast they ate the victims of their own welcome-offerings, giving thanks to the Lord, their fathers' God. And now the 23 whole multitude resolved to keep festival seven days more, and right gladly they did it. A thousand bulls and seven thousand 24 sheep were given to them by king Ezechias, a thousand bulls and ten thousand sheep to the nobles; task enough for the many priests that had cleansed themselves by now. Glad was Juda that day, glad were 25 priest and Levite, and new-comers from Israel, and men of alien birth from Israel's domain and Juda's alike; such high festival 26 was kept in Jerusalem as the city had never seen since the days of David's son Solomon, that was king of all Israel. Then 27 priests and Levites stood up to bless the people, nor did their voices go unheard;
heaven's holy dwelling-place echoed to their prayer.

31 When this was duly done, all the Israelites there assembled went about among the cities of Juda, breaking the idols and cutting down the shrines from forest and hill-side, and destroying the altars; and this they did not only in Juda and Benjamin, but all over the territory of Ephraim and Manasses, till none were left. Then the Israelites made their way home to their own cities.

And now Ezechias assigned the various 28 companies of priests and Levites their duties; for each his own task, attending to burnt-sacrifice and welcome-offering, thanking and praising the Lord, or watching over his gates, where his tent was

3 pitched on earth. The offering of burnt-sacrifice each morning and evening, on the first day of the month and at other times when the law of Moses required it, should 4 be defrayed at the royal expense; it was for the citizens of Jerusalem to provide for the priests and Levites, so that they might devote all their time to the demands of the 5 Lord's law. No sooner was this decree made public, than the people began sending in the first-fruits of their corn, wine and oil; tithes, too, of their honey and of 6 all their lands produced; and all who dwelt in Juda's cities, men of Israel and of Juda alike, gave tithes of cattle and sheep, and of all the offerings they had vowed to the Lord. These tithes they brought themselves, and piled them up all around; from 7 the third month to the sixth, ever greater grew these heaps, and when Ezechias and his nobles came to see them, they blessed the Lord's name, and blessed the people of Israel.

9 But when Ezechias asked the priests and Levites why the offerings were left to lie in 10 heaps thus, their answer was, they had eaten their fill ever since the first-fruits began to come in, and now, such plenty had the Lord granted to his people, much was left unconsumed; it was this surplus 11 that lay before him. So Ezechias bade them make granaries in the Lord's house; and in these granaries, once built, they 12 bestowed carefully first-fruits and tithes and vowed gifts alike. They were in charge of the Levite Chonenias, with his brother 13 Semei to aid him; and under Chonenias and Semei were ten others, Jahiel, Azarias, Nahath, Asael, Jerimoth, Jozabad, Elel, Jesmachias, Mahath and Banaias. But king Ezechias and Azarias, that was controller of God's house, had the 14 direction of all. Gifts that were freely made, and what was set apart for the priests and for holy uses, were in charge of Core, son of Jemna, the Levite that was door-15 keeper of the eastern gate. Under him were Eden, Benjamin, Jesue, Semeias, Amarias and Sechenias; their office was to distribute portions to their brethren in the various priestly cities, young and old alike, 16 except men (and their sons of three years and over) who were on duty at the time in the Lord's house, and had portions assigned to them during their turn of office. The priests, family by family, the Levites of twenty years and more, company by company, together with all who belonged to them, wives and sons and daughters, had their food duly allotted to them out of the consecrated gifts. Other officers were appointed here and there to distribute the allowance to boys and men of priestly or Levitical race in the country-side, and in the precincts round each of their cities.¹

Such were the provisions Ezechias made for his whole realm, a king ever true and loyal to the will of the Lord his God; such loving care he bestowed on the Lord's house, its laws and observances, resolved to make God his whole heart's quest; and so doing he reigned prosperously.

32 After all this faithful service done, Juda was invaded by Sennacherib, king of the Assyrians, who laid siege to its fortified cities, thinking to make them his own. Ezechias, warned by his approach that Jerusalem was the chief object of his attack, bade his nobles and commanders consider the plan of shutting in the water courses that ran beyond the city walls. To this all agreed, and he set a multitude of hands to work stopping up all the springs, as well as the stream that flowed through the open country; should there be water flowing freely for the kings of Assyria to profit by it? No pains did he spare to rebuild the wall where it had fallen into disrepair, with towers to crown it and a second wall within; Mello, too, in the Keep of David he fortified anew, and prepared shields and all other weapons of defence. Then he appointed commanders for his army; and these he bade assemble in the open space by the city gate, where he spoke to them for their encouragement. Play the man, he said, and keep your courage high; let there be no shrinking, no faint hearts, at the sight of the Assyrian king and the hordes that follow him; we have many more on our side than they on theirs. Theirs is but mortal strength; we have the Lord our God to aid us, and fight on our side. In such words from king Ezechias the hearts of the men of Juda found support.

Sennacherib, the Assyrian king, was laying siege with his army to Lachis; and now he sent envoys to Jerusalem with a message for king Ezechias and for all the citizens; Word to you, they said, from the king of Assyria. What confidence is it that makes you so bold, cooped up there in Jerusalem? Will you die there of hunger and thirst, deluded by Ezechias' promise that the Lord your God will deliver you from the power of the Assyrian king? Tell me, who is Ezechias? Is he not the man who has robbed this God of hill-shrine and altar, leaving you but one altar to repair to, when you would do worship and burn incense before him? See how I and my fathers have subdued the world, and the gods of a whole world could not rescue it from me! Tell me, in all these countries my fathers and I have laid waste, was there ever a god found could save his people from my power, that you should trust this God of yours when the same power threatens you? Do not be deluded by the persuasions of Ezechias; do not listen to him. All those peoples and kingdoms my fathers and I have conquered, their gods notwithstanding; will your God do better? Much else these courtiers said in dispraise of the Lord God, and his servant Ezechias; there was a letter, too, Sennacherib wrote, full of blasphemy against the Lord God of Israel, boasting that Ezechias' God could not save his people from attack, where the gods of so many other nations had failed them. Nay, they must needs raise a cry in the Hebrew tongue, to daunt the folk who sat on Jerusalem walls, and persuade them to yield up the city. Lightly did they speak of Jerusalem's God, as if he had been all one with those old gods the Chanaanites worshipped, idols made by human hands.

Against such blasphemers, king Ezechias and the prophet Isaias, son of Amos, fell to prayer, crying out to heaven for aid; and with that, the Lord sent out his angel, who smote down warrior and chieftain and commander in the Assyrian king's camp, so that he went home in sorry plight. And there, when he was at worship in the temple of his god, two sons of his own body drew their swords on him and slew him. Thus it was the Lord rescued Ezechias and the men of Jerusalem from the Assyrian king's power, and of all else that assailed them; on every side he kept them free from alarm. Many were the victims and offerings that were brought to the Lord at Jerusalem; many were the gifts made by Ezechias king of Juda, whom all the nations held thenceforward in high renown.

And now Ezechias fell sick, and was at death's door; but he prayed to the Lord, and the Lord answered his prayer, giving him a sign of his recovery. Yet it was an ill return he made for all these benefits; his heart was puffed up with pride, so that he brought punishment upon himself, on Juda, too, and Jerusalem; for this pride of his, both he and the citizens of Jerusalem afterwards humbled themselves, and it was not in Ezechias' own time that the Lord's vengeance fell. Great were the riches of Ezechias and his fame; great was the store of silver and gold, of jewels and spices, of weapons for every purpose and of precious ware, that king Ezechias laid up. He had store-houses too, for corn, wine and oil, stables full of beasts, and folds full of flocks; new cities he must build, so many were his herds of sheep and cattle, so abundant were the possessions the Lord had given him. It was this Ezechias that blocked the upper waters of the Gihon stream, and conveyed them under ground into the western part of the Keep of David. In all that he did, he prospered; and if, when the princes of Babylon came to enquire about the portent that had happened in his country, God left him to his own counsel, it was but to try him, and test the dispositions of his heart. What else Ezechias did, all his acts of piety, may be found set down in the Vision of Isaias, son of Amos, and in the Record of the kings of Juda and Israel. So Ezechias was laid to rest with his fathers, on the slope where the tombs of David's sons are; and all Juda and Jerusalem did honour to his funeral. And the throne passed to his son Manasses.

33 This Manasses was twelve years old when he came to the throne, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted fifty-five years. And he defied the Lord's will, by courting the false gods of those nations which the Lord destroyed to make room for the sons of Israel. He restored once again the hill-shrines which his father Ezechias had overthrown; he raised altars to the gods of the country-side, and set up sacred trees, and gave to all the host of 4 heaven worship and observance. Nay, he must set up these altars of his in the temple itself, where the Lord fulfilled his promise that Jerusalem should be the shrine of his 5 name for ever; altars there must be for all the host of heaven in the two temple 6 courts. He consecrated his own sons by passing them through the fire in the ravine of Benennom;¹ there was watching for dreams and taking of auguries, there was practising of magical arts; he surrounded himself with diviners and soothsayers, until this defiance of his provoked the 7 Lord's anger. He carved an image, too, and cast a sheath for it, and set this up in the Lord's house. And this was at Jerusalem, the Lord's choice among all the cities of Israel; this was in the temple that was to be the everlasting shrine of his name; so he had promised David and 8 Solomon, Nevermore will I let the sons of Israel be dislodged from the land I gave their fathers, if only they will be true to law and observance and decree Moses en-9 joined on them in my name. The very nations which the Lord destroyed to make room for the sons of Israel were guilty of less wrong than Juda and Jerusalem did, when they were led astray by the example 10 of Manasses. Warnings enough the Lord sent to him and to his people, but they 11 went unheeded; and the next emissaries he sent to them were the captains of the Assyrian army, who made Manasses their prisoner, and carried him away, loaded 12 with chains and fetters, to Babylon. It was to his own God, the Lord, that he turned in this time of distress; before him, the God of his fathers, he made humble 13 amends, and sought his favour with earnest prayer. That prayer the Lord answered, and restored him to his throne at Jerusalem. Such good proof had Manasses that the Lord only was God.

14 It was after this that he built the wall beyond David's Keep, out in the ravine west of Gihon, all the way round from the Fishmongers' Gate to Ophel, raising it to a great height; set captains, too, on garrison duty in all the fortified towns of 15 Juda. Meanwhile, there was an end of the false gods, of the idol that stood in the Lord's house, of the altars he had set up on the temple hill and all over Jerusalem;

 he cast them away beyond the city walls.
 The Lord's altar must be restored; to this he brought his victims, his welcomeofferings and thank-offerings, and bade Juda serve the Lord, the God of Israel.
 None the less, men still sacrificed at the hill-shrines, but only to the Lord their God. What else Manasses did, the prayer he offered to his God, and the warnings that were given to him by prophets in the name of the Lord God of Israel, may be found set down in the Record of the Israelite kings.² The Chronicle of Hozai, too, tells of his prayer and how his prayer was answered; of his defiance, and of all the places where he set up hill-shrine and forest shrine and image, before the time of his repentance. So Manasses was laid to rest with his fathers, with his own house for his burying-place, and the throne passed to his son Amon.

This Amon was twenty-two years old when he came to the throne, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted two years; he defied the Lord like his father Manasses. No idol Manasses had made but Amon must sacrifice and pay worship to it; nor did he ever imitate his father by making humble amends, rather he outwent him in guilt.
 He was slain in his own house, through a conspiracy among his own servants; but the common folk put them to death, and gave the crown to the son of Amon, that was called Josias.

34 Josias was eight years old when he came to the throne, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted thirty-one years; he was obedient to the Lord's will, and followed the example of his ancestor, king David, never swerving to right or left. It was while he was still a boy, in the eighth year of his reign, that he betook himself to the God his father David worshipped; and in the twelfth year of his reign he re-^d Juda and Jerusalem of hill-shrine and forest shrine, carved image and molten image.
 All the altars of the countryside gods must be destroyed in his presence; sacred trees and statues he cut down everywhere and broke in pieces, which he scattered on the tombs of their worshippers; and on the altars that were raised to false gods he burned the bones of their own priests, till Juda and Jerusalem were defiled no more. Then he must carry out the same work of destruction in the cities of Manasses, Ephraim and Simeon, and all the way to Nephthali; altars were thrown down, images crushed to pieces, and shrines demolished, all over the land of Israel; and so he returned to Jerusalem.¹

Then, in the eighteenth year of his reign, the land and the temple now purged, he commissioned Saphan, son of Eselias, and Maasias that was governor of the city, and Joha son of Joachaz, that kept the records, to see that the house of the Lord their God was put in repair. So they made their way to the high priest, Helcias, who handed over to them the offerings collected by Levites and door-keepers for the temple fabric; offerings from Manasses and Ephraim and all the rest of Israel, as well as Juda, Benjamin and Jerusalem. These they paid out to the overseers of the Lord's house, bidding them restore it and put it in repair. And they, in their turn, gave it to the craftsmen and masons, that must buy stone from the quarries; wood, too, for joiner's work, and for roofing the buildings which earlier kings had left in ruins. All this was faithfully carried out; the work was hastened on by these overseers, the Merarites Jahath and Abdias, the Caathites Zacharias and Masollam, Levites all and musicians; the workmen that did but carry burdens at need were under the command of the secretaries and the chief door-keepers.

It was just when they came to take away the temple offerings that Helcias found a copy of the law which the Lord gave through Moses; and he told Saphan, the secretary, how he had found, there in the temple, a copy of the law, which he gave him to read. Saphan took the book with him when he went to the king to report that the commission had been faithfully executed. They have collected all the money, said he, that was there in the temple, and paid it out through the overseers to craftsmen and to masons. And here is a book the high priest, Helcias, has given me.

This book, then, Saphan read out in the royal presence; and the king, upon hearing the terms of the law, rent his garments about him. Then he gave orders to Helcias, and Ahicam son of Saphan, and Abdon son of Micha, and Asaas, one of his courtiers; Go and consult the Lord,² he told them, for me and all that is left of Israel and Juda, about this new-found copy of the law. What wonder if the Lord should rain down vengeance on us, a race that has left his warnings unheeded, his bidding undone? So Helcias and his companions went on the king's errand to the prophetess Olda. She was wife to Sellum, son of Thecuath, son of Hasra, that once kept the royal wardrobe; her dwelling was at Jerusalem, in the new part of the city. So they told her their business, and she, in return, gave them this message from the Lord God of Israel for the man that sent them; Thus says the Lord, For this city and its citizens I have punishments in store, all the punishments threatened in yonder book which has been read out to the king of Juda. The men of Juda have forsaken me, and offered sacrifice to alien gods; all they do is done in defiance of me; the fire of my vengeance must needs rain down on this city, and there is no quenching it. But to the king of Juda, who sent you here to consult the Lord, give this message from the Lord God of Israel: Well for thee thou didst listen to the warnings this book gave thee! Well for thee that thy heart failed thee, and thou didst humble thyself before God, at hearing him threaten city and citizens with doom; that thou didst make amends, by tearing thy garments about thee, and hadst recourse to me with tears. And thou hast won my audience, the Lord says; I will lay thee to rest with thy fathers, in quiet times thou shalt go to thy grave. Not for thy eyes the great calamities I mean to bring on city and citizens of thine.

When they brought the king his answer, he summoned all the elders of Juda and Jerusalem; then he went up to the Lord's temple, and all the men of Juda bore him company, all the citizens of Jerusalem, priest and Levite and common folk high and low. There, in their hearing, he read the whole book out to them. Standing on the dais, he made a promise, there in the Lord's presence; they would make the Lord their leader, holding fast by command and decree and observance of his heart and soul, obeying all the terms of the law they had listened to. And he bound them by an oath, all the men of Jerusalem and of Benjamin. This pact with the Lord God of their fathers was kept loyally.¹

¹ These reforms are mentioned in IV Kg. 23 as if they had happened only after the rediscovery of the law in Josias' eighteenth year. It seems probable that the author of that book mentioned them out of their historical order, as a more logical arrangement. ² The Latin here has 'Intercede with the Lord', but the word used in the Hebrew text is the same as that used in IV Kg. 22. 13.

So Josias swept away from the whole realm of Israel all detestable worship, and made the remnant that were left in Israel obey the Lord their God. Never again did they forsake the Lord, their fathers' God, while Josias' life lasted.

35 And now Josias proclaimed a paschal feast at Jerusalem; the victims should be duly slain on the fourteenth day of the first month. To the priests, he assigned their several tasks, and put heart into them for their long ministrations in the Lord's house. And he had his word for the Levites, too, that must teach all Israel and hallow it to the Lord's service: Let the ark of God rest in its shrine, in the temple David's son Solomon, that was king of all Israel, built for it; no need any longer for you to carry it this way and that.² You have tasks to perform for the Lord your God, and for his people of Israel. Range yourselves by the order of your clans and families, as David king of Israel and his son Solomon prescribed, each household, each company of Levites ready to do its own office in the sanctuary. Rid yourselves of defilement, to keep the pasch, and make all in readiness for your brethren, so that they can carry out the commands which the Lord gave them through Moses. For those who were present at this paschal feast, Josias provided the flocks they had need of, thirty thousand lambs and kids, as well as three thousand bulls, all of the king's bounty. Other gifts had been promised, for priests, Levites and people, by the men of his court; the controllers of the Lord's house, Helcias, Zacharias and Jahiel, gave the priests, for their paschal victims, two thousand six hundred lambs and kids, and three hundred bulls; and there were five thousand lambs and kids and five hundred bulls for the Levites' pasch, from Chonenias, his brothers Semeias and Nathanael, and the Levite chiefs Hasabias, Jehiel and Jobab. Thus preparation was made for the ceremony, and the priests stood ready for their task, with the Levites to aid them, ranged at the king's bidding in their several companies.

The paschal victims were killed; blood was sprinkled from priestly hands, Levites flayed the burnt-sacrifice, and victims were distributed to all the worshippers, clan by clan, household by household, ready to be offered to the Lord as Moses commanded, the bulls with the rest. The paschal victim itself was roasted over the fire, as the law enjoins; the welcome-offerings were cooked in pan and pot and caldron, and so divided among the people without more ado. This done, the Levites had still the paschal feast to make ready for themselves and for the priests; these had been busy over the burnt-sacrifice up to night-fall, so that Aaron's sons must be served last, and the Levites with them. All the musicians had kept their ranks, as David would have them, and his royal spokesmen Asaph, Heman and Idithun; all the door-keepers had remained on guard at their several gates, never released from duty for an instant; for these, too, their brother Levites must needs make ready the feast. Nothing of due observance was left unfulfilled that day; the pasch was kept, and burnt-sacrifice, too, was offered to the Lord on his altar, at king Josias' bidding. And all the Israelites who were present kept, at this time, not only the pasch but the feast of unleavened bread, for seven days together. Never was such a paschal feast as this in all Israel's history since the days of the prophet Samuel; never a king, of all who reigned in Israel, so kept it as Josias did, with priests and Levites and pilgrims from Juda and Israel,

² Some think that the ark had been removed from the temple in the idolatrous reign of Amon; but it is curious that this should not have been mentioned. It is perhaps better to understand Josias' words as an almost jocular allusion to the fact that the Levites, who carried the ark through the desert, have other duties now.

besides the citizens of Jerusalem. It was the eighteenth year of his reign when the pasch was so kept.

After Josias' restoration of the temple was finished, news came that Nechao, king of Egypt, was on his way to attack Char-camis, on the Euphrates. Josias marched out to bar his way, whereupon he sent him a message, Nay, king of Juda, I have no quarrel with thee. At God's bidding I march, and with all speed, against another kingdom, not thine; God is on my side; cross his will, and he will slay thee. But there was no turning Josias back from his warlike intent; listen to Nechao he would not, though it was God's own lips that warned him; he was for offering battle in the plain of Mageddo. And there, wounded by a volley from the archers, he bade his men carry him out of the fight; My hurt, said he, is grievous. He had a second chariot, as kings will, that followed behind him; into this they removed him out of his own chariot, and bore him away to Jerusalem. So he died, and was buried where his fathers lay. All Juda and Jerusalem mourned for him, but none so grievously as Jeremias; to this day man and maid, singing the dirge for Josias, say...¹ till it has become a custom in Israel; it is all to be found in the book of Dirges.

What else Josias did, all his acts of piety in carrying out the terms of the divine law, all his history, first and last, is set down in the Record of the kings of Juda and Israel.

36 The choice of the people now fell upon Josias' son Joachaz, whom they crowned at Jerusalem to succeed his father. He was twenty-three years old when he came to the throne, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted but three months; then he was deposed by the king of Egypt, who marched to Jerusalem and levied a fine from the country, a hundred talents of silver and a talent of gold. Joachaz he carried off with him to Egypt, and set up one of the other princes to rule Juda and Jerusalem, Eliakim, whose name he changed to Joakim. This Joakim was twenty-five years old when he came to the throne, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted eleven years, during which he defied the will of the Lord his God. Then he was attacked by the king of Babylon, Nabuchodonosor, who led him off to Babylon in chains; he also carried off (some of) the furniture of the Lord's house, and laid it up in his own temple there.² What else Joakim did, all his idolatry and the story of the life he lived, may be found in the Record of the kings of Juda and Israel; he was succeeded by his son Joachin. This Joachin was eight(een)³ years old when he came to the throne, and his reign at Jerusalem lasted three months and ten days. He too defied the Lord's will, and when the spring came round, Nabuchodonosor had him brought to Babylon, with all the most precious of the furniture that was left in the Lord's house. And he set up as king of Juda and Jerusalem Joachin's uncle Sedecias.

This Sedecias was twenty-one years old when he came to the throne, and he reigned at Jerusalem eleven years. He defied the Lord's will, nothing abashed by the prophet Jeremias, that carried threats to him from the Lord's own lips. He rebelled against Nabuchodonosor, though he had plighted his allegiance to him in the name of God; refused ever the yoke, steeled ever his heart, and would not come back to the Lord, the God of Israel. All the chief priests, too, and the common folk did heinous wrong by following the detestable ways of the heathen; desecrated that sanctuary the Lord had set apart for himself at Jerusalem. He, the God of their fathers, sent messengers to warn them; never a day dawned but he was already pleading with them, so well he loved his people and his dwelling-place. And they? They mocked the Lord's own messengers, made light of his warnings, derided his prophets, until at last the Lord's anger was roused against his people, past all assuaging. Then it was that he embroiled them with the king of Babylon, who came and put their young men to the sword in

² 'Some of the furniture'; the Latin version has simply 'the furniture', but cf. verse 10 below.

³ The text here has 'eight years old', no doubt through a copyist's error; cf. IV Kg. 24. 8.

the sanctuary itself, pitying neither young man nor maid, old man nor cripple; none 18 might escape his attack. All the furniture of the Lord's house, great and small, all the treasures of temple and king and princes, 19 must be carried off to Babylon. Enemy hands set fire to the Lord's house, pulled down Jerusalem's walls, burnt its towers to the ground, destroyed all that was of 20 price. Those who escaped massacre were carried off to Babylon, where they must live as slaves to the king and his heirs until their empire should pass to the king of 21 Persia; then, at last, the Lord's prophecy through Jeremias would be fulfilled, then the land of Juda would have lain fallow long enough. Fallow it must lie, until seventy years had come and gone.

So, in the first year of the Persian king, 22 Cyrus, the Lord made good the promise which Jeremias had uttered in his name. He put a resolve into the heart of Cyrus, king of Persia; who thereupon published a written decree all through his dominions; A message, it said, from Cyrus, king of Persia. The Lord God of heaven has made me master of the world, and now he will have me rebuild his own temple for him at Jerusalem, a city of Judaea. Who is left among you of his own people? Let him go to the task, with the Lord his God to speed him. 23

THE FIRST BOOK OF ESDRAS

IN the first year of the Persian king, Cyrus, the Lord fulfilled the promise which he had made through Jeremias.

He put a new resolve into the heart of Cyrus, king of Persia, who thereupon published a written decree all through his dominions; A message, it said, from Cyrus, king of Persia. The Lord God of heaven has made me master of the world, and now he will have me rebuild his own temple for him at Jerusalem, a city of Judaea. Who is left among you of that race? To Jerusalem let him go, in Judaea, with divine aid to speed him; and there let him help to build the temple of the Lord God of Israel, who is the true God.¹ And let all others take note, that such a man is to receive assistance from his neighbours; silver and gold, stores and beasts are to be put at his disposal, apart from the offerings they may make, of their own free will, to this temple of God at Jerusalem.

Thereupon the clan chiefs of Juda and Benjamin, with priests and Levites and all whom God had so inspired, set out for Jerusalem to rebuild the Lord's temple there; and all their neighbours lightened the task for them with presents of silver ware and gold, of stores, beasts and furniture, over and above the offerings that were freely made. King Cyrus himself brought the temple ornaments out again; these had been carried off from Jerusalem by Nabuchodonosor, who laid them up in the temple of his own god, but now, at the orders of the Persian king Cyrus, Mithridates son of Gezabar must bring them out again, and give full account of them to Sassabasar, chief of the tribe of Juda. And this was the count made: gold trays thirty, and silver trays a thousand, knives twenty-nine, cups of gold thirty, . . . baser cups of silver four hundred and ten, . . . and a thousand other appurtenances;² in all, gold and silver appurtenances, five thousand four hundred. All these were taken back to Jerusalem by Sassabasar and the exiles who returned with him from Babylon.

2 In what numbers, then, did they come back to Jerusalem, and to the various cities of Juda, these exiles that had been taken to Babylon by the Chaldaean king Nabuchodonosor, and were now on the march for home?³ Their leaders were Zorobabel, Josue, Nehemia, Saraia, Rahe-laia, Mardochai, Belsan, Mesphar, Beguai, Rehun and Baana. These were the numbers the various clans of Israel provided: Pharos, two thousand one hundred and seventy-two, Sephatia, three hundred and seventy-two, Area, seven hundred and seventy-five, Phahath-Moab . . .⁴ Josue-Joab, two thousand eight hundred and twelve, Aelam, one thousand two hundred and fifty-four, Zethua, nine hundred and forty-five, Zachai, seven hundred and sixty, Bani, six hundred and forty-two, Bebai, six hundred and twenty-three, Azgad, one thousand two hundred and twenty-two, Adonicam, six hundred and sixty-six, Beguai, two thousand and fifty-six, Adin, four hundred and fifty-four, Ather, coming from Ezechias, ninety-eight, Besai, three hundred and twenty-three, Jora, a hundred and twelve, Hasum, two hundred and twenty-three.

And the various townships provided: Gebbar, ninety-five,⁵ Bethlehem, a hundred and twenty-three, Netupha, fifty-six, Anathoth, a hundred and twenty-eight, Azmaveth, forty-two, Cariathiarim, Cephira and Beroth, seven hundred and forty-three, Rama and Gabaa, six hundred and twenty-one, Machmas, a hundred and ¹ The Latin is usually printed, unnecessarily, as if it meant 'let him help to build the temple of the Lord God of Israel, who is God there'.

² It seems clear that some items have fallen out of the list, which adds up to 2,499 instead of 5,400. Among these we should expect to find silver cups of better quality, by way of contrast with the 410 mentioned as being less valuable.

³ vs. 1-70. See Neh. 7. 6-73.

⁴ It is generally doubted whether the Hebrew text here is sound; the sons of Phahath-Moab to the sons of Josue-Joab' has no obvious meaning in the context.

⁵ It is not quite clear whether Gebbar belongs to the list of clans or to that of townships; in Neh. 7. 25 it is replaced by Gabaa, and is perhaps only a faulty reading.

28 twenty-two, Bethel and Hai, two hundred 29 and twenty-three, Nebo, fifty-two, Meg-30 bis, a hundred and fifty-six, (the other 31 Aelam, one thousand two hundred and 32 fifty-four),¹ Harim, three hundred and 33 twenty, Lod, Hadid and Ono, seven hun-34 dred and twenty-five, Jericho, three hun-35 dred and forty-five, Senaa, three thousand six hundred and thirty. . . .²

36 And the various priestly clans provided: Jadaia, in the line of Josue, nine hundred 37 and seventy-three, Emmer, a thousand and fifty-two, Pheshur, one thousand two 38 hundred and forty-seven, Harim, a thou-39 sand and seventeen.

40 And the various Levite clans provided:
 Josue and Cedmihel, that came down from 41 Odovias, seventy-four, Asaph's sons, the musicians, a hundred and twenty-eight, 42 Sellum, Ater, Telmon, Accub, Hatita and Sobai, the door-keepers, a hundred and thirty-nine in all.

43 The Nathinaeans included the sons of 44 Siha, Hasupha, Tabbaoth, Ceros, Siaan, 45 Phadon, Lebana, Hagaba, Accub, Hagab, 47 Semlai, Hanan, Gaddel, Gaher, Raaia, 48 Rasin, Necoda, Gazam, Aza, Phasea, Be-49 see, Asena, Munim, Nephusim, Bacbuc, 52 Hacupha, Harhur, Besluth, Mahida, Har-54 sa, Bercos, Sisara, Thema, Nasia and Ha-tipha; and Solomon's servants, including 56 Sotai, Sopheret, Pharuda, Jala, Dercon, 57 Geddel, Saphatia, Hatil, Phochereth from Asebaim, and Ami; these Nathinaeans, including those descended from the servants of Solomon, amounted to three hundred and ninety-two in all.

59 Some of those who came back from Thelmala, Thelharsa, Cherub, Adon and Emer could not prove whence their ancestors came or whether they were of Is-60 raelite stock; they were descendants of Dalaia, Tobia and Necoda, amounting to 61 six hundred and fifty-two. Such, too, among the priests were the sons of Hobia, of Accos, and of that Berzellai who married a daughter of Berzellai the Galaadite and took his name;³ they could find no written record of their ancestry, and were excluded from the priesthood; they might not partake of the food reserved for the priests, the governor told them, until there should be a high priest that bore the touchstones of wisdom and truth.⁴

The whole number, taken together, amounted to forty-two thousand three hundred and sixty, not counting the men and women servants, of whom there were seven thousand three hundred and thirty-seven, with two hundred men and maids that were singers. They had with them seven hundred and thirty-six horses, two hundred and forty-five mules, four hundred and thirty-five camels, six thousand seven hundred and twenty asses.

Some of the clan chiefs, upon entering the Lord's temple at Jerusalem, made of their own accord an offering for rebuilding God's house where it stood; contributing to that end, as their means allowed, sixtyone thousand gold pieces, five thousand silver pieces, and a hundred sets of vestments for the priests. And now priests and Levites (and some of the people), singers, door-keepers and Nathinaeans were back in their own precincts, and all Israel in the cities that were their homes.⁵

3 And now, for the first time since Israel's home-coming, it was the seventh month of the year; the people, with one consent, had gathered at Jerusalem. Josue son of Josedec and his brother priests, Zorobabel son of Salathiel and his brother chiefs, must bestir themselves; the God of Israel must have an altar built for him, if the law given by his servant Moses was to be obeyed, by the offering of burnt-sacrifice. No more they dared to do, with hostile nations threatening them all around, than erect God's altar on its ruined base;⁶ here, morning and evening, burnt-sacrifice was offered, and with that daily offering, with the due observance of

¹ It seems as if verse 7 had been accidentally repeated by a copyist's error, and 'the other' had been put in by an editor to hide the fault.

² An omission has been marked at the end of this verse, because the items in verses 3-63 do not add up to the total given in verse 64; it looks, therefore, as if there were a lacuna somewhere in the list.

³ The text says literally that he married one of the daughters of Berzellai and was called after 'their' name.

⁴ See Ex. 28. 30. ⁵ It seems likely that the Hebrew text in this verse is corrupt.

⁶ This seems the best account to give of a difficult phrase in the original, 'They set up the altar of God on its base, because they were afraid of the native population round about'. Fear of their neighbours accounted, not for the rebuilding of the altar, but for the rebuilding of the altar without walls or roof to shelter it; cf. verse 6. In the (uncanonical) book known as III Esdras, the neighbours are represented as coming in and helping to build the altar.

each day as it came, they held the feast of 5 Tent-dwelling. After that, burnt-sacrifice went on uninterruptedly, on the feast days set apart for the Lord, and on other days, too, when gifts were brought to the Lord 6 out of devotion. From the first day of this seventh month onwards the offering of burnt-sacrifice to the Lord began; and still they had not laid the very foundations of God's temple.

7 But meanwhile, money was being spent on quarrymen and stone-masons; on food, too, and drink, and oil for the men of Tyre and Sidon, who must convey cedar planks from Lebanon by sea to Joppe, in pur-8 suance of the Persian king's decree. And in the second month of the second year after their return to God's temple at Jerusalem, Zorobabel and Josue with their brethren, priests and Levites and citizens returned from exile, began their task.
 Levites that were above the age of twenty 9 were appointed to hasten on the execution of the divine command, and at the head of these Levites, clansmen of Henadad's clan, were Josue's clan and Cedmihel's (and the 10 men of Juda), insisting that they should give the temple workmen no rest.¹ So at last the masons laid the foundation of the Lord's temple. There stood the priests in full array with their trumpets; there stood the Levites, come down from Asaph, with their cymbals, ready to praise God as David bade them, that long ago was king 11 of all Israel. And as their hymn of praise went up to the Lord, The Lord is gracious, his mercy to Israel endures for ever, the whole people raised a great shout, thanking the Lord that now the foundation of his temple was laid.

2 Among the priests and Levites and chiefs of clans there were many older men who had seen the earlier temple when it stood built there. In their eyes, that was the Temple,² and they cried aloud in lament, while these others shouted and huzza'd for joy. Shouts of folk rejoicing,¹³ and cries of folk lamenting, none could tell them apart; it was all a confused uproar of men's voices, that echoed far away.

4 When news reached the enemies of Juda and Benjamin that the returned exiles were rebuilding the temple of the Lord, the God of Israel, they had a request 2 to make of Zorobabel and the chieftains.
 Let us help you to build it, they said; we too have recourse to the same God whom you worship; witness the sacrifices we have been offering to him ever since the Assyrian king Asar-Haddon settled us here.
 But Zorobabel and Josue and the clan 3 chiefs told them, To build a house to our God can be no common task of yours and ours. The Lord is our God, and we alone must be the builders of it; such were the orders given to us by Cyrus, king of Persia.
 Nothing would serve the neighbouring 4 folk after that but they must thwart Juda's purpose and interfere, as best they could, with the enterprise. All through the reign 5 of Cyrus, and right up to the time when Darius came to the throne of Persia, they were still hiring pleaders to baulk the design.

At the beginning of Assuerus' reign,³ 6 they sent a letter which brought accusations against the men of Juda and Jerusalem; and when Artaxerxes came to the throne, Beselam, Mithridates and Thabeel, with their partisans, addressed another to king Artaxerxes, in Syrian script and in the Syrian dialect. This letter about 8 Jerusalem, sent by the procurator Reum and the notary Samsai to king Artaxerxes, is given below; it is addressed in the name 9 of Reum and Samsai and their partisans, the Dinaeans, Apharsathachaeans, Terphalaeans, Apharsaeans, Erchuaeans, Babylonians, Susanechaeans, Dievites and ¹ The text of this verse may well be corrupt, but cannot be restored with certainty.

² Or possibly,

'And now, before their eyes, this (new) temple had been founded'. The Hebrew text is difficult to reconstruct; it seems to run, 'There were many who had seen the earlier temple. And when it was founded (or, when he founded it), this temple, before their eyes, (they were) weeping with a loud voice, and many with a shout with joy to raise the voice'.

³ Some have understood Assuerus and Artaxerxes as titles used indifferently by all the Persian kings, and have identified the former here with Cambyses, the latter with Smerdis, the two immediate successors of king Cyrus. In that case, it must be understood that the enemies of the Jews accused them of rebuilding the fortifications, when in fact they were only rebuilding the temple. But it seems much more likely that Assuerus is Xerxes, the successor of Darius, and Artaxerxes is the prince, immediately following him, who is known to history by that name. If so, verses 6-23 can only be a parenthesis, anticipating the events of later times so as to illustrate the kind of persecution the Jews had to put up with, even in these earlier days under king Darius, when it was only a question of restoring the temple.

10 Aelamites, and men of other nations besides, settled anew by Asenaphar, of great and glorious memory, in the cities of Samaria, and elsewhere beyond the Euphrates. Peace be with us! (here the text of their letter begins). Greetings to king Artaxerxes from his subjects beyond the 11 Euphrates. Be it known to the king's grace, that the Jews he sent here have betaken themselves to Jerusalem, a city ever infamous for its rebellions, where they have set about building up the ramparts and 12 repairing the walls. We warn the king's grace that if this city is rebuilt, and its walls restored, there will be an end of all tribute, toll and custom, to the prejudice of the royal revenues. To us, beholden as we are 13 to the royal bounty,¹ the sight of any wrong done to the king is something not to be borne; that is why we are sending him this information. Let him consult the archives 14 of the kings who went before him, and he will learn, from what is set down in their annals, that this is a rebellious city, the bane of king and governor; time out of mind, wars were ever brewing there, and for that 15 very reason it was laid in ruins. We warn the king's grace, then, that once this city is rebuilt, and its walls restored, he must not look to have any dominions left on this side of the river.

16 Thereupon the king wrote to Reum, Samsai, and their partisans in Samaria and beyond Euphrates, wishing them health and peace. Your accusation (he said) has 17 been read out in my presence, and its sense is clear to me. I have had research made, and it proves that this city rebelled ever 18 against the royal allegiance, a nursery of wars and revolts. Time was when Jerusalem had kings most powerful, that were 19 overlords of the whole country beyond Euphrates, receiving tribute, toll and custom from it. It is my pleasure that you 20 should restrain these men from rebuilding their city, until I take further order. See that these commands of mine are not neglected, to the imperilling, by slow degrees, 21 of the royal power.

22 No sooner had the text of this decree from king Artaxerxes been read out to them, than Reum, Samsai and their partisans went post-haste to Jerusalem, and prevented the Jews by main force from any further enterprise.

And so it was now; even the raising of a temple at Jerusalem must needs be abandoned, nor was it ever resumed till the second year of Darius' reign over Persia.

5 But the God of Israel had still his prophets, Aggaeus, and Zacharias son of Addo, to give his message to the Jews, now that they had returned to their own country and city. With these prophets to aid them, Zorobabel son of Salathiel and Josue son of Josedec did set about providing the Lord with a temple of his own at Jerusalem; and all at once there were protests from Thathanai, who had charge of affairs west of the river, and Sthar-buzanai, and all their partisans; Who commissioned you, they asked, to rebuild this temple, and put its walls in repair? We must ask of you besides the names of those who are promoting the enterprise.² But there was no withholding the elders of the Jews, so sure were they of the divine protection; the matter must be referred to Darius himself before they would meet the charge against them.

Here is a copy of the letter sent by the governor Thathanai, by Sthar-buzanai, and their Arphasachite partisans west of the river, to king Darius. To king Darius, all peace (their message ran). This is to inform the king's grace that we have paid a visit to Judaea, where they are building a temple of rough-hewn stone in honour of the great God; timber is already being fitted into the walls; they are busily employed, and have the work well in hand. We summoned their elders, and asked who had given the commission for such building and such repairs, and also demanded, for thy better information, a list of their leaders, which is given below. Their answer was, The God we worship is the Lord of heaven and earth; the temple we are rebuilding is an edifice built by a great king of Israel, long ago. Years passed, and the God of heaven, goaded to anger by our fathers, left them at the mercy of Nabuchodonosor, the Chaldaean king who then ruled in Babylon; he it was laid the temple in ruins, and carried off as exiles to Babylon the men who worshipped there. Then Cyrus became king of Babylon; and Cyrus, in his first year, gave order that this house of God should be rebuilt. There was gold ware and silver in the temple of our God; all this Nabuchodonosor had carried off from Jerusalem and laid it up in another temple, there at Babylon. What did Cyrus? He stripped the Babylonian temple in his turn; all must be given over to one Sassabasar, the man he had appointed to rule us; Take these, he said, and lay them up in the temple at Jerusalem.¹ The house of God, he said, must be rebuilt on its old foundations. But all Sassabasar did, when he reached Jerusalem, was to lay the foundations of God's temple; it has been in building ever since, and remains unfinished.

May it please the king's grace to have research made in the royal archives, there at Babylon, to find out whether Cyrus did indeed give any orders for God's house at Jerusalem to be rebuilt; meanwhile, we await the royal pleasure.

6 Thereupon, at king Darius' orders, research was made in the archives laid up at Babylon; and at last in Ecbatana, a city of the Median province, a document was found to this effect: In the first year of king Cyrus a royal decree was made about the house of God at Jerusalem. It is to be rebuilt, for the better offering of sacrifice; foundations to be laid that will support a structure sixty cubits . . . high and sixty wide; upon these three rows of rough-hewn stone, and then courses of timber. For all this, the expense to be defrayed by the royal treasury. All the gold and silver ware from the temple at Jerusalem that was brought to Babylon by Nabuchodonosor is to be restored, and carried back to Jerusalem, to find its fitting place in the temple of God.

. . . It is my will² that Thathanai, governor of the province beyond the river, and Stharbazanai, and the Apharsachites beyond the river, their associates, should cease interfering with the Jews; the Jewish ruler and the Jewish elders must be allowed to go on with their temple-building, so that this house of God may be re-established on its ancient site. And to the intent that these elders of the Jews may be able to continue the said building without intermission, my will is that moneys should be paid to them with all diligence out of the royal chest, and namely out of the tribute that is collected beyond the river; moreover that if there is need of calves, lambs or kids for burnt-sacrifice to the God of heaven, or of corn, salt, wine and oil to perform the ceremonies practised at Jerusalem, supplies of these should be given them daily, without fail. So let them be enabled to make their offerings to the God of heaven, and let them pray for the welfare of the king and royal princes. My will is, further, that if any man presume to alter the tenour of this decree, a beam should be taken from his house, and himself nailed up on it; the said house to be confiscated.³ And may the God, who has made Jerusalem the shrine of his name, destroy every kingdom and people which attempts to injure or destroy this temple of his that is built there. I, Darius, am the author of this decree, and will have it carried out with all diligence.

Carry it out they did, and diligently, both Thathanai and Stharbazanai and all their partisans. As for the elders of the Jews, they built on, and all went favourably; true prophets were Aggaeus and Zacharias son of Addo; higher and higher the fabric rose, with the God of Israel for its speed, with Cyrus for its speed, and Darius, (and Artaxerxes), kings of Persia. It was on the third day of the month Adar, in the sixth year of king Darius, that they finished God's house; great joy had priest and Levite, great joy had all the returned exiles, as they consecrated God's house together. The offerings they made at the dedication were a hundred calves, two hundred rams, and four hundred lambs; besides twelve goats to atone for the faults

¹ The words of Cyrus are given as if he supposed the temple to be still standing; possibly he is not credited with understanding that so little was left of it. The decree quoted at the beginning of the next chapter is more precise.

² The reply of king Darius to Thathanai here begins, with no rubric to introduce it. No doubt the decree of Cyrus (verses 3-5) was incorporated in the text of king Darius' letter, and the author has passed on from quotation to text without adverting to the fact that he is doing so.

³ The Hebrew (or rather Aramaic) text has 'turned into a dung-hill'.

18 of all Israel, one for each of Israel's tribes. Row upon row the priests stood, turn and turn about the Levites ministered, as the law of Moses bade them, doing the Lord's errand there at Jerusalem.

19 Afterwards, on the fourteenth day of the first month, Israel's sons, returned from captivity, kept the paschal feast. All the priests had rid themselves of defilement, and so had the Levites to a man; cleansed they must be, to slay the paschal victim for the returned exiles, and for their brethren 21 the priests, and for themselves besides. So the Israelites who had come back from Babylon ate the pasch; and with them those others who had remained in the country, and been defiled by contact with its inhabitants; now they united with their brethren in having recourse to the Lord, the God of Israel. And all through the week following they kept the feast of unleavened bread, glad at heart. Glad indeed the Lord had made them, Assyria's king¹ no more their enemy, their task so lightened for them in building a house for the Lord God of Israel.

7 Now turn we to the reign of Artaxerxes in Persia, and to Esdras. This Esdras was descended through Saraias, 2 Helcias, Sellum, Sadoc, Achitob, Amarias, 4 Azarias, Maraioth, Zarahias, Ozi, Bocci, 5 Abisue, Phinees and Eleazar from Aaron, 6 that was the first priest of all. He was a scribe, well versed in the law given to Israel by the Lord God through Moses; and now he came from Babylon armed, under God's favour, with all the powers he 7 had asked from the king. Some of the common folk made the journey to Jerusalem with him, as well as priests, Levites, singers, door-keepers and Nathinaeans. This was in the seventh year of king 8 Artaxerxes; they reached Jerusalem in the fifth month of this seventh year, on the first day of the month, after leaving Babylon on the first day of the first month, 10 such was the favour God shewed him. His was a heart given up to study of the Lord's law, ready to hold fast by it and teach the men of Israel decree and award.

Here is a copy of the letter Artaxerxes sent with him, addressed to, The priest Esdras, a scribe well versed in the Lord's utterances, all the commands and observances he enjoined upon Israel. Artaxerxes, king of kings, to Esdras, a scribe most learned in the law of the God of heaven, health and greeting. My will is, that any Israelite, priest or Levite who desires it should have leave to accompany thee to Jerusalem. Thou art commissioned by the king and his seven counsellors to visit Juda and Jerusalem in the name of that divine law thou carriest with thee, and to convey thither such silver and gold as the king and his council are sending to the God who dwells there, the God of Israel, as their own free gift. Whatever silver and gold in all Babylon is at thy disposal, all that is willingly offered by people and priests for the temple of their God at Jerusalem, thou art free to accept; and so with all thy diligence buy calf and ram and lamb and all the offerings and libations that go with them, gifts, when you reach Jerusalem, for the temple of your God. Use what remains of the sum as thou and thy brethren, in obedience to the will of your God, shall see fit. There at Jerusalem, in the presence of thy God, consecrate those appurtenances of his worship thou hast with thee. All else thou must needs spend upon thy God's house shall be defrayed by the treasury and the royal purse, at my own cost.

King Artaxerxes to all that have charge of the royal revenues beyond Euphrates; My will and decree is, that if the priest Esdras, a scribe of the God of heaven, demands any payment of you, it should be made without more ado; so long as this payment does not exceed a hundred talents of silver, two hundred quarters of wheat, or six hundred and fifty gallons of oil; for salt, there is no limit prescribed. What the God of heaven needs for his temple worship, the God of heaven must receive; let there be no remissness, that may call down his vengeance on the king, and the king's heirs. We make it known to you further that priests, Levites, singers, door-keepers,

¹ The Persian dynasty which had ousted the Babylonian dynasty which had ousted the Assyrian dynasty is described in this way, presumably because the second class of people mentioned in verse 21 came (many of them) from the territory of the ten Israelite tribes. It was an Assyrian king who had conquered Samaria, and to them the great empire of the east was still 'Assyria'.

Nathinaeans, and other persons ministering in the temple of this God, are exempt from all tax, toll and custom of your imposing.

It is for thee, Esdras, who dost carry with thee the wise precepts of thy God, to appoint judges and magistrates, that will try the causes of all such persons beyond the river as are acquainted with thy God's law; and such as do not know it, you may instruct freely. If anyone neglects to observe that law, or the king's law either, these judges shall have power to pronounce sentence on him of death, exile, confiscation of his goods, or imprisonment.

Blessed be the Lord God of our fathers, that moved the king so to honour his temple at Jerusalem, and deigned so to aid me when king and councillor and noble gave me audience! My task lightened by such favour shewn me, I set about finding men of name in Israel to bear me company.

8 The leaders, who took part with me in this migration under Artaxerxes, were descended as follows: Gersom was of the stock of Phinees, Daniel of Ithamar, Hattus of David. These were the numbers the various clans provided: Pharos (of the sons of Sechenias), a hundred and fifty under Zacharias; Phahath-Moab, two hundred under Elieoenai, son of Zarehe; Sechenias, three hundred under . . . , son of Ezechiel; Adan, fifty under Abed son of Jonathan; Alam, seventy under Isaias son of Athalias; Saphatia, eighty under Zebedia son of Michael; Joab, two hundred and eighteen under Obedia son of Jahiel; Selomith, a hundred and sixty under . . . , son of Josphia; Bebai, twenty-eight under Bebai's son Zacharias; Azgad, a hundred and ten under Johanan son of Ecetan; Adonicam, sixty, under his last remaining sons, Elipheleth, Jehiel and Samaias; Beui, seventy under Uthai and Zachur.

We made a halt of three days by the Ahava river; and there I found that I had common folk with me and priests, but no Levites. So I despatched some of the chiefs, Eliezer, Ariel, Semeias, Elnathan, Jarib, (a second Elnathan,) Nathan, Zacharias and Mosollam, with two prudent counsellors, Joiarib and Elnathan, to Eddo, who was in command at Casphia; I bade them ask Eddo and the Nathinaeans who were there with him to supply us with ministers for the house of our God. And they, by God's favour, sent us . . . , a Levite of Moholi's clan, with Sarabias and eighteen more of his kinsmen; also a Merarite, Hasabias, with Isaias and twenty more of his. There were also two hundred and twenty Nathinaeans; these Nathinaeans were men bound over by David and David's councillors to the service of the Levites. A list of all their names was supplied to us.¹

There, by the Ahava river, I proclaimed a fast; we would do penance, and ask of the Lord our God a safe journey for ourselves, for the children who went with us, and for all that was ours. I would have asked the king for an escort of horsemen to defend us from attack, but shame withheld me; had we not boasted in the king's presence that our God graciously protected all who had recourse to him, that only faithless servants of his brought down on themselves the constraining power of his vengeance? So fast we did, to win the favour we asked of God, and all went well.

Then I chose twelve of the leading priests, Sarabias and Hasabias with ten others, and handed over to them the offerings made by king, councillors, and nobles, and by such Israelites as came forward with gifts; the whole weight of silver and gold, and all the hallowed appurtenances of our God's temple. It was six hundred and fifty talents of silver I paid over to them, with a hundred pieces of silver ware; and a hundred talents of gold, with twelve bowls of the same metal, each of ten pounds' weight, and two pieces of the finest bronze ware, like gold itself for beauty. You are consecrated to the Lord, I told them, and here are consecrated things; here are silver and gold offered as a free gift to the Lord God of our fathers. Keep watchful guard over them; you are answerable for delivering them safely, in the presence of priest and Levite and clan chief there in Jerusalem, into the treasury of our God. So these priests and Levites took all that weight of silver and gold into their keeping, and the ornaments besides, that must be brought safely to the house of our God at Jerusalem.

¹ In verses 16-20 it seems likely that some minor errors have been made in copying out the names.

31 We left the Ahava river on the twelfth day of the first month, bound for Jerusalem; and, with our God protecting us from all peril on the way, of open enemy 32 or secret, to Jerusalem we came. We had 33 been there but three days before silver, gold and ornaments, were delivered safe in our God's temple. Meremoth, son of the priest Urias, and Eleazar, son of Phinees, with two Levites, Jozabed son of Josue and 34 Noadaia son of Bennoi, handed it over, all counted and weighed, and its weight was 35 duly entered. And these exiles, restored now from captivity, offered the God of Israel burnt-sacrifice; twelve calves for the twelve tribes of Israel, ninety rams and seventy-seven lambs, besides twelve goats as an offering for fault. Such was the burnt-sacrifice they made in the Lord's 36 honour; then they delivered the royal edict to the governors, that were the king's officers; and now God's people and God's house were held in honour by all that bore rule in the country west of Euphrates.

9 When all this was done, a complaint was brought to me by the chieftains, against priest and Levite and common folk alike. They had not kept themselves apart from the old inhabitants of the land, Chanaanite, Hethite, Pherezite, Jebusite, Ammonite, Moabite, Egyptian and Amorrhite, or from their detestable practices; foreign wives and daughters-in-law had contaminated the sacred stock of Israel, and the chief blame for this lay with 3 the rulers and magistrates themselves. At this news I tore cloak and tunic both, plucked hair from head and beard, and sat 4 there lamenting. Such as feared God's warnings, defied by these restored exiles, rallied to my side; and still I sat lamenting until the time came for the evening sacrifice.

5 Then, at the time of the evening sacrifice, I rose up from my posture of grief; cloak and tunic still torn about me, I fell on my knees and stretched out my hands 6 to the Lord my God. And thus I prayed: O my God, I am all confusion, I am ashamed to lift my eyes towards thee; so deep, head-deep, are we sunk in the flood of our wrong-doing, so high, heaven-high, mounts the tale of our transgressions. Sinful fathers begot us, sinners are we to this day; in vain have we fallen a prey, we and our kings and our priests, to the power of Gentile kings, to massacre, exile, rapine, and the humiliation that is with us now. For a brief moment it seemed as if the Lord our God had listened to our prayers; he would leave a remnant of our race surviving, leave us a foot-hold¹ on this holy ground; some gleam of hope our God would afford us, some breath of life in our bondage. Slaves we were, but in our slavery the Lord did not abandon us; he deigned to win us the favour of the Persian king; we were to live still, the house of our God was to rise anew, restored from its ruins, Juda and Jerusalem should have a wall to defend them. And now, O Lord our God, after all this, what plea can we offer? Thy will stands defied.

That will of thine, through thy servants the prophets, thou hast made fully known to us. They warned us, The land in whose conquest you are engaged is a heathen land, like heathen lands everywhere, unclean; detestable rites have filled it to the brim with defilement. Never a daughter 1 of yours for their sons, never a daughter of theirs for yours; never peace or good will between them and you, while time lasts! So you shall rise to greatness, so you shall enjoy all the blessings this land of yours can give, and bequeath them evermore to your sons for their inheritance. And now,
1 after so much wrong-doing, such punishment for lives ill lived, such pardon for our sins, and the deliverance that is with us this day, should we turn back? Should we 1 defy thy commandments, by mating with these, the abominable? Oh, then indeed thy patience is at an end; no remnant of us is to be left surviving! Lord God of Israel, the fault is not with thee; that we are alive to-day is proof of it. Ours is the fault; we stand before thee guilty, and without excuse.

10 While Esdras thus prayed for mercy, lying in tears before God's temple, a great throng of Israelites gathered round him, men, women and children alike, and loud was their lament.

¹ Literally 'a peg', such as is used for fixing a tent down.

At last Sechenias the son of Jehiel, of Aelam's clan, said to him, We have offended our God by marrying foreign wives, women of the neighbouring peoples; but is there no hope of pardon for Israel? Come, let us make a covenant with the Lord our God; let us send away these wives, and the children born of them. That is the Lord's counsel; that is the counsel of all who reverence his commands; let the law be obeyed! With thee, Esdras, the decision rests; count on our obedience; up, and go boldly about thy task. So Esdras rose up, and bound them by an oath, priests, Levites, and common folk, to do their part. Then, leaving the temple fore-court, he betook himself to Johanan's lodging, that was son of Eliasib; but here too he would neither eat nor drink, so bitterly he grieved over the restored exiles and their faithlessness.

And now word went round Juda and Jerusalem, that all those who had returned from captivity must meet together in the city; it had been decreed by the rulers and the elders that any man who did not appear there within three days should be deprived of all his goods and should be cut off from the restored community. Meet together they did, all the men of Juda and Benjamin, within the three days prescribed (that is, on the twentieth day of the ninth month), at Jerusalem. There they sat, a whole people, in the open space before the house of God, their spirits cowed by guilt, and by the rain that was falling. And the priest Esdras rose up and spoke to them. There is guilt among you, he said; by mating with aliens you have made the reckoning against Israel heavier yet. Confess your fault to the Lord God of your fathers, and obey his will; separate yourselves from the peoples that live around you, from the foreign wives you have married. At that, the whole multitude gave a loud cry. At thy bidding it shall be done! Only, because the throng was so great, and it was the rainy season, when there was no standing out of doors, because their task could not be performed in one day or two, so many were the faults thus committed, they would have their rulers go bail for the rest.¹ Then, in each township, those who had married alien wives should meet the elders and judges of it at a fixed time, till at last no faults were left to earn their God's vengeance. So Jonathan, son of Azahel, and Jaasia, son of Thecuc, took charge of this,² with two Levites, Mesollam and Sebethai, to help them; and the restored exiles kept their word, and separated themselves. The priest Esdras, with the clan chiefs... family by family and man by man; they began making their enquiries on the first day of the tenth month,³ and by the first day of the first month all the husbands of foreign wives had passed before them.

Some members of the priestly families had made such marriages, . . . and his brothers, Maasia, Eliezer, Jarib and Godolia, sons of Josue, son of Josedec; all these engaged themselves to send their wives away and sacrifice a ram as an offering for fault. Besides these, there were Hanani and Zebedia, of Emmer's family, Maasia, Elia, Semeia, Jehiel and Ozias, of Harim's, Elioenai, Maasia, Ismael, Nathanael, Joza-bed and Elasa, of Pheshur's. The Levites were Jozabed, Semei, Cleaia (or Calita), Phataia, Juda and Eliezer; there was one of the singers, Eliasib, and three of the door-keepers, Sellum, Telem and Uri. Of the common folk, there were Remeia, Jezia, Melchia, Miamin, Eliezer (Melchia), and Banea, of Pharo's family; Mathania, Zacharias, Jehiel, Abdi, Jerimoth and Elia, of Aelam's; Elioenai, Eliasib, Mathania,

¹ Literally, 'let rulers be set up in the whole multitude', which may also be understood as meaning 'that commissioners were to be appointed, to see the resolution carried out. But both in the Hebrew text and in the Septuagint Greek the phrase is, "Let our rulers for all the congregation stand". Both here and in the two following verses it may be questioned whether our text is not corrupt.

³ As it stands, this verse can be read so as to make a complete sentence: 'And the restored exiles kept their word; and they went away, the priest Esdras and the clan chiefs, into the houses of their fathers, and all by their names. . .', etc.; but it is difficult to see how any meaning can be attached to the sentence unless we suppose that some such words as 'took the whole people in order' have accidentally fallen out.

THE SECOND BOOK OF ESDRAS

OR THE BOOK OF NEHEMIAS

THESE are the memoirs of Nehemias, son of Helchias. One day in the month of Casleu, the year, the twentieth of Artaxerxes, in the royal city of Susa, I was visited by a kinsman of mine, Hanani, who brought with him certain travellers just come from Juda. So I asked them how it went with Jerusalem, and with the Jews still left there, survivors of the exiles who returned. Survivors there are, said they, in various parts of the province, left over from the days of the exile. But they are in great distress, and count for nothing; Jerusalem is but broken walls and charred gates.¹ For a long time after hearing this news I kept my house, all tears and lament; I fasted, and sought audience with the God of heaven in prayer.

Mercy, I cried, thou God of heaven, the strong, the great, the terrible! Thou who ever keepest thy gracious promises to the souls that love thee, and are true to thy commandments! Let thy ears be attentive, thy eyes watching still; listen to the prayer I offer thee now, thy servant, interceding day and night for my fellow-servants, the men of Israel. Listen to the confession I make of our sins; they, the men of Israel, have sinned, I and my father's race have sinned; led away by false aims, we have neglected decree and observance and award of thine, enjoined on thy servant Moses. But do not forget that this servant of thine, Moses, had a promise of thee too. Far and wide though thou shouldst scatter us among the nations, when we disobeyed thee, yet if we came back to thee, if we kept thy bidding in mind and performed it, then wouldst thou reunite us, though the furthest corner of earth were our place of banishment, and bring us home to that city which is the chosen shrine of thy name.

Are they not thy own servants, thy own people, won for thee by thy great deeds, by thy constraining power? Let not thy ears be deaf, Lord, I beseech thee, to thy servant's prayer, to the prayer of all these servants of thine who love to hold thy name in reverence. Speed thy servant well this day, and win for him the pity of a human heart.

It was of the king I spoke; I was the royal cup-bearer.

2 It was the month of Nisan, in the twentieth year of king Artaxerxes' reign. The king sat at his wine, and as I took it up to hand it to him, I stood there sad of mien in the royal presence.² Why, what mean these pale looks? he asked. Ill I know thou art not; this can be nothing else than some sorrow gnawing at thy heart. At this, I was in an extreme of fear; and, wishing the king long life, I answered, Little wonder if my looks are sad, when the city where my father lies buried is but a wilderness, and its gates blackened with fire. What wouldst thou have of me? the king asked. And I, first praying to the God of heaven, made answer thus, Did I but stand so high in the royal favour, my request would be that thou wouldst send me to Judaea, to this city where my father lies buried, and give me leave to rebuild it. No question had the king to ask, or his consort that was there beside him, but how long my journey would last? When did I think to return? So the king was content to let me go, and it was for me to name the time of my absence. Then I said, May it please the king's grace to entrust me with letters for the governors of the country beyond Euphrates, bidding them see me safe on my way to Judaea; a letter, moreover, to Asaph, the ranger of the royal forest, bidding him supply me with timber for coping the gates of the temple palace and the city walls, and roofing my own house besides. All this, by God's favour, the king granted me.

² The Hebrew text here has 'And I was not evil before him', probably through some error of copying. The Septuagint Greek, reading a very slightly different text in the Hebrew, gives us 'and there was no other (that is, no other servant in attendance) in his presence'.

9 So I made my way to the governors beyond Euphrates, with royal letters to give them, and a royal escort of captains and horsemen. Sick and sorry men were 10 Sanaballat the Horonite, and Tobias the Slave, one of the breed of Ammon, to hear of any visitor that had Israel's welfare at 11 heart. Then I went on to Jerusalem, and 12 waited three days before telling anyone what purpose God had put into my heart, to bring me there. When I stirred abroad, it was at dead of night, with only a few men to attend me, and none mounted but myself. At dead of night, I went out by the 13 Valley Gate, past the Dragon's Well, and on to the Scavengers' Gate, and all the way I found the wall of Jerusalem lying in ruins, and its gates blackened with fire. The next 14 gate I came to was that of the Well, and beyond that was the royal aqueduct; here the beast I was mounted on could find no 15 way to pass. So, at midnight, I passed along the ravine and examined the wall, returning home again by the Valley Gate;
16 none of the rulers knew whither I had gone, or on what errand; I had not opened my mind yet to the Jewish folk, priest or noble or ruler or any other whom the task 17 concerned. But now I called upon them to witness the sore strait we had been brought to, Jerusalem a wilderness, the gates blackened with fire; Come, I said, let us 18 build Jerusalem walls, and endure contempt no longer! Then I told them what favour God had shewn me, what speech I had had with the king's grace; Up, I cried, to the task! And with the good news, courage came back to them.

19 When word came to Sanaballat the Horonite, and Tobias the Slave, that was of Ammon's breed, and Gosem the Arabian, all was mockery and disdain; Here are fine doings! they said. Are you for 20 rebelling against the king's majesty? But I had my answer ready for them: The Master we serve is the God of heaven; he will be our helper. Leave us to set about our task of building; for you there is no right of possession, no privilege, no citizenship here at Jerusalem.¹

3 Up rose the high priest Eliasib, and his priestly brethren with him, and rebuilt the Shepherds' Gate; handselled it, and set up its doors, handselled the work all the way to Hundred-cubit Tower, all the way to the Tower of Hananeel. Next to him toiled, on this side, the men of Jericho; toiled, on that side, Zachur the son of Amri. The Fishmongers' Gate was restored by the sons of Asnaa, coping and doors, bolts and bars; then came Marimuth, son of Urias, son of Accus, then Mosollam, son of Barachias, son of Mesezebel; then Sadow, son of Baana; then the folk of Thecue, though never a shoulder did their chieftains put to the Lord's work. The Old Gate was restored by Joiada son of Phasea and Mosollam son of Besodia, coping and doors, bolts and bars; then came Meltias of Gabaon and Jadon the Meronathite, (and the)² men of Gabaon and Maspha, but they were working for the governor of the country beyond Euphrates; then Eziel son of Araia, of the gold-merchants, then Ananias, of the apothecaries; these let out Jerusalem as far as the wall round the open square.³ Then came Raphaia, son of Hur, that was in charge of a whole district of the city; then Jedaia, son of Haromaph, for the part abutting on his own house; then Hattus, son of Hasebonias. Half of that district of the city, with the Furnace Tower, was restored by Melchias, son of Herem and, next to him, Hasub of the clan of Phahath-Moab; next him again came Sellum son of Alohes, that had half one of the districts of Jerusalem in his charge, and his daughters with him. The Valley Gate was restored by Hanun and the men of Zanoë, coping and doors, bolts and bars, and a thousand cubits of the wall besides, right up to the Scavengers' Gate. This was restored, bolt and bar and door, by Melchias son of Rechab, that had charge of the Bethacharam district; and the Gate of the Well

by Sellum son of Cholhoza, chief of the Maspha district;¹ coping and door and bolt and bar he finished it, built the wall, too, of Siloe pool right up to the royal garden, and to the steps that lead down from David's Keep.

Nehemias son of Azboc, that had half the district of Bethsur in his charge, restored as far as David's tomb, and the artificial pool, and the House of the Heroes. Then came the Levites . . . Rehum son of Benni; then Hesebias, along that part of the Ceila district which was in his charge; then their brethren . . . Bavai son of Enadad, who had charge of the rest of the Ceila district . . .²

Then came a second length of wall restored by Azer son of Josue, that was chieftain at Maspha, where the steps go up by the great bastion; another second length by Baruch son of Zachai, from the bastion up to the door of the house where the high priest Eliasib lived; and another by Merimuth son of Urias son of Accus, from the door all along the side of the house. Then came some of the priests, men that dwelt in the plains of Jordan, then Benjamin and Hasub for the part opposite their house, then Azarias, son of Maasias, son of Ananias, for the part opposite his. Then Bennui son of Enadad built a second length, from the house of Ananias to the corner where the wall turns; then came Phalel, son of Ozi, for the part by the corner itself and the high tower of the royal palace that looks out on the prison yard; then Phadaia, son of Pharos, and the Nathinaeans (who)³ lived in the Ophel quarter, for the part by the eastern water-gate, and the jutting tower. Then the men of Thecue built a second length on the other side, from the great jutting tower to the temple wall. All the way up from the Stable Gate the priests restored, each along the front of his own house. Then came Sadoc the son of Emmere, opposite his own house, then Semaia son of Sechenias, that had charge of the eastern gate; then Hanania, son of Selemias, then Hanun, the sixth son of Seleph, a second length, then Mosollam son of Barachias, opposite his store-room, then Melchias, of the goldsmiths, past where the Nathinaeans and the chapmen lived, opposite the Judgement Gate, right up to the room⁴ in the wall corner. And from the room in the wall³¹ corner back to the Shepherds' Gate, the restoration was done by the goldsmiths and by the merchants.

4 Great was the rage of Sanaballat when news reached him that we were rebuilding the walls, and cruel were the taunts he uttered against the Jews in his anger. There among his kinsmen, there before a throng of Samaritan folk, he taunted us: What are they about, these starveling Jews? Do they think we Gentiles will let them have their way? Or do they think to handsel their work at dawn and have it finished by nightfall? From those charred ashes can they make stones to build with? Let them build, said his gossip, Tobias the Ammonite; come a fox by, he will leap over all the stones they can put together.

Mark it well, Lord God, how they turn us into a laughing-stock; on their own heads let the mockery recoil; exile and ignominy be their own lot! Do not hide away their guilt; imperishable in thy presence be the record of the wrong they did, in flouting such a design as this!

Meanwhile we did not cease building, and now we had completed the whole circuit of the wall up to half its full height, so eagerly did the people set about their task. And when this news came, that the breach in Jerusalem walls was healing, and the gaps were being filled, great was the indignation of Sanaballat and Tobias, of Arab, Ammonite and Philistine alike; and now, making common cause, they would attack Jerusalem and throw all into confusion. But still we asked help of our God, and set watchmen on the walls, day and night, to defeat their purpose. Already the Jews were complaining that they had no

² In verses 17-18, it seems likely that there is some break or fault in the text. That the list of names as we have it is incomplete, is suggested by the ensuing verses, where several people not hitherto mentioned are described as making themselves responsible for a second length of wall.

³ It is difficult not to believe that the word 'who' has dropped out of the text; a mere parenthesis about the district where the Nathinaeans lived seems wholly out of place.

⁴ In the Hebrew text, 'the ascent'.

strength left for carrying burdens, that the ground was choked with rubble; our task 11 would never be finished; and now our enemies thought to steal upon us unawares, 12 and put an end to it by taking our lives. On ten several occasions Jews that lived near them came back to us from different parts 13 with the same news; and at last I must array a force, armed with sword and lance and bow, behind the wall round its whole 14 circuit. That provision made, I set about encouraging them, nobles and chiefs and common folk alike; Fear no assault, I told them; bethink you how great, how fearsome the Lord is, and fight well each for his own kindred, for son and daughter and 15 wife, for house and home. And so, when word came to our enemies that we had been forewarned, God threw all their plot into confusion.

Back we went to our several posts at the 16 wall; and thenceforward the warriors among us were divided into two companies; one of these remained at work, while behind them, under the clan chiefs of Juda, the rest stood arrayed for battle, with lance and shield, bow and breast-17 plate. And even while they were at work, built they or loaded or carried loads, it was one hand to work with, and one closing still 18 on a javelin;¹ nor was there ever a workman but must build with his sword girt at his side. And the men that blew the trum-19 pets were close beside me; I had warned nobles and chiefs and common folk, Here is a task for many to do; spread wide apart, we are sundered far here on the wall and 20 there; rally, all of you, to any point where you hear the trumpet sound, and our God 21 will be our speed. We officers² too must take our share in the work, only half of us standing by with our spears, from dawn 22 till the stars rise. And to the common folk I said, Each of you, and his manservant with him, must lodge here in Jerusalem itself, taking turn and turn about, day and 23 night. As for myself, and my clansmen and servants, and the men of my bodyguard, we never took our garments off all the while, save when we stripped for washing.

5 And now there was a great outcry of the common sort, men and women, against their richer neighbours, that were Jews too. Poor folk, who had sons and daughters in great number, had bethought themselves of bartering these for the corn they must have if they would live; some, in the great scarcity, had been ready to pledge lands, vineyards and house in return for corn; some had offered vineyard or lands for a pledge when they would borrow money to pay the royal tribute.
 And now they complained, These men are our brothers; of one race, they and we,
 of one race, their sons and ours; and here are we, with some of our daughters bond-women already, giving up sons and daughters to slavery still, and no hope of ransoming them; here are lands and vineyards of ours given over to the enjoyment of others!

Great was my anger when I heard such cause of complaint was theirs. I took deep thought over it, and then taxed nobles and rulers with their fault; would they play the usurer with their own brethren? Summoning a great assembly of the citizens to confront them, I reminded them that we in Babylon had been at pains to ransom our Jewish brethren who were enslaved to the heathen; must we now ransom them anew, from masters of their own flesh and blood?
 At this, there was silence; nothing could they find to say.³ Here are sorry doings, I told them. Have you no fear of God's vengeance, of the reproach this will earn from our heathen neighbours? You are not the only creditors; I myself, my kinsmen and my servants have been lending money and corn on all sides. Come, let us conspire to forgo our rights, let us all remit the debt due to us; and do you restore, here and now, lands, vineyards, olive-yards and houses; restore, too, the interest charge you claim of a hundredth, for money and corn, wine and oil alike. Restore it we will, they answered, and make no further claim; thy bidding shall be done. Thereupon I summoned the priests, and would have this undertaking secured by an oath. I shook the dust, too, from the

² The word 'officers' is not in the original, but the emphasis thrown on the word 'we' seems to indicate that this is the sense intended.

³ The interpretation of this verse in the Hebrew text is not certain; but the rendering above, which follows the Latin, seems to give the best sense.

folds of my lap, and cried out: God give no gentler handling than this to the man who plays me false; sweep away house and lands, and leave him a beggar! Amen, answered the whole assembly, and gave praise to God. And loyally the agreement was kept.

For twelve years, ever since Artaxerxes gave me my commission in Juda (that is,
 from the twentieth to the thirty-second year of his reign) my kinsmen and I refused to take the allowance which was granted to the governors. My predecessors, by accepting corn, wine, and money, at the rate of forty sicles a day, had been a burden to the people, who suffered also from the exactions of their servants. Not so I, God's fear preventing me; instead of buying lands, my care was to help build the wall, and there was no servant of mine but took his place among the workmen. A hundred and fifty Jews, (the rulers,¹ and those) who came in to help us from the country round about, fed at my expense; every day an ox and six fat rams, and fowls besides, were dressed for me, and every tenth day brought a fresh supply of various wines;
 yet for this and much else I would take no allowance as governor in return; to such straits had the men of Juda been brought.
 Not unremembered, Lord, not unrewarded, be these services done to thy people.

6 And now news reached Sanaballat and Tobias and the Arabian, Gosem, and the rest of our enemies, that I had finished building the wall, and never a gap was left in it; although in truth I had not yet been able to set up doors in the gateways. Thereupon Sanaballat and Gosem sent a message proposing that I should meet them in some unfortified town on the plains of Ono, and there make a treaty; it was their design to do me some mischief.
 But I bade my own messengers answer, It is a hard task I must perform here; I am not for the plain. There would be folk standing idle here, while I came down to meet you. Four times they sent word to the same purpose, and ever had the same answer from me; and once more Sana-ballat repeated it, but this time the servant

who brought it had a letter in his hand.
 And this was the tenour of it: The Gentiles will have it, and Gosem says the tale is truc, that thou and the Jews are rebuilding the walls because you are plotting rebellion. It is said that thou wouldst be king thyself, and to that end hast put forward prophets to preach thee up in Jerusalem, and announce that Juda has a king.
 All this will reach the ears of Artaxerxes;
 come hither thou must, and we will devise measures between us. But I sent word back, There is no truth in the tale; it is of thy own imagining.

It was but a conspiracy to frighten us;
 their thought was we would cease building, and bide our time; but I pressed on the harder. I went once to visit Semaïas, son of Dalaias, son of Metabeel; he was then keeping his house. Nay, said he, let us go to the temple and there hold converse, there in the heart of the temple, behind shut doors. They are coming to murder thee; this very night they are coming to murder thee. What, I answered, I take flight? I am not the man to save my life by skulking in God's house. The temple is not for me. And well I knew that his was no errand from God, though he spoke to me as one inspired to prophesy. It was Tobias and Sanaballat that had him in their pay;
 they had bribed him, hoping that through terror I would commit a fault, and they would have ill tales to spread about me.
 Not unremembered, Lord, be all this that I suffered on account of Tobias and Sana-ballat; of the prophet Noadia, too, and all those prophets that would have daunted me!

The wall was finished on the twenty-fifth day of the month Elul; it had taken fifty-two days a-building. And when this reached the ears of our enemies, fear overtook all the nations round about us; their stature fell in their own eyes, and they doubted no longer that it was God who had inspired the enterprise.

Tobias, at this time, was exchanging letters with many of the Jewish nobles; he had married the daughter of Sechenias, son of Area, and wedded his son Johanan to the daughter of Mosollam, son of Barachias, and so had a great following in ¹ There is no mention of rulers in the Septuagint Greek; it seems possible that the word has crept into the Hebrew text through an error.

19 Judaea. Still they sang his praises to me, still sent him news of all I did; this very Tobias was writing letters to fill me with alarm.

7 When the wall was finished, and I had set up the gates, I made a register of the door-keepers; of the singers, too, and the Levites. Then I entrusted the defence of the city to my kinsman Hanani, and to Hananias, who was controller of the temple palace at Jerusalem, and eminent, as it seemed to me, in honour and piety; these I made answerable for seeing to it that the gates should never be opened till the sun was up. At nightfall, the gates must be bolted and barred in their presence. And such citizens of Jerusalem as had houses facing the wall must take their turn at keeping watch.

4 Far and wide the city stretched, and its citizens were few and far between; the houses in it had not yet been repaired. But I, God putting such a resolve into my heart, mustered them all, nobles, rulers and common citizens alike, to make a register of them. I found the old register, with the names of those who first returned from exile, and their numbers, it proved, were as follows.

6 These were the numbers in which they came back to Jerusalem, and to the various cities of Juda, these exiles that had been taken to Babylon by the Chaldaean king Nabuchodonosor, and afterwards returned home. Their leaders were Zorobabel, Josue, Nehemias, Azarias, Raamias, Nahamani, Mardocheaus, Belsam, Mespharath, Begoai, Nahum and Baana. These were the numbers the various clans of Israel provided: Pharos, two thousand one hundred and seventy-two, Saphatia, three hundred and seventy-two, Area, six hundred and fifty-two, Phahath-Moab... Josue-Joab, two thousand eight hundred and eighteen, Aelam, one thousand two hundred and fifty-four, Zethua, eight hundred and forty-five, Zachai, seven hundred and sixty, Bannui, six hundred and forty-eight, Bebai, six hundred and twenty-eight, Azgad, two thousand three hundred and twenty-two, Adonicam, six hundred and sixty-seven, Beguai, two thousand and sixty-seven, Adin, six hundred and fifty-five, Ater, coming from Hesecias, ninety-eight, Hasem, three hundred and twenty-eight, Besai, three hundred and twenty-four, Hareph, a hundred and twelve.

And the various townships provided: Gabaon, ninety-five, Bethlehem and Netupha, a hundred and eighty-eight, Anathoth, a hundred and twenty-eight, Bethazmoth, forty-two, Cariathiarim, Cephira and Beroth, seven hundred and forty-three, Rama and Geba, six hundred and twenty-one, Machmas, a hundred and twenty-two, Bethel and Hai, a hundred and twenty-three, (the other) Nebo fifty-two, (the other) Aelam, one thousand two hundred and fifty-four, Harem, three hundred and twenty, Jericho, three hundred and forty-five, Lod, Hadid and Ono, seven hundred and twenty-one, Senaa, three thousand nine hundred and thirty...

And the various priestly clans provided: Idaia, in the line of Josue, nine hundred and seventy-three, Emmer, a thousand and fifty-two, Phashur, a thousand two hundred and forty-seven, Arem, a thousand and seventeen. Levites there were, named after Josue and Cedmihel, that came down from Oduais, seventy-four; singers, after Asaph, a hundred and forty-eight; door-keepers, after Sellum, Ater, Telmon, Accub, Hatita and Sobai, a hundred and thirty-eight.

The Nathinaeans included the sons of Soha, Hasupha, Tebbaoth, Ceros, Siaa, Phadon, Lebana, Hagaba, Selmai, Hanan, Geddel, Gaher, Raايا, Rasin, Necoda, Gezem, Aza, Phasea, Besai, Munim, Nephussim, Bacbuc, Hacupha, Harhur, Besloth, Mahida, Harsa, Bercos, Sisara, Thema, Nasia, and Hatipha, Solomon's servants, Sothai, Sophereth, Pharida, Jahala, Darcon, Jeddell, Saphatia, Hatil, Phochereth, son of Sabaim, son of Amon; these Nathinacans, including those descended from the servants of Solomon, amounted to three hundred and ninety-two in all.

Some of those who came back from Thelmela, Thelharsa, Cherub, Addon and Emmer could not prove whence their ancestors came or whether they were of Israelite stock; they were descendants of Dalaia, Tobia and Necoda, amounting to six hundred and forty-two. Such, too, among the priests were the sons of Habia, of Accos, and of that Berzellai who married

64 a daughter of Berzellai the Galaadite and took his name; they could find no written record of their ancestry, and were expelled 65 from the priesthood; they might not partake of the food reserved for the priests, the governor told them, until there should be a high priest that bore the touchstones of wisdom and truth.

66 The whole number, taken together, amounted to forty-two thousand three 67 hundred and sixty, not counting the men and women servants, of whom there were seven thousand three hundred and thirty-seven, with two hundred and forty-five 68 men and maids that were singers. They had with them seven hundred and thirty-six horses, two hundred and forty-five 69 mules, four hundred and thirty-five camels, six thousand seven hundred and twenty asses.¹

(End of the register. The narrative of Nehemias continues.²)

70 ... Some of the chief families made contributions to help the enterprise. The governor handed over to the treasury a thousand gold pieces, fifty bowls, and five hundred and thirty tunics for the priests; 71 the heads of clans, twenty thousand gold pieces, and two thousand two hundred 72 silver pieces, the rest of the people, twenty thousand gold pieces, two thousand silver pieces, and sixty-seven tunics for the 73 priests. And now priests and Levites, singers and door-keepers (and the rest of the people) and the Nathinaeans and all Israel were back in the cities that were their homes.

8 When the seventh month had come after the return of the Israelites to their cities, the whole people gathered, like one man, in the open space before the Water-gate; and there they would have the scribe Esdras go and fetch the book in which the law of Moses, the Lord's prescription to Israel, was written down. So there and then, on the first day of the seventh month, the priest Esdras fetched out the book, in the presence of a great throng of men and women, with such children as were old enough to understand it.

And there in the open space before the Water-gate he proclaimed the law, before men and women and such younger folk as could take it in, from daybreak to noon, and all listened attentively while the reading went on. A wooden pulpit had been erected to carry the sound better, and at this the scribe Esdras stood; with him were Mathathias, Semeia, Ania, Uria, Helcia and Maasia on his right, Phadaia, Misael, Melchia, Hasum, Hasbadana, Zácharia and Mosollam on his left. Esdras was plainly seen, as he opened the book, by all the people underneath. When he had opened it, all rose; and when he blessed the name of the Lord, the great God, all lifted their hands and answered, Amen, amen; and with that they bowed down and worshipped with their faces close to the ground. Then the Levites came forward, Josue, Bani, Serebia, Jamin, Accub, Seb-thai, Odia, Maasia, Celita, Azarias, Jozabed, Hanan and Phalaia; these enjoined silence on the people, as they stood there in their places for the reading of the law.
And they read out the book of the law, clear and plain to give the sense of it, so that all could understand the reading. And now the governor, Nehemias, with Esdras, priest and scribe, and these Levites who interpreted to the people what was read, must needs remind them that it was a feast-day set apart to the Lord; there must be no lamenting and weeping; already the whole multitude were in tears, as they listened to the words of the law. Go home, said Nehemias, and regale yourselves with rich meat and honeyed wine, sharing your good things with those who have none.
There must be no sadness on this day, the Lord's feast-day. To rejoice in the Lord, there lies our strength. The Levites, too, called for silence everywhere; Peace there, no lamenting, they said, this is a day of rejoicing. So all the throng dispersed, to eat and drink and share their good things with glad hearts, the message of the law made plain to them.

Next day, all the clan chiefs and priests and Levites thronged about the scribe Esdras, to hear him interpret the law's

¹ vv. 6-69, cf. I Esdras 2. 1-67. It is evident from the slight variations which will be noticed among the figures that our text of the sacred scriptures is not always immune from occasional errors in copying.

14 meaning. And there they found it set down, as the Lord's injunction through Moses, that the sons of Israel, at the feast of the seventh month, should make their 15 dwelling in tents. They were to proclaim it far and wide at Jerusalem and in all their cities, Go out to the mountain-side, and bring in boughs of olive, or of some favourite tree, branches of myrtle and palm, leafy boughs, to make arbours, as the law 16 prescribes. So the men of Juda went out, and brought green boughs home; arbours they made everywhere, in their own dwellings and fore-courts, in the courts of the Lord's house, and in the open spaces before the Water-gate and the Gate of 17 Ephraim. Thus the whole body of those who had come back from exile made arbours and lodged in them; since the days of Josue son of Nun the rite had fallen into abeyance, and now there was great re-18 joicing. Day after day while the feast continued Esdras read out the book of God's law to them. So for seven days they kept high festival, and on the eighth there was a gathering of the whole people, held with due solemnity.

9 Then, on the twenty-fourth day of this same month, the men of Israel met together, fasting, and with sackcloth 2 about them, and sprinkled with dust, and the whole breed of Israel severed itself from all contact with alien folk. They met to confess their sins, and all the guilt their 3 fathers had brought on them. The day was divided into four parts; first they would stand in their places, while the terms of the Divine law were read to them, then they would make confession, and offer worship 4 to the Lord their God. It was for the Levites to mount upon the pulpit, Josue, Bani, Cedmihel, Sabania, Bonni, Sarebias (Bani), and Chanani, and cry out in a loud voice to the Lord their God.

5 . . . This was the prayer offered by the Levites, Josue, Cedmihel, Bonni, Haseb-nia, Serebia, Odaia, Sebnia and Phathahia. Up, friends, and bless the Lord your God, as blessed he must be from the beginning to the end of time! Blessed be thy glorious name, O Lord, that is beyond 6 all blessing, and all praise! Heaven is of thy fashioning, and the heaven of heavens, and all the hosts that dwell there, earth and sea, and all that earth and sea hold; to all these thou givest the life they have; none so high in heaven but must pay thee worship. It was thou, Lord God, that didst make choice of Abram, and beckon him away from Chaldea, from the City of Fire.¹ And now thou wouldst call him Abraham; a loyal servant thou didst find him, and didst make a covenant with him, promising that his race should inherit the lands of Chanaanite and Hethite, Amorrhite and Pherezite, Jebusite and Gergesite. That promise, in thy faithfulness, thou didst make good. Thou hadst an eye for the affliction our fathers suffered in Egypt, an ear for their cry of distress at the Red Sea; the pride of Pharao and Pharao's court and all his people had not passed unregarded; there were portents, and marvels, and thy name won renown, as it has won renown this day.

Thou didst part the waters at their coming, so that they crossed the sea dryshod, didst hurl their pursuers into the depths of it, so that they sank like a stone beneath the rushing waves. Thou thyself didst lead thy people on their journey, hidden by day in a pillar of cloud, by night in a pillar of fire, to light the path they must tread. There, on mount Sinai, thou didst keep tryst with them; thy voice came from heaven to teach them thy just decrees, thy abiding law with all its observances, all its wholesome bidding.
 There thou didst reveal to them how thy sabbath should be kept holy; law and observance and award thou, through Moses, didst hand down to them. When they were hungry, thou didst give them bread from heaven; when they were thirsty, thou didst bring water out of the rock; and for the goal of their journey didst beckon them on to take possession of this same land, which thou hadst sworn to give them.

But now our fathers sinned through pride in their turn; spurned the yoke, and would not listen to thy commandments.
 No memory of the wondrous protection thou hadst given them could win their obedience; they would spurn the yoke, and take their own defiant path, the path that led back to slavery. But thou, a God so indulgent, so kind, so merciful, so patient, 8 so pitying, wouldst not abandon them; not even when they made a molten calf, and hailed it very blasphemously as the God 9 that had rescued them from Egypt; still in thy great mercy thou wouldst not cast them off in the desert. Never lacked they by day the pillar of cloud that led them, never by night the pillar of fire that shone 10 upon their path; still thy gracious spirit gave its warnings, still thou wouldst not refuse manna to feed them, water to 11 quench their thirst. All those forty years in the desert thou didst feed them, and nothing did they lack; never a garment threadbare, never a foot sore with travel.

12 Whole kingdoms, whole nations thou didst subdue before them, to allot them lands of their own; nothing Sehon possessed, that reigned at Hesebon, or Og, that was king in Basan, but should be 13 theirs. By now, thou hadst given increase to their race till they were countless as the stars in heaven; it was the fathers thou hadst first bidden to invade the land and 14 take possession of it, but it was their sons that reached the goal. At their coming, thou didst crush the pride of the Chanaanites that dwelt here, kings and people alike were a prey for the conqueror, left at 15 his mercy. So it was that our fathers gained cities well fortified, lands well tilled; houses full of all they needed, wells other men had dug for them, vineyard and olive-yard and orchard already planted. Now they might eat their fill, glut their 16 appetites with all the good things thy mercy had bestowed.

Then it was they defied thy anger, thy worship forsaken, thy laws forgotten, and slew the prophets that adjured them to come back to thee. And thou, in return for such foul impieties, didst give their enemies the mastery over them, till they fell into sore distress. But when, in their misery, they cried out to thee, thou, in heaven, didst not refuse them audience; ever thou wouldst send, of thy great mercy, a champion to bring them rescue. Still the days of peace saw them defying thy will, until thou must needs put them at their enemies' mercy; still their repentant cries reached thy hearing, and won 17 them merciful deliverance. And thou, all the while, wast pleading with them to return to thy allegiance, while they, too proud to heed thy bidding, transgressed the commandments that bring man life; always the unwilling shoulder, the stubborn neck, the deaf ear. Through long 18 years thy patience lasted, and thou wast content to warn them through inspiration given to thy prophets; then at last, when these went unheard, thou didst give thy people up into the hands of the Gentiles. And even so, in thy clemency, thou 19 wouldst not make an end of us; even now thou hast not abandoned us, so pitying, so merciful a God thou art.

To thee, then, we turn, who art our 20 God, to thee, the great, the strong, the terrible God, who dost not forget thy covenant, or the mercy thou hast promised. Do not think scorn of all the misery that has come upon us, king and prince, priest and prophet, in our fathers' time and since, from the day when the king of Assyria became our enemy. The fault was never thine, if all this has overtaken us; thine the faithfulness, ours the unnatural rebellion. King and prince and 21 priest together, our fathers have neglected thy law; the decrees thou hadst enjoined, the warning thou gavest, went alike unheeded. The royal majesty, the blessings 22 showered on them, the wide domains thou didst subdue at their onslaught, were not enough to win obedience from them, or recall them from their rebellious ways. Here are we, this day, living as slaves; here 23 are the wide lands, the rich lands thou gavest to our fathers, to till and to enjoy, and we are living on them in slavery. The 24 harvests ripen for alien kings, our masters now in punishment of our guilt; our bodies, our beasts are theirs, to treat as they will, and oppression is all about us. In such a plight we turn to thee, binding 25 ourselves by a covenant; that covenant we here record in writing, rulers and Levites and priests have set their names to it.

10 At the head of those who signed this covenant was the governor, Nehemias the son of Hachelai; then came Sedecias, Saraias, Azarias, Jeremias, Phe- 26 shur, Amarias, Melchias, Hartus, Sebenia, 27 Melluch, Harem, Merimuth, Obdias, 28 Daniel, Genthon, Baruch, Mosollam, 29

8 Abia, Miamin, Maazia, Belgai and Se-9 meia, all priests. Then the Levites, Josue son of Azanias, Bennui of Henadad's clan, 10 Cedmihel, Sebenia, Odaia, Celita, Pha-11 laia, Hanan, Micha, Rohob, Hasebia, 12 Zachur, Serebia, Sabania, Odaia, Bani and 14 Baninu. Then the clan chiefs of Pharos, Phahath-Moab, Aelam, Zethu, Bani, 15 Bonni, Azgad, Bessai, Adonia, Begoai, 17 Adin, Ater, Hezecia, Azur, Odaia, Hasum, 19 Besai, Hareph, Anathoth, Nebai, Meg-21 phias, Mosollam, Hazir, Mesizabel, Sadoc, 22 Jeddua, Pheltia, Hanan, Anaia, Osee, 24 Hanania, Hasub, Alohes, Phalea, Sobec, 25 Rehum, Hasebna, Maasia, Echaia, Hanan, 27 Anan, Melluch, Haran and Baana. The oath was taken by the whole people, priests, Levites, door-keepers, singers, Nathinaeans and the rest, all who had broken off their contact with the Gentiles to keep the law of God. Wives as well as husbands took it; sons and daughters, too, 29 where these were of age to understand its import. Their leaders did but go bail for the rest; all alike entered into a sworn undertaking that they would obey God's law, given through his servant Moses.
 Never a decree or award or observance the Lord our God had enjoined but they would keep it sacred and live by it.
 30 Never shall our children mate with the children of Gentile parents, or theirs with 31 ours. Never shall Gentile wares, exposed on sabbath or feast-day, furnish our needs.
 Every seventh year the land shall lie 32 fallow, and all debts shall be remitted. We impose upon ourselves a tax, of one third 33 of a sicle yearly, for our God's temple; for the loaves that must be set out, and the continual offering, the burnt-sacrifice on sabbath and new moon and feast-day, welcome-offering and offering for fault that win Israel mercy, and all the needs of 34 our God's house. For the provision of wood, we have cast lots between priests, Levites and the people at large so that each clan must take its turn, season and season about, bringing in logs to burn on the altar of the Lord our God, as the law of Moses 35 enjoins. Year by year, too, we will bring to the Lord's house the first-fruits of all 36 that our lands or fruit-trees yield; due offering shall be made there of all our first-born, man or beast, ox or sheep, as the law bids, before the priests that minister there in the Lord's house; food and drink, the fruit of all our trees, our grapes and our olives, shall be taxed by the priests that have charge of our God's treasury. Our lands shall be tithed, too, for the Levites; in all our cities the Levites themselves shall collect a tithe from all our crops. A priest of Aaron's line shall accompany the Levites when they make the collection, and the Levites themselves shall contribute a tithe of their tithe to the house of our God, to the treasury where his wealth is stored.

 To that treasury all alike must contribute, Levites and people out of their corn and wine and oil; that house must have its furniture of worship, priest and singer, door-keeper and ministrant. It is the house of the Lord our God; shall we leave it forsaken?

11 The rulers must needs have their dwelling in Jerusalem; the common folk had their residence assigned by lot, every tenth man going to live in the holy city, while the other nine remained in the country parts; whoever offered of his own free will to be a Jerusalem-dweller earned the blessings of his fellow-citizens.
 And these were the leading men of the colony that lived at Jerusalem, leaving the rest, the people at large, the priests, the Levites, the Nathinaeans, and the line of Solomon's servants, to occupy the country parts, each in the cities allotted to them.
 In Jerusalem, the population was mixed, men of Juda and men of Benjamin living side by side.

The chief men of Juda were Athaias, descended through Aziam, Zacharias, Amarias and Saphatias from Malalee . . .¹ and for the line of Phares, Maasia, descended through Baruch, Cholhoza, Ha-zia, Adaia, Joiarib and Zacharias from Silonitess; altogether, there were four hundred and sixty-eight fighting men at Jerusalem that came down from Phares.
 The chief men of Benjamin were Sellum, descended through Mosollam, Joed, Phadaia, Colaia, Masia and Ethael from Isaia, and next to him Gebbai . . . Sallai² . . . nine

¹ It looks as if there had been an omission made here by a copyist; we should expect to hear that Athaias led the clan of Zara (as opposed to Phares) and to be given some account of their numbers.

² The two names here given are most reasonably accounted for by supposing a manuscript defect.

9 hundred and twenty-eight in all. All these were under the charge of Joel son of Zechri; Judas son of Senua was next in command of the city.

10 Among the leading priests were Idaia
1 son of Joiarib, Jachin, and Saraia, the temple prefect, that came down through Helcias, Mosollam, Sadoc and Meraioth 1 from Achitob; their clansmen, engaged in the service of the temple, amounted to eight hundred and twenty-two. Also Adaia, that came down through Jeroham, Phclelia, Arnsi, Zacharias and Pheshur 1 from Melchias, with two hundred and forty-two heads of families, his clansmen. Also Amassai, descended through Azreel, Ahazi and Mosollamoth from Emmer, with the clansmen of his line, a hundred and twenty-eight, valiant men all. And these were in charge of Zabdriel; his fathers, too, were valiant men before him.

The Levite chiefs were Semeia, descended through Hasub, Azaricam and Hasabia from Boni, and Sabathai and Jozabed, these were in charge of the work the Levites did beyond the temple precincts; Mathania, descended through Micha and Zebedei from Asaph, led the music of praise and thanksgiving and prayer, with his kinsman Becbecia to aid him, and Abda, descended through Samua and Galal from Idithun. There were two hundred and eighty-four of these Levites in the city; and door-keepers besides, Accub and Telmon, with a hundred and seventy-two clansmen of theirs who shared their watch at the gates. The rest of Israel, priests and Levites included, had their homes in the various cities of Juda, but the Nathinaeans, with Siaha and Gaspha over them, all lived together in the Ophel quarter. The Levites at Jerusalem were in charge of Azzi, that came down through Bani, Hasabias and Mathanias from Michas. He was of the clan of Asaph, that were musicians in the service of the temple by royal command, taking their turns, day in, day out, with the chant.¹ The king's representative in all that concerned the citizens was Phathahia, son of Mesezebel, of Zara's clan, that was son to Juda.

All over the countryside the men of Juda had their homes, at Cariatharbe, Dibon and Cabseel, with their daughter townships, at Jesue, Molada, Bethphaeth, Hasersual, Bersabee and its neighbourhood, Siceleg, Mochona and its neighbourhood, Remmon, Saraa, Jerimuth, Zanoa and Odollam and the towns near them, Lachis and its district, Azeca, too, and its neighbourhood. Their territory stretched all the way from Bersabee in the south to the valley of Ennom. The Benjamites, with Geba for their capital, were spread about at Mechmas, Hai, Bethel and its daughter townships, Anathoth, Nob, Anania, Asor, Rama, Gethaim, Hadid, Seboim, Neballat, Lod and Ono, down in the Valley of the Craftsmen. And the precincts of the Levites were spread over Juda and Benjamin alike.

12 Here is a list of the priests and Levites who came back from exile with Zorobabel, Salathiel's son, and Josue.
Saraia, Jeremias, Esdras, Amaria, Mel-luch, Hattus, Sebenias, Rheum, Meri-muth, Addo, Genthon, Abia, Miamin, Madia, Belga, Semeia, Joiarib, (Joiada),² Sellum, Amoc, Helcias and Idaia were the chief priests who had the preeminence among their brethren in Josue's time. The chief Levites were Jesua, Bennui, Cedmihel, Sarebia, Juda and Mathanias, who, with their clansmen, had charge of the music; also Becbecia and Hanni, whose clansmen had various other offices assigned to them. The high priesthood passed from Josue through Joacim, Elisib, Joiada and Jonathan to Jeddoa. In Joacim's time the clan of Saraia was represented by Maraia, that of Jeremias by Hanania, and the other twenty by Mosollam, Johanan, Jonathan, Joseph, Edna, Helci, Zacharia, Mosollam, Zechri, Phelti (who represented both Miamin and Madia), Sammua, Jonathan, Mathanai, Azzi, Celai, Heber, Hasebia and Nathanael.
There was a list made, at the time when Darius was king of Persia, of all who had been heads of the Levitical and priestly clans in the days of Eliasib, Joiada,

¹ It is difficult to see why a note should have been given here about the duties of the Asaphite clan, but still more difficult, if we put a full stop after Asaph, to make out of the words which follow a sentence relevant to the context. ² The Latin here reads 'Idaia', which seems to be a copyist's mistake for 'Joiada'; see next verse, where Idaia appears.

Johanah and Jeddoah.¹ In the book of Annals, the Levite chiefs are only entered down to the days of Eliasib's grandson Jonathan.

24 . . . The duties of the Levite chiefs were thus divided; Hasebia, Serebia, Josue, (Bennui), Cedmihel and their clansmen took their turn in due order at singing of praise and giving of thanks, as David bade, 25 that was God's servant; Mathania, Becbecia, Obedia, Mosollam, Telmon and Accub must keep the gates and the courts 26 before the gates. These held office in the days of Joacim, son of Josue son of Josedec, when Nehemias was governor and Esdras was priest and scribe.

27 At the time when the wall of Jerusalem was dedicated, the Levites, from all their scattered homes, were summoned up to Jerusalem; theirs to interpret the joy and thanksgiving which this dedication brought, with song and cymbals, with harp 28 and zither. From the lowlands about Jerusalem they came, these makers of music, 29 from the townships of Nethuphati, from their residence at Galgal, from Geba and Azmaveth, and wherever there were colonies of singers at a distance from Jerusalem itself. Priests and Levites rid themselves of all defilement, then did as much for the people, and for the walls and gates themselves.

31 And I, Nehemias, would have the chief men of Juda mount on the wall, and two choirs of singers to escort them with chants of praise. One choir went along the wall to the right, in the direction of the Scavengers' Gate, with Osaiah and half the chiefs of Juda behind it; then Azarias, Esdras and Mosollam; then (half) the men of Juda and Benjamin;² then Semeiah and 34 Jeremias; then some of the priests with trumpets, led by Zacharias, that came down through Jonathan, Semeiah, Mathanias, Michaias and Zechur from Asaph himself; the others were Semeiah, Azareel, Malalai, Galalai, Maai, Nathanael, Judas and Hanani. So they went, and with them went the music planned by God's servant

David, and the scribe Esdras marched at their head. When they reached the Gate of the Well, an upward climb confronted them; up the steps of David's Keep they went, and up the slope that passes David's palace, till they reached the Water-gate in the east wall.

The second choir, with the same chant 37 of praise, marched in the other direction, I myself and half the people accompanying it; climbed the wall and the Furnace Tower, and so went on where the wall was broadest, past the Gate of Ephraim, and the old gate, and the Fishmongers' Gate, 38 and the Tower of Hananeel and the Tower of Emath, and on to the Shepherds' Gate. At last they reached the Watch-tower Gate, and came to a halt there. Then the two choirs stood together at God's house giving praise. I, too, and the chiefs who were with me had priests with trumpets for our escort, Eliachim, Maasia, Miamin, 40 Michea, Elioenai, Zacharia and Hanania; also Maasia, Semeiah, Eleazar, Azzi, Johanah, Melchia, Aelam and Ezer. Loud sang the singers, and loud sang Jezraiah at their head. Great was the slaughtering of victims that day, and greatly they rejoiced, women and children with the rest, at the signal mercy the Lord had shewn them; such a cry of triumph went up from Jerusalem as was heard far away.

At this time they appointed certain 43 priests and Levites to take charge of the treasury, and receive offering and first-fruit and tithe from the city chiefs, in honour and gratitude; so well content were the men of Juda with the ministrations of priest and Levite both.³ And ever they kept true to the old observances, God honoured, defilement cleansed away, singers and porters fulfilling the duties which David, and David's son Solomon, enjoined upon them. Ever since David's 45 time and Asaph's there had been masters of the choir to give praise and thanks; and now, in the times of Zorobabel and of Nehemias, men assigned a daily portion 46

¹ vv. 10-23. The list or lists, incorporated in verses 10-23, apparently go down later than the time of Nehemias himself; the Darius mentioned in verse 23 seems to be the Darius defeated at Arbela in 331, not the Darius defeated at Marathon in 490. Verses 43-46 also seem to come from a period when Nehemias' governorship was already past history. ² It seems unlikely that 'Juda and Benjamin' here are the names of prominent individuals; if the two tribes are meant, it would appear that only half of the Judean population marched with the first choir, cf. verse 37 below. ³ The Hebrew text here is very obscure; the Latin version, which seems to be based on a different tradition, yields the sense given above.

both to choristers and to door-keepers; Israel honoured Levi with gifts, and Levi Aaron.

13 And now a new discovery came to light, while the law of Moses was being read out to the people. It was found set down there, that no Ammonite or Moabite might be admitted to the Lord's assembly. And this was a disability they had incurred for all time, by refusing to provide food and drink, when Israel came by; it was they, too, that hired Balaam to curse Israel, only our God transformed that curse into a blessing. No sooner was this injunction made known, than the Israelites began to rid themselves of all contact with alien folk.

Till now, it had been otherwise; here was the high priest Eliasib, that had the treasury of our God's temple in his keeping, a close friend of Tobias;¹ and so Tobias had one of the great store-rooms put at his disposal. (It was the room where at one time they used to store up the bloodless offerings, and the incense, and certain ornaments, and the tithe or corn, wine and oil, given to Levite, singer and door-keeper, and the first-fruits that belonged to the priests.) All this had happened while I was away from Jerusalem. During the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes' reign I went to court, and it was only at the end of the year that I had leave to return. When I was back at Jerusalem, and learned what harm had come of Eliasib's love for Tobias, that he would give him a store-house in the very temple of God, I cried shame on him; out went all Tobias' furniture from the treasury, and I gave orders besides that the treasure-rooms should be cleansed, and put back the furniture of God's house there, the offerings, too, and the incense.

And now I learned that the Levites were not having their portions granted them; Levite and singer and all the ministrants had gone back to their homes in the country-side. So I attacked the rulers, asking them whether the house of God was to be left deserted; and I brought the Levites back, and reinstalled them; from all over Juda, tithe of corn and wine and oil flowed into their store-houses once more; and we gave the charge of these store-houses to men whose honour we could trust, the priest Selemias, the scribe Sadoc, the Levite Phadaia, and Hanan, son of Zachur, son of Mathanias. My God, let not this go unremembered; do not blot out the record of the service I have done to thy temple, my God, and to thy ceremonies.

Even now I found Jewish folk treading out their wine-presses and carrying burdens on the sabbath day. On the sabbath day they would load their asses with wine-skins, or grapes, or figs, or some other freight, and bring them to Jerusalem for sale. These I warned that they must find some other day for selling their wares; but there were still traders from Tyre in the city itself, importing fish and all manner of goods, who sold them to their Jewish neighbours on the sabbath, there in Jerusalem. So I took my complaint to the Jewish rulers; Here are fine doings of yours, I said, that profane the sabbath day! All these late afflictions that God brought on us and on our city were a punishment for such disobedience as this; would you crown Israel's guilt by breaking the sabbath? When the sabbath came, and the traffic of the market-place had died away, and the gates were shut, I gave orders that they should not be opened till the sabbath was over; I set a guard there, too, of my own men, to make sure that no load came in that day. That week and the next, the merchants waited beyond Jerusalem walls and did all their trading there; but that would not serve; I warned them not to loiter about the walls, and threatened to use force if they did the like again; so there was no more trafficking on the sabbath. Meanwhile, I bade the Levites rid themselves of defilement and keep watch over the gates, for the better hallowing of the sabbath day. For this too, O my God, let me not go unremembered; as thou art rich in mercy, grant me pardon still.

Even now I found men of Juda that had married wives from Azotus, or Ammon, or Moab, with children that spoke half in the

Philistine dialect, not like true Jews; they would use the speech first of one race and then of another.¹ I remonstrated with such men, and called down a curse on them; with some I came to blows, and plucked the hair from their heads. Then I made them take an oath in God's name; there should be no more alien sons-in-law, or daughters-in-law, or wives. Why, I said, was not this king Solomon's undoing? Here was a man that had not his like on earth, the favourite of his God, that gave him all Israel for his kingdom; yet such a man alien women could bend to sinful ways. Here is heinous rebellion, and great despite done to our God, if we take wives of another race, as Solomon did. Eliasib himself, the high priest, had a grandson, one of the sons of Joiada, that had married a daughter of Sanaballat the Horonite; of his company I soon rid myself. Not unremembered, O Lord my God, be their profanation of the priesthood, unworthy sons of Aaron and of Levi both.

Thus it was mine to rid Israel of the alien-born, to marshal priests and Levites for their due service, to plan the offering of wood at appointed times, and of the first-fruits. Not unremembered, my God, be all this, not unrewarded.

¹ This verse is very obscure; it is not clear whether half the children spoke in a strange dialect, or all the children spoke in a half-strange dialect; nor whether the last clause refers to half-Jewish children who spoke wholly in the dialects of Moab, Ammon, and other neighbouring countries, or to half-Jewish children whose speech alternated between that of other countries and that of Judaea. On the analogy of I Par. 12. 33, we should expect 'race and race', like 'heart and heart', to mean an alternation of usage.

THE BOOK OF TOBIAS

THERE was a man of Nephthali dwelling in the city of that name, which lies in the hill-country of Galilee, beyond Naasson, by the road leading westwards with Sephet on the left of it. His name was Tobias; and when he was carried off as a prisoner by the Assyrians under king Salmanasar, he would not make his exile an excuse for deserting true religion. Every day he would share whatever means he had with his fellow-captives, that were men of his own clan.

Even when he was a boy, and was of least regard among the men of Nephthali, no boyish levity did his acts display. While the rest had recourse to the golden calves Jeroboam had set up when he reigned in Israel, Tobias shunned their company and went his own way; went up to Jerusalem to the Lord's temple, and worshipped the Lord that was God of Israel. First-fruit and tithe he duly offered, and every third year he tithed his goods afresh, for the needs of wanderers and homeless folk. By such acts as these he shewed, even in boyhood, what loyalty he had for the law of God; when he grew up it was a maiden of his own tribe, called Anna, that he wedded, and their son, called by his father's name, was brought up to fear God and keep clear of every fault.

Such was he, when, like all his tribe, he was carried away, with his wife and his son, to Nineve. All the rest might share the food of the Gentiles, he would not lose his innocence, he would not defile himself by eating what the law forbade. And God, finding his heart so loyal to the divine commands, won him favour with king Salmanasar. From this king he had leave to go where he would, and spend his time as he would; so he made a round of all his fellow-exiles, giving them such good counsel as might avail them. Once he was at a Median city called Rages, and had with him ten talents of silver, a gift from the king's bounty. To what use should he put it? He found there a fellow-tribesman of his own, called Gabelus, who was in great need; to him, then, he lent the aforesaid silver under a bond.

Time passed; Salmanasar died, and the throne passed to his son Sennacherib, who was no friend to the Jews; and now it was Tobias' daily task to visit his own clansmen, comforting them and providing for each of them as best he could, out of what store he had; it was for him to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to honour with careful burial men that had died of sickness, and men slain. When Sennacherib came home from Judaea, escaping while he might from the divine vengeance his blasphemies had brought upon him, he killed many an Israelite in his anger; and these too Tobias would bury. When this came to the king's ears, he gave orders that Tobias should be put to death, and seized all his property; but he escaped, with his wife and son, into safe hiding; destitute as he was, he had many friends. And then, forty-five days later, Sennacherib was murdered by his own sons, whereupon Tobias came back home, and had all his goods restored to him.¹

2 Soon after this, one of the Lord's feast-days came round, and Tobias, his table richly spread, would have his son go out and invite fellow-tribesmen and fellow-worshippers of theirs, to share the banquet. Go out he did, but came back bearing ill news; he had found an Israelite lying murdered in the open street. His father, without more ado, sprang up from where he sat, leaving his dinner untasted; he would not break his fast till he had found the body, wrapped it about and carried it home with him, to bury it in secret when night fell. A sad and anxious meal was his, with such a guest hidden under his roof; he remembered those words the Lord had put into the mouth of

Amos, Your feast-days shall end in lamentation and sad thoughts. Night fell at last, and the body was buried in safety; but his neighbours shook their heads over it, Here was sentence of death passed on thee for such doings of thine; from that sentence thou wast barely reprieved, and art thou back at thy grave-digging? But still Tobias feared God much, and the king little; still the bodies of murdered men were stolen away, hidden in his house, and at dead of night buried.

But toil brought weariness, and one morning, when he came home, he threw himself down in the shadow of the wall, and quickly fell asleep. As he slept, warm droppings from a swallow's nest fell into his eyes, and he became blind. This was but a trial which the Lord allowed to befall him, so that he might leave to later ages, as God's servant Job did, a document of patience. Here was a man that had feared God and obeyed his commandments from infancy; he was smitten with blindness; did he thereupon complain, God was using him ill? No, he remained as stout-hearted a worshipper of God as before, and never a day passed but he returned thanks for the gift of life. Kinsman and clansman might taunt him, as Job was taunted by his fellow chieftains; might call him a fool for his pains, and ask whether this was the reward he had hoped for when he gave alms, and went a-burying; Tobias took them up short. Nay, said he, never talk thus; we come of holy stock, you and I, and God has life waiting for us if we will but keep faith with him. His wife Anna went every day to work at the loom, bringing home what earnings she could; and one day it was a kid that was given her for her wages. When she brought this home, and its bleating reached her husband's ears, he made great ado for fear it had been stolen; Nay, he said, this must be restored to its owner; never shall it be said that we ate stolen food, or soiled our hands with theft! Fine talk,¹ said she, but the like hopes have played thee false already; what hast thou to shew, now, for all thy almsgiving? With such taunts as these even his wife assailed him.²

3 So at last Tobias fell a-sighing, and he prayed still, but wept as he prayed. Lord, he said, thou hast right on thy side; no award of thine but is deserved, no act of thine but tells of mercy, of faithfulness, and of justice. Yet bethink thee, Lord, of my case; leave my sins unpunished, my guilt, and the guilt of my parents, forgotten. If we are doomed to loss, to banishment and to death, if thou hast made us a by-word and a laughing-stock in all the countries to which thou hast banished us, it is because we have defied thy commandments; it was fitting punishment, Lord, for the men who neglected thy bidding, and were half-hearted followers of thine. And now, Lord, do with me as thy will is, give the word, and take my spirit to thyself in peace; for me, death is more welcome than life.³

Now turn we to Rages,⁴ a city in Media, and another soul that must undergo taunts on this same day, Sara, the daughter of Raguel. It was one of her father's maid-servants that taunted her; and the ground of it was that she had been married seven times, but each of her husbands in turn had been killed, at the time of his bedding with her, by an evil spirit that was named Asmodaeus. This maid, then, upon being reproved for some fault, had answered, God send we never see son or daughter of thine brought to light! Murderess, where are those husbands of thine? Wouldst thou make as short work with me as thou didst with those seven? At that, Sara withdrew to an upper room of the house, and for three days and nights would neither eat nor drink; all this time she spent in prayer, begging with tears that God would free her of the suspicion.

And at last on the third day, her time of prayer ended, she blessed the name of the Lord after this fashion: Blessed is thy name, O God of our fathers, who, though

¹ These words are not in the original; they have been inserted to elucidate the train of thought, which is here much confused. It seems probable that Anna meant, 'Why should you make such a point of being honest, when Providence has given you such a poor reward for being charitable?' ² In this chapter the Hebrew and Greek versions still give the story in the first person. But here they correspond more nearly with the Vulgate Latin (and with the Aramaic text from which it was translated); the chief difference is the omission of verses 12-18. ³ The Hebrew and the Greek versions are still in the first person, but the substance of Tobias's prayer is the same. ⁴ All the other versions here have Ecbatana as the name of the Median city, 'Rages' is probably a copyist's error, cf. i. 16 and 9. 3.

thy anger be roused, shewest mercy still, who dost pardon the sinner that cries out 14 to thee in time of need! To thee, Lord, 15 I turn; on thee my eyes are fixed; and,
 Lord, my prayer is that thou wouldst 16 either rid me of this clogging suspicion, or else take me away from earth. Thou, Lord, canst bear me witness that I lusted never after man; still have I guarded my soul 17 from shameful desire, nor kept company with the wanton, nor cast in my lot with 18 the lovers of dalliance. If I consented to take a husband, law of thine was my rule, 19 not lust of mine. It seems I was unworthy of these men's love, or perhaps they of mine; it may be thou wast reserving me for 20 another husband; thy designs are beyond 21 our human reach. But this at least all thy true worshippers know; never was a life of trials but his crown; never distress from which thou couldst not save; never punishment but left a gateway to thy 22 mercy. Not thine to plot eagerly for our undoing; the storm passes, and thou grant-est clear weather again; tears and sighs are over, and thou fillest the cup with re-23 joicing; blessed be thy name, God of Israel, for ever!¹

Two prayers that day reached the bright 25 presence of the most high God; and Raphael, one of the Lord's holy angels, was sent out, bearing common deliverance to the suppliants of a single hour.

4 And now, thinking that his prayer for death was to be granted, the elder 2 Tobias called his son to him and gave him a charge; Let these rules of mine, said he,
 be the frame-work of thy life, my son.

When God takes my soul to himself, 3 give this body of mine burial, and give thy 4 mother her due² while her life lasts; do not forget what hazard she underwent to bear 5 thee in her womb; and when she, too, has lived out her allotted span of years, bury 6 her at my side. And do thou, while thou hast life, think ever upon God, nor lend thyself to any sinful design, nor leave the commandments of the Lord our God unfulfilled. Use thy wealth in giving of alms; 7 never turn thy back on any man who is in need, and the Lord, in thy own need, will have eyes for thee. Shew to others what 8 kindness thy means allow, giving much, if 9 much is thine, if thou hast little, cheerfully sharing that little. To do this is but to lay 10 up a store against the day of distress; alms-11 deeds were ever a sovereign way of escape from guilt and death, a bar against the soul's passage into darkness; none has less 12 to fear when he stands before the most high God than he who does them.

Keep clear, my son, of fornication; save 13 for thy wife, never let woman's name be linked with thine. In thought and word of 14 thine, pride must never bear rule; thence it was all our undoing came. There and 15 then pay thy workman his wages; do not let the hire he has earned remain in thy keeping; never use another as thou wert 16 loth thyself to be used. Share thy bread 17 with the hungry and the poor; in thy garments let the naked go clad. Bestow thy 18 meat and thy drink upon a just man's burying, never share them with sinners.³ Still take a wise man's counsel over thy 19 doings; but praise God all the while, and ask him to guide thy paths aright; let all thy designs repose in him.

This too I would have thee know, my 21 son, that long since, when thou wert but a child, I lent ten talents of silver to a citizen of Rages in Media, called Gabelus, and I have his bond still. Do thou find means to 22 reach his home, and so recover from him the sum I speak of, in return for his bond.
 Never lose heart, my son, though we lead, 23 thou and I, the life poor men lead. Fear we but God, shun guilt, and do the good we can, blessings shall be ours in abundance.⁴

5 Father, answered the young Tobias, I will do all thy bidding; but as for 2 recovering the money, I have little hope.

¹ The prayer of Sara is given in a quite different form by the other versions, including our present Aramaic text. From this point onwards, all the versions tell the story in the third person. ² Literally 'honour', but this was, according to St Jerome, a regular idiom among the Jews.

³ The meaning of this verse is very obscure, and some think there is a corruption in the text. The versions have, not 'bestow', but 'pour out'; it was a common heathen practice to pour libations of wine over the tombs of the dead, but the mention of bread would in that case be confusing, and the Septuagint Greek has simply 'Pour out thy leaves' without any mention of wine. It is possible there is some reference to providing entertainment for the mourners at a pauper funeral, but the allusion seems far-fetched. For the custom of providing the mourners at a funeral with food, cf. Jer. 16. 8.

Here is one who is a stranger to me, and I to him; what proof can I bring forward? Meanwhile, I must find my way to Rages, and of that I have no experience. Nay, said his father, I have the man's bond here; do but shew him that, and he will restore the money without more ado. Up then, and find some man of credit, that will go with thee upon condition of a due reward; must I die before thou bring the money back to me? With that, his son went out, and at the door stood a young man of noble mien, all girt about, as if he were ready for a journey. Little he knew that this was an angel of God, as he gave him welcome; Fair sir, he asked, whence comest thou? And on hearing that he had been among the men of Israel, Why then, said he, thou knowest the road from here to Media? I know it well, he answered; no step of it but I have marched often enough, when I would visit a fellow-countryman of ours who lives there; one Gabelus. The city where he dwells, Rages, is in Media, in the hill-country about Ecbatana.

Wait for me here, Tobias asked of him, while I give my father news of this. Then he went back, and told the story to his father, who was all astonishment, and would have the stranger brought in. So in he came, and wished him abiding happiness. Happiness! Tobias said; little happiness for me, that sit here in the dark, and see never the light of day! Take courage, the stranger said, God means thy soon recovery. Then Tobias asked, Wilt thou take my son with thee, and guide him to Media, to Rages, and so to the house of Gabelus? There shall be a reward awaiting thee on thy return. I will take him there, said the angel, and bring him home again besides. Then Tobias would know of what household or tribe he came. It was indeed no other than the angel Raphael that spoke to him; What, he answered, is it my lineage, not myself, thou wouldst have for thy son's escort? But set thy mind at rest; my name is Azarias,¹ and a man of renown, Ananias, was my father. Forgive me,

Tobias said, for doubting thy lineage; thou comest of good stock indeed.

Raphael, then, promised to conduct the boy safely and bring him safely home, and Tobias bade them good speed; God be with you, said he, on your journey, and may his angel bear you company! Then, when his pack was ready, the young Tobias bade his father and mother farewell, and the travellers set out together. Now that the boy had gone, his mother fell a-weeping; Here was the only support of our old age, said she, why hast thou passed him on into other hands? Would to God the money thou hast sent him to claim had never been thine! We were content in our poverty; the very sight of the lad was riches enough. Dry thy tears, Tobias answered; safe will he fare, this son of ours, and safe return; those eyes shall have sight of him again. I hold it for truth that some good angel of the Lord escorts him, to see that all goes well with him and grant him happy return. Thus comforted, the mother dried her tears and complained no more.²

6 Tobias, meanwhile, was on the march, with his dog at his heels; they did not make their first halt until they reached the river Tigris. And when he went down to wash the dust from his feet, up came a monstrous fish as if it would have devoured him. At this, he cried out in an extreme of fear, Help, sir; he means mischief. But the angel bade him catch it by the gill and pull it towards him; so catch it he did, and brought it out on to the dry land, where it lay struggling at his feet. This fish, the angel told him, is worth the bowelling; heart and gall and liver of it thou must keep by thee, sovereign remedies all. This done, he roasted part of the meat, which they ate on their journey, and salted the rest, to serve them for provisions till they should reach Rages in Media.

And now Tobias had a question to ask of the angel; Tell me, good Azarias, said

¹ The name Azarias means 'God has brought aid', and the name Ananias 'God has been merciful', as if the angel had chosen a name to signify the nature of his office. St Athanasius explains that he was actually wearing the appearance of the living Azarias and was appointed by divine Providence to represent him; he was, so to speak, Azarias' second self. The purpose of concealing his angelic nature was evidently so as to make proof of the elder Tobias' faith (cf. verse 27 below). ² The outlines of the story are the same here in all the versions, but there is enough difference of detail to make it clear that they do not follow a single manuscript source.

he, what healing virtue lies in those parts 8 of the fish I must needs keep by me? Its heart, answered he, has this virtue, that if a morsel of it be laid on the coals, the smoke will rid man or woman of the fiend's 9 harassing, and that for ever. As for the gall, it is a sovereign salve for healing eyes 10 that have a white film binding them.¹ And for our journey, said Tobias, what is the 11 next stage of that? Our host's name is Raguel, the angel told him, a tribesman and a kinsman of thy own. He has a daughter called Sara, and neither chick nor 12 child besides. Of all he possesses thou mayest be heir, if thou wilt claim his 13 daughter's hand in marriage; thou hast but to ask him, and she is thine.

14 I hear stories told of this maid, Tobias answered; how she has been betrothed seven times, and to every bridegroom it brought death; how it was a fiend, if the tale be true, that made away with them.
 15 If the like befall me too, it would go hard with those parents of mine; I am all the children they have, they are old now, and this were to give them a cheerless passage 16 to the grave. Heed me well, answered Raphael, and thou shalt hear why the fiend has power to hurt some and not others.
 17 The fiend has power over such as go about their marrying with all thought of God shut out of their hearts and minds, wholly intent on their lust, as if they were horse or 18 mule, brutes without reason. Not such be thy mating, when thou hast won thy bride.
 For three days deny thyself her favours, and the time you spend together, spend all 19 in prayer. The first night, burn the liver of yonder fish, and therewith the fiend shall 20 be driven away. On the second night, union thou shalt have, but with the com-21 pany of the holy patriarchs.² The third night, thy prayer shall win thee a blessing, of children safely born to thee and to her.
 22 Then, when the third night is past, take the maid to thyself with the fear of the Lord upon thee, moved rather by the hope of begetting children than by any lust of thine. So, in the true line of Abraham, thou shalt have joy of thy fatherhood.

7 To Raguel, then, they went, and right gladly he welcomed them; he no sooner caught sight of Tobias than he said to his wife Anna,³ Here is a young man has the very look of my cousin Tobias! Then 3 he asked them, Whence come you, fellow-countrymen? And, upon hearing that they were of Nephthali's tribe, exiles dwelling at Nineve, Do you know my cousin, 4 Tobias? Yes, they said, we know him well.
 With that, Raguel fell to singing his cousin's praises, but the angel cut him short: Thou dost well to ask about Tobias; this is his son. Thereupon Raguel threw his arms about him, and wept, and kissed him, and wept again; A blessing on thee, 7 my son, cried he; 'tis a good man, a good excellent man, thou hast for thy father!
 And there stood his wife Anna, and their daughter Sara, in tears like himself.

When they had spent some time in talk, 9 Raguel would have a ram killed, and a feast made. But it was in vain he urged them to fall to; Neither eat nor drink will I in this 10 house, Tobias said, until thou dost grant a request of mine. And my request is for the hand of thy daughter Sara in marriage.
 Upon hearing this, Raguel was much taken 11 aback; he had not forgotten what befell those other seven men that went near her bed; and the fear assailed him, What if this one fares no better? But while he hummed and hawed over his answer, the angel said, 12 Do not be afraid to give him thy daughter's hand; for his pious care she was destined, that is why those other wooers could not gain their suit. Why then, answered Ra-13 guel, all those prayers and sighs of mine were not wasted; God has granted them audience; and I doubt not his design in 14 bringing you here was to have my daughter matched with one of her own kin, as the law of Moses bade. Then he said to Tobias, Have no fear, she is thine. And so, taking 15 his daughter's right hand and putting it into the right hand of Tobias, he gave them his blessing: May the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob be with you and himself join you in one, and fulfil his merciful purpose in you.

So they took paper, and signed a con- 16

¹ The fish called by the ancients callionymus, or uranoscopus, was supposed to be a specific in cases of leucoma; it was, however, a salt-water fish. In verses 1-9 the other versions vary hardly at all, but from this point onward they shew considerable difference, and have nothing corresponding to verses 16-22 of the Vulgate. ² The meaning of this mystical allusion is unknown. ³ This seems to be a mistake in the Latin: the other versions call Raguel's wife Edna.

17 tract of marriage; then they sat down to their feasting, and gave thanks to God.
18 Meanwhile Raguel called Anna aside, and bade her have a fresh room in readiness.
19 Into this she brought her daughter Sara, 20 weeping as she did so; then she said, Do not lose heart, daughter; thou hast had sadness enough; may the Lord of heaven give thee gladness in exchange.¹

8 When the feasting was over, bridegroom was led to bride-chamber.
2 And now, remembering what the angel had said, he took out from his wallet a piece of the fish's liver, which he burnt on 3 live coals. With that, the evil spirit fled; it was overtaken by the angel Raphael in the waste lands of Upper Egypt, and there 4 held prisoner. Next, Tobias must plead with his bride; Leave thy bed, Sara; today, and to-morrow, and the day after, let us pray God for mercy. These three nights are set apart for our union with God; when the third is over, we will be joined in one, 5 thou and I. We come of holy lineage; not for us to mate blindly, like the heathen 6 that have no knowledge of God. Side by side they kept vigil, and prayed together that no plague should mar their mating.
7 Lord God of our fathers, Tobias said, praise be to thee from heaven and earth, from seas and fountains and rivers, and from all creatures of thine that make in 8 these their homes! When Adam was made of earth's clay, it was by thy hand; when Eve was sent to cheer him, it was of thy 9 gift. Thou, Lord, art my witness that I wed this sister of mine not from love of dal-liance; only in the dear hope of leaving a race behind me, a race in whose destiny, 10 Lord, may thy name be ever blessed! And thus Sara prayed, Have mercy on us, Lord, have mercy on us; safe from all harm grow we old together, he and I!

11 And now it was cock-crow, and Raguel had all his men out betimes to help him dig the grave; Like enough, thought he, 12 this one will have fared no better than the 13 other seven that took her to wife. Their 14 digging done, he went back to his wife, and bade her send one of her maids to find out if Tobias were dead; it were best to have him in his grave before the sun was up.

So the maid went on her errand, and ven-15 tured into the bride-chamber, where both lay asleep together, safe and sound. When 16 she returned with that good news, Raguel and Anna fell to praising the Lord; God 17 of Israel, said they, we thank thee that our fears were vain! Great mercy hast thou 18 shewn us, in ridding us of the fiend's pursuit; great mercy hast thou shewn on these 19 two, Tobias' only child and ours. Ever may their hearts, Lord, swell with thankfulness, ever may these lives thou hast preserved be a sacrifice of praise to thee, till all the Gentiles around them know thee for the only God that rules on earth!

With that, Raguel bade his men fill up 20 the newly dug grave before sunrise; bade 21 his wife spread a feast, and prepare such food as the travellers needed. Two fat 22 heifers and four rams must be slaughtered and a banquet made for all his neighbours and friends. And now he was urgent with 23 Tobias to be his guest for two whole 24 weeks; half of all his goods he bestowed upon him there and then, while the rest, as he declared in writing, should follow when he and Anna died.²

9 And now Tobias took the angel aside and, though he still did not guess this was more than man, spoke as follows: Pray bear with this request of mine, friend Azarias. No return could I make for all thy 2 watchful care of me, though I should dedicate myself to be thy slave. Instead of that, 3 I am still asking thee for a favour; that thou wouldst journey on to Rages in Media, with what beasts, what retinue thou wilt, and seek out Gabelus there. Give him back his bond, recover the debt, and bid him to my wedding-feast. Thou canst guess 4 how my father is counting the days till my return; no fresh day of my absence but 5 brings with it a fresh sorrow; yet thou seest how earnestly Raguel pleads with me to stay on, and that plea I cannot bring myself to refuse.

6 So Raphael took with him four of Raguel's men, and two camels; went to Rages in Media and sought out Gabelus there;
gave him the bond, and recovered the debt

¹ The correspondence between the various versions is fairly close in this chapter, but the Vulgate is not a direct translation from any of the others. ² The course of the story is the same in the other versions, except that they represent Tobias' marriage as having been consummated on his wedding night.

7 in full. Then he recounted to him the the younger Tobias' history, and brought him back to take part in the wedding-feast.
 8 Tobias, who was sitting at table when Gabelus entered the house, sprang up to welcome him; and when they had embraced, Gabelus wept, and praised God 9 for their meeting. The God of Israel bless thee, he cried, for the son of an excellent honest man, his true worshipper, and a 10 great giver of alms! May the name of this thy bride, the names of her parents and thine, be used for an example of blessed-11 ness! May you live to see sons of yours, and sons of theirs again, and a fourth generation to succeed the third! May your posterity win a blessing from the God of 12 Israel, that reigns everlastingly! All said Amen to that, and so they fell to and feasted; yet was there no merry-making over this wedding but such as became God's worshippers.

10 While the younger Tobias lingered thus over his marriage, his father fell into an extreme of anxiety. What means this long delay on my son's part? he asked.
 2 What has detained him? Can it be that Gabelus is dead, and there is no recovering 3 the debt? Great lament he made, and his wife Anna with him, and fast fell the tears of both, that the appointed day was over 4 and their son not yet returned. The mother's grief there was no consoling; My son, my son, she cried, why did we ever let thee go on thy travels? The light of our eyes, the support of our old age, our comfort in life, our hope of posterity when we 5 are gone; all this thou wert, and thou alone; how could we let thee leave our 6 sight? All in vain did Tobias try to comfort her, with, Peace, woman; never disquiet thyself; there is nought amiss with our son; it was a trusty companion we sent 7 with him. Comfort she would have none; no day passed but she would rise from her place and view the landscape all about, or roam the streets, hoping she might get some rumour, some distant glimpse of his return.

8 Meanwhile, Raguel was pressing his son-in-law to stay on; I will send a message to thy father, said he, to assure him of thy safety. But Tobias would have none of it; 9 No question, said he, but my father and mother are counting the days, and tormenting their hearts over me. Still Raguel 10 plied him with entreaties, and still could not win his consent. So at last he gave Sara into Tobias' keeping, and with her half his goods, men and maid servants, sheep and camels and cows, and of money a great sum, and let him go his way, safe and content. The Lord's holy angel, said 11 he, go with you on your journey, and bring you home without scathe, to find that all is well, Tobias and Anna both. And may my life be spared to see children born of you. So Raguel and Anna embraced their 12 daughter, and kissed her, and set her on her way, full of good counsel to the last; 13 how she was to give father-in-law and mother-in-law their due, love her husband, be mistress in her own house, order it well, and prove herself the perfection of a woman.

11 On the eleventh day of their homeward journey, they halted in the middle of it at a place that looks out towards Nineve (called Charan).¹ And 2 here the angel said, Friend Tobias, remember how eagerly thy father awaits thee. How sayest thou? Should not we 3 two hurry on together, and leave thy wife to follow at leisure with the servants and the beasts? When this was agreed upon, 4 he bade Tobias take some of the fish's gall with him, for he would need it; take it he did, and they set out together.

There sat Anna, where she sat every 5 day, on the brow of the hill, whence she could scan the country far and wide. From 6 that seat of hers she saw them coming, a long distance away, and knew at once it was her son that came. Back home she ran, and told her husband, Thy son! He is coming!

Thy home once reached, Raphael said 7 to Tobias, pay worship to the Lord thy God first, and return thanks to him. Then go up to thy father, and embrace him, and 8 rub on his eyes, without more ado, some of the fish's gall thou hast with thee. I promise thee it will not be long before his eyes are opened; once more he will look on the light of day, and have a father's joy at the sight of thee.

¹ The name of the place reached by the travellers is variously given in the different versions. If it was really Charan, it must have been quite different from the well-known city of that name, which stood miles away to the west.

9 Yet he was not to reach the house first. The dog that had accompanied him on his travels ran on before him, heralding the good news with the caress of his wagging tail. Up sprang the father, blind though 10 he were, and made for the door, running and stumbling as he ran. A servant must take him by the hand before he could go 11 out to meet his son; but meet him he did, embraced and kissed him, and his wife too must embrace the boy and kiss him, and then they both wept over him; but they 12 were tears of joy. So they paid God worship, and gave him thanks, and sat down together.

13 Then it was that Tobias took out the fish's gall, and rubbed it on his father's 14 eyes. He waited, maybe, for half an hour, and then a white film, like the white of an egg, began to separate itself from the eyes; 15 he took hold of this and pulled it away, and immediately his father's sight was restored. How they praised God, he and his 16 wife and all who knew them! I thank thee, Lord God of Israel, the old man cried; 17 from thee my chastisement, from thee my deliverance came; I thank thee for eyes that see, and eyes that see Tobias, my son!

18 It was a week before his daughter-in-law Sara reached Nineve, with all her retinue safe and sound; the farm stock, too, she brought with her, and the camels, and all the money she was dowered with, besides the sum paid over by Gabelus.
19 Meanwhile, her husband told his parents the whole story; all the mercies God had shewn him through the man that was his 20 guide. Tobias' cousins, Achior and Nabath, came with glad hearts to congratulate him over the blessings he had received; 21 and for a whole week they all kept high festival, and rejoiced together.

12 And now Tobias took his son aside and asked him, What payment shall we make to this heaven-sent companion of thine? Payment? answered he; why, what reward can ever suffice for all the services he did me? He it was that 3 escorted me safely, going and coming; recovered the debt from Gabelus; won me my bride; rid her of the fiend's attack; engaged the gratitude of her parents; rescued me from the fish's onslaught; and to thee restored the light of day. Through him, we have been loaded with benefits; is it possible to make any return for all these? Do this, father, at least; ask him to 4 accept half of all the wealth that has come to us.

So both of them, father and son, beckoned him aside, and would have prevailed on him to accept half of their new-found wealth. But he, with a finger on his lip,¹ 5 bade them give their thanks to the God of heaven. To him, he said, offer your praises for all men to hear; he it is that has shewn mercy to you. Kings have their counsel that must be kept secret; God's ways are open, and he honours them best who 6 claims them openly.

Prayer, fasting, and alms, said he, here 8 is better treasure to lay up than any store of gold. Almsgiving is death's avoiding, is 9 guilt's atoning, is the winning of mercy and of life eternal; the sinners, the wrongdoers, are enemies to their own souls. Come, let me tell you the whole truth of 10 the matter, bring the hidden purpose of it to light. When thou, Tobias, wert praying, 11 and with tears, when thou wert burying the dead, leaving thy dinner untasted, so as to hide them all day in thy house, and at night give them funeral, I, all the while, 12 was offering that prayer of thine to the Lord. Then, because thou hadst won his 13 favour, needs must that trials should come, and test thy worth. And now, for thy 14 healing, for the deliverance of thy son's wife Sara from the fiend's attack, he has chosen me for his messenger. Who am I?
15 I am the angel Raphael, and my place is among those seven who stand in the presence of the Lord.

Upon hearing this, they were both 16 mazed with terror, and fell down trembling, face to earth. Peace be with you, the 17 angel said; do not be afraid. It was God's will, not mine, brought me to your side; to him pay the thanks and praise you owe.
18 I was at your side, eating and drinking, but 19

¹ Literally, 'in secret', but as the three had already gone apart, it seems best to understand the words as referring to some gesture of secrecy.

only in outward show; the food, the drink 20 I live by, man's eyes cannot see. And now the time has come when I must go back to him who sent me; give thanks to God, 21 and tell the story of his great deeds. With that, he was caught away from their eyes, 22 and no more might they see of him.¹ For three hours together, face to earth, they gave thanks to God; and when they rose up, it was to tell the story of all these marvels.

13 It was thus, when he found utterance, that the elder Tobias sang praise to the Lord: Great is thy name, Lord, for ever; thy kingdom cannot fail.
 2 Thine to scourge, thine to pity; thou dost bring men to the grave and back from the grave; from thy power there is no de-3 liverance. Sons of Israel, make his name known, publish it for all the Gentiles to 4 hear; if he has dispersed you among heathen folk who know nothing of him, it was so that you might tell them the story of his great deeds, convince them that he, 5 and no other, is God all-powerful. He it is that has scourged us for our sins; he it 6 is that will deliver us in his mercy. Look and see how he has dealt with us, and then give thanks to him, but with trembling awe in your hearts; let your own deeds acclaim 7 him, king of all the ages. I, at least, in this land of exile, will be the spokesman of his praise, tell the story of his dread dealings 8 with a sinful race. Come back, sinners, and do his will; doubt not that he will shew you 9 mercy. Here at least, while I live, is a soul 10 that finds content in him. Bless the Lord, souls whom the Lord has chosen; keep high festival in his honour.
 11 Jerusalem, city of God, what divine punishments thy own ill deeds have 12 brought on thee! Yet thank the Lord for the blessings that are thine, praise him, the eternal God. So may he rebuild thy dwelling-place, recall thy exiles, give thee 13 joy that shall last for ever. Thou shalt yet shine with dazzling brightness, for all the 14 ends of the world to worship thee. From far away, nations shall come bringing their gifts, to worship the Lord within those walls of thine; shall reckon thy soil holy ground, so great the name they shall invoke 15 within thee. Cursed shall they be that despise thee, condemned shall they be that blaspheme thee, blessed shall they be that build thee again. What joy wilt thou have 17 of thy children, a blessed race, gathered in the Lord's fold anew! A blessing on all that love thee, on all that welcome thy good news! Give thanks, my soul, to the 19 Lord, the Lord our God who has delivered Jerusalem, his own city, from all the afflictions she endured; happy I count 20 myself, if any posterity of mine is left to see Jerusalem in her splendour. Sapphire and 21 emerald Jerusalem's gates shall be, of precious stones the wall that rings her round; shining white and clean the pavement of 22 her streets; no quarter of her but shall echo the Alleluia-chant of praise. Blessed be 23 the Lord, that has set her on the heights; may he reign there for ever, reign for ever as her king. Amen.²

14 Such was the song of Tobias. He lived forty-two years after recovering his sight, lived to see his great-grandchildren; then, dying at the age of a 2 hundred and two, he was buried with due honour in the town of Nineve. He lost his 3 sight at the age of fifty-six, recovered it at the age of sixty, and lived out the rest of 4 his life in great content, his course ever untroubled, his conscience ever more tender towards God.

On his death-bed, he called his seven 5 grandsons to him, with their father Tobias, and spoke thus: The Lord's words 6 must needs come true; it will not be long before Nineve is destroyed. After that, our exiled brethren will be able to return to the land of Israel; the deserted country-side will be populous once again, and its tem-7 ple, long since destroyed by fire, will be built anew, and all those who fear God will find their way back to it. Then the Gen-8 tiles, too, will forsake their false gods; will betake themselves to Jerusalem, and find 9 a home there; all the kings of the earth will

¹ In the Aramaic text we now have, Raphael goes away without disclosing his identity. ² The Aramaic text has nothing corresponding to this chapter. Some think that verses 11-23 are a separate psalm, which has been attached accidentally to the canticle of Tobias. If we understand these sentiments as having been expressed by Tobias, it must have been by way of prophecy; the dates given in the next chapter shew that he cannot have been alive at the time when Jerusalem was sacked by the king of Babylon.

take pride in it, as they pay worship to the king who reigns in Israel.¹

- 10 This, then, my sons, is your father's testament: Keep true to the Lord's service, 11 studying ever to carry out his will; and hand on this charge to your children, that they should do what the law enjoins and give alms freely, that they should keep God ever in mind, offering him faithful praise at all times, and with all their strength.
 12 And you, my sons, heed well this warning of mine; do not linger in this country, but leave it as soon as you have laid your mother to rest at my side, to share my 13 grave; there is guilt at Nineve, I see well, that must needs bring it to ruin.

So, when his mother died, Tobias, with his wife, sons and grandsons left Nineve. 14 He betook himself to his wife's parents instead, and found them thriving still, well 15 content in their old age. Tenderly he cared for them, and when they died it was he that closed their eyes in death. Then he became heir to all Raguel possessed, and himself lived to see a fresh generation yet, descendants of his own. Ninety-nine years 16 he lived in the fear of God, and with full hearts they buried him. No kith or kin 17 of his but persevered in uprightness and holy living; God's favour they had and man's alike, well loved by all their neighbours.

¹ Tobias' prophecy in verses 6-9, like many in the Old Testament, foreshortens the perspective of history; relating first to the conquest of Assyria by Babylon in 612, then to the conquest of Babylon by Persia in 539, and the restoration of the Jewish exiles, then to the Messianic kingdom. In the Greek text, the destruction of Jerusalem by Nabuchodonosor is explicitly mentioned.

THE BOOK OF JUDITH

ARPHAXAD, king of Media, the conqueror of many nations, built a princely city, which he called Ecbatana. Of stones cut and squared he built it, with walls seventy cubits thick and thirty cubits high, and towers reaching the height of a hundred cubits. Each of these towers was twenty feet square, and at the foot of them he set gates to match their height.¹ And he boasted much of his great army, of his fine chariots; till at last war was levied upon him by the Assyrian king Nabuchodonosor,² then in the twelfth year of his reign, with his capital at Nineve. This Nabuchodonosor defeated him in the great plain called Ragua, where Euphrates flows, and Tigris, and Jadason, in the lowland country belonging to Erioch, king of the Elici.

Thus to Nabuchodonosor in his turn, came power and pride. To distant lands he had sent out his demand for aid; to Cilicia, Damascus, and the Lebanon, to Carmel, and Cedar, and Galilee about the wide Esdrelon plain, Samaria, and all the country beyond Jordan as far as Jerusalem, and the land of Gessen³ right up to the borders of Ethiopia. And of all the peoples to whom Nabuchodonosor, the Assyrian king, sent out his messengers, there was not one but had refused, and sent them away thwarted and despised. So now, in anger, Nabuchodonosor swore by his royal throne to avenge himself on these countries, one and all.⁴

2 It was on the twenty-second day of the first month, in the thirteenth year of his reign, that this resolve was taken at Nabuchodonosor's court. He summoned all his councillors, chieftains and commanders, and put before them his secret design; his thought, he told them, was to bring the whole world under his allegiance. With this, all agreed; whereupon he summoned Holofernes, that commanded his forces, and said, March out and make war on the western kingdoms, those especially that made light of my summons. Nowhere let pity melt thy eye; no fortified town but must be brought under my dominion.

Thereupon Holofernes summoned all the chieftains and commanders of the Assyrian army, and mustered a force to march out and do the king's bidding, a hundred and twenty thousand that went on foot, and twelve thousand mounted archers. And his baggage-train he sent on beforehand, a long array of camels, well laden with all his army needed, herds of oxen, too, and flocks of sheep, past all counting. A supply of corn from the whole of Syria was to meet him as he passed, and he had great store of gold and silver from the royal treasury.

Then he himself set out at the head of his forces, chariots and horsemen and archers and the rest, that swarmed like locusts on the ground.

Leaving Assyria, he first reached the high mountains of Ange, on the left-hand side of Cilicia, scaling all their fastnesses and reducing all their garrisons. Then he broke into the city of Meloth, that resisted him stubbornly, and ravaged all the country which belonged to the sons of Tharsis, and to the Ismaelites, facing the desert, to the south of Cellon. Then he crossed Euphrates into Mesopotamia, and stormed every stronghold between the river Mambre and the sea. All the land of Mesopotamia he overran, from Cilicia on the north to the frontier of Japheth on the south, drove the Medianites from their homes and plundered their goods, putting 17 all who resisted him to the sword.¹ And at last he came down on to the plain of Damascus, in harvest time, burnt all the crops there and had all the trees and vine-18 yards cut down. And a great dread of him fell upon the whole country-side.

¹ The measurements here are uncertain, since the Greek gives a different account of them. ² No Nabuchodonosor king of Assyria is known from other sources. Probably the story relates to some conqueror known to history under another name, but there is no agreement among scholars about his identity. We cannot, therefore, be certain what is the period in which the action of the book takes place. ³ 'Gessen'; this is given in the Vulgate as 'Jesse', probably through a copyist's error; Gessen is mentioned in the Septuagint Greek. ⁴ Here and in the following chapters the story is told in different language and at somewhat greater length in the Septuagint Greek.

3 And now from every city and province, from the Syrians of Mesopotamia and Sobal and from (Libya² and) Cilicia, king and chieftain sent envoys to 2 Holofernes. Spare us thy further vengeance, they said; better we should live as slaves to the great king Nabuchodonosor, under thy commands, than be reduced by 3 slaughter, undergoing massacre and slavery both. Cities and lands, mountain and hill and plain, ox and sheep and goat and horse and camel, all that we have, and our own households too, lie at thy mercy; 4 dispose of them all as thou wilt; we, and 6 our children with us, are thy slaves. Come to us as our master, so thou come to us in peace, and make what use thou wilt of our surrender.

7 Then, with his horsemen and all his armed strength, he came down from the hill-country and made city and citizen his 8 own, levying from their townships all the bravest men, all the picked warriors, for his 9 own service. Such dread of him lay on these provinces, that chiefs and nobles came out from every town, with the com-10 mon sort at their heels, to meet him, welcoming him with crowns and processions by torch-light, dancing in his honour to 11 the music of tambour and flute. Yet might they not, even so, win over that relentless heart; cities must be razed to the ground, 12 and forest-shrines cut down; king Nabu-chodonosor had bidden him destroy all traces of the countryside gods, so that the nations overpowered by Holofernes might acknowledge no other god but himself.
 14 Then, after traversing the Syrian country of Sobal, and Apamea, and Mesopotamia, he reached the Idumæans that dwelt in the 15 land of Gabaa. Their cities surrendered to him, and he made a halt of thirty days there, during which he bade all the forces under his command rally to his side.

4 Consternation fell on all the Israelites that dwelt in Juda, at the news of his coming; fear struck deep at their anxious hearts, that Jerusalem and its temple might 2 fare as other cities and temples had fared.
 So they sent the word round all the Sa-3 maritan country, and back again to Jericho, that all the mountain-heights were to be occupied; the villages on them were put in 4 a state of defence, and corn stored up in readiness for the campaign. Nay, the high 5 priest Eliachim sent letters even further afield; the hill-folk that lived facing Esdreion across the wide plain around Dothain, controlling the passes to the south, must occupy all the hill-paths lead-6 ing to Jerusalem, standing ever on guard where the defile was narrowest. Such 7 orders from Eliachim, the Lord's high priest, the Israelites faithfully carried out.

8 Meanwhile, in good earnest, the whole nation made appeal to the Lord, doing penance, men and women alike, with fast and prayer. Garb of sackcloth the priests 9 wore, and bade the very infants lie prostrate before the temple gates; in sackcloth they veiled the Lord's own altar; and so 10 with one voice they made appeal to the Lord, the God of Israel. Were they to see their children slaves, their women-folk allotted as spoil, their cities razed, their sanctuary profaned? Were they to become 11 the scorn of the Gentiles? And Eliachim, the Lord's high priest, went about everywhere among the Israelite folk with words of comfort. Be sure, said he, that the Lord 12 will listen to your plea, if you pray on, fast on, in his presence. Remember how 13 Amelec, long ago, boasted of their overwhelming strength, of their great army, shields and chariots and horsemen; and it was by the holy prayers he offered, not by the sword, that the Lord's servant Moses de-14 feated them.³ So shall it be with all Israel's enemies, will you but persevere in your undertaking. Thus encouraged, they kept 15 their posture of entreaty, there in the Lord's presence; the very priests who offered him 16 sacrifice, did so in sackcloth, with ashes on their heads; and with all their hearts 17 they prayed, every one of them, that God would bring deliverance to his people of Israel.

¹ The place-names given in verses 12-16 cannot be identified with certainty: many of them differ in the different versions. ² Perhaps a copyist's mistake for 'Lebanon' or 'Lycia'. ³ Ex. 17. 12.

5 When news reached Holofernes, the Assyrian commander, that the Israelites were for offering resistance, and had secured the mountain passes, he broke out into a great fury of indignation. He summoned all the chiefs of Moab and Ammon to his presence; What folk are these, he asked, that would hold the mountain-heights? Are their cities so prosperous or so well defended, are they so brave or so numerous, have they a commander so skilled in war, that they alone defy us, and will not come out to meet and welcome us, like the other nations around them?

5 It was Achior, chief paramount of the Ammonites, that answered him. My lord, said he, if thou wilt hear me out, I will tell the whole truth to thy face, about these mountain-folk; never a false word shalt thou hear from me. They come of Chaldaean stock, but they made their abode in Mesopotamia, because they had no mind to worship the old gods of Chaldea; gods a many their fathers' worship owned, but they forsook it, to worship one God only, the God of heaven. He it was bade them remove thence, and dwell in Charan. At a time when famine overspread the world, they took refuge in Egypt; and there, when four hundred years had passed,¹ they had grown so numerous that there was no counting the muster of them. The king of Egypt oppressed them, forcing them to make bricks of clay and build cities for him; so they cried out to this Lord of theirs, and he smote the whole land of Egypt with plagues of every sort, till at last the Egyptians were fain to be rid of them. But not for long; plagued no more, they tried to capture the men of Israel and make slaves of them anew. To these, as they fled, the God of heaven opened a path through the sea, whose waves stood firm as a wall to right and left while they marched across its floor dry-shod; and when a great army from Egypt sought to follow them, it was overwhelmed in those waters, so that never a man escaped to tell his children the story.

14 The Red Sea once passed, they took for their own the desert country about Sinai, that never yet gave man a home, gave wanderer a resting-place; there from brackish fountains fresh water sprang, there, for forty years, heaven itself sent them nourishment. Go where they would, without bow or arrow, shield or spear, God fought for them, and won the victory; there was no beating down such a people as this, save when they forsook the worship of the Lord their God; only when they worshipped some god other than himself, their own God, would he let them be plundered, and slaughtered, and treated with insult. Even then, did they but repent of their revolt from his allegiance, the God of heaven would give them strength to resist their assailants. So it was they overthrew kings a many, Chanaanite and Jebusite, Perezite and Hethite and Hevite; the Amorrite king too, and all the warrior chiefs of Hesebon; took possession of their lands, and garrisoned their cities.

All went well with them, so long as no sin of theirs offended his eye, the God that is an enemy to all wrong. But there was a time, these many years back, when they forsook the old paths God had given them to follow; then, in battle after battle, nation after nation defeated them, and a multitude of them were borne away as captives into an alien land; it was but lately that they turned to their God again, and he reunited the scattered remnants of them. So they returned to these hills, and took possession anew of Jerusalem, where their sanctuary is. Of this, then, my lord, assure thyself first; has any guilt of theirs lost them the favour of their God? Then indeed march we against them; none more ready than this God of theirs to hand them over to thee, fit subjects for thy overmastering yoke. If fault he has none to find with his own people, then meet them in battle we may not; he himself will be their defender, and ours will be a plight for all the world to mock at.

At these words of Achior's, Holofernes' lords were full of indignation, and thought to make an end of him. What talk is this? they said to one another. Can the men of Israel, without arms, without valour, without skill in war, hold out against king Nabuchodonosor and his troops? Scale we yonder heights, to prove Achior a liar, and when we have mastered the defenders, let Achior be put to the sword with the rest.

¹ The four hundred years are probably reckoned as elapsing between Abraham and Moses; cf. a similar calculation in Ac. 13. 20.

29 Let us prove to the whole world that Nabuchodonosor rules it, and other god there is none.

6 When their talk had died down, Holofernes himself, in a transport of rage, said to Achior, This, then, is thy prophecy, that the race of Israel will find protection in their God? Thou hast a lesson still to learn; that Nabuchodonosor is god, and he only. So be it; when the Israelites fall like one man, thou too shalt feel the sword of Assyria, and share their utter ruin. Proof thou shalt have first, that Nabuchodonosor is the world's supreme lord; then, no more breathing-space given thee, thou shalt perish with the rest, shalt lie where Israel lies, with Assyrian steel between thy ribs. What, does thy face fall, sir Oracle? Why those pale cheeks, if thou knowest all my threats are vain? Nay, be assured thou shalt learn the truth when the Israelites learn it, no sooner. Henceforth thy lot shall be thrown in with theirs; only when my sword falls on them shalt thou feel my vengeance.

7 With that, Holofernes bade his men lay hold of Achior and bear him off to Bethulia,¹ and so hand him over to the men of Israel. Lay hold of him they did, and set out on their journey across the plain, but when they reached the mountain spurs, out came slingers to meet them. So they let the mountains alone, tied Achior hand and foot to a tree, and went back to their master, leaving Achior there with the ropes round him. But now the men of Israel ventured down from Bethulia, and came to his side; he was set free and taken back to the town with them. There he must stand up before the general assembly of the people and satisfy their questioning: what moved the Assyrians to leave him thus bound?

8 The chieftains there at this time were the Simeonite, Ozias son of Micha, and Charmi, who was also called Gothoniel. Before these and all the elders, in full view of the people, Achior told them what answer he had made to Holofernes' question; how the bystanders had been for killing him outright; in what angry fashion Holofernes had given orders for his surrender to Israel, only so that he too, in the hour of their defeat, might be doomed to execution; and of all the punishments he was threatened with, only for saying, They have the God of heaven to defend them. When Achior had finished his story, the people bowed down with one accord, face to earth, offering the Lord worship and entreaty; all was weeping and lament. Lord, they cried, God of heaven and earth, leave not this insolence unregarded, our distress unrelieved, the prayer of thy chosen servants unheeded! Give proof, now, that those who trust in thee are never forsaken, that the presumptuous, who boast of their own strength, are ever brought low! So they made an end of weeping; and now, their day of public prayer over, they offered Achior consolation. The God of our fathers, they told him, will give thee thy reward. Thou hast been the herald of his great deeds, and thou shalt live to see the downfall of thy enemies. Then, when the Lord our God has granted his servants deliverance, may he still be with thee, thy own God, here in our midst; thou and thine shall be made free of our company.

And now Ozias, dismissing the assembly, bade Achior to his house and made a great feast for him; all the elders, too, were bidden, and together they refreshed themselves, now the fast was over. But afterwards all the people were summoned from their homes anew; and in solemn assembly, the whole night long, they prayed to the God of Israel, to win deliverance.

7 Next day, Holofernes ordered his troops to march on Bethulia. He had a hundred and twenty thousand foot and twenty-two thousand horse under his command, besides forced levies from the manhood of all the regions and cities he had overrun. This whole army now prepared to attack the Israelites, advancing up the mountain-slopes to a height which commands the Dothian plain, all the way from Belma to Chelmon, near Esdremon. Face to earth the men of Israel bowed down, and threw dust on their heads, as they saw the enemy's numbers, beseeching

¹ No town called Bethulia is elsewhere mentioned. Some think that the names, both of persons and of places, have been deliberately replaced by fictitious ones throughout this book.

God with one accord to grant his people 5 deliverance; then, taking up their arms, they mounted guard over the approaches of the narrow defile that leads between the mountains, where they kept watch day and 6 night. Holofernes, looking for a devious path to circumvent them, came upon the springs which fed their aqueduct, south of the city and beyond its enclosure; so he gave orders that their supply of water 7 should be cut off. A few springs remained, not far from the wall, from which they still drew water, enough to revive their spirits but scarce enough to quench their thirst.
This they did by stealth, but not unob-8 served; and now the men of Ammon and Moab offered their advice to Holofernes.
Not in bow or lance, said they, do the Israelites put their trust; it is the hill-country that befriends them; these mountains with their headlong slopes are all the 9 defence they need. Wouldst thou defeat them without battle joined? Then set a guard over these springs of theirs, and let them draw water no longer. Either thou wilt compass their deaths, and no blood shed, or, worn down at last, they will yield into thy hands the city they think impregnable.

This advice commended itself to Holofernes and his lords, and he set a hundred men to guard each of the wells all about.
When this watch had been kept for twenty days together, the people of Bethulia had no water left in tank or cistern, not a full supply for one day; for now a daily allowance was made to each. Thereupon all of them, husbands and wives, young men and children, gathered about Ozias, all uttering a single cry of complaint. God give judgment, they said, between us and thee; an ill turn thou hast done us, in refusing to come to terms with the Assyrians. Now God has given them the mastery over us;
none brings aid; we lie at their mercy, cruelly undone by thirst. Come, muster all the citizens, and let us all surrender at discretion to the army of Holofernes.
Better we should be prisoners, still thanking the Lord for our lives spared, than ourselves be slaughtered, first winning the whole world's reproaches by letting our wives and little ones be slaughtered before our very eyes. We adjure you by heaven 17 and earth, and by the God of our fathers, who now takes such vengeance on us for our sins, to surrender the town to Holofernes' army. If we must die, let it be a swift death at the sword's point, not a lingering death from this parching thirst.

All this was said, and with that the whole 18 throng fell to weeping and lamenting bitterly; and for many hours together they cried out to God as with a single voice:
We have taken part in our fathers' sins; 19 we are guilty men, rebels against thee. Do thou, in thy great love, take pity on us; 20 or if punished we must be, let it be under thy own rod; do not abandon us, that still acknowledge thy name, to the mercy of men who never knew thee! Wouldst thou 21 have the heathen asking, What has become of their God? At last they grew weary of their clamour; they had wept enough; and when silence was restored, Ozias rose from 23 his place, bathed in tears, and spoke to them. Brethren, said he, be calm and patient. These five next days, let us still look to the Lord for deliverance; perhaps 24 his anger will relent, perhaps he means to win himself fresh renown. If at the end of 25 those five days no help has reached us, rest assured we will act on the counsel you have given.

8 Now turn we to one whom all this news concerned; a widow called Judith, that was descended (from Ruben)¹ through Merari, Idox, Joseph, Ozias, Elai, Jannor, Gedeon, Raphaim, Achitob, Mel-chias, Enan, Nathania, Salathiel and Simeon. She had been married to one 2 Manasses, but lost him when the barley was a-reaping; he must needs be hurrying 3 his men on as they bound the sheaves on his farm, while the sun beat fierce on his head, and of that stroke he died, and was laid to rest with his fathers, there in his native town of Bethulia. Judith had now 4 been left a widow these three years and six months past; ever she dwelt cloistered 5 among her maid-servants, in a secret bower she had made for herself on the roof of her house, wearing sackcloth about her 6 waist and keeping fast continually, save on the sabbath and the new moon and what

¹ 'Son of Ruben' can hardly be taken literally, unless the names are deliberately fictitious. The phrase does not appear in the Septuagint Greek, which differs here in several other features.

other holidays were observed in Israel.
 7 She was a woman very fair to see, and her husband had left her great wealth, a full household, and lands well stocked with 8 cattle and sheep; a woman of high repute everywhere, and the Lord's devout worshipper; no man had a word to say in her dispraise.

9 This Judith, then, when she heard how Ozias had promised to surrender the city in five days' time, would have two of the elders, Chabri and Charmi, pay her a 10 visit.¹ And thus she greeted them, Is it true Ozias has promised he will hand the city over to the Assyrians, if in five days no 11 rescue comes to you? By what right, sirs, do you put the Lord's goodness to such a 12 test? This is no way to win it; rather, we shall earn his displeasure, add fuel to his 13 vengeance. What, would you set a date to the Lord's mercies, bid him keep tryst with 14 you on a day of your own appointing? Well for us that he, at least, is patient; repent 15 we, and with flowing tears ask his pardon! He will not overwhelm us with reproaches, 16 as men do; not his the human anger that bursts into flame. Abate we our pride, and 17 wait on him with chastened spirits; entreat him with tears to grant us relief at a time 18 of his own choosing. Then shall we, who stand aghast now at the pride of our 19 enemies, triumph in the reward of our humility. It is something that we have not 20 followed the evil example of our forefathers, who forsook their own God and 21 worshipped alien gods instead, dooming themselves thus to massacre, to plunder, 22 and to insult at the hands of their enemies. At least we acknowledge one God, and 23 him only. Wait we humbly till he sends us relief; he will avenge our wrongs by 24 bringing misfortune on our enemies; he, the Lord our God, will bring the invader 25 low, and disappoint him of his prize.

26 You, brethren, are among the elders of the people; their lives are in your charge. Yours to hearten them, by reminding them 27 what trials our fathers underwent, to shew whether they were God's worshippers in-28 deed; how Abraham was put to the proof, tested by long endurance, before he be-

29 came God's friend; how Isaac, Jacob, 23 Moses, and all who won God's favour, must be loyal to him under great affliction 30 first. And what of those others, who could 24 not hold out, submitting to the divine will, under these trials; who bore them-31 selves impatiently, and did the Lord des- 25 pite by complaining against him? These were the men the destroying angel slew, the men who fell a prey to serpents. It 32 is our turn to suffer now, and never a 26 word said in remorse-trance; think we the 33 Lord's rod too light a punishment for 27 our sins, believe we that he is punishing us as his servants, to chasten, not to 34 destroy.

35 All thou sayest is true, Ozias and the 28 elders confessed, beyond cavil. Pray for 36 us, holy woman as thou art, and the Lord's 29 true worshipper. Why then, said Judith, 37 if you recognize the words I say as God's 30 words, judge for yourselves whether the 38 deed I mean to do is of God's ordaining; 31 and pray him to bring my design to effect. Stand at the gate this night, while I pass 39 beyond it with my handmaid for company, 32 and pray that the Lord bring Israel relief within the five days you spoke of. But 40 what my design is, never ask me; till I 33 come back and give you news, I would have nothing of you but your prayers to the 41 Lord our God. Go in peace, Ozias said, 34 and the Lord be with thee, to the confusion of our enemies. And with that they left her, and withdrew.

9 When they had gone, Judith went to her place of prayer, sackcloth her garb, ashes sprinkled over her head, and thus, falling down before the Lord, she cried for mercy: Lord God of my father 42 Simeon, thou didst put a sword in his hand to punish the alien for foul wrong done, for a virgin stripped and shamed;² thou 43 didst mark down their wives for spoil, their daughters for slavery, their goods as forfeit, to reward the men who had thy 44 honour at heart. Listen now, O Lord my God, to a widow's prayer. Thine are the 45 deeds of long ago; that this event should succeed that, was of thy contriving; all thy

¹ The Greek text says she sent for Ozias as well (cf. verses 28 and 34).

² The murder of the Sichemites by Simeon and Levi is apparently condemned by Jacob (Gen. 34. 30; 49. 5-6). But evidently the Simeonites only preserved the tradition that their ancestor had shewed a laudable zeal for God's service, in taking vengeance for the contamination of the Israelite stock with alien blood.

Turn thy eyes now to yonder Assyrian camp, as thou didst let them fall long ago on the Egyptians, the armed host that went in pursuit of thy servants, boasting so proudly of its chariots and horsemen, its warrior strength. One glance from thee, and on that camp darkness fell; their feet were sucked down into the depths, and the waters closed above them! So be it, Lord, with these others, that boast of their great array, now of chariots, now of pike and shield, of arrow and lance, and know not the name thou bearest, thou, our God, crushing the invader still. Lift up thy hand, as it was lifted up long ago; break power of theirs with power of thine! Helpless may they lie beneath thy vengeance, who now think to profane thy holy place, dishonour the very shrine of thy name, violate, at the sword's point, the sanctity of thy altar.

The sword of Holofernes! Lord, if it might be his own pride's undoing! Be the eyes he casts on me a lure to catch himself, the professions of love I make, his death-blow! Too bold be my heart to fear, too resolute to spare him! Let him fall by a woman's hand, and all the glory of it will be ascribed to thy name. Not in the mustering of great armies, Lord, thy power is shewn; not on the well-horsed warrior thy choice falls; never did boasting earn thy favour. Still from a humble soul, an obedient will, the prayer must come that wins thee. God of the heavens, maker of the floods, Lord of this universal frame, listen to the defenceless plea of one who trusts only in thy mercy. Bethink thee, Lord, of thy covenant; grant my lips utterance, my heart firm resolve; so shall thy temple ever remain inviolate, so shall all the Gentiles learn that thou art God, and hast none to rival thee.

10 Then, her plea for the divine succour ended, Judith rose from the ground where she lay prostrate in the Lord's presence, called her maidservant to her, and went downstairs into her house. Flung aside, now, the sackcloth, folded away her widow's weeds; she bathed herself, anointed herself with the finest myrrh, parted and tied her hair. The garments of happier days she donned anew, put on her sandals, took bracelet and anklet, ear-ring and finger-ring; decked herself with every ornament she had. The Lord himself lent grace to her mien; manly resolve, not woman's wantonness, was the occasion of her finery, and he would enhance her beauty till all beholders should vow there was never woman so fair. A bottle of wine she bade her serving-maid carry, and a phial of oil, parched corn and dry figs, and bread, and cheese, and so she went out on her journey. When they reached the gates, they found Ozias and the elders of the city awaiting them there; and no sooner did these catch sight of her, than they fell into a great wonderment of her beauty. Still they did not question her, but let her pass; May the God of our fathers, they said, grant thee his favour, and his strength speed whatever design is in thy heart. Cause may Jerusalem have to be proud of thee; may thy name live among the holy and the just! And all the bystanders, as with one voice, said Amen to that.

So, with a prayer to the Lord, Judith passed out at the gate, and her maidservant with her. At break of day, while she was yet making her way down the mountain-slope, she fell in with the advance-guard of the Assyrians, who stopped her, and asked whence she came, whither she was bound? A Hebrew, she said, but I have given my fellow-countrymen the slip, well knowing that the city must fall into your hands. Why did they defy you, and refuse to surrender, instead of throwing themselves on your mercy? What was I to do? I determined to win audience with your general, Holofernes, and tell him of their secret plans; shew him, too, means by which he may reduce the city without losing a man of his army. Her story told, they must next scan her face; and now their eyes dazzled with the admiration they had of her beauty. It has been the saving of thy life, they told her, this plan thou hast formed of betaking thyself to our master yonder. Of this be well assured, once thou hast found thy way to his presence he will use thee well; none so welcome as thou. And so they led her to Holofernes' tent, and advised him of her coming.

17 No sooner did she stand before him, than Holofernes' eyes made him her prisoner.
 18 Meanwhile, his lords were saying to one another, Who shall belittle the Hebrew folk, or doubt they are worth the attacking, when for prize there are such women as this? As for Judith, she saw 19 only Holofernes, as he sat there with a canopy over him, a canopy of purple, with gold and emeralds and other precious stones worked into it. She looked him full 20 in the face, then did reverence, bowing down to earth, until his servants raised her to her feet, at their master's bidding.

11 Compose thyself, Holofernes said; no need thy heart should misgive thee. None ever yet came to harm through me, that would do homage to my lord 2 Nabuchodonosor; never had lance of mine been raised against thy own people, if they 3 had not defied me. Tell me, what moved thee to part from their company and betake 4 thyself to us? My lord, said Judith, I have counsel for thee; do but take the advice this handmaid of thine offers, and the Lord 5 shall do great things with thee. By the life of Nabuchodonosor I swear it,¹ by the power of Nabuchodonosor, committed to thee here and now for the punishment of rebellious spirits! All men, nay, the brute beasts themselves, thou tamest to his will;
 6 of thy unwearied labours all nations know; a world acclaims thee for the best and greatest of his subjects; no province but speaks of thy wise government.

7 It is common knowledge among us what Achior said to thee, and what doom thou 8 hast pronounced in return. His words have come true; God is indeed angered by our sins, so angered that he has sent warning through his prophets, he means 9 to put our guilty race in thy power, and if the Israelites tremble at thy coming, it is because they know they have lost their 10 God's favour. And now, with famine threatening them, doomed to perish from 11 lack of water, they have taken a worse resolve. They mean to kill their cattle and 12 drink the blood; they mean to satisfy their own needs with the hallowed corn, wine, and oil offered to the Lord their God, tasting what they are forbidden to touch. This done, it is certain they will involve themselves in ruin. Hearing such news, what marvel if I shun their fellowship? Thy handmaid now; the Lord has sent me to tell thee of all this. Thy handmaid, but my own God I must still worship, though I be dwelling in thy camp. Suffer me, my lord, to go beyond its bounds, and offer prayer to God; so he will make it known to me, when he means to punish their guilt, and I will come and tell thee. Then I will take thee into the heart of Jerusalem, and thou wilt find the whole people of Israel defenceless as strayed sheep, not a dog to bark at thee. It is God's providence has advised me of all this; his vengeance that has sent me to warn thee of it.

This was welcome hearing for Holofernes and all that served under him; what prudence was hers! They told one another, Never was a woman such as this, so fair to look upon, so wise to listen to. And Holofernes said to her, God has been good indeed, sending thee here in advance of thy people, so as to give them up into our hands. These are fair promises thou makest; will he but bring them to fulfilment, thy God shall be my God too, and thou thyself, at Nabuchodonosor's court, shalt be held in high honour; wide as the world shall be thy renown.

12 And now Holofernes would have her repair to the tent where he kept his treasures, and lodge there; and he was for sending food to her there from his own table. But Judith told him, Eat I may not of the portion thou wouldst assign me; that were a grave fault; I have brought my own provisions with me. Ay, thou hast brought them, Holofernes said, but how if they should not suffice? How shall we fend for thee? My lord, answered Judith, as thou art a living man, God will prosper thy handmaid's undertaking before ever these are spent. So his servants shewed her to the tent he had designed for her; but as she entered it, she asked that she might be allowed to leave it each night, before day broke, and, praying, make her peace with the Lord. So he gave orders to his chamberlains, that for the next three days she should be allowed to come and go as she would, for the worship of her God; each night she went out to the vale of Bethulia, and washed herself in a fountain there, and prayed, as she came up out of the water, the God of Israel would speed her errand for his people's deliverance. Then she guarded herself against defilement by keeping her tent all day, till she made her meal at sun-down.

On the fourth day, Holofernes made a banquet for his own attendants, and sent his chamberlain Vagoa with an invitation to her. Prevail if thou canst, said he, on this Hebrew woman to grant me, of her own free will, her favours. (Great shame the Assyrians hold it in a man, if any woman fools him, and contrives to escape from his company unmolested.) So Vagoa waited on Judith, and said, Fair lady, make no scruple to appear as an honoured guest in my master's presence, to eat with him, and make merry over the wine. It is not for me, Judith answered, to gainsay my lord in this. Whim and will of his shall be whim and will of mine; I ask no better, all my life, than to obey his pleasure. With that, she rose up and threw her robe about her, and so made her way into Holofernes' presence; fast beat his heart within him, such was his longing for her charms. Drink with me, he said; fall to, and make merry; thou art right welcome. And Judith answered, Drink I will, my lord; never was a day in my life so proud as this. So she ate and drank with him, but only what her serving-maid had prepared for her. And Holofernes, basking in her smiles, drank ever deeper; never drank Holofernes as on that night.

13 And now it was late; his attendants were fain to make for their beds, leaving Vagoa, the last of them, to shut the doors of the banqueting-room; the wine had made drowsy men of them. In the banqueting-room, Judith was now left alone, save for Holofernes, that lay full length on his couch by the table, in drunken sleep. Her maid she left at the door, to keep watch; she herself, standing by the couch, wept silently, and silently moved her lips in prayer. Lord God of Israel, she said, give me strength! Now guide these hands aright, and give Jerusalem the relief thou hast promised; now be the task performed, but for the hope of thy aid, undreamed of! With that, she went to the head of the couch, and unfastened the scimitar that hung there; unsheathed it, and caught the sleeping man by the hair; Lord God, she said, strengthen me now! Twice the scimitar fell on his neck, and cut clean through it; down came the canopy from the pillars, down fell the headless body to the earth, and ere long she was at the doors, giving the severed head to her maid-servant and bidding her thrust it away into the wallet she carried. Then they went out, both of them, right through the camp, as if bound on their customary errand of prayer; but this time they took the winding path along the valley, right up to the city gates.

Far away rang the cry of Judith to the watchmen on the city walls, Open the gates! God is on our side. Open the gates! His power yet lives in Israel. These, upon hearing her voice, ran to tell the elders of the city, and all, high and low, went out to meet her; they had thought never to see her again. There, by torch-light, they gathered round her, and she, mounting on to higher ground, bade them keep silence. Silence was made, and thus Judith began, Praise the Lord our God; he does not forsake those who put their trust in him. Through me, his handmaid, deliverance has come to Israel's race, as he promised; through me, this night, the enemy of his people lies slain. With that, she took Holofernes' head out of the wallet where it lay hidden. Look upon this, she cried, and know that the Assyrian army has lost its general. Look upon this, the canopy he lay under, in drunken sleep, when the Lord our God smote him, and by the hand of a woman. And, as the Lord is a living God, well did his angel watch over me, thither going, there abiding, and thence returning. The Lord would not have his own handmaid stained with sin; he has brought me back to you inviolate, to glory in his triumph, my preservation, and your deliverance. One and all, then, give thanks to the Lord; the Lord is gracious, his mercy endures for ever!

Thereupon all of them offered the Lord worship; and to her they said, With his own power the Lord has blessed thee, and by thy means has brought our enemies to nothing! And Ozias, that was the Israelites' commander, said to her, Blessing be thine, my daughter, from the Lord God, the most high, such as no other woman on earth can claim! Blessed be the Lord, maker of heaven and earth, for sending thee out to wound the head of our arch-enemy. Such high renown he has given thee this day, that the praise of thee shall never die on men's lips, so long as they hold the Lord's power in remembrance. Thy own life thou wouldst not prize, when thy countrymen were in need and great affliction; thou wouldst avert our ruin, with our God to speed thee. And to that all the people said Amen.

Then Achior was summoned, and thus Judith greeted him: No credit hast thou lost, by averring that the God of Israel did not spare his enemies; by my hand, this night, he has cut down the chief of those who gave thee the lie. Was it not Holofernes that defied the God of Israel, in his proud insolence, and threatened thyself with death? When Israel was conquered, thou too, he said, shouldst be put to the sword. To prove which was the truer prophet, here is his head. Upon seeing the head of Holofernes, Achior was in such a great taking of fear that he fell to earth in a swoon. Then, coming back to his senses and taking heart again, he did reverence, bowing low at her feet; Wherever the sons of Jacob dwell, said he, God has made thy name a name of blessing; wherever thy renown reaches through the world, the God of Israel shall be glorified in the telling of it.

14 Hang we this head from the battlements, Judith said to the people; and now, brethren, here is my plan. At sunrise, arm all of you, and go out to the attack; but this attack of yours will be a feint, you will not go down into the plain. It will suffice to make the advance guards retreat, and rouse their general; and when their leaders hasten to the tent of Holofernes, to find his headless body lying in a pool of blood, they will be overcome by terror. Then, once assured that they are ready for flight, go out after them undismayed, and the Lord will beat them to dust under your feet.

(Meanwhile Achior, such visible proof before his eyes of what Israel's God could do, cast heathenry aside and learned to believe in God. He would be circumcised, and reckoned among Israel's folk, and so his posterity remain to this day.)

No sooner was day dawned, and Holofernes' head raised aloft on the battlements, than all took up their arms, and sallied out with a great stir and noise of shouting, whereupon the enemy's advance guard hastened back to Holofernes' tent. The guards there went to the door of the banqueting-room and bustled to and fro; rouse their lord they must, but they had rather make this show of commotion and disturb him with their din, than wake him outright; never a man in all the Assyrian army durst knock at the door or go in. But now chief and captain and commander in the Assyrian king's service were waiting there, and they said to Holofernes' attendants, Go in and rouse him; these Israelite rats have left their holes, and are boldly offering battle. Upon this, Vagoa went into the room where he lay, and stood behind the curtain clapping his hands; no doubt had he but Holofernes was there with Judith for his bed-fellow. Then, when his ears told him that the sleeper had not moved, he went closer to the curtain and lifted it. And when he saw the headless body of Holofernes lying there on the ground, weltering in its own blood, he gave a loud cry of lament, and tore his garments about him. Making his way to Judith's tent, and finding her gone, he ran out to where the others stood; Here is great despite done, he cried, to the court of king Nabuchodonosor, and one Jewish woman its author! Holofernes lies there felled to the earth, and no head on his body!

At this news, all the Assyrian leaders tore their garments; a craven fear fell on them they could not master, and their spirits were cowed utterly; never was such a cry as went up then from the heart of the Assyrian camp.

15 When word of this outrage upon Holofernes spread through the army, plan and purpose had they none;

taking counsel only of the fear that shook their limbs, they sought refuge in flight. None might say a word to his neighbour, none might lift his head; they left all behind, and hastened to make good their escape from the rumoured onslaught of the Hebrews, some taking the roads across the plain, some the mountain tracks. The Israelites, when they saw their backs turned, went in pursuit, and swept down the hill-side with blowing of trumpets and a great shouting at their heels. The Assyrians, in their headlong flight, could not hold together, and their enemies, pursuing them in orderly array, need only catch them to overpower them; so Ozias sent out messengers to all Israel, city-dwellers and country-dwellers alike, and none but sent out the flower of their manhood, ready armed for the pursuit. At the sword's point they followed them, to the very frontiers of their domain. As for the folk who had been left behind in Bethulia, they made their way into the Assyrian camp, whence they carried off all the Assyrians had left behind when they fled, and it was no light load they brought home with them. When the victorious army returned, with the spoils taken from their enemies, there was no counting the cattle and the pack-beasts and the plunder of all sorts; none, high or low, but was enriched with the booty.

And now the high priest Joacim¹ came to Bethulia, with all that were his fellow elders at Jerusalem, asking to see Judith; and when she answered his summons, all with one voice began to extol her; Thou art the boast of Jerusalem, the joy of Israel, the pride of our people; thou hast played a man's part, and kept thy courage high. Not unrewarded thy love of chastity, that wouldst never take a second husband in thy widowhood; the Lord gave thee firmness of resolve, and thy name shall be ever blessed. And to that all the people said Amen.

Scarce did thirty days suffice for the men of Israel to gather the Assyrian spoils. Among these, all that proved to be Holofernes' own went to Judith herself, gold and silver, clothes and jewels, and furniture of every sort; all these the people handed over to her, keeping high festival, while man and maid, wed and unwedded, played flute and harp together.

16 Then Judith herself sang to the Lord, and this was Judith's song: Strike up, tambour, and cymbals beat in the Lord's honour, sound a fresh song of praise; high enthroned him, call aloud upon his name! What power divine crushes the enemy, but the Lord's great name? Here in the midst of his people he lies encamped; come what enemy may, he grants deliverance.

Came the Assyrian from the northern hills in his great strength, the valleys choked with his marching columns, the mountain glens black with his horses; to send fire through our country-side, put our warriors to the sword, mark down our children for slavery, our maidens for spoil. Great despite the Lord Almighty did him, that he should fall into a woman's power for his death-blow. Not by warriors' hands the tyrant fell; not giants smote him, not heroes of the old time barred his path; it was Judith, Merari's daughter, Judith's fair face that was his undoing. Laid aside now, her widow's weeds; festal her array must be; a feast waits for the sons of Israel. Ointment, there, for her cheeks, a band for her straying locks, a robe new-wrought to ensnare him! Her very sandals thrall'd his eyes; he lay there, his heart beauty's prisoner, while the sharp steel pierced his neck through. Stood Persian, stood Mede aghast at the boldness of her resolve; loud rang the cry of the Assyrian camp, when the hard-pressed defenders sallied out against them, parched with thirst! Slaves, did they call us? But we gave them cold steel; cut them down where, like slaves, they ran; one glance from the Lord our God, and the battle was lost.

A hymn, a new hymn, sing we to the Lord our God. Great and glorious thou art, Lord Adonai; there is no outmatching thy wondrous power. Let all thy creatures do thee service; were they not made at thy word, fashioned by a breath from thee? When thou commandest, none but must

¹ The only high priest we know of as bearing this name held office during the early days of the Persian empire, long after the fall of Assyria (Neh. 12. 10). Once more, the suggestion seems possible that the names in the story have been artificially supplied.

18 obey. Rain-swept, the mountains quake from their depths, the rocks melt like wax 19 at thy coming. Yet great, by thy measure, are those that fear thee, in all their doings 20 great. Woe to the nations that levy war on my people; when the time comes for judgement, the Lord Almighty will execute vengeance on them; he will not spare.
 21 Their flesh the fire shall scorch, the worm shall devour; lament they must and bear their pain for ever.

22 And now, their victory won, all went to Jerusalem to worship the Lord there; once they were cleansed of defilement, burnt-sacrifice was done, vow and promise were 23 paid by all alike. As for Judith, she kept none of Holofernes' spoil, that the people had given her, nor the canopy she had carried off from his banqueting-room, for herself; she offered them up as a thing 24 forfeit.¹ High festival the people kept, there before the sanctuary; for three whole months they solemnized their victory, and Judith among them. Then they dispersed 25 to their homes, and Judith, back at Bethulia, was held in great renown; in all Israel, none so honoured as she. So well, 26 in her, did chastity mate with valour; once her husband was dead, she never had knowledge of man again. When she left her 27 house on festival days, great reverence was hers indeed. And for the serving-maid, 28 Judith let her go free.

There, then, Judith lived on in her husband's dwelling-place, and a hundred and five years had passed before she was laid to rest at his side at Bethulia; and the 29 whole people bewailed her for seven days together. All the while she lived, and long 30 after her death, was never enemy that disturbed the peace of Israel. In the Hebrew 31 calendar, a day of rejoicing commemorates her victory; in such honour have the Jews held it from that day to this.

¹ Literally, 'as an anathema of forgetfulness'; in the Greek, 'as an offering'. If the Vulgate rendering is right, the phrase probably alludes to the proceedings mentioned in Deut. 13. 16, Jos. 7. 24

THE BOOK OF ESTHER

NOW turn we to the days of Assuerus,¹ that was lord of a hundred and twenty-seven provinces, from India on this side to Ethiopia on that, and was firmly established on the throne of his kingdom, with the city of Susa for his capital. It was now the third year of his reign, and he held high feast for all his lords and vassals; Persian warriors, Median notables, and the governor of every province, were his guests. All should have proof of his royal splendour, of the power and pride that were his; and long they kept holiday, for a hundred and eighty days together. And when the festivity drew to an end, he would entertain all the folk of Susa, high and low; for a whole week a banquet was spread for them at the gates of his garden, amid trees planted by art at the royal bidding. On every side, fastened by ivory rings to marble columns, hung canopies, some white, some flaxen, some violet, with cords of fine linen and purple thread; couches of gold and silver were set here and there on a floor of malachite and marble, wondrously patterned. From golden cups they drank, and the very trenchers on which the meat was served were ever of new design. Wine they had in plenty, and of rare vintage, as befitted a king's state; nor was any man compelled to drink; the king had set one of his nobles at the head of each table, bidding him see that each man drank as drink he would. For the women the queen, Vasthi, held a banquet too, in Assuerus' own palace.

The seventh day had come; the king's heart was merry, warmed by long draughts of wine; and now he had an errand for the seven chamberlains that waited on him, Maumam, Bazatha, Harbona, Bagatha, Abgatha, Zethar and Charchas. They were to bring queen Vasthi into the king's presence, wearing the royal crown, so that he might display her person to the rabble as well as to his lords; hers was no common beauty. Vain was the royal summons the chamberlains brought her; she would not come. Whereupon the king broke out into a great passion of rage, and was fain to take counsel of the wise men that were ever about his person, after the fashion of courts; theirs was still the advice he followed, theirs the knowledge of ancient law and precedent. (The chief of them, and the nearest to his person, were Charsena, Sethar, Admatha, Tharsis, Mares, Marsana and Mamuchan; these seven princes of Persia and Media attended on him always, and had places next himself.) What sentence should he pass on queen Vasthi, to whom he, king Assuerus, had sent a summons through his chamberlains, and in vain?

Thereupon, in the hearing of the king and his nobles, Mamuchan thus spoke: Queen Vasthi has put a slight, not upon the king's grace only, but on all men, high and low, in his dominions. All our women-folk will hear what she has done, and all will set their husbands at defiance, reminding them how king Assuerus sent for queen Vasthi, and she would not come. Not a wife in Persia or Media but will disobey her husband more lightly for this example; the king has good reason to be angry. So please thee, let an edict go out in thy name, by the laws of Persia and Media irrevocable, forbidding Vasthi ever to come into the royal presence again. Let the crown pass to some head worthier than hers. In all the broad lands under thy domain let this decree be published; so to all husbands, high and low, their wives shall pay due honour henceforward.

King and nobles liked the plan well, and the king did as Mamuchan had advised, sent a letter to each nation in the tongue it spoke, the characters it used, decreeing that a man should be lord and master in his own house, and the whole world must take note of it.²

¹ Assuerus is the name given on inscriptions to that king Xerxes who was defeated by the Greeks at Salamis in 480 B.C. ² Instead of this last phrase, the Hebrew text has 'and should speak the tongue of his own people,' an expression difficult to account for.

2 With time, the rage of Assuerus cooled down, but he had not forgotten Vasthi's offence, or her dismissal. And now his courtiers and attendants offered him their counsel, It is time we made search for beauty and maidenhood, to console the king's grace. It would be well if commissioners were sent into all the provinces, to look out fair damsels that are maidens still, and bring them here to Susan. There let them be handed over to the chamberlain Egeus, that has charge of the women's quarters in the palace, and an allowance be made them for adding art to their beauty, and for all else they need. And she, who most of all wins the royal favour, shall be queen instead of Vasthi. The king liked this counsel well, and gave orders that it should be put into effect. There was a Jew called Mardocheus living at Susan, descended through Jair and Semei from Cis the Benjamite,¹ who was carried off from Jerusalem by the Babylonian king Nabuchodonosor at the same time as king Jechonias of Juda. A ward this man had, a niece of his called Edissa, or Esther, that had lost both her parents. Beauty was hers of form and face, and when her parents died, Mardocheus adopted her as his own daughter. In accordance with the king's bidding, Esther was carried off among many other fair maidens to Susan, and there handed over to the chamberlain Egeus, to be kept in waiting with the rest. Her charms won his favour, and he bade her attendant set about the anointing of her without more ado; choice foods should be allotted to her, and seven maids, the fairest in all the palace, to wait on her, adorning with all his art her person and theirs. Of her race and country she had told him nothing; concerning that, Mardocheus had enjoined silence on her; and he himself walked to and fro, every day, before the lodging of those fair pensioners, so great was his care for Esther and of what would befall her.

It was a full twelvemonth before a maiden's turn came, to be the king's bride; first she must add art to her beauty, anointing herself for six months with oil, and for six with paints and powders. Ever the bride was given what adornment she would, and so, in finery of her own choosing, passed out from the maidens' lodging to the royal bed-chamber. Each morning, the bride of yesternight was escorted to a new home, where the chamberlain Susagazi, master of the royal concubines, had charge of her, nor might she ever find her way back to the king, save at his will and on his express summons.

So the day came when it was the turn of Esther, Abihail's child, daughter now to his brother Mardocheus, to be a king's bride. For her adorning, she had no request to make; let the chamberlain Egeus, since the maidens were under his charge, deck her as he would. But oh, she was fair; she had beauty past all belief, to win men's favour and their love. It was in Tebeth, the tenth month, in the seventh year of Assuerus' reign, that she was escorted to the royal bed-chamber.² More than all those others she won the king's heart, more than all she enjoyed his loving favour; on her head he set the royal crown, and made her his queen in place of Vasthi. And he had a great feast prepared for all his lords and vassals, Esther's bridal feast. To all his dominions he granted a public holiday, and made them gifts, with princely liberality, besides.

And now, the brides summoned and housed anew,³ Mardocheus took up his post at the gates of the palace itself. Still faithful to his bidding, Esther had said no word about her race or her country; still, as in her nursery days, she remembered and did all he told her. And it was while Mardocheus haunted the palace gates

¹ If Assuerus is identified with Xerxes, the words 'who was carried off' should perhaps be applied to Cis, not to Mardocheus; otherwise Mardocheus must have been more than a hundred years old. But see note 2 on page 448. According to the Hebrew text and the Septuagint Greek, Esther was cousin, not niece, to Mardocheus. So in 2. 15 below 'his brother' should, according to the Hebrew, be 'his nephew'.

² The slow progress of events may be partly explained, if Assuerus is Xerxes, by his absence during the time of his campaign against Greece.

³ Literally, in the Hebrew text, 'when the maidens were collected a second time', in the Latin, 'when the maidens were sought out and collected a second time'. Commentators are much exercised to know how a repetition of the procedure mentioned in verse 3 should have been either likely in itself, or relevant to the present context. The rendering given above is based on what seems the most probable interpretation; the brides had now passed out of Egeus' care into the seraglio proper (verse 14); Mardocheus, therefore, deserted his post at the entrance of Egeus' establishment (verse 11), and mingled with the hangers-on at the gates of the palace itself.

that two of the royal chamberlains, Bagathan and Thares, door-keepers both at the palace entry, grew disaffected, and would have made a murderous attack on the king's person. Mardocheus came to hear of it, and told queen Esther; she, naming him as her informant, told her husband. The charge was investigated, and found true; the two conspirators were hanged, and the circumstance was put on record, being entered in the king's own archives.

3 It was after this that king Assuerus bestowed high rank upon an Agagite, Aman the son of Amadathi, bidding him take precedence of all his other nobles. And all the royal attendants at the palace gates must bow the knee and do Aman reverence, such were their orders. But Mardocheus went his own way, and would neither bow nor bend. Often the king's men asked him at the palace doors why he thus defied the royal bidding, but still he gave them no heed, till at last they told Aman of it. Would he still be so stiff in his opinions? They had learned from him by now that he was a Jew. Aman, when he heard their story, and proved the truth of it for himself, that Mardocheus would neither bow nor bend, fell into a great passion of rage; and, hearing that he was a Jew, he would not be content with laying hands on Mardocheus only; the whole race, throughout all Assuerus' dominions, should be brought to ruin for it. It was in the twelfth year of the reign, in Nisan, the first month of it, that the lot (which the Hebrews call Pur) was cast into the urn in Aman's presence, to determine the day and month when he would make an end of the Jews; and the month chosen was the twelfth month, Adar.

So now Aman said to king Assuerus, There is a race spread here and there throughout thy domains that follows strange law and custom, in defiance of the royal decrees; judge whether it consorts with thy royal dignity that licence should embolden them. Be it thy pleasure to decree their destruction, and I promise thee an increase of ten thousand talents to thy revenue. There and then Assuerus took off the ring he wore on his hand, and gave it to the Agagite Aman, son of Amadathi, the Jews' enemy; Keep it for thy own use, said he, the money thou offerest, and as for the people, do what thou wilt with them. So, on the thirteenth day of that month, Nisan, the royal secretaries were summoned, and a decree was made in Aman's sense. Governor and chieftain must receive a letter, each in the language and the characters of his own province or tribe, sent in the name of king Assuerus and sealed with his royal seal. All through his dominions the couriers went out on their errand, bearing death and ruin to all the Jews, to young and old, to women and little children with the rest. The day fixed for their massacre and the seizing of their goods was the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, Adar. The tenour of the letter, sent out to warn all the provinces and have them in readiness for the stated day, was this . . .¹ No time the couriers lost in following out the royal command; at Susan, the decree was posted up forthwith, and before the king and Aman had finished their wine, all the Jewish citizens were in tears.

4 When the news reached Mardocheus, he tore his garments about him; put on sackcloth, and sprinkled ashes on his head; and as he went through the open square in the heart of the city, loud lament betrayed the bitterness of his grief. Lamenting he made his way to the outer gates of the palace; further than that he might not go, into the royal court, with sackcloth for his wear. So it was everywhere; never a province, town or district the cruel edict reached but there was mourning and fasting, wailing and weeping among the Jewish folk, and of sackcloth and ashes many among them made their beds.

Esther heard, from her maidservants and from the chamberlains, what Mardocheus did; she was bewildered at the news, and sent out clothes for him to wear instead of his sackcloth, but he would have none of it. Then she sent for Athach, the chamberlain whom the king had deputed for her needs, bidding him go and ask Mardochoaeus what his doings meant.

6 There in the public square, before the gate that led to the palace, Athach found him, and heard from him all the news; of the money Aman had promised to the royal treasury in return for the Jews' destruction. Mardochoaeus gave him a copy, too, of the edict which had been posted in Susan, bidding him shew it to the queen; go she must into the king's presence, and

9 plead there the cause of her people.¹ So

10 Athach went back with his message. But 11 she sent this answer: No subject of the king's grace, no province in his domains, but knows the inner court of the palace to be sacred. Man or woman entering it unbidden dies there and then; unless indeed the king should grant them life, by holding out his gold sceptre in token of pardon. These thirty days past I have not been summoned to the king's presence; how can I venture in?

12 Upon receiving this message, Mardochoaeus answered, Do not flatter thyself that a royal court will shelter thee in the 14 general massacre of thy countrymen. Keep silence, and the Jews will find some other means of deliverance; on thee and thine destruction shall fall. Who knows, but thou hast reached the throne only to be ready

15 for such an opportunity as this? Then

16 Esther sent word, Go and muster all the Jews thou canst find in Susan, and pray for me. Spend three days and nights without food or drink, while I and my maidens fast too. Then I will break the law by appearing in the king's presence unsummoned, 17 though I must die for it. And Mardochoaeus went away, to do as Esther had bidden him.

5 The third day came, and Esther put on her royal robes; and, so clad, made her appearance before the king's palace, within the royal (that is, the inner) court. There sat the king on his throne, in the palace council chamber, facing the main

2 door; he saw Esther, his queen, standing there without, and the sight of her won his heart. Out went the golden sceptre he bore, and as she drew near to kiss the tip of it, Why, Esther, said he, what is thy errand? Ask me for half my kingdom, and it is thine. My lord king, she answered, do me the honour of dining with me to-day; I have a feast prepared; and bring Aman with thee. The king, without more ado, had Aman summoned to wait, there and then, on Esther's pleasure; and both of them went to the feast she had prepared. Deep drank the king that day, and said to Esther, What wouldst thou? Tell me what thy desire is? Be it half my kingdom, it shall not be denied thee. What would I have? said she. I ask no more than this; since the king's grace is ready to humour my whim, to grant me what I ask, do me the favour to dine with me to-morrow, and Aman with thee; then I will make known to the royal ear what my request is.

A proud man was Aman that day, and he went home treading on air. But Mardochoaeus still sat at the palace door; rise up he would not, nor stir from his post. And Aman, seeing it, fell into a rage. He gave no mark of it then, but when he reached home he called all his friends about him, and his wife Zares among them, and opened his mind. He recounted to them how great his wealth was, how many children were his, what honour the king had done him by promoting him to be the chief of all his nobles and courtiers. More, he said; it was but this day queen Esther gave the king a banquet, and would have me and none other for his fellow-guest; to-morrow I must dine with her again, with the king present. All this is mine, he said, and all this is nothing to me, while I yet see Mardochoaeus sitting there at the palace gate.

But they had a remedy for this, his wife Zares and those friends of his. Have a gallows made, fifty cubits high, so that to-morrow thou canst bid the king have Mardochoaeus hanged on it. Then thou mayst go light-hearted enough, to feast with the king. This counsel Aman liked well, and he gave his men orders to have a high gallows in readiness.

6 All that night the king could not sleep; so he would have the annals of his reign brought to him, the record of times past, and they began to read these out in his presence. In the reading of them, they came upon the story of the plot made by two chamberlains, Bagathan and Thares, to murder the king, and how Mardocheus gave information of it. And for this loyalty, the king asked, what honours or rewards were given to Mardocheus? But page and courtier were agreed, Mardocheus was never the better for it. Who is out there in the court? the king asked. It was Aman, come into the inner court to find audience with the king, and have Mardocheus hanged on his gallows; so when they told him it was Aman, Let him come in, the king said.

Aman, said Assuerus, when he came in, what should a king do, if his heart is set on raising one of his subjects to great honour? And Aman, casting about in his mind, could think of no other man that would be so marked out for the royal favour, but himself. Why, said he, if such a man is to be honoured indeed, he should be dressed in royal robes, mounted on the king's own horse, and crowned with the royal crown; and let him ride through the city streets, with the noblest of all the king's vassals crying out at his bridle-rein, So he rides, whom most the king would honour. Lose no time, then, the king answered; bring robe and horse, and do as much thyself for the Jew Mardocheus, that sits there at the palace gates. And have a care that none of the ceremonies thou speakest of goes unobserved.

So Aman must bring robe and horse, must dress Mardocheus and mount him, and then go through the city streets at his bridle-rein, crying out, So he rides, whom most the king would honour. That done, Mardocheus went back to his post at the palace gates, while Aman made the best of his way home, weeping loud and hiding away his head. To his wife Zares and to all his friends he told the story of what befell; but from wife and counsellors he could get no comfort. If he is of the Jewish race,¹ they said, this Mardocheus who has begun to outmatch thee, thou wilt never get the better of him; yield to him thou must. And even as they spoke, in came the royal chamberlains, and hurried him off to the feast the queen had prepared for him.

7 So met they once again, the king and Aman, over the queen's wine. And once again, his heart warmed by drinking, Assuerus would know what Esther's mind might be; what was it she would have? Half of his kingdom should be hers for the asking. My lord king, she said, if this is indeed thy gracious pleasure, one gift I would ask, my life; one boon, the preservation of my people. Must we be crushed to nothing, I and my people; must we perish by massacre? To that we are doomed. If we were only marked down for slaves and bondwomen, our lot should be bravely borne; I would have nursed my grief in silence. But here is an enemy whose cruel designs concern the king's grace. Who is this man? Assuerus asked. Where is the insolence to be found that would make such an attempt as this? One enemy we have, said Esther, one schemer's malice we fear, and he is here in thy presence; Aman.

Upon hearing this, Aman was struck dumb, and could look neither king nor queen in the eyes. The king rose angrily from his place, left the banqueting-room, and went out to walk in the garden, among his trees. With that, Aman rose too, intent on winning his pardon from queen Esther; doubt he might not that the king was bent on his undoing. Thus minded, he fell sprawling across the couch on which Esther lay; and so the king found him, when he returned from garden to banqueting-room. What, cried he, will he ravish the queen before my eyes, and in my own house? And before the words were out of his mouth Aman was gagged and blindfold.

And now Harbona, one of the chamberlains in attendance on the king's person, came forward; What of the gallows, said he, fifty cubits high, that stands there by Aman's house, ready for Mardocheus, that saved the king's life?² Let Aman himself hang on it, said the king. So Aman

¹ This is generally interpreted as an allusion to the divine protection enjoyed by the Jewish people. But we should have expected to find such an argument supported by reference to the events of Jewish history (cf. Judith 5. 6-25); and it is perhaps only a hostile reference to the Jews, implying that if once they rise to power they are careful not to lose it.

² Literally 'spoke good for the king', that is, gave useful information.

was hanged on the gallows he had raised for Mardocheaus; and with that, the king's angry mood was appeased.

8 That same day, Assuerus made a present to Esther of Aman's house, that was the Jews' enemy, and gave audience to Mardocheaus; for now Esther had told him that this was her uncle. He took back, too, the ring he had bade Aman wear, and gave it to Mardocheaus instead; and Mardocheaus was given charge of Esther's house. Nor would Esther be content, till she had fallen weeping at the king's feet and prayed him to prevent the mischief Aman had thought to do by his false plotting against the Jews. The golden sceptre was held out, in sign of the royal favour, and she rose to her feet and stood fronting him. Please it the king's grace, she said, to look favourably on my suit, and find nothing in it to his disadvantage. I would have new dispatches sent out, to revoke the order made by Aman, our crafty enemy, for the slaying of the Jews in all thy domains. How can I bear to see my own people exterminated by massacre? Nay, said the king to Esther and Mardocheaus; Aman's house I have granted to Esther, and Aman himself I have sent to the gallows, for daring to lift his hand against the Jews. But letters sent in the king's name and signed with his ring, by the custom of the realm, none must ever revoke.¹ Write rather in my name, under the royal seal, orders for the Jewish people to obey, in whatever sense likes you best.

9 So, on the twenty-third day of the third month, Siban, they summoned notary and scribe of the royal household, and at Mardocheaus' bidding they issued orders to the Jewish people. Letters were sent to all the chieftains, governors and judges who ruled the hundred and twenty-seven provinces between India and Ethiopia, written to each province or tribe in the characters it used and in the language it spoke; to the Jews, in their own characters and their own language. And these letters, written under the royal seal in the king's name, were sent out by post-boys, that must carry them from province to province before the earlier decree could be executed. City by city the Jews must be brought together, so that they could muster their whole number and fight for their lives. They might slay their enemies till they made an end of them, with their wives and children and all their households, and divide their goods as plunder. The day fixed everywhere for this act of retribution was the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, Adar. . . . A copy of the letter warning the Jews everywhere in Assuerus' empire, to be prepared for vengeance. . . .² Swiftly the post-boys went about their errand, and in Susan the royal edict was hung up for all to see.

When Mardocheaus came out from his audience with the king, resplendent in royal robes of violet and white, a gold crown on his head, his cloak of purple and lawn, the whole city welcomed him with rejoicing and applause; for the Jews, it was a dawn of new hope, a day of gladness and triumphant glory.

As each tribe, city and province received the royal letter, there was feasting and carousal and holiday; and many there were, of alien race and alien creed, that submitted themselves to Jewish rite and observance; such terror the name of Jewry struck into their hearts.

9 So Adar came, the last month of the year, and the thirteenth day of Adar. All preparations had been made, by blood-thirsty enemies, for a massacre of the Jews on that day, but instead, the Jews had the better of them, and could set about avenging themselves. City by city, town by town, region by region they banded themselves together, ready to strike the first blow against the men that hated and persecuted them. None dared withstand them, so wide-spread the fear their rise to power had engendered; judge and governor and chieftain, ruler and administrator everywhere had no praise too high for the Jewish people, for dread of Mardocheus; did he not hold the first place at court, high in the royal favour? Every day his fame grew, and he was in all men's mouths.

Great havoc the Jews wrought among their enemies that day, slaying the very men who had marked them down for slaughter; in Susan alone they put five hundred men to death, not counting the ten sons of Aman the Agagite. Ten sons he had, Pharsandatha, Delphon, Esphatha, Phoratha, Adalia, Aridatha, Phermestha, Arisai, Adirai and Jezatha; all these they slew, and would take nothing of theirs for plunder. And now, learning the number of those who had been killed at Susan, the king said to the queen, In Susan alone the Jews have slain five hundred men, and Aman's ten sons besides; here is massacre indeed, if in all my dominions they have done the like. Tell me, what more wouldst thou have me do for thee? Please it the king's grace, she answered, let the Jews be free to continue this day's work tomorrow; and let the bodies of Aman's sons be hanged on gibbets. So the king gave orders as she asked. No sooner was the decree posted up, than gallows were made for the bodies of Aman's sons; and on the fourteenth day of Adar the Jews mustered afresh, killing three hundred citizens of Susan, but taking nothing of theirs for plunder.

All over the king's dominions, the Jews fought for their lives, and put to death the enemies that persecuted them, till seventy-five thousand of them lay slain, and no plunder taken. Everywhere it was on the thirteenth of Adar they began laying about them, and next day they slew no more; so it was this day, the fourteenth, they made into a holiday, to be observed thenceforward with feast, and rejoicing, and carousal. In the city of Susan itself, the killing went on for two days; it was the fifteenth day, when their work was over, that they set apart for feasting and merry-making; but in the unwall'd towns and villages round about, carouse and rejoicing and the sharing out of dainties began on the fourteenth. So Mardocheus wrote to all the king's Jewish subjects, near and far, setting all this out and bidding them observe both the fourteenth and the fifteenth, year by year, as the days of Jewry's vengeance, when weeping and lament gave place to mirth and gladness. There was to be feasting on both days, and on both days rejoicing; dainties should be exchanged, and gifts made to the poor.

So the will they then had and the orders Mardocheus sent became a yearly rite; to recall how Amadathi's son, Aman the Agagite, thought to vent his enmity against the Jews by murderously destroying them, and how he consulted Pur, the lot; how Esther sought audience with the king, praying for a royal decree that should thwart his design, and make his malice fall on his own head; and how Aman and his sons went to the gallows. This feast has ever been known as the feast of Purim, because of Aman's lot-taking. Here in this letter, nay, this book you have been reading, the whole story has been set out, deeds done, griefs borne, and strange vicissitudes. And the Jews pledged themselves and their children, with all who in after times should seek admission to their way of worship, to observe two days in each year, at the fixed time by this record determined.¹ Never must the observance die out with the passing of years, where there are Jews living in any part of the world; in every city the feast of Lots must be kept by the Jews, and by all those on whom their ancestral customs are binding.

There was a second letter written by queen Esther, Abihail's daughter, and the Jew Mardocheus, confirming this ordinance for ever; it went out to all the Jews in the hundred and twenty-seven provinces of Assuerus' realm, wishing them health and assuring them that they had her warrant for keeping Purim feast with yearly rejoicing. And they, at the bidding of Mardocheus and Esther, bound themselves and their children to keep it in mind;

¹ Verses 20-27, the interpretation of which is in several places uncertain, are taken by some as implying that Mardocheus' letter set out at length the story of what had been happening at Susan, and that the Book of Esther itself is either a copy of, or an abridgement made from, this document.

the fasting, and the cries for aid, the casting this book, the book of Esther.

10 This Assuerus received tribute 2 from the islands out at sea; how great his reign was, you may learn from the Annals of the Medes and Persians. There, too, you will read of the high honours to which he 3 raised Mardocheaus; how Mardocheaus, a Jew, became next in rank to the king himself, a great name among Jewish names, a man well loved by his fellows, that sought his people's good and brought blessings on their race.

(So runs the Book of Esther in the Hebrew text, omitting certain passages which appear in the Septuagint Greek. In our Latin version, these additional passages have been collected at the end of the book, as in the translation given below. The remaining verses of this chapter, with verse 1 of chapter 11, occur at the end of the Septuagint Greek; they may, however, have been displaced, being an extract from some fuller narrative. The dream referred to is described in chapter 11.)

4 . . . All this has been God's doing, Mar-5 docheaus said. I have not forgotten the dream I had, and all this was foretold in 6 it; not a word but has come true. I dreamt of a little spring that grew into a river, spreading out into sun and sunlight, and so went rolling on in full tide. This was Esther, the king's bride that became his 7 queen. I dreamt of two dragons; of these, 8 I was one, and Aman the other. I dreamt of nations mustering for battle; these were the men that would have blotted out the 9 Jewish name. And the single nation in my dream was Israel; did not Israel cry out to the Lord, and win his protection, win deliverance from its wrongs? Wondrous proof he gave of his power, for all the world 10 to see. Two dooms he ordained, one for 11 God's people and one for the Gentiles, and either should take effect, all the world over, after an interval of time divinely decreed; then it was the Lord shewed he remembered his own people still, pitied his own servants still. With eager and glad hearts all must come together and observe that time, the fourteenth and fifteenth days of Adar, as long as Israel's race shall last.

11 This document about the feast of Purim, said to have been translated by Lysimachus son of Ptolemy, a native of Jerusalem, was first made public in the fourth year of king Ptolemy and queen Cleopatra, by Dosithaeus, who claimed to be a priest of true Levite descent, and his son, who was also called Ptolemy.¹

(The remaining twelve verses of this chapter, and the whole of chapter 12, appear in the Septuagint Greek as the introduction to the whole book. In part, they are a duplicate of 2. 5, 6, 21-23 above.)

On the first day of the month Sisan, in the second year of the great Artaxerxes, a vision came in a dream to Mardocheaus the Benjamite, who was descended from Cis through Jairi and Semei. Although a Jew, he dwelt at Susan, and was a man of consequence in the royal court;² he belonged to that band of exiles who were carried off from Jerusalem by Nabuchodonosor, king of Babylon, together with the king of Juda, Jechonias. His dream was this: Mutter-ings and uproar at first, thunder and earthquake, and commotion all over the world, and from these two dragons disengaged themselves, ready to join battle. Roused by their clamour, the whole world rose to levy war against one innocent nation; it was a time of darkness and of peril, of affliction and sore need, and great fear brooded over all the earth. Then this innocent nation, terrified by the misfortunes which threatened it, already marked down to die, cried out to the Lord. And at their cry, a great river grew out of a little spring, and rolled on in full flood; the sun returned, and the sunlight, the weak triumphed now, and tyranny fell a prey to their onslaught. All this Mardocheaus

¹ The dating here is obscure. Taken in conjunction with 12. 1, this verse seems to imply that the vision was seen after the incidents described in chapter 1 and in chapter 2. 1-20. But those incidents began with the third year of the reign, and it is difficult to see how we are still in the second. But probably chapter 12 is a separate fragment of the story, not closely connected with chapter 11 in date. 'Artaxerxes' is the Greek translator's rendering of 'Assuerus' throughout this book; the Latin has hitherto given him his Hebrew name Assuerus. ² See note on 2. 5 above. Here the reference is clearly to Mardocheaus himself; probably he only 'belonged' to the band of exiles carried off in 588 B.C. in the sense of being descended from them.

saw, and rose from his bed still wondering what the divine purpose was; still the vision haunted his mind, and he longed to know what was the meaning of it.

12 ...At this time his days were passed at the king's palace, and two of the royal chamberlains, Bagatha and Thara, were much in his company. When he came to know their minds better, and read the secret of their ambitions, he became aware that they were plotting against the king's life, and warned the king of his danger. Both, upon examination, confessed their guilt, and were sent to execution; and the king had the story recorded in his archives; Mardocheaus himself has also left an account of it. The royal orders were, that he should be rewarded for the information given, and lodged at the palace;¹ but already he had an enemy, Aman son of Amadathi, the Bugaeon. This Aman was in high favour with the king, and owed both Mardocheaus and his nation a grudge for bringing the two chamberlains to their death.

13 The great king Artaxerxes, to the governors of the hundred and twenty-seven provinces between India and Ethiopia, and to all his vassal chiefs, sends greeting. Wide as I rule, the world's conqueror, I would not abuse this great power of mine; mild and indulgent my sway should be, and my subjects live in undisturbed tranquillity; peace is man's greatest boon. So I asked my counsellors how this end might best be achieved; and among them Aman, who ranks next to my person; no counsellor so wise or so trusty as he. He it was told me of a race scattered about the world that lives by strange laws, and usages unknown to the rest of mankind; thinks lightly of the royal decrees, and by dissenting from them mars the concord of nations. Strange news, that one people should revolt against the whole of mankind; should follow misguided customs, slight our edicts, and disturb the peaceful order of our empire! This Aman, next to the king in dignity, is one we reverence like a father; in all our provinces, he is supreme. He will name the malefactors, who must be put to death with their wives and children, and no mercy shewn, on the fourteenth of Adar in this present year. In one day let them all be hurried to the grave, so that our realm may recover the peace they have denied it.

(The rest of this chapter, the whole of chapter 14 and chapter 15 verses 4-19 follow, in the Septuagint Greek, at the end of chapter 4 above.)

So Mardocheaus bethought him of all the Lord's great deeds in time past, and thus he prayed: O Lord, thou art the sovereign Lord and King of all things; nothing but is subject to thy power; who then can withstand thy will, if thou art minded to deliver Israel? Heaven and earth and all that heaven's vault contains is thy creation; thy dominion is universal, thy royalty unchallengeable. Thou knowest, who knowest all things, that if I refused proud Aman yonder my greeting, it was no pride of mine, no scorn, no ambition of mine that moved me. For Israel's sake, willingly enough would I kiss the dust his feet have trodden, did not fear withhold me from giving man that reverence which is God's due, from worshipping aught else than thee, my God. God of Abraham, our Lord and King, now as ever have mercy on thy people, now when our enemies threaten to destroy us, and put an end to thy ancient right. Wilt thou make so little of the possession thou didst win for thyself in Egypt? Nay, listen to my prayer, have mercy on the people thou claimest for thy own; turn our sadness, Lord, into rejoicing, and let us live to bless thy name; do not silence the lips that sing thy praise. Such was the mind, such was the prayer of all Israel, as they cried out to the Lord that day, with doom hanging over their heads.

14 And what of queen Esther? She too had recourse to the Lord, in her fear of the danger that threatened. Laid aside were those royal robes of hers, her array must tell only of grief and lament; dust and dung should be all her anointing now. Her body she tamed with fasting; only her torn locks hung where once she had loved to adorn her beauty. In such guise she made her plea to the Lord, the God of Israel; Lord, our King, thou reignest alone; befriend a lonely heart that can find help nowhere but in thee. The peril I must take upon me is plain to view. Lord, my childhood's lessons are still un-forgotten; I know that Israel, for all time, is the people of thy choice, chosen stock of a chosen race; I know that thy warnings have come true, and if thou hast given our enemies the mastery, it is because we sinned against thee, by worshipping the gods they worshipped; in all this, Lord, thou art nothing to blame. But now they are not content with holding us down under a cruel yoke; strong in the fancied protection of these false gods, they would fain set all thy promises aside, leave thee no possession on earth at all. They would silence the voices that praise thee, dim the glories of thy temple and thy altar;¹ nothing must be heard but the chant of the Gentiles boasting of their false gods, offering their endless praises to a mortal king.

Lord, wilt thou yield thy sceptre to gods that are no gods? Must the heathen laugh over our downfall? Let their own scheming recoil on them; bring him to a swift end, the man who has loosed his fury on us! Lord, bethink thee of our need, give proof of thy power; Lord, that hast no rival in heaven or earth, grant me confidence. Frame my utterance, as I speak with this fierce lord of mine, and embitter him against our enemy, bringing ruin on Aman and all that take Aman's part. So let thy power deliver us; grant help where help save thine is none. Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest how I hate the splendours of a godless court, how unwillingly I mate with an alien lord, a lord un-circumcised. The sport of ill-chance, how little I love the proud emblem of royalty I must wear before the world! Loathsome to me as the rags we women cast aside, how gladly I tear it from my brow, in this cool hour! At Aman's board I would never sit; even the king's banquets have no taste for me, nor would I drink the wine from which he pours libation. Ever since they brought me here, comfort thy handmaid had none, Lord God of Abraham, save in thee! Lord, that hast power over all men, listen to this cry of despair; save us all from the clutches of our enemies, and rid me of these fears that daunt me!

(The three verses which follow represent a section found by St Jerome as a detached fragment in the Latin version current before his time. But they correspond to the Septuagint Greek text of 4. 8, where the Hebrew and Vulgate texts stop short after the words 'Go she must into the king's presence, and plead there the cause of her people'. This phrase, however, is verbally different in the Vulgate of 4. 8 and 15. 1. In our present context St Jerome has added the note, The speaker is evidently Mardocheus.)

15 . . . So he bade her claim audience with the king, and intercede for her people and for her country. Remember, said he, the days of thy humbler fortunes, and how it was my care nurtured thee. Now thou art matched against Aman, that is next to the king's person; he pleads for our overthrow, and it is thine to plead for our preservation. Ask aid of the Lord, and seek the king's audience. . . .

(The remaining verses of this chapter represent an alternative version, in the Septuagint Greek, of the opening of chapter 5, and resume the narrative from 14. 19 above, which is the end of chapter 4 in the Greek. The main phrases of 5. 1-2 can be distinguished here in 15. 4, 9, 15.)

When the third day came, she laid aside the garb of prayer,² and put on all her fine array, queenly robes that dazzled the eye. One prayer she offered to the God who alone rules, alone can save; then bade two of her waiting-maids bear her company. On one she leant, as though her dainty form must needs be supported; the other followed her mistress as train-bearer. Al-

¹ This verse gives a hint that Aman had special designs against the restored Jewish exiles at Jerusalem, whose existence is nowhere else alluded to in the Book of Esther. ² This is perhaps the sense of the Greek; the Latin, probably through a confusion between oration and ornation, has 'the garb of her adornment', which gives no good sense.

luring beauty of flushed cheek and shining eye hid a heart grief-stricken, a heart chilled with an overwhelming fear. Door after door she passed, till she reached the king's presence, where he sat on his royal throne, royally clad, amid a glitter of gold and jewels; terrible of mien. No sooner had he looked up, his fiery glance betraying his angry humour, than the queen swooned away; white went her cheeks, as she leaned her head, fainting, on the maid that stood by.

And now God changed the king's mood all at once to mildness; he started from his throne in trembling haste, and was fain to hold her in his arms till she came to herself; and still with soothing words he reassured her: Esther, what is amiss with thee? Were I thy own brother, thou hadst not less cause to fear. Thy life is safe; to others the law forbids entry, never to thee; thou hast but to come near, and touch my sceptre. And with that, for she was voiceless still, he raised his golden sceptre and touched her neck with it; then kissed her, and asked, What, hast thou no word for me? My lord, she said, the sight of thee overawed me, as if I had seen one of God's angels; such reverence does thy majesty inspire. For indeed, my lord, there is nothing about thee but must be admired, nothing in thy looks but is gracious. Even as she spoke, once again her strength failed her; and she was near to fainting; the king was all anxiety, and his courtiers must needs come about him, seeking to allay her fears.

(This chapter appears in the Septuagint Greek after 8. 12. The letter here given is addressed throughout to the king's Gentile subjects; which suggests that two separate missives are referred to in 8. 9.)

16 The great king Artaxerxes, to the governors of the hundred and twenty-seven provinces between India and Ethiopia, and to all his vassal chiefs, sends greeting. The favour of princes has often bred insolence in those whom they advanced to high rank; they oppress their fellow-subjects, and are even prompted by their good fortune to plot against the authors of it; deaf to the claims of gratitude and of humanity, they think to escape the all-seeing scrutiny of God. A madness comes over them, and they assail with false charges the very men who win the praise of all by faithfulness to their duties; what easier, than to abuse with calumny the confidence of an unsuspecting ruler, who fancies all men to be as honest as himself? That men will so practise on the credulity of princes is evident both from history and from daily experience; no little foresight is needed, if the welfare of a great empire is to be preserved. The orders given yesterday must be reversed to-day; not from any caprice of ours, but because we have to consider the changing needs of the moment, in the best interests of the commonwealth.

But to our matter. We took under our protection, some time since, one Aman, son of Amadathi, a stranger; a Macedonian by race, with no share of our Persian blood, a Macedonian in his nature, whose cruel temper sorts ill with our Persian kindness.¹ He received from us nothing but friendly usage; we would have him called our father, we would have reverence paid to him as one that stood next to the king's person. And he? So was his heart swelled with pride, that he went about to deprive us of our royalty, and of life itself. First, with daring unheard-of, he would compass the death of two persons, through the general massacre of their race; Mardocheaus, to whose loyalty we owe life itself, and Esther, the queen-consort of our realm. Then, when their deaths had left us unbefriended, he would plot against our own empire and transfer it to the Macedonians.² Meanwhile, the race this inhuman wretch had marked down for slaughter, the Jewish race, proves to have deserved no blame whatever. The laws they follow are just; they are the children of that most high, most powerful and ever-living God by whose favour my fathers won this realm, and I maintain it.

Take note, then, that the directions
